He had, however, not only a wonderful gift of musical poetry, but also a firm grasp on musical form. More than any other composer, perhaps, he insisted on the absolute unity of the group of four or more pieces known as the symphony. In only one (the Rhine or Cathedral symphony, played at the festival of 1890,) does he depart from his practice of repeating some part of the melodies of one movement in succeeding movements. In the Rhenish symphony there was logical reason for this departure. In the symphony played last night, this system of reminiscence is developed to an extraordinary degree. Unity was still further promoted by the composer's express instruction, that there should be no waiting between the movements, and this injunction was obeyed. In some sense the notion of unity is emphasized by the fact that there is practically no second theme, where it should be expected, at the modulation in the first section of the first movement. Schumann took good care that there should be no peril of monotony, on the other hand, and the entire work is rich in attractive thematic material. Of the various performances of the symphony by this orchestra, it is impossible to recall one that was more exhilarating than that of last night. The audience was emphatic in manifesting its pleasure.

The next concert will be given Thursday evening, Feb. 16.

Boston Courier,

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 1, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

Considerable of the music performed at the tenth symphony last evening was in the semi-classic vein, that is neither here nor there, so to speak; and the programme for the most part must have proven far more acceptable to many sentimental and easily pleased amateurs who regularly attend the symphony concerts, than to musicians. The concert opened admirably, however, with the “Benvenuto Cellini” overture by Berlioz. While there is a real wealth of creative power in this noble work, it is also written with the perfect ingenuousness of one who utters his own thoughts in his own way, and without stopping to think how, without the slightest affectation or straining after effect and often with the childlike grace and sweetness well-nigh cloying, with which even a child might sympathize. Furthermore, the composition is to some extent pictorial in its effect, and this experience is rendered all the more intense by the genial warmth of sentiment and masterly taste with which the orchestra coloring is applied. The members of the orchestra to a man were in their element with this work; and in glowing colors was exquisitely set forth an orchestral score which would seem as superior to praise as it is indeed incomparable. It was presented with a distinctness and fidelity that were perfect in their way—time, tune and tone being given out with a fractional nicety and exactitude such as even the Boston Symphony Orchestra seldom equals.

With the concerto for violin in D minor, op 31 by Henri Vieuxtemps came the first appearance here, as virtuoso, of Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra. The concerto is written in a fervent and impressive style, with a fine regard far the musical possibilities of the solo instrument and is most exacting in its demands on the performer. The four chief divisions of the work consist of an introduction; andante (D minor) followed by a moderato in D minor; an adagio religioso in E flat major; a scherzo, vivace (D minor) with trio, meno musso, in the same key; and a finale marziale, which has an introductory andante in D minor, followed by an allegro in D major. In all this well nigh kalelidoscopic variety of movement, the musical attractiveness of the work is invariably well sustained, although in the adagio religioso the inherent sentiment of the subject matter is in the trend of a super-sentimental style to which its composer is mere or less prone. The scerzo is bewitchingly jocoee, and the finale is as vigorous and brilliant an allegro as one would care to hear. Mr. Schnitzler was delightfully triumphant in his mastery of the technical difficulties of the concerto. He also proved himself to be a musically refined and interesting artist. His tone is at its best with such melody as appeals to the heart; and it is a clear, full, true, and sympathetic tone. With the scherzo and finale his technique was somewhat rigid, but both movements were otherwise most ably and effectively played. The artist was several times recalled, and the impression he made was, all in all considered, so highly favorable that his future appearances in this city will be heartly welcomed.

It can at least be said for Volkman's symphony in B flat major that it is a thoroughly genial and well made work, and that unlike at least two modern symphonies that have been heard this season, it is pregnant with the charm of naturalness. It is not in the music of the neglected Volkmann that one finds form twisted and tortured into any abnormal state of formality. The entire first movement of the work is so admirable and so clear in form that it would well become a symphony of more classic attainments in other ways. The allegretto is plainly modeled after the allegretto of Beethoven's symphony in F major and it also calls to mind the Russian F major quartet.

Well has Robert Volkmann been styled the Hungarian Gade. Ehlert finds in the last movement a predominating happy humor. What a thoroughly comical fancy it is that we come upon shortly before the piu musso' when the double basses contrapuntalize the first theme “and with a diabolical irony as an accompaniment to the awkward three half notes.” The symphony is chiefly scored for strings, the usual wood-wind, trombones and tympani, although in the middle movement the instrumental force is markedly reduced. The first performance of the work was under Director Henschel at the Boston Symphony concert of Dec. 22, 1883. The symphony was delightfully played.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The concert given by the Kneisel Quartet on Monday evening was distinguished alike by the beauty of the selections and as usual by the smoothness, nice ensemble and expression with which everything was received. The programme included the Beethoven quartet op. 131 and the quartet by Brahms for piano and strings, op. 26 in A major. In its interior springs of feeling and imaginative suggestion, the Beethoven quartet op. 131, which represents Beethoven's third period may be described as one of the deepest compositions of its class and it is certainly one of the most beautiful. As for the performance, seldom has there been heard here, not even from the Kneisel Quartet, such a fine blending of the strings together with such a clear individuality of the parts. Mr. Kneisel himself never played with more delicate finish and expression, and there was even more warmth, spirit and verve in his playing than usual.

The opus 26 in A major by Brahms was admirably played by Mr. Nikisch and the quartet. Mr. Nikisch displayed much freedom, fluency and refinement of technique while his own absorption in the music was so artistic and effective that the audience wes held in an attention of the most rapt kind.

A notable project is that of Mr. C. A. Ellis, which has recently been made known to the musical world. Mr. Ellis has made the Boston Symphony orchestra the chief musical success of the country, and he has now planned an organization which promises, in another way, to be an equal success. Mme. Lilian Nordica is to be placed at the head of a company, including Mme. Sofia Scalchi, contralto; Andreas Dippel, tenor; Signor Del Puente, barytone; Emil Fisher, basso; and Helen Dudley Campbell, the American alto, besides a complete orchestra. The plan is to give operatic concerts, with one act of an opera, in all the large cities of the country. The first concert will be given Jan. 16, in Music Hall.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 1, 1893.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Tenth Concert, With Violinist Schnitzler as Soloist.

The symphony concert last evening was one of exceeding brevity, lasting but little over an hour. Berlioz's overture to “Benvenuto Cellini,” a concerto for violin by Vieuxtemps and a Volkmann symphony constituted the programme.

The Berlioz number is considered as one of his finest works, combining brilliancy, lively rhythm and characteristic orchestration, notably the heavy scoring for brasses and instruments of percussion.

The overture was finely played, the work of the brasses being particularly correct and harmonious. The somewhat irregular Volkmann symphony, with its technical peculiarities, is an interesting composition, and it received a capital interpretation.

The soloist was Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra, who was heard in Vieuxtemps concerto for violin, No 4, in D minor.

The young artist played the long and difficult selection in a generally satisfactory manner. His execution was excellent and quite smooth, and while his intonation was not always perfect, a harshness being apparent in the lower notes of his instrument when playing forte, his staccato bowing was clear, and true and delicate.

Mr. Schnitzler plays without affectation or trickery, and with the air of a well-grounded and conscientious musician. He was warmly applauded by the auditors and his fellow-musicians for his excellent performance.

The programme for the 11th rehearsal and concert this week will be Haydn's symphony in D minor; suite, “L'Arlesienne,” No. 2, Bizet; overture, “Leonore,” No. 3, Beethoven. Mme. Basta Tavary will be the soloist.

Lillian Nordica Concert Company.

A new musical enterprise, and one that may be looked upon as launched from Boston, will make a tour of the United States, beginning at Music Hall, Jan 16. The organization is to be called the Nordica operatic concert company, and is composed of Mme. Lillian Nordica, the great American dramatic soprano; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, the celebrated contralto; Andreas Dippel, tenor, who created so great a success last ear, and who was the principal tenor of the late German opera company at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; Emil Fischer, basso; Signor Del Puente, barytone; Helen Dudley Campbell, and a large orchestra.

Mr. Ellis has matured his plans so that a grand operatic concert tour will be undertaken, and it is to embrace all the large cities of the United States, including the Pacific coast. The combination is the strongest vocal-musical affair now before the public, and is destined to make fame and fortune for the manager, who has successfully introduced the Boston Symphony orchestra all over the United States, and has made so great a success of Boston's musical pride.

Mr. Ellis has had years of experience, and in this formidable and expensive organization will be assisted in the management by Mr. Jefferson S. Leerburger, who has been one of the chief lieutenants on Henry E. Abbey's staff.

—Mr. C. A. Ellis' last enterprise in engaging Mme. Nordica to head an opera organization for platform performances is sure to be a success in his always competent hands.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 1.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night opened with a brilliant and exceptionally effective performance of Berlioz's “Benvenuto Cellini” overture, and ended with Volkmann's genial, bright and graceful symphony No. 2 in B flat, op. 53. This also was sympathetically read and delightfully played; the pretty allegretto and the tender andantino receiving especially fine treatment. The soloist was Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra, who played Vieuxtemps's Concerto for violin, No 4, in D-minor, Op. 31, a serious work, not overladen with virtuoso passages, dignified in style, and making its strongest demands on the finer and deeper qualities of the artistic intelligence of the performer. Mr. Schnitzler has a pure and full tone, an ample and flexible technique, large freedom and ease in bowing, and excellent taste. Now and then his intonation was slightly inaccurate but on the whole, he played well in tune. His cantabile playing is especially warm and broad, and his style is sincere, generally. The effort was commendable for its frank straightforwardness and for the excellent schooling that it evidenced. He was applauded with cordial enthusiasm, and vigorously recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, D-minor Haydn; Suite “L'Arlesienne,” No' 2, Bizet; Overture, “Leonore,” No. 3, Beethoven. The soloist is Mme. Basta Tavary, who will sing two arias.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet gave their fourth concert of the season in Chickering Hall. The programme was: Quartet, C-sharp minor, op. 131, Beethoven, and Quartet, for piano and strings, A-major, op. 26, Brahms. The Beethoven work, one that is seldom given, owing to its length and its extreme difficulty, was magnificently read and played. Nothing finer in the way of ensemble playing has ever been given here, even by this organization. The Brahms quartet is heavy, labored and dry, scholarly, of course; and faultless in respect to purity of taste, equally of course; but suggestive of a groping in the dark to seize something that is never grasped. It was played with devoted earnestness and an evident enthusiastic sympathy with the spirit of the composer, but it is knotty music for enjoyment. The performance may be heartily and justly praised. Mr. Nikisch was the pianist, and played with brilliancy, easy fluency and refined musical feeling; his only fault being a tendency to force the tone of the instrument unduly, thus overpowering the other instruments when it was essential that all four should be heard. Otherwise his debut as a pianist was wholly and gratifyingly successful.

Miss Margaret Elliott, assisted by Mrs. George H. Stoddard, will give a song recital in Steinert Hall, on Tuesday afternoon.

Cambridge Dec 22 Tribune

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert was given in Sanders theatre on Thursday evening, with the programme as follows: Johannes Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90. Schubert-Liszt, “Wanderer Fantasie” for piano and orchestra. Berlioz, two movements from “The Damnation of Faust,” Op. 24. Menuet des Feu-follets. Valse des Sylphes. Weber-Liszt, Polacco Brilliante for piano and orchestra, Op. 72. Schumann, Overture to Genoveva. Mr. William H. Sherwood was the soloist.

This was the finest concert of the season, and a red-letter night in every respect. The beauty of the Brahms symphony, like all great works of art, is more and more confirmed with each successive hearing, and the listener is delighted with new charms which constantly arise. The performance proved that Mr. Nikisch was thoroughly master of his subject, the wonderfully virile themes of the first movement being played with great force and distinctness, especially the “counter irritant” for the celli and double basses. The Andante has more of the brooding and abstruseness which characterize many of Brahms' works, but the lovely melody of the two themes, which are afterward developed with such fanciful treatment, is undeniable. The third movement (poco allegretto in C minor) takes the place of the usual Scherzo, and immediately finds its way to the heart of the audience. The finale is the very essence of a furious Hungarian movement, and bears ample witness to Brahms' inimitable skill in writing in the true Hungarian style. Grave and gay alternate, and the rapid transition from the vehement song of praise to the concluding pianissimo was like a benediction. Mr. Nikisch has the happy faculty of reading “between the lines,” and interprets Brahms with a telling dramatic coloring which no other conductor has ever vouchsafed us. Mr. William H. Sherwood received a most cordial greeting as he stepped upon the stage. It was a great pleasure to listen once more to America's greatest pianist, for, if we mistake not, this is the first time that Mr. Sherwood has been heard in Cambridge since Gericke's first year in Boston. Too much praise cannot be given him for his magnificent playing of Schubert's wonderful “Wanderer Fantasie.” His dazzling brilliancy of technique, which enables him to give the fullest expression to every passing emotion, combined with a wealth of imagination and deep poetic feeling, produces results which are simply astounding. One feels instinctively that the lion's paw is there, and that each idea of the composer is given out for all that it is worth. Liszt's exquisite ornamentations were faultlessly executed, and the orchestral accompaniment was in full sympathy with the virtuosity of the pianist. Mr. Sherwood created the greatest enthusiasm, and was compelled to bow his acknowledgments again and again. The two graceful trifles from Berlioz's Dramatic Legend of “Faust” are from the twelfth and seventh scenes respectively. The “Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps,” follows the invocation of Mephistopheles “Ye spirits of flickering flame,” etc., while the “Dance of Sylphs” follows the portion entitled “Faust's Vision,” a wonderful choral movement. They were both played to absolute perfection by Mr. Nikisch, and the audience was fairly spellbound with delight. The “Dance des Sylphes” was delicate and evanescent as sea foam, and nothing but an immediate repetition would satisfy the wild excitement of the audience. Mr. Sherwood made another “ten strike” in his splendid performance of Weber's Polacca, which sparkled with brilliancy and animation throughout. The fiery vigor of his attack, delicacy and purity of his “runs” and scales, with the extraordinary sustained power of the long and exacting double trill, commanded the breathless attention of his hearers, and the most stormy applause rewarded his great and artistic rendition. The instrument on which Mr. Sherwood played was a superb Mason & Hamlin and could hardly be equalled for richness and sonority of tone. The concert ended with Schumann's romantic overture to “Genoveva,” superbly played in Mr. Nikisch's most impassioned and finished style. The next concert will take place on Thursday evening, January 19th. C. R.

[73]

MORNING
Worcester Spy
THE SPY SHOULD HAVE THE EYE OF ARGUS: HE IS HONORABLE IF HE DO BUT LOOK TO THE WELFARE OF THE COMMONWEALTH.
WORCESTER.
FRIDAY, DEC. 30, 1892.

A BRILLIANT CONCERT.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, NORDICA AND SCHROEDER.

REINECKE'S "MANFRED" OVERTURE—DVORAK'S D MAJOR SUITE, SCHUMAN'S D MINOR SYMPHONY AND VARIOUS SOLOS.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mechanics Hall last evening was a series of brilliant performances. The somewhat anomalous program was:

Karl Reinecke, overture.....“King Manfred”
Gounod aria.....“Reine de Saba”
Antonin Dvorak suite for orchestra in D major, op. 39.
Solos for violoncello.
Chopin.....Nocturne
Klengel.....Capriccio
Rossini, aria, “Una Voce,” from “Barber of Seville.”
Schumann symphony in D minor, No. 4.

The soloists were Mme. Lillian Nordica and Alwin Schroeder.

Mme. Nordica, who was received with enthusiasm, gave a first rate vocal display in both her numbers and was recalled, again and again, after each. She showed good taste not only in her singing but also in declining encores. There is no better 'cellist permanently in America than Alwin Schroeder. A larger work with orchestra would have been gratifying, but he played so exquisitely the relatively small things on the program that there can be only room for admiration.

As for the orchestra it has never played here with more “snap” and dramatic fire. It made even the “Manfred” overture sound almost like live music, to which it ordinarily bears about the same relation as a plaster cast to a marble statue. The form is exact but the material is not valuable, and the idea is borrowed. The work begins with some promise, and continues in a persistent and well meant endeavor to get somewhere, but never arrives anywhere in particular. The overture was evidently appreciated last night despite the controversy among musicians as to its value.

Once upon a time there was a certain Athenian named Aristides who was so truly good that his fellow-citizens couldn't stand him. Therefore they rose up one day and thrust him out of the city. In modern times there are evidently those who would be happy to assist at a similar service for Karl Reinecke. Such say Reinecke is like a polished society man, whose language is always sure to be “in good form,” and whose thoughts are conventionally correct and strictly moral, but never very interesting, forceful or original. He is a model of deportment and a good shape for his tailor. Doubtless it would afford relief if he would occasionally break through his well-bred reserve and over-refined conventionality, and do something that was frivolous or positively shocking. The overture was played with singularly good effect, save for a queer false intonation among the strings.

Dr. Dvorak's D minor suite for strings is an example of what can be done by a man of ideas, without any too much respect for form. The five movements are: Prelude (pastorale), allegro moderato; polka, allegretto grazioso; minuet (Sousedska), allegro giusto; romance, andante con moto; finale (furiant), presto. There is no lack of freshness of melody and harmony or of orchestral color, and the interes never flags. The suite is not enough in itself to establish the composer's reputation, but it is good music.

The beauty and vitality of Schumann's D minor symphony was never more conspicuous than in contrast with the preceding jumple of Reinecke, Gounod, Dvorak and Rossini, and the orchestra entered into it with a will that might indicate pleasure at finding something solidly noble at last. Schumann, the most important writer of symphonies since Beethoven, is still the professional test of popular musical appreciation and intelligence. Why this should be it is needless to discuss here. He was late in applying his genius to this sort of composition, but in that respect he was not unlike others. One trait that is doubtless an obstacle to the greater popularity of his orchestral works is his comparative lack (less obvious in the D minor symphony than in others) of picturesqueness in orchestration.

He had, however, not only a wonderful gift of musical poetry, but also a firm grasp on musical form. More than any other composer, perhaps, he insisted on the absolute unity of the group of four or more pieces known as the symphony. In only one (the Rhine or Cathedral symphony, played at the festival of 1890,) does he depart from his practice of repeating some part of the melodies of one movement in succeeding movements. In the Rhenish symphony there was logical reason for this departure. In the symphony played last night, this system of reminiscence is developed to an extraordinary degree. Unity was still further promoted by the composer's express instruction, that there should be no waiting between the movements, and this injunction was obeyed. In some sense the notion of unity is emphasized by the fact that there is practically no second theme, where it should be expected, at the modulation in the first section of the first movement. Schumann took good care that there should be no peril of monotony, on the other hand, and the entire work is rich in attractive thematic material. Of the various performances of the symphony by this orchestra, it is impossible to recall one that was more exhilarating than that of last night. The audience was emphatic in manifesting its pleasure.

The next concert will be given Thursday evening, Feb. 16.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 1, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

Considerable of the music performed at the tenth symphony last evening was in the semi-classic vein, that is neither here nor there, so to speak; and the programme for the most part must have proven far more acceptable to many sentimental and easily pleased amateurs who regularly attend the symphony concerts, than to musicians. The concert opened admirably, however, with the “Benvenuto Cellini” overture by Berlioz. While there is a real wealth of creative power in this noble work, it is also written with the perfect ingenuousness of one who utters his own thoughts in his own way, and without stopping to think how, without the slightest affectation or straining after effect and often with the childlike grace and sweetness well-nigh cloying, with which even a child might sympathize. Furthermore, the composition is to some extent pictorial in its effect, and this experience is rendered all the more intense by the genial warmth of sentiment and masterly taste with which the orchestra coloring is applied. The members of the orchestra to a man were in their element with this work; and in glowing colors was exquisitely set forth an orchestral score which would seem as superior to praise as it is indeed incomparable. It was presented with a distinctness and fidelity that were perfect in their way—time, tune and tone being given out with a fractional nicety and exactitude such as even the Boston Symphony Orchestra seldom equals.

With the concerto for violin in D minor, op 31 by Henri Vieuxtemps came the first appearance here, as virtuoso, of Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra. The concerto is written in a fervent and impressive style, with a fine regard far the musical possibilities of the solo instrument and is most exacting in its demands on the performer. The four chief divisions of the work consist of an introduction; andante (D minor) followed by a moderato in D minor; an adagio religioso in E flat major; a scherzo, vivace (D minor) with trio, meno musso, in the same key; and a finale marziale, which has an introductory andante in D minor, followed by an allegro in D major. In all this well nigh kalelidoscopic variety of movement, the musical attractiveness of the work is invariably well sustained, although in the adagio religioso the inherent sentiment of the subject matter is in the trend of a super-sentimental style to which its composer is mere or less prone. The scerzo is bewitchingly jocoee, and the finale is as vigorous and brilliant an allegro as one would care to hear. Mr. Schnitzler was delightfully triumphant in his mastery of the technical difficulties of the concerto. He also proved himself to be a musically refined and interesting artist. His tone is at its best with such melody as appeals to the heart; and it is a clear, full, true, and sympathetic tone. With the scherzo and finale his technique was somewhat rigid, but both movements were otherwise most ably and effectively played. The artist was several times recalled, and the impression he made was, all in all considered, so highly favorable that his future appearances in this city will be heartly welcomed.

It can at least be said for Volkman's symphony in B flat major that it is a thoroughly genial and well made work, and that unlike at least two modern symphonies that have been heard this season, it is pregnant with the charm of naturalness. It is not in the music of the neglected Volkmann that one finds form twisted and tortured into any abnormal state of formality. The entire first movement of the work is so admirable and so clear in form that it would well become a symphony of more classic attainments in other ways. The allegretto is plainly modeled after the allegretto of Beethoven's symphony in F major and it also calls to mind the Russian F major quartet.

Well has Robert Volkmann been styled the Hungarian Gade. Ehlert finds in the last movement a predominating happy humor. What a thoroughly comical fancy it is that we come upon shortly before the piu musso' when the double basses contrapuntalize the first theme “and with a diabolical irony as an accompaniment to the awkward three half notes.” The symphony is chiefly scored for strings, the usual wood-wind, trombones and tympani, although in the middle movement the instrumental force is markedly reduced. The first performance of the work was under Director Henschel at the Boston Symphony concert of Dec. 22, 1883. The symphony was delightfully played.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The concert given by the Kneisel Quartet on Monday evening was distinguished alike by the beauty of the selections and as usual by the smoothness, nice ensemble and expression with which everything was received. The programme included the Beethoven quartet op. 131 and the quartet by Brahms for piano and strings, op. 26 in A major. In its interior springs of feeling and imaginative suggestion, the Beethoven quartet op. 131, which represents Beethoven's third period may be described as one of the deepest compositions of its class and it is certainly one of the most beautiful. As for the performance, seldom has there been heard here, not even from the Kneisel Quartet, such a fine blending of the strings together with such a clear individuality of the parts. Mr. Kneisel himself never played with more delicate finish and expression, and there was even more warmth, spirit and verve in his playing than usual.

The opus 26 in A major by Brahms was admirably played by Mr. Nikisch and the quartet. Mr. Nikisch displayed much freedom, fluency and refinement of technique while his own absorption in the music was so artistic and effective that the audience wes held in an attention of the most rapt kind.

A notable project is that of Mr. C. A. Ellis, which has recently been made known to the musical world. Mr. Ellis has made the Boston Symphony orchestra the chief musical success of the country, and he has now planned an organization which promises, in another way, to be an equal success. Mme. Lilian Nordica is to be placed at the head of a company, including Mme. Sofia Scalchi, contralto; Andreas Dippel, tenor; Signor Del Puente, barytone; Emil Fisher, basso; and Helen Dudley Campbell, the American alto, besides a complete orchestra. The plan is to give operatic concerts. with one act of an opera, in all the large cities of the country. The first concert will be given Jan. 16, in Music Hall.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN. 1, 1893.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Tenth Concert, With Violinist Schnitzler as Soloist.

The symphony concert last evening was one of exceeding brevity, lasting but little over an hour. Berlioz's overture to “Benvenuto Cellini,” a concerto for violin by Vieuxtemps and a Volkmann symphony constituted the programme.

The Berlioz number is considered as one of his finest works, combining brilliancy, lively rhythm and characteristic orchestration, notably the heavy scoring for brasses and instruments of percussion.

The overture was finely played, the work of the brasses being particularly correct and harmonious. The somewhat irregular Volkmann symphony, with its technical peculiarities, is an interesting composition, and it received a capital interpretation.

The soloist was Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra, who was heard in Vieuxtemps concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor.

The young artist played the long and difficult selection in a generally satisfactory manner. His execution was excellent and quite smooth, and while his intonation was not always perfect, a harshness being apparent in the lower notes of his instrument when playing forte, his staccato bowing was clear, and true and delicate.

Mr. Schnitzler plays without affectation or trickery, and with the air of a well-grounded and conscientious musician. He was warmly applauded by the audotors and his fellow-musicians for his excellent performance.

The programme for the 11th rehearsal and concert this week will be Haydn's symphony in D minor; suite, “L'Arlesienne,” No. 2, Bizet; overture, “Leonore,” No. 3, Beethoven. Mme. Basta Tavary will be the soloist.

Lillian Nordica Concert Company.

A new musical enterprise, and one that may be looked upon as launched from Boston, will make a tour of the United States, beginning at Music Hall, Jan 16. The organization is to be called the Nordica operatic concert company, and is composed of Mme. Lillian Nordica, the great American dramatic soprano; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, the celebrated contralto; Andreas Dippel, tenor, who created so great a success last ear, and who was the principal tenor of the late German opera company at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; Emil Fischer, basso; Signor Del Puente, barytone; Helen Dudley Campbell, and a large orchestra.

Mr. Ellis has matured his plans so that a grand operatic concert tour will be undertaken, and it is to embrace all the large cities of the United States, including the Pacific coast. The combination is the strongest vocal-musical affair now before the public, and is destined to make fame and fortune for the manager, who has successfully introduced the Boston Symphony orchestra all over the United States, and has made so great a success of Boston's musical pride.

Mr. Ellis has had years of experience, and in this formidable and expensive organization will be assisted in the management by Mr. Jefferson S. Leerburger, who has been one of the chief lieutenants on Henry E. Abbey's staff.

—Mr. C. A. Ellis' last enterprise in engaging Mme. Nordica to head an opera organization for platform performances is sure to be a success in his always competent hands.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 1.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night opened with a brilliant and exceptionally effective performance of Berlioz's “Benvenuto Cellini” overture, and ended with Volkmann's genial, bright and graceful symphony No. 2 in B flat, op. 53. This also was sympathetically read and delightfully played; the pretty allegretto and the tender andantino receiving especially fine treatment. The soloist was Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra, who played Vieuxtemps's Concerto for violin, No 4, in D-minor, Op. 31, a serious work, not overladen with virtuoso passages, dignified in style, and making its strongest demands on the finer and deeper qualities of the artistic intelligence of the performer. Mr. Schnitzler has a pure and full tone, an ample and flexible technique, large freedom and ease in bowing, and excellent taste. Now and then his intonation was slightly inaccurate but on the whole, he played well in tune. His cantabile playing is especially warm and broad, and his style is sincere, generally. The effort was commendable for its frank straightforwardness and for the excellent schooling that it evidenced. He was applauded with cordial enthusiasm, and vigorously recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, D-minor Haydn; Suite “L'Arlesienne,” No' 2, Bizet; Overture, “Leonore,” No. 3, Beethoven. The soloist is Mme. Basta Tavary, who will sing two arias.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet gave their fourth concert of the season in Chickering Hall. The programme was: Quartet, C-sharp minor, op. 131, Beethoven, and Quartet, for piano and strings, A-major, op. 26, Brahms. The Beethoven work, one that is seldom given, owing to its length and its extreme difficulty, was magnificently read and played. Nothing finer in the way of ensemble playing has ever been given here, even by this organization. The Brahms quartet is heavy, labored and dry, scholarly, of course; and faultless in respect to purity of taste, equally of course; but suggestive of a groping in the dark to seize something that is never grasped. It was played with devoted earnestness and an evident enthusiastic sympathy with the spirit of the composer, but it is knotty music for enjoyment. The performance may be heartily and justly praised. Mr. Nikisch was the pianist, and played with brilliancy, easy fluency and refined musical feeling; his only fault being a tendency to force the tone of the instrument unduly, thus overpowering the other instruments when it was essential that all four should be heard. Otherwise his debut as a pianist was wholly and gratifyingly successful.

Miss Margaret Elliott, assisted by Mrs. George H. Stoddard, will give a song recital in Steinert Hall, on Tuesday afternoon.

Cambridge Tribune
Dec 22

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert was given in Sanders theatre on Thursday evening, with the programme as follows: Johannes Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90. Schubert-Liszt, “Wanderer Fantasie” for piano and orchestra. Berlioz, two movements from “The Damnation of Faust,” Op. 24. Menuet des Feu-follets. Valse des Sylphes. Weber-Liszt, Polacco Brilliante for piano and orchestra, Op. 72. Schumann, Overture to Genoveva. Mr. William H. Sherwood was the soloist.

This was the finest concert of the season, and a red-letter night in every respect. The beauty of the Brahms symphony, like all great works of art, is more and more confirmed with each successive hearing, and the listener is delighted with new charms which constantly arise. The performance proved that Mr. Nikisch was thoroughly master of his subject, the wonderfully virile themes of the first movement being played with great force and distinctness, especially the “counter irritant” for the celli and double basses. The Andante has more of the brooding and abstruseness which characterize many of Brahms' works, but the lovely melody of the two themes, which are afterward developed with such fanciful treatment, is undeniable. The third movemcnt (poco allegretto in C minor) takes the place of the usual Scherzo, and immediately finds its way to the heart of the audience. The finale is the very essence of a furious Hungarian movement, and bears ample witness to Brahms' inimitable skill in writing in the true Hungarian style. Grave and gay alternate, and the rapid transition from the vehement song of praise to the concluding pianissimo was like a benediction. Mr. Nikisch has the happy faculty of reading “between the lines,” and interprets Brahms with a telling dramatic coloring which no other conductor has ever vouchsafed us. Mr. William H. Sherwood received a most cordial greeting as he stepped upon the stage. It was a great pleasure to listen once more to America's greatest pianist, for, if we mistake not, this is the first time that Mr. Sherwood has been heard in Cambridge since Gericke's first year in Boston. Too much praise cannot be given him for his magnificent playing of Schubert's wonderful “Wanderer Fantasie.” His dazzling brilliancy of technique, which enables him to give the fullest expression to every passing emotion, combined with a wealth of imagination and deep poetic feeling, produces results which are simply astounding. One feels instinctively that the lion's paw is there, and that each idea of the composer is given out for all that it is worth. Liszt's exquisite ornamentations were faultlessly executed, and the orchestral accompaniment was in full sympathy with the virtuosity of the pianist. Mr. Sherwood created the greatest enthusiasm, and was compelled to bow his acknowledgments again and again. The two graceful trifles from Berlioz's Dramatic Legend of “Faust” are from the twelfth and seventh scenes respectively. The “Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps,” follows the invocation of Mephistopheles “Ve spirits of flickering flame,” etc., while the “Dance of Sylphs” follows the portion entitled “Faust's Vision,” a wonderful choral movement. They were both played to absolute perfection by Mr. Nikisch, and the audience was fairly spellbound with delight. The “Dance des Sylphes” was delicate and evanescent as sea foam, and nothing but an immediate repetition would satisfy the wild excitement of the audience. Mr. Sherwood made another “ten strike” in his splendid performance of Weber's Polacca, which sparkled with brilliancy and animation throughout. The fiery vigor of his attack, delicacy and purity of his “runs” and scales, with the extraordinary sustained power of the long and exacting double trill, commanded the breathless attention of his hearers, and the most stormy applause rewarded his great and artistic rendition. The instrument on which Mr. Sherwood played was a superb Mason & Hamlin and could hardly be equalled for richness and sonority of tone. The concert ended with Schumann's romantic overture to “Genoveva,” superbly played in Mr. Nikisch's most impassioned and finished style. The next concert will take place on Thursday evening, January 19th. C. R.

[73]

PASTE OVER

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
MONDAY, JANUARY 2, 1893.

The Tenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The First Appearance of Mr. Schnitzler, Violinist.

Several Antidotes Against Severe Pianoforte Poisoning.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz
Concerto for violin No. 4, D minor.....Vieuxtemps
Symphony, No. 2, B flat.....Volkmann

***

Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra, was the solo violinist of the evening. From the technical standpoint his performance deserved warm praise. He played fluently, without extravagance, with musical intelligence. It is true that occasionally, and then chiefly in bravura, he strayed from the true pitch; but in cantabile his intonation was pure and his delivery was frank. Mr. Schnitzler made a very favorable impression, and he was applauded loudly and deservedly. Whether Mr. Schnitzler, as violinist, has that great gift or rare acquirement known as temperament real or feigned is another question. He would in all probability always command respect, possibly hearty admiration. I do not think, however, that he can wind his fiddle strings around the heart or hypnotize the hearer. It is true that the music played by him does not lend itself to such interesting and dangerous experiments.

***

For the D minor concerto of Vieuxtemps is a serious work, dignified, and at times almost noble. Vieuxtemps himself hesitated about playing it in public, for, although it was finisned in 1850, he did not produce it in any concert in Polish or Austrian city that year. Not until he was in Paris in December, 1851, did the great violinist so highly esteemed by Schumann, Berlioz and Wagner allow it to go upon a programme. On that occasion Berlioz wrote a glowing account of the performance and praised highly the work itself. "The composer is here almost jealous of the virtuoso; and yet what a brilliant task he has allotted him. * * * The ideas are spontaneous, numerous; and they are always clothed with an instrumental dress that heightens the effect. The scherzo is indeed singular; it is a difficult task for the leader of the orchestra and for the violinist to arrive at the end without a slip."

***

Vieuxtemps, by the way, was born the 17th of February, 1820, not the 20th, as stated by the programme book. Many biographers, with Fetis at the head, say the 20th. Vieuxtemps, in his autobiography, is clear that it was the 17th, and his friends Radoux and Kupperath, in their lives of the great violinist, follow his own direction.

***

It may be of interest now that Hollman, the 'cellist, has played in Boston, to listen to the opinion of Vieuxtemps concerning him. Vieuxtemps finished his first concerto for violoncello in January, 1876. Hollman sought counsel concerning the proper interpretation of the work, which was first played by Joseph Servais. It is recorded that Vieuxtemps spoke as follows concerning the former 'cellist: "Hollman is the Dutch 'cellist, with his powerful tone, his bow of steel. He plays my concerto superbly, with vigorous tone, incredible strength, but not with the magic charm of Servais. The latter is more refined, more delicate, more remarkable in expression and in variety of color. The other, however, is young, zealous, industrious, an enthusiast. * * * I could fashion him into a great antagonist, with whom it would be dangerous to contend."

***

The orchestra gave Saturday evening a brilliant performance of the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture by Berlioz. The overture has made the swing of the pendulum. In early days it provoked such men as Louis Ehlert to rhapsodical praise; and now many thoughtful French and Germans search in it in vain for one great musical thought, and prefer "Le Carnaval Romain," the companion piece. The believer in programme music may here find, possibly, the full expression of the mad, artistic and adventurous life of that singular genius and cutthroat, Cellini, who boasted of his descent from a Captain in the Army of Julius Cæsar. The concert-goer who seeks merely amusement listens to a concert overture where there is much ado about nothing, and he may console himself with the remark of Ehlert, that the mistakes of a giant are more interesting than the truisms of a dwarf.

***

The Volkmann Symphony is pleasing music, and it was played in a charming and sympathetic manner. The second and third movements were particularly delightful, and the solo passages of the andantino were treated con amore. It is true that the symphony is not "great" or "profound" music, but it is a pleasure to hear occasionally music that does not prescribe to itself very preposterously. "It has become the fashion to write overtures to subjects like Lear, Faust, Manfred and Hamlet—subjects that, if one be not a great man, must further in the most dangerous manner all unhealthy and improper tendencies. What demands do we not make that we may be able to enjoy in such cases, and—pardon the inversion—with what a measure of delight is not our enjoyment exacted from us? What have we to do with spiritual sprains, in which form musicians exhibit before us their soul suffering? I will openly assert that I discover more genuine intended and expressed art sense in Strauss's 'Beautiful Blue Danube' than in all the caricatures of puffed-up, modern romantic music."

***

The pianists are upon us. Again will there be various interpretations of Beethoven and Chopin and conflicting opinions. The concert-goer who wishes an antidote against pianoforte poisoning should first of all read diligently Louis Paguerre's treatise on "The Evil Influence of the Pianoforte on Music as an Art."

***

He may then find comparative relief in the following definitions and sayings, borrowed for the most part from the French.

A "pianoteuse" is a female pianist who spends her time in torturing the ears of the neighbors by playing without style, without taste and with the imperturbability of a country girl of marriageble age, a great repertoire of light music which under her untrained fingers stabs the hearers.

"The pianoforte is the gatling gun of peace."

A horse that trots irregularly is said to "play the pianoforte."

"Piano-morbus" is instrumental "endemic cholera."

"Society," said Horenthon, "appears to me to be divided into two classes: Some play the pianoforte, others submit to this."

"The pianoforte," said Huart, "is untiring and ferocious. Once open, it never shuts its lid; it is like unto the oyster."

"I do not like the pianoforte," cried an unfortunate husband, "but the hunting horn is a hundred times worse. I do not like the pianoforte, and yet I am happy; for if I loved the pianoforte, my wife would play the horn from morning to night."

"When he is at the pianoforte, you think it is Vulcan lording it over the anvil and iron and brass. He prides himself on striking with full force, and you would swear that he was forging ebony and ivory."

Alphonse Karr invented an ingenious plan. "An island should be discovered and used as a Botany Bay for all pianists and young people who have 'pianistic' hopes. Unless the pianist is of the very first rank he should not be allowed under any pretext to leave the island. When, however, he is remarkable and really wishes to give a concert he should enter Paris in a close carriage. The moment the concert is over he should be packed immediately in the same vehicle and be transported at lightning speed to the Isle of Pianofortes."

"An elephant driver once came with his animal to a country town. He advertised as follows:

"'GRAND PIANOFORTE RECITAL!

"'An elephant, the first prize of the Conservatory, will play a concerto of Chopin.'

"The ticket office was stormed. The hall was crowded. The elephant appeared. He touched the pianoforte with his trunk, uttered his cry, and left the stage. The public was indignant. The elephant driver spoke as follows: 'Ladies and gentlemen, please pardon us. The elephant was in the best of humor; but an unfortunate accident deprived him of his nerve. As he looked at the keys of the instrument he recognized the teeth of his mother."

Playing the pianoforte is sometimes called by irreverent Parisians "playing dominos."

***

But let us not forget that it was Alphonse Karr who said: "Complaints against the pianoforte are often as noisy as the instrument itself; it is as necessary to quell the one as the other."

PHILIP HALE.

THE NORDICA CONCERT COMPANY.

A more than interesting musical organization has sprung into existence, to be under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, who has undoubtedly made a great success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The new organization is to be known as the Nordica Operatic Concert Company, and it will make its initial appearance in Music Hall, Jan. 16, after which it will make the tour of the Union, including all the larger cities.

Aside from Mrs. Nordica, Mr. Ellis has specially engaged Sofia Scalchi, who will arrive in this country to-day, Andreas Dippel, who was with the Metropolitan Opera Company of 1891, and who last year made a great success here; Emil Fischer, Del Puente and Helen Campbell, who, in connection with a large orchestra, will make up the organization.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN, 2, 1893.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

The Symphony concert on Saturday evening was one of the pleasantest of the season. The programme was not a long one, but it was thoroughly enjoyed from beginning to end, and moreover, the audience was favored by the first appearance as a soloist of I. Schnitzler, a member of the corps of violins. The first number was Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," which was given in a brilliant manner, the orchestra having been strengthened to meet the requirements of the score.

Volkmann's symphony No. 2 was the final number, and its interpretation was in every way commendable. Its movements are bright and tuneful, pleasing alike the artistic and popular tastes, and its rendering left little to be desired.

Mr. Schnitzler's work in Vieuxtemps's concerto No. 4 shows him to be an artist on the violin. There were moments of false intonation, possibly due to nervousness, but as a whole his performance was admirable. He plays with fine expression as well as technique, and in the adagio his tones were full, clear and effective. His methods are broad and with a brilliant style, which make his playing very attractive. It is to be hoped that he will be heard in solo work again this season. Next Saturday evening Haydn's smyphony in D minor, Bizet's "Suite l'Arlesienne" No. 2, and Beethoven's overture, "Lenore," are to be given, with Mme. Basta-Tavary as soloist.

At the Tremont Theatre last evening a large and appreciative audience welcomed the return of the Urania spectacles, which are the most instructive and interesting illustrated lectures ever given in this city. The "Trip to the Moon" was last evening's subject, and Mr. Garrett P. Serviss in his graphic and entertaining manner explained a series of marvellous photo-opticon pictures. The discourse was the same as given earlier in the present season, and was fully as interesting to the large audience present. The Urania entertainments will be given Sunday evenings, Jan. 1, 8, 15, 22, 29. Matinees, Monday, Jan. 2; Thursday, Jan. 5; Friday, Jan. 6; Tuesday, Jan. 10; Wednesday, Jan. 11; Thursday, Jan. 12; Tuesday, Jan. 17; Wednesday, Jan. 18; Thursday, Jan. 19; Tuesday, Jan. 24; Wednesday, Jan. 25; Thursday, Jan. 26.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 185.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 1, 1893.

The Symphony Concert—Soloist Mr. I. Schnitzler.

Director Arthur Nikisch sent his last evening's audience away from the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall, under his direction, in the happiest frame of mind, and one of the leading violin players of the organization, Mr. I. Schnitzler, will be apt to share in the pleasant memories of the occasion.

The programme was an eminently enjoyable one, and Mr. Schnitzler made his first appearance, and a most successful one, as soloist.

Hector Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" made the opening number, and the great French composer has never been better represented in this selection than in Mr. Nikisch's reading of it last evening. The band was re-enforced in the wind and percussion parts to meet the full demands of the score, and the several movements were brilliantly played throughout.

Mr. Schnitzler chose Vieuxtemps' concerto No. 4 in D minor, op. 31, for his debut as soloist, playing the complete work and in a most masterly fashion. He proved a thoroughly conscientious player, well equipped for all the demands of the concerto, and his success with the audience was in keeping with his merits. He commands the resources of the violin with rare skill, his playing is characterize by purity of tone, good taste and breadth of style, and his bowing is free and graceful at all times. He made an especially successful effort in the adagio in which the hymnlike theme was sung with fine expression upon the instrument, and in the brilliant finale the admirable style in which he played the sharply contrasting movement showed him to be an artist of broad and liberal training. He instantly attracted the attention of the audience and maintained his hold upon his public throughout the concerto, gaining repeated recalls as he finished his task, his associates in the orchestra joining heartily in the ovation in his honor.

Robert Volkmann's symphony No. 2, B flat major, made the final number of the evening's selections, and the bright tuneful movements were given a most satisfactory interpretation, which called out the heartiest applause and left a very delightful impression of the final concert of 1892.

Mme. Basta-Tavary is the soloist next Saturday evening, and the orchestra will play the Haydn symphony in D minor, Bizet's "Suite l'Arlesienne," No. 2, and the "Leonore No. 2," overture by Beethoven.

NORDICA OPERATIC CONCERT.

The remarkable success achieved by Mme. Lilian Nordica in her concert tour last season, under the management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis of Music Hall, will readily be recalled, and the triumphant reception given the fair Boston singer before her departure will easily explain why Manager Ellis persisted in his negotiations with this great artist until he had secured her for another extended tour during the present season.

Mme. Nordica's career has been uniformly brilliant, and her successes on both sides the Atlantic on the operatic, as well as the concert, stage have been so pronounced that the coming engagement can but prove equally advantageous to this popular artist and her manager. Mme. Nordica has won name and fame throughout America, and her admirers from Maine to California will be given a further opportunity of enjoying her vocal gifts during the tour planned.

The company organized will include Mme. Sofia Scalchi, contralto; Andreas Dippie, tenor; Emil Fischer, basso; Sig. Del Puente, baritone; Helen Dudley Campbell, contralto, and a large orchestra.

The first appearance of the company will be at Music Hall on Monday evening, the 16th inst. when its members will be heard in a brilliant operatic concert programme, for which seats may now be ordered. The organization will appear in operatic selections in costume during the tour when opportunity offers.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 2, 1893.

AN EXCELLENT CONCERT BY THE SYMPHONY.

Berlioz Overture to Benvenuto Cellino a Typical Example of its School—The Composer's Indulgence in Experiments—Vieuxtemp's D Minor Violin Concerto Performed.

The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," which began the concert of Saturday, is a typical example of the merits and defects of its school. In the domain of art it sometimes occurs that a genius arises whose paintings are out of drawing, whose perspective and groupings are not satisfactory, but who goes down through the centuries simply because of his wonderful employment of colors. There are analogous cases in the realm of music. Reduce this glowing overture from a many-colored orchestral painting to the black and white etching of a piano-forte transcription, and it becomes a very tangled affair with tattered bits of melody leading nowhere, and spasmodic thoughts lacking true development. Nor is the process of such transcription an utterly unjust one; one can apply it in the case of Beethoven or of Wagner and have a very satisfactory residuum. Given the contrasted tone-tints of the orchestra, however, allowed to spice his dish as he pleases, and Berlioz become sometimes great—always interesting. He differs from Wagner, and is less powerful than him, (in the matter of scoring; in the grandeur of musical ideas there can be no comparison made) chiefly in the fact that the great German always knew exactly the effect that he wanted, while Berlioz frequently indulged in mere experiment.

There are such experiments in "Benvenuto Cellini," and the trombone theme with its florid violin accompaniment (excellently played it was too) pales before a similar combination made in the overture to "Tannhaeuser." The trombones had grand work to do and played exceedingly well; but Berlioz here too constantly employs these instruments in their noisiest manner, and seems not to have grasped that effective gloom, that intensified horn tone, in soft, trombone passages, which Wagner employed, and which Mozart seems to have understood. Yet the clangor and the fierce, threatening tone of these instruments was grandly effective in the combative portions of the work, and it may be possible that the chief fault here lay in the unrestrained manner in which the entire brass band was allowed to control matters in the performance. Yet I hesitate to state this defect, for the performance, as a whole, was so noble, so full of verve, that one desires only to praise. Decidedly, if our conductor has his weak points, he has his great ones, too, and it would be difficult to equal the performance of this overture in any other American orchestra.

Mr. I. Schnitzler was the soloist, and performed Vieuxtemp's D minor violin concerto. It is one of the few worthy compositions of the Franco-Belgian school, which too often gives violin fireworks for their own pyrotechnical sake. The Adagio Religioso is full of breadth and nobility, and the concerted work of the solo violin, harp and violoncello in this movement is true music. It is unnecessary to chronicle how well the last two instruments were played. The soloist was by no means overweighted by his difficult task; if I except a slight flatting in pitch, and this but temporary and in the higher positions, the execution was all that could be demanded. The breadth of tone obtained in the G string passages of the finale, the security of the harmonics, the clear double stopping, especially in the chromatic runs, and the brilliancy of the chief theme of the Scherzo, all call for favorable comment. The rustic character of the Trio of the Scherzo, the drone bass, and the pretty, pastoral character of the wood-wind passages, were well brought out in the orchestral work and formed a good contrast to the spirited and martial finale. The soloist was recalled with much enthusiasm, twice, by the audience, but did not accept encores as was done in the preceding concert.

The programme ended with Volkmann's B flat symphony, a work of shapely and melodious character and of conservative scoring. The musical essayists seem agreed that Volkmann drew inspiration from Schumann, much as Gade took sustenance from Mendelssohn, even to the extent of becoming a copy of his ideal, but in this case nothing of individuality is lost, and in fact the allegretto of this symphony is a nearer approach to that of Beethoven's eighth symphony (which forms the slow movement of that thoroughly playful work) than to anything in the Schumann repertoire; the whole symphony, indeed, is closely comparable (although at a respectful distance), in its brevity, its accelerated "slow movement," and its humorous and capricious touches, with the above-mentioned work of the symphonic master. The first movement is the most satisfactory, for there is excellent contrast of themes (the chief theme is bold and fiery, the second charmingly playful), and proper development. The reappearance of a theme from the first movement, in the midst of the second, gives a continuity to the work, and is a device which both Beethoven and Schumann had used in their symphonies, and Volkmann may have been indebted for the thought to either or both. This second movement was delightfully shaded, and the final appearance of the gavotte-like theme on the strings, pizzicato, with imitations on the woodwind, was the perfection of daintiness in its execution. In the andantino, which serves to introduce a less worthy finale, the excellent playing of the oboe against a well-balanced pizzicato accompaniment deserves much praise, and so does the shading of the crescendo which led gradually from the languor and melancholy of the third, into the dash and brio of the finale. The horn, too, gave its part of the dialogue with the oboe without break or blur.

But it is almost unnecessary to seek out the individual excellence where all was so well done. If the concert presented nothing of astounding depth, it gave nothing, per contra, that was weak or unworthy, and the brilliancy of the first, and the delicacy of the last number, redeemed the roughness and crudity that has marked the performance of some recently played masterpieces.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

A NEW OPERA COMPANY.

C. A. Ellis, manager, who has so successfully piloted the Boston Symphony Orchestra until it has become the great musical attraction of this country, is about to embark in another enterprise, also of high musical worth. The organization which he will put on the road is to be called the Nordica Operatic Concert company, headed by Mme. Lilian Nordica, the well-known prima donna; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, contralto; Andreas Dippel, tenor; Sig. Del Puente, baritone; Emil Fischer, basso; also Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, the American alto. The first concert will take place at Music Hall, Jan. 16. The enterprise is one to be managed on a grand scale, and is purely a Boston affair.

[74]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

HYPERION THEATRE, . . . NEW HAVEN,

Monday Evening, January 9, at 8.

ONLY GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, 75c., $1.00, and $1.50. On sale at the Hyperion Theatre on and after Monday, Jan. 2, 1893.

JANUARY 2, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert given in the Music Hall last Saturday afternoon was as follows:

Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Opus 23.
Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor,
Symphony No. 2, in B-flat, Opus 53.
Mr. J. Schnitzler was the violinist.

The "Cellini" overture, one of Berlioz's best written and most stoutly constructed works in this form, was given an immensely brilliant and finished performance. One missed the low tones of the bass clarinet, which should serve to blend those of the ordinary clarinet with those of the four bassoons, in the grave theme in the middle of the Larghetto movement near the beginning of the overture; the omission of this instrument, to be sure, leaves no gap either in the melody or harmony, but it does make a serious change in Berlioz's coloring; this omission is of a wholly different nature from Mr. Nikisch's reducing the prescribed "four trumpets" to two at the return of this same theme in the midst of the Allegro; an examination of the score shows plainly enough that Berlioz added another pair of trumpets at this point, neither for the sake of greater strength nor of greater fulness in the harmony, but simply on account of the defective scale of the old plain trumpets for which he wrote: by taking four trumpets in different keys, and making the practicable notes of one instrument fill up the gaps in the scale of another, he could get a sufficiently complete scale to enable the four instruments to play the melody after the fashion of Russian bell-ringers—each of the four trumpets playing what notes of the melody it could, and omitting the rest. But this melody can be as well played on two (or, for matter of that, on one) of our modern chromatic instruments as on four of Berlioz's plain ones; so the omission of the extra pair of trumpets was in nowise a piece of infidelity to the score. It made no difference whatever: but leaving out the bass-clarinet did make a sensible difference. Still, our orchestra so seldom sins in this way—it being, upon the whole, very remarkable, as orchestras go, for its scrupulous fidelity to composers' specifications—that this one point should not be too much dwelt on. Here, as on several previous occasions, Mr. Nikisch showed a peculiar aptitude for entering into Berlioz's spirit, and reflecting his individual style with surpassing truthfulness. The performance had all of Berlioz's brilliancy, impetuosity and verve, yet without ever degenerating into mere noisiness; his characteristic sudden crescendos were especially admirably done.

The Volkmann B-flat symphony has been heard here before with a certain amount of relish; but it seemed last Saturday evening as if this second hearing were just once too often. The work is respectably written, it is a sufficiently blameless composition, of no overweaning pretentions, but lamentably devoid of genius. It is decent mediocrity in its fullest bloom. It is both curious and dismal to note how, when the composer hits upon a really charming musical thought—as in the first phrase of the theme of the Allegretto (second movement)—he flounders about in the most constrained way to finish his theme without falling plump into Mozart or Haydn. The first phrase is simply delicious; what follows it is but a consciously awkward avoidance of plagiarism. We were rather dismayed to hear how flat and foisonless several points in this symphony sounded, which had seemed quite fascinating to us at the first hearing. That dialogue between oboe and horn in the Andantino, for instance, seemed dreary and "manufactured" as might be. The symphony is a praiseworthy work enough, but it is not in fast colors; it cannot live. The performance was admirable.

Vieuxtemp's long D minor concerto—a very "sea-serpent concerto," to use Bülow's expression—has not been heard here for some time, if we remember aright. It is a work for which one cannot but feel a certain respect; there are some admirable points in it; the way in which both solo instruments and orchestra are treated in their relation to each other is really masterly, and speaks of something artistically deeper than mere cleverness. Time was (on the first appearance of this concerto in Paris) when a critic like Berlioz could go into unfeigned raptures over it; it is well built, it is musical, there are many passages of real beauty in it, at moments it almost reaches the pitch of inspiration. But it none the less belongs distinctly and irreclaimably to a by-gone musical period; it is one of those too common things in art that become obsolete with their style, that can not outlive their manner. Its being superior to many of its contemporaries can not save it; today it has nothing left to say to us. That it gives the performer abundant opportunity, not only for virtuoso display, but for really fine and artistic playing goes without saying; but with all its admirable qualities, it remains cold as stone, and an artist must be a very Pygmalion to win it to life.

Mr. Schnitzler will be remembered as the young violinist who came out to this country some years ago, at the same time as Mr. Fritz Giese, to join the Mendelssohn Quintet Club. After a while he left the club and went West, whence he returns this year as one of the first violins in our Symphony Orchestra. His playing has grown with time in force, vigor and authority; he showed himself last Saturday evening as a solo player par excellence—for, although we have not heard him in concerted chamber music since his return, there are certain unmistakable traits by which the born solo player may be recognized, and he has them distinctly. It is largely a matter of temperament. There was Wilhelm Müller, the 'cellist; one of the finest, if not the finest, quartet 'cellist ever heard here; hear him in a quartet, and he seemed possessed of every artistic virtue—fine tone, technique, marked individuality of style, immense pithiness of expression. It seemed as if he could squeeze all the juice out of any musical orange. Well! in solo playing he made next to no effect at all. His was not the solo temperament. Now Mr. Schnitzler plainly has the solo temperament to a high degree; it is not only that his playing stands out easily in relief against the orchestral background, that he plays with the authority of one who knows himself in a commanding position; neither is it that he has very marked individuality of style—for, ex-

[57]

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.

Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MESSRS. F. BUSONI AND G. GOLDSCHMIDT.

V. CONCERT.

MONDAY, JANUARY 16, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

VOLKMANN. TRIO in B flat minor.
I. Largo.
II. Ritornell (Allegretto).
III. Allegro con brio.—Largo.

SCHUMANN. QUARTET in A minor, op. 41, No. 1.
I. Introduzione (Andante espressivo).—Allegro.
II. Scherzo (Presto).
III. Adagio.
IV. Presto.

BRAHMS. QUINTET for CLARINETTE, 2 VIOLINS, VIOLA and 'CELLO, B minor, op. 115.
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio.
III. Andantino.—Presto ma non troppo e con sentimento.
IV. Con moto.
(First time.)

The date of the Sixth Concert is February 13.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 2, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Berlioz: Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Opus 23.
Vieuxtemps: Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor, Opus 31.
Volkmann: Symphony No. 2, in B-flat, Opus 53.
Mr. I. Schnitzler was the violinist.

The "Cellini" overture, one of Berlioz's best written and most stoutly constructed works in this form, was given an immensely brilliant and finished performance. One missed the low tones of the bass clarinet, which should serve to blend those of the ordinary clarinet with those of the four bassoons, in the grave theme in the middle of the Larghetto movement near the beginning of the overture; the omission of this instrument, to be sure, leaves no gap either in the melody or harmony, but it does make a serious change in Berlioz's coloring; this omission is of a wholly different nature from Mr. Nikisch's reducing the prescribed "four trumpets" to two at the return of this same theme in the midst of the Allegro; an examination of the score shows plainly enough that Berlioz added another pair of trumpets at this point, neither for the sake of greater strength nor of greater fulness in the harmony, but simply on account of the defective scale of the old plain trumpets for which he wrote: by taking four trumpets in different keys, and making the practicable notes of one instrument fill up the gaps in the scale of another, he could get a sufficiently complete scale to enable the four instruments to play the melody after the fashion of Russian bell-ringers—each of the four trumpets playing what notes of the melody it could, and omitting the rest. But this melody can be as well played on two (or, for matter of that, on one) of our modern chromatic instruments as on four of Berlioz's plain ones; so the omission of the extra pair of trumpets was in nowise a piece of infidelity to the score. It made no difference whatever; but leaving out the bass-clarinet did make a sensible difference. Still, our orchestra so seldom sins in this way—it being, upon the whole, very remarkable, as orchestras go, for its scrupulous fidelity to composers' specifications—that this one point should not be too much dwelt on. Here, as on several previous occasions, Mr. Nikisch showed a peculiar aptitude for entering into Berlioz's spirit, and reflecting his individual style with surpassing truthfulness. The performance had all of Berlioz's brilliancy, impetuosity and verve, yet without ever degenerating into mere noisiness; his characteristic sudden crescendos were especially admirably done.

The Volkmann B-flat symphony has been heard here before with a certain amount of relish; but it seemed last Saturday evening as if this second hearing were just once too often. The work is respectably written, it is a sufficiently blameless composition, of no overweaning pretentions, but lamentably devoid of genius. It is decent mediocrity in its fullest bloom. It is both curious and dismal to note how, when the composer hits upon a really charming musical thought—as in the first phrase of the theme of the Allegretto (second movement)—he flounders about in the most constrained way to finish his theme without falling plump into Mozart or Haydn. The first phrase is simply delicious; what follows it is but a consciously awkward avoidance of plagiarism. We were rather dismayed to hear how flat and foisonless several points in this symphony sounded, which had seemed quite fascinating to us at the first hearing. That dialogue between oboe and horn in the Andantino, for instance, seemed dreary and "manufactured" as might be. The symphony is a praiseworthy work enough, but it is not in fast colors; it cannot live. The performance was admirable.

Vieuxtemp's long D minor concerto—a very "sea-serpent concerto," to use Bülow's expression—has not been heard here for some time, if we remember aright. It is a work for which one cannot but feel a certain respect; there are some admirable points in it; the way in which both solo instruments and orchestra are treated in their relation to each other is really masterly, and speaks of something artistically deeper than mere cleverness. Time was (on the first appearance of this concerto in Paris) when a critic like Berlioz could go into unfeigned raptures over it; it is well built, it is musical, there are many passages of real beauty in it, at moments it almost reaches the pitch of inspiration. But it none the less belongs distinctly and irreclaimably to a by-gone musical period; it is one of those too common things in art that become obsolete with their style, that can not outlive their manner. Its being superior to many of its contemporaries can not save it; today it has nothing left to say to us. That it gives the performer abundant opportunity, not only for virtuoso display, but for really fine and artistic playing goes without saying; but with all its admirable qualities, it remains cold as stone, and an artist must be a very Pygmalion to win it to life.

Mr. Schnitzler will be remembered as the young violinist who came out to this country some years ago, at the same time as Mr. Fritz Giese, to join the Mendelssohn Quintet Club. After a while he left the club and went West, whence he returns this year as one of the first violins in our Symphony Orchestra. His playing has grown with time in force, vigor and authority; he showed himself last Saturday evening as a solo player par excellence—for, although we have not heard him in concerted chamber music since his return, there are certain unmistakable traits by which the born solo player may be recognized, and he has them distinctly. It is largely a matter of temperament. There was Wilhelm Müller, the 'cellist; one of the finest, if not the finest, quartet 'cellist ever heard here; hear him in a quartet, and he seemed possessed of every artistic virtue—fine tone, technique, marked individuality of style, immense pithiness of expression. It seemed as if he could squeeze all the juice out of any musical orange. Well! in solo playing he made next to no effect at all. His was not the solo temperament. Now Mr. Schnitzler plainly has the solo temperament to a high degree; it is not only that his playing stands out easily in relief against the orchestral background, that he plays with the authority of one who knows himself in a commanding position; neither is it that he has many very marked individuality of style—for, ex-

[75]

HYPERION THEATRE, . . . NEW HAVEN,

Monday Evening, January 9, at 8.

ONLY GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, 75c., $1.00, and $1.50. On sale at the Hyperion Theatre on and after Monday, Jan. 2, 1893.

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MESSRS. F. BUSONI AND G. GOLDSCHMIDT.

V. CONCERT.

MONDAY, JANUARY 16, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

VOLKMANN. TRIO in B flat minor.
I. Largo.
II. Ritornell (Allegretto).
III. Allegro con brio.—Largo.

SCHUMANN. QUARTET in A minor, op. 41, No. 1.
I. Introduzione (Andante espressivo).—Allegro.
II. Scherzo (Presto).
III. Adagio.
IV. Presto.

BRAHMS. QUINTET for CLARINETTE, 2 VIOLINS, VIOLA and 'CELLO, B minor, op. 115.
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio.
III. Andantino.—Presto ma non troppo e con sentimento.
IV. Con moto.
(First time.)

The date of the Sixth Concert is February 13.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Production of Mascagni's Charming "Cavalleria Rusticana."

NORDICA AND SIGNOR DEL PUENTE

Assisted by Other Soloists and the Rheinberger Club Give Music Lovers a Delightful Evening.

It was the proudest hour in the Rheinberger Club's life, last evening was, when its members had the privilege of singing with that glorious and wholly charming prima donna soprano, Mme. Lillian Nordica, some of the most vigorous, dramatic and tuneful music New Bedford has ever heard rendered. The concert was a brilliant success. Nordica was, of course, the centre of attraction; and, with Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, the contralto, Payne Clarke, the tenor, and Guiseppe del Puente, the baritone, and the Rheinberger Club, the concert was grand. The hall was filled, and it was an appreciative and enthusiastic audience, composed largely of persons who find good music, well rendered, a source of inspiration and a means of cultivation and education. Each of the artists appeared in solo numbers in the miscellaneous concert which opened the programme, and won the hearty applause of the audience. Mme. Nordica sang in a perfectly exquisite way. It is useless and needless to analyze the charm of her voice. Her bewitching manner always captivates, and her clear, sweet, firm and round soprano voice always excites marvelling admiration. Del Puente is always the same—intense, dramatic and adorable. The same bit of red silk peeped out of his coat front, the fame dashing smile adorned his countenance, and, if we are not mistaken, the same notes flowed forth upon his mellow voice as upon his last appearance in this city, some three seasons ago. The insatiate audience called him out four times. Mr. Clarke was disappointing in his selection here, but later in the opera he was all that could be desired. His voice is smooth and powerful and very effective, but his articulation is poor. Miss Campbell has a rich and expressive contralto voice. The Rheinberger Club showed to splendid advantage in the Rheinberger chorus, The Journey Song, which closed the first part of the programme.

MADAME NORDICA.

But the interest of the evening centred in the much talked of opera of Pietro Mascagni, a most delicious, intense, fiery and exciting composition,—a musical production that has echoed round the world. The story is well known, how the young Italian wrote in competition for a prize the one act opera voicing the intensest passion; how his success raised him from extremest poverty to a position of comparative wealth; how he was courted and feted by all Europe, which had gone wild over the work of Mascagni, who, we are told, had lived through many of the experiences, had been guilty of the sins and known the passions of his Sicilian hero, Turiddu. However varied was the opinion in regard to the merit of the opera or its entire originality the critics were unanimous that Pietro Mascagni had genius and of a brilliant sort, and they pronounced his composition a hot-blooded, a thrilling, soul-stirring and nerve-straining work. Its rendering in concert form was the second part of the programme last evening and the audience rejoiced that the opportunity was afforded them to listen to it, even if robbed of the visible action and the dramatic illusion. The music is highly descriptive and with the aid of the synopsis of the libretto contained in the programme the least imaginative listener could picture to himself the scenes of the opera. The choruses were sung in English and the solos where Mr. Clark was concerned, but otherwise the rendering was in Italian. Mr. Isidoro Luckstone, who had played a brilliant piano solo, acted as accompanist and showed himself a thoroughly capable pianist in his handling of the very difficult but taxing music. There was a [illegible] that Mr. J. Frank[illegible] conducted it. It was suspected that he had succumbed to the fascinations of Mme. Nordica, or that in weariness he had yielded to blissful sleep. At all events, the pealing, ringing notes of the organ failed to reach our ears with the exception of a few strains of the intermezzo. It couldn't have been Mr. Donahoe's fault, whatever was the trouble, for he is well known as the organist at the Cathedral in Boston and his ability as a musician is undoubted.

Mme. Nordica was a strong and dramatic Santuzza and Del Puente an ideal Alfio. They sang their roles in good opera form, interpreting the music in manner as well as in voice. Miss Campbell as Lucia and Lola and Mr. Clarke as Turiddu were also thoroughly satisfactory. The chorus work was grand. The three or four choruses of the opera are a noteworthy part of it, and as sung by the Rheinberger Club they were magnificant. The club under Mr. F. L. Diman's direction has been doing splendid work for four or five seasons, but it has this season reached a greater height of perfection than ever before attained. That the organization could take up this work, with its vigorous and complicated choral parts, and after five rehearsals sing as it was last night sung, speaks for itself. Mr. Diman is a skillful and efficient conductor, and the results of his efforts are greatly to his credit. The club is an honor to its conductor, to its members and to the city. Mr. C. A. Ellis of Music Hall, Boston, under whose management the concert was given, was so well pleased with the performance of the chorus that there is some talk of taking the club to Boston to sing with the same soloists.

After the harmonious and ingenious prelude, interrupted by Turiddu's serenade, one imagines the dawning of day and the eager gathering of the peasants in the village square before the church on Easter morning, and listens enraptured to their chorus, Blossoms of Oranges, a melodious and rhythmical composition, well sung by the Rheinberger club, with soprano and tenor parts in connection. The love-lorn Santuzza bewails Turiddu's desertion of her in a pathetic recitative, answered by the faithless lover's mother, Lucia, the parts being admirably sung by Nordica and Miss Campbell. Then follows the strongly contrasting solo of Alfio, splendidly sung by Del Puente, who is said to make a most picturesque and striking Alfio in costume, and the vigorous, jerky and decidedly unique chorus of the contadini, The Jolly Carter, which was given with a snap that was really infectious. The soprano and tenor parts are pitched abnormally high, but the chorus took the notes well. Here the style of the music changes completely, and the grandly swelling and inspiring Easter anthem, Queen of the Heaven, rings forth. It is a noble and a stirring hymn and was gloriously rendered.

You know the story, how deserted Santuzza, in a heart-rending romanza, begs Lucia to aid her and then seeks her faithless lover. The passionate duo here between Turiddu and Santuzza called forth unbounded enthusiasm. Nordica was superb and Mr. Clarke sang with much dramatic fervor.

Silence, Santuzza, slave will I not be
Unto thy foolish, jealous exactions,

thrilled the audience, which was moved to pity by Nordica's rendering of Santuzza's wail,

Strike me, revile me, still will I adore thee,
Bow down before thee, loving thee, languish.

Miss Campbell showed to good advantage in her rendering of the coquettish Lola's ditty, which interrupts the anguish of the other two. It is in this romanza and duo that Mascagni's fiery genius most brilliantly shines. Santuzza, scorned, scoffed at by her rival, deserted by her lover, and unassisted by heaven, has something still to live for. "Vengeance, Vendetta." Revealing to Alfio the perfidy of his wife, she leaves him vowing vengeance. In the dramatic action this is the emotional climax of the play, and that a brief pause may separate the earlier from the later episodes of the music drama, there is introduced an inter-mezzo, which is full of flowing harmony when rendered by the orchestra, but last evening there was only the piano, with the little, thin wheezing assistance from the organ, which has been previously mentioned. The action is resumed with a sparkling and melodious drinking song, the exquisite tenor solo of Mr. Clarke being finely supported by the Rheinberger Club. The swinging rhythm of the piece was splendidly maintained by the chorus. And then comes the finale and the final tragedy, and so characteristic is the music that without the words we should know a melo-drama was being enacted. The duel is fought, the tragedy ends. The closing notes of the performance were unfortunate. There was some trouble. It must have been that Del Puente came in too soon. At all events, the chorus was unprepared for their final shriek of anguish at Turiddu's death. This was nothing, however. The opera requires 70 minutes in the rendering, and it was 70 minutes of strong melody. The concert was a glowing success.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1893.

The program of the tenth symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz
Violin concerto, No. 4, D minor.....Vieuxtemps
Symphony, No. 2, B flat.....Volkmann

Mr. Schnitzler, who was the violinist, is a new member of the orchestra. He played with fluency and musical intelligence. He seems, however, to lack temperament, and in his bravura there were occasional departures from the true pitch. The orchestra gave a brilliant performance of the Berlioz overture. The Volkmann symphony pleased the audience, and with reason. It has been called "small beer;" but small beer is very soothing and grateful, after deep potations of rebellious liquors or after spiced and Eastern food. So, at least, have heroes of Shakespeare and Thackeray willingly admitted.

PHILIP HALE.

These shocking examples are presented as New Year's reminders, incentives to sobriety and decency. There has been but little music here during the past week. The program of the Kneisel Quartet concert Monday evening the 26th included Beethoven's C sharp minor quartet, op. 131, and Brahm's piano quartet, op. 26. The ensemble, particularly in the Beethoven number, was almost faultless, and Mr. Nikisch proved himself to be an excellent pianist in chamber music. In the Brahm's quartet, the piano was at times too much in evidence. But in view of the virility and the musical intelligence of the performance it seems ungracious to refer to a slight bar to enjoyment that might not have been noticed if the piano cover had been closed and not raised to its full height.

Nordica Operatic Company.—Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has organized the Nordica Operatic Company, which will begin a tour of the States on January 16. The company will consist of Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Andreas Dippel, Del Puente and Emil Fischer. Mrs. Scalchi is expected to arrive in New York within two or three days.

Eugenia Castellano.

TRUE temperament peeps out of the eyes of the little Eugenia Castellano, whose face is reproduced on the first page of this issue. In staid Boston this young girl in her early teens played so well at Music Hall that she stirred up the gelid blood of her audience and she was recalled again and again.

Eugenia Castellano will be heard in this city with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, January 12, at Chickering Hall. February 3 and 4 she will play at the Music Hall in the third Symphony Society concert, and she will also play at a private musicale to be given by H. Le Grand Cannon. In fact this Italian child, by the fire and brilliancy of her playing, has triumphed everywhere. Read what the Boston press had to say of her recently:

Boston "Transcript," Tuesday, December 27, 1892.
MUSIC HALL: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Miss Castellano was announced to play the Tschaikowsky G major concerto, but when it came to rehearsal the orchestral parts were found to be in a condition that forbade all thoughts of giving the work. So, as time was short, it was decided that she should play three short pieces without orchestra. This young lady is said to be only sixteen; her technic, especially in respect to finger work, is almost phenomenal, and she already plays with no little authority and style. If in the Chopin number her feeling showed itself as rather immature, it was honest, straightforward and musical, and there was no aping of the doings of older folk. But in the lighter things she did positive wonders, and was so rapturously applauded by the audience that she had to play two encore pieces. Indeed the impression she made was conspicuously fine.

The "Sunday Herald," Boston, December 25, 1892.

The patrons of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were given a very pleasant surprise last evening in the appearance of Eugenia Castellano, a pianist, who made her American début on this occasion.

The young artist may well take pride in the success attending her introduction to this country, and it is entirely safe to predict for her a brilliant career, if the triumphs of last evening's appearance may be taken as a measure of her abilities.

She comes to this country as the representative of a school little known here in recent years, for she is a player of the piano, and not a mere mechanical manipulator of the keyboard, with a prodigious memory and a firm belief in the standard repertory of the day.

Her appearance was to have been made in the second Tschaikowsky concerto, but the incompleteness of the parts supplied the orchestra made it necessary to substitute solo numbers, including a Chopin posthumous nocturne in E minor and scherzo in B minor and Martucci's "Étude de Concert."

She came before her public an utter stranger, but the entire confidence and self possession which characterized her entrance predisposed the audience in her favor, and before she had concluded the "Nocturne," she was an accepted Boston favorite.

She is a master of the technic of the piano, but her command of the keyboard has been made a means and not an end, and the drill incidental to the acquirement of her skill in the manipulation of the keyboard has not, as is too often the case, lessened in the least degree the development of her artistic nature.

She is a born musician, and the refinement, sentiment and warmth of her temperament all contribute to the effect of her playing. Her touch is delightfully clear and elastic; she shows a reserve power in the broadest passages that is surprising in a woman, and one so young especially; her tone is never forced beyond a pure musical quality, and the greatest rapidity of movement attainable is accompanied by such a clearness and accuracy that every note is given its full value.

Such playing, while showing the intelligence which appeals to the mental faculties, touches the inner nature of the music lover and gives a sense of satisfaction which no words can describe.

Her most artistic interpretation of the Chopin numbers created a great impression upon the audience, but at the finish of the marvelously brilliant étude by her old teacher, Martucci, both her public and the orchestra found vent for their enthusiasm in the most extravagant expressions of approval, and after four recalls she added as an encore number "Il Momento Cappriccioso," by Van Westerhout. Even this failed to satisfy the audience, now in a state of delight over the new sensation, and, following a further double recall, she completed her triumphs by playing in a superb fashion a gavot in the sixteenth century style by Van Westerhout. It was a great success for the signorina, and the quick recognition of the rare abilities of the new comer reflected credit upon the intelligence of the audience. Without doubt the followers of the German school will be shocked at having critical Boston indorse a player who is not bound by the laws of the classical school, but the public will gladly accept the newcomer and enjoy her playing with a sense of relief.

The Bos[illegible] "Globe," Sunday December 25, [illegible]

The soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert was a very [illegible] and a very brilliant pianist, Miss Eugenia Castellano. She is only sixteen years of age and in appearance is a child, but her playing is that of a mature artist, so broad and comprehensive in her method, so forceful, brilliant and finished is her technic, and so intelligent and sympathetic are her interpretations of master compositions.

She is an Italian and received her early education from her mother, who was herself a musician of high repute. How naturally music comes to her may be inferred from the fact that she graduated in three years with high honors from a conservatory course of study which is supposed to require eight years of constant application.

She made her first public appearance in America at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon and completely captivated that usually reserved assemblage. She was recalled four times with uncommon demonstrations of enthusiasm. Her reception was even more cordial at the concert last evening.

It was intended that she should play Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 2, but the number was necessarily withdrawn on account of the incorrect orchestral parts provided.

As a substitute she played three solos—Chopin's nocturne in E minor and scherzo in B minor and a concert study by Martucci, the master under whom Miss Castellano has studied for the past few years.

The familiar Chopin numbers were played with marvelous expression and artistic finish. The Martucci study is a most exacting composition, bristling with difficulties which would try the skill of the most nimble of fingers. She played the most difficult passages with astonishing rapidity and in a faultless manner. She is truly a remarkable pianist, and her promised appearance here in a recital will be awaited with eager interest by Boston music lovers.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 7, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The orchestral numbers at the tenth Symphony were two, and both were works for which the conductor has an evident predilection (the overture especially) and which the band renders remarkably well in mechanism and in mood under his baton—Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture and a symphony of Volkmann, the second in B-flat. Between these Mr. I. Schnitzler, of the first violin wing, played Vieuxtemps's concerto in D minor, which is a rich, full and brillant and at times a dignified composition. Its author, himself one of the greatest modern violinists, had the skill to unite in what he wrote for his instrument music adapted for both the artist and the virtuoso, requiring now the utmost executive skill and now the sentimental touch and responsive mood. This concerto has much variety of fancy and figure and it is often immensely difficult—so difficult, in fact, that there were moments when it seemed as if every endeavor of the finely equipped players were taxed to get the notes into their groupings and there was no means left whereby to insure them perfect intonation. For Mr. Schnitzler has a remarkably fine mastery of his art and plays with freedom, confidence, solidity of tone, vivacity of spirit and flashing clearness of execution. It was chiefly in the flying paces of the first movement that he faltered in respect of intonation, for in the melodious adagio and the lively scherzo he was rarely at fault. His earnestness and enthusiasm were contagious and he was twice recalled.

Tonight, the orchestra will play no novelty, the selections being Haydn's symphony in D-minor, Bizet's second "Arlesienne" suite and the "Leonora, No. 3" overture. Mme. Basta-Favary is to be the soloist and will sing twice.

A NEW CONCERT COMPANY.

Mr. Charles A. Ellis, who has been gradually working this way into general management, is about to put upon the concert stage—beginning at Boston Music Hall, on January 16—a company which will at once command admiration and patronage. Its soprano will be Mme. Lillian Nordica; its contralto, Signora Scalchi; its tenor, Herr Andreas Dippel; its basso, Herr Fischer; its barytone, Signor Del Puente, and its second contralto, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell. A competently large orchestra will give adequate support to the singers and supply such instrumental numbers as shall be desirable to diversify the programmes. With such singers it will be possible to give any music for solo voices which the most exacting audience could ask, and all are also known as artists who have too much pride in their profession to slight any iota of their duties. The enterprise is an ambitious and arduous one, but Mr. Ellis has experience and spirit and can depend upon the good will which he has well earned.

[76]

DAILY MERCURY

TUESDAY, JANUARY 3, 1893.

Produotion of Mascagni's Charming "Cavalleria Rusticana."

NORDICA AND SIGNOR DEL PUENTE

Assisted by Other Soloists and the Rheinberger Club Give Music Lovers a Delightful Evening.

It was the proudest hour in the Rheinberger Club's life, last evening was, when its members had the privilege of singing with that glorious and wholly charming prima donna soprano, Mme. Lillian Nordica, some of the most vigorous, dramatic and tuneful music New Bedford has ever heard rendered. The concert was a brilliant success. Nordica was, of course, the centre of attraction; and, with Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, the contralto, Payne Clarke, the tenor, and Guiseppe del Puente, the baritone, and the Rheinberger Club, the concert was grand. The hall was filled, and it was an appreciative and enthusiastic audience, composed largely of persons who find good music, well rendered, a source of inspiration and a means of cultivation and education. Each of the artists appeared in solo numbers in the miscellaneous concert which opened the programme, and won the hearty applause of the audience. Mme. Nordica sang in a perfectly exquisite way. It is useless and needless to analyze the charm of her voice. Her bewitching manner always captivates, and her clear, sweet, firm and round soprano voice always excites marvelling admiration. Del Puente is always the same—intense, dramatic and adorable. The same bit of red silk peeped out of his coat front, the fame dashing smile adorned his countenance, and, if we are not mistaken, the same notes flowed forth upon his mellow voice as upon his last appearance in this city, some three seasons ago. The insatiate audience called him out four times. Mr. Clarke was disappointing in his selection here, but later in the opera he was all that could be desired. His voice is smooth and powerful and very effective, but his articulation is poor. Miss Campbell has a rich and expressive contralto voice. The Rheinberger Club showed to splendid advantage in the Rheinberger chorus, The Journey Song, which closed the first part of the programme.

MADAME NORDICA.

But the interest of the evening centred in the much talked of opera of Pietro Mascagni, a most delicious, intense, fiery and exciting composition,—a musical production that has echoed round the world. The story is well known, how the young Italian wrote in competition for a prize the one act opera voicing the intensest passion; how his success raised him from extremest poverty to a position of comparative wealth; how he was courted and feted by all Europe, which had gone wild over the work of Mascagni, who, we are told, had lived through many of the experiences, had been guilty of the sins and known the passions of his Sicilian hero, Turiddu. However varied was the opinion in regard to the merit of the opera or its entire originality the critics were unanimous that Pietro Mascagni had genius and of a brilliant sort, and they pronounced his composition a hot-blooded, a thrilling, soul-stirring and nerve-straining work. Its rendering in concert form was the second part of the programme last evening and the audience rejoiced that the opportunity was afforded them to listen to it, even if robbed of the visible action and the dramatic illusion. The music is highly descriptive and with the aid of the synopsis of the libretto contained in the programme the least imaginative listener could picture to himself the scenes of the opera. The choruses were sung in English and the solos where Mr. Clark was concerned, but otherwise the rendering was in Italian. Mr. Isidoro Luckstone, who had played a brilliant piano solo, acted as accompanist and showed himself a thoroughly capable pianist in his handling of the very difficult and taxing music. There was a rumor abroad in the hall that Mr. J. Frank Donahoe was presiding at the organ, but the audience rather doubted it. It was suspected that he had succumbed to the fascinations of Mme. Nordica, or that in weariness he had yielded to blissful sleep. At all events, the pealing, ringing notes of the organ failed to reach our ears with the exception of a few strains of the intermezzo. It couldn't have been Mr. Donahoe's fault, whatever was the trouble, for he is well known as the organist at the Cathedral in Boston and his ability as a musician is undoubted.

Mme. Nordica was a strong and dramatic Santuzza and Del Puente an ideal Alfio. They sang their roles in good opera form, interpreting the music in manner as well as in voice. Miss Campbell as Lucia and Lola and Mr. Clarke as Turiddu were also thoroughly satisfactory. The chorus work was grand. The three or four choruses of the opera are a noteworthy part of it, and as sung by the Rheinberger Club they were magnificant. The club under Mr. F. L. Diman's direction has been doing splendid work for four or five seasons, but it has this season reached a greater height of perfection than ever before attained. That the organization could take up this work, with its vigorous and complicated choral parts, and after five rehearsals sing as it was last night sung, speaks for itself. Mr. Diman is a skillful and efficient conductor, and the results of his efforts are greatly to his credit. The club is an honor to its conductor, to its members and to the city. Mr. C. A. Ellis of Music Hall, Boston, under whose management the concert was given, was so well pleased with the performance of the chorus that there is some talk of taking the club to Boston to sing with the same soloists.

After the harmonious and ingenious prelude, interrupted by Turiddu's serenade, one imagines the dawning of day and the eager gathering of the peasants in the village square before the church on Easter morning, and listens enraptured to their chorus, Blossoms of Oranges, a melodious and rhythmical composition, well sung by the Rheinberger club, with soprano and tenor parts in connection. The love-lorn Santuzza bewails Turiddu's desertion of her in a pathetic recitative, answered by the faithless lover's mother, Lucia, the parts being admirably sung by Nordica and Miss Campbell. Then follows the strongly contrasting solo of Alfio, splendidly sung by Del Puente, who is said to make a most picturesque and striking Alfio in costume, and the vigorous, jerky and decidedly unique chorus of the contadini, The Jolly Carter, which was given with a snap that was really infectious. The soprano and tenor parts are pitched abnormally high, but the chorus took the notes well. Here the style of the music changes completely, and the grandly swelling and inspiring Easter anthem, Queen of the Heaven, rings forth. It is a noble and a stirring hymn and was gloriously rendered.

You know the story, how deserted Santuzza, in a heart-rending romanza, begs Lucia to aid her and then seeks her faithless lover. The passionate duo here between Turiddu and Santuzza called forth unbounded enthusiasm. Nordica was superb and Mr. Clarke sang with much dramatic fervor.

Silence, Santuzza, slave will I not be
Unto thy foolish, jealous exactions,

thrilled the audience, which was moved to pity by Nordica's rendering of Santuzza's wail,

Strike me, revile me, still will I adore thee,
Bow down before thee, loving thee, languish.

Miss Campbell showed to good advantage in her rendering of the coquettish Lola's ditty, which interrupts the anguish of the other two. It is in this romanza and duo that Mascagni's fiery genius most brilliantly shines. Santuzza, scorned, scoffed at by her rival, deserted by her lover, and unassisted by heaven, has something still to live for. "Vengeance, Vendetta." Revealing to Alfio the perfidy of his wife, she leaves him vowing vengeance. In the dramatic action this is the emotional climax of the play, and that a brief pause may separate the earlier from the later episodes of the music drama, there is introduced an inter-mezzo, which is full of flowing harmony when rendered by the orchestra, but last evening there was only the piano, with the little, thin wheezing assistance from the organ, which has been previously mentioned. The action is resumed with a sparkling and melodious drinking song, the exquisite tenor solo of Mr. Clarke being finely supported by the Rheinberger Club. The swinging rhythm of the piece was splendidly maintained by the chorus. And then comes the finale and the final tragedy, and so characteristic is the music that without the words we should know a melo-drama was being enacted. The duel is fought, the tragedy ends. The closing notes of the performance were unfortunate. There was some trouble. It must have been that Del Puente came in too soon. At all events, the chorus was unprepared for their final shriek of anguish at Turiddu's death. This was nothing, however. The opera requires 70 minutes in the rendering, and it was 70 minutes of strong melody. The concert was a glowing success.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1893.

The program of the tenth symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz
Violin concerto, No. 4, D minor.....Vieuxtemps
Symphony, No. 2, B flat.....Volkmann

Mr. Schnitzler, who was the violinist, is a new member of the orchestra. He played with fluency and musical intelligence. He seems, however, to lack temperament, and in his bravura there were occasional departures from the true pitch. The orchestra gave a brilliant performance of the Berlioz overture. The Volkmann symphony pleased the audience, and with reason. It has been called "small beer;" but small beer is very soothing and grateful, after deep potations of rebellious liquors or after spiced and Eastern food. So, at least, have heroes of Shakespeare and Thackeray willingly admitted.

PHILIP HALE.

These shocking examples are presented as New Year's reminders, incentives to sobriety and decency. There has been but little music here during the past week. The program of the Kneisel Quartet concert Monday evening the 26th included Beethoven's C sharp minor quartet, op. 131, and Brahm's piano quartet, op. 26. The ensemble, particularly in the Beethoven number, was almost faultless, and Mr. Nikisch proved himself to be an excellent pianist in chamber music. In the Brahm's quartet, the piano was at times too much in evidence. But in view of the virility and the musical intelligence of the performance it seems ungracious to refer to a slight bar to enjoyment that might not have been noticed if the piano cover had been closed and not raised to its full height.

Nordica Operatic Company.—Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has organized the Nordica Operatic Company, which will begin a tour of the States on January 16. The company will consist of Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Andreas Dippel, Del Puente and Emil Fischer. Mrs. Scalchi is expected to arrive in New York within two or three days.

Eugenia Castellano.

TRUE temperament peeps out of the eyes of the little Eugenia Castellano, whose face is reproduced on the first page of this issue. In staid Boston this young girl in her early teens played so well at Music Hall that she stirred up the gelid blood of her audience and she was recalled again and again.

Eugenia Castellano will be heard in this city with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, January 12, at Chickering Hall. February 3 and 4 she will play at the Music Hall in the third Symphony Society concert, and she will also play at a private musicale to be given by H. Le Grand Cannon. In fact this Italian child, by the fire and brilliancy of her playing, has triumphed everywhere. Read what the Boston press had to say of her recently:

Boston "Transcript," Tuesday, December 27, 1892.
MUSIC HALL: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Miss Castellano was announced to play the Tschaikowsky G major concerto, but when it came to rehearsal the orchestral parts were found to be in a condition that forbade all thoughts of giving the work. So, as time was short, it was decided that she should play three short pieces without orchestra. This young lady is said to be only sixteen; her technic, especially in respect to finger work, is almost phenomenal, and she already plays with no little authority and style. If in the Chopin number her feeling showed itself as rather immature, it was honest, straightforward and musical, and there was no aping of the doings of older folk. But in the lighter things she did positive wonders, and was so rapturously applauded by the audience that she had to play two encore pieces. Indeed the impression she made was conspicuously fine.

The "Sunday Herald," Boston, December 25, 1892.

The patrons of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were given a very pleasant surprise last evening in the appearance of Eugenia Castellano, a pianist, who made her American début on this occasion.

The young artist may well take pride in the success attending her introduction to this country, and it is entirely safe to predict for her a brilliant career, if the triumphs of last evening's appearance may be taken as a measure of her abilities.

She comes to this country as the representative of a school little known here in recent years, for she is a player of the piano, and not a mere mechanical manipulator of the keyboard, with a prodigious memory and a firm belief in the standard repertory of the day.

Her appearance was to have been made in the second Tschaikowsky concerto, but the incompleteness of the parts supplied the orchestra made it necessary to substitute solo numbers, including a Chopin posthumous nocturne in E minor and scherzo in B minor and Martucci's "Étude de Concert."

She came before her public an utter stranger, but the entire confidence and self possession which characterized her entrance predisposed the audience in her favor, and before she had concluded the "Nocturne," she was an accepted Boston favorite.

She is a master of the technic of the piano, but her command of the keyboard has been made a means and not an end, and the drill incidental to the acquirement of her skill in the manipulation of the keyboard has not, as is too often the case, lessened in the least degree the development of her artistic nature.

She is a born musician, and the refinement, sentiment and warmth of her temperament all contribute to the effect of her playing. Her touch is delightfully clear and elastic; she shows a reserve power in the broadest passages that is surprising in a woman, and one so young especially; her tone is never forced beyond a pure musical quality, and the greatest rapidity of movement attainable is accompanied by such a clearness and accuracy that every note is given its full value.

Such playing, while showing the intelligence which appeals to the mental faculties, touches the inner nature of the music lover and gives a sense of satisfaction which no words can describe.

Her most artistic interpretation of the Chopin numbers created a great impression upon the audience, but at the finish of the marvelously brilliant étude by her old teacher, Martucci, both her public and the orchestra found vent for their enthusiasm in the most extravagant expressions of approval, and after four recalls she added as an encore number "Il Momento Cappriccioso," by Van Westerhout. Even this failed to satisfy the audience, now in a state of delight over the new sensation, and, following a further double recall, she completed her triumphs by playing in a superb fashion a gavot in the sixteenth century style by Van Westerhout. It was a great success for the signorina, and the quick recognition of the rare abilities of the new comer reflected credit upon the intelligence of the audience. Without doubt the followers of the German school will be shocked at having critical Boston indorse a player who is not bound by the laws of the classical school, but the public will gladly accept the newcomer and enjoy her playing with a sense of relief.

The Boston Sunday "Globe," Sunday December 25, 1892.

The soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert was a very young and a very brilliant pianist, Miss Eugenia Castellano. She is only sixteen years of age and in appearance is a child, but her playing is that of a mature artist, so broad and comprehen[illegible] method so forceful, brilliant and finished is her technic, and so intelligent and sympathetic are her interpretations of master compositions.

She is an Italian and received her early education from her mother, who was herself a musician of high repute. How naturally music comes to her may be inferred from the fact that she graduated in three years with high honors from a conservatory course of study which is supposed to require eight years of constant application.

She made her first public appearance in America at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon and completely captivated that usually reserved assemblage. She was recalled four times with uncommon demonstrations of enthusiasm. Her reception was even more cordial at the concert last evening.

It was intended that she should play Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 2, but the number was necessarily withdrawn on account of the incorrect orchestral parts provided.

As a substitute she played three solos—Chopin's nocturne in E minor and scherzo in B minor and a concert study by Martucci, the master under whom Miss Castellano has studied for the past few years.

The familiar Chopin numbers were played with marvelous expression and artistic finish. The Martucci study is a most exacting composition, bristling with difficulties which would try the skill of the most nimble of fingers. She played the most difficult passages with astonishing rapidity and in a faultless manner She is truly a remarkable pianist, and her promised appearance here in a recital will be awaited with eager interest by Boston music lovers.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 7, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The orchestral numbers at the tenth Symphony were two, and both were works for which the conductor has an evident predilection (the overture especially) and which the band renders remarkably well in mechanism and in mood under his baton—Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture and a symphony of Volkmann, the second in B-flat. Between these Mr. I. Schnitzler, of the first violin wing, played Vieuxtemps's concerto in D-minor, which is a rich, full and brillant and at times a dignified composition. Its author, himself one of the greatest modern violinists, had the skill to unite in what he wrote for his instrument music adapted for both the artist and the virtuoso, requiring now the utmost executive skill and now the sentimental touch and responsive mood. This concerto has much variety of fancy and figure and it is often immensely difficult—so difficult, in fact, that there were moments when it seemed as if every endeavor of the finely equipped players were taxed to get the notes into their groupings and there was no means left whereby to insure them perfect intonation. For Mr. Schnitzler has a remarkably fine mastery of his art and plays with freedom, confidence, solidity of tone, vivacity of spirit and flashing clearness of execution. It was chiefly in the flying paces of the first movement that he faltered in respect of intonation, for in the melodious adagio and the lively scherzo he was very at fault. His earnestness and enthusiasm were contagious and he was twice recalled.

Tonight, the orchestra will play no novelty, the selections being Haydn's symphony in D-minor, Bizet's second "Arlesienne" suite and the "Leonora, No. 3" overture. Mme. Basta-Favary is to be the soloist and will sing twice.

A NEW CONCERT COMPANY.

Mr. Charles A. Ellis, who has been gradually working this way into general management, is about to put upon the concert stage—beginning at Boston Music Hall, on January 16—a company which will at once command admiration and patronage. Its soprano will be Mme. Lillian Nordica; its contralto, Signora Scalchi; its tenor, Herr Andreas Dippel; its basso, Herr Fischer; its baritone, Signor Del Puente, and its second contralto, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell. A competently large orchestra will give adequate support to the singers and supply such instrumental numbers as shall be desirable to diversify the programmes. With such singers it will be possible to give any music for solo voices which the most exacting audience could ask, and all are also known as artists who have too much pride in their profession to slight any iota of their duties. The enterprise is an ambitious and arduous one, but Mr. Ellis has experience and spirit and can depend upon the good will which he has well earned.

[76]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 8, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

The eleventh symphony concert was genial, classic and quieting in the general effect of its programme; unlike too many of the concerts thus far, this season, the sound and fury-kind of music, signifying nothing, was conspicuous by its absence. The symphony was by Haydn—in B flat major, or No. 12 of the Breitkoff and Haertel collection—a work that even, yes and even forever, for that matter, should be admired for something more than its nominal value. Its venerable age seemed never more interesting, nor more nobly simple, and it was performed with all the fervency that the most fastidious listener would have demanded for it. The musical world owes much to Haydn. He was not the mere pedagogue, not simply the purest, that flippant musical opinion has frequently accredited him with being, but in both his homophony and polyphony there are interlocked in a rare degree certain epic and lyric elements of great value. Few symphonies so smack of the whole-heartedness of genius and are identified with such plastic clearness and harmonic fullness as the symphony in B flat major.

In the allegro vivace there is all the energy and strong youthful activity of a modern young athlete at his sport; and how ingenious it all is, especially at its transition period, no musician surely need be told. With the second movement, the expression becomes deeply fervent, and here we have indisputably the most beautiful movement of the symphony. It is deeply full of thought; and a devout and exalted tone pervades its strains.

The minuet has the same old formula that our grandparents in the Harvard Musical Association days used so much to admire, and with the finale there is a genial play of tones, but as is usually the case with Haydn symphonies, a deeper meaning is wanting. Many years will elapse before an estimate of Haydn's fame will cease to interfere with that just appreciation of his symphonies, which has but slightly more to do with homage than with enjoyment. The orchestral performance of the work was exceedingly good in points of tonal contrast and attention to some of the most delicate effects of light and shade, although the allegro vivace was taken at a rate of speed that was unjust if not inartistic in its effect.

The soloist for the Letter aria from Mozart's "Don Juan" and an aria from Tannhaeuser, Act II, Scene I, was Mme. Basta-Tavary.

Mme Tavary, with all her vocal endowments, which are rare, and her intelligence as a musician, which is by no means mediocre, was but partially successful with the Mozart aria. Her delivery lacked straightforwardness and decision, not sincerity, for Mme. Tavary is eminently a sincere artist. She is, furthermore, gifted with a sympathetically musical nature; but, paradoxical as it may seem, her tones are always not quite true. Although Mme. Tavary is a dramatic soprano, her vocalism was offensively plegmatic in her performance of the great aria from Tannhauser, "Dich theure Halle."

There was lively, piquant and ear-catching melody and plenty of it in Georges Bizet's suite No. 1 from L'Arlesienne and it is all worked out with great ingenuity and various kinds of imitations. It heightened the audience into a humor that had not before been experienced and won for the orchestra some of the very hearty plaudits. In the performance of the suite there was a rare amount of finesse and refinement, yet all due chic, all of which culminated in the aggregated excellence of a united effort.

The concert had for its overture Beethoven's Leonore "No. 3." The right chronological order of these important overtures would still seem to be an open question, but the programme-book to the contrary notwithstanding it would appear that overture No. 2 was composed in 1805 and not in 1806 in which year the overture performed last evening was composed.

An interesting note which the programme does not contain may be found in a letter which Beethoven's biographer, Mr. Alexander H. Thayer, wrote to the New York Tribune, March 5, 1888. It refers to Beethoven's intention regarding the well-known trumpet signal that is a popular characteristic in each of the three overtures. As the opera was given in 1805-6, the closing scene was down in the dungeons of the prison. "When the signal is first given," says Mr. Thayer, "it is heard lightly, because all the doors and passages are supposed to be closed. On repetition these are all open and the crowd is rushing into the vaults. The increased loudness of the trumpets shows Pizarro that the time to commit murder is now passed." The reading of this overture differed very materially from any other that has been heard here. The allegro was taken at a tempo that often dragged, yet which was either hurried or retarded in accordance with an exceedingly inappropriate tempo rubato. At the concert one week from next Saturday evening Monsieur Henri Marteau, violinist, will appear; the overture will be Goldmark's "In the Spring;" and Raff's "In Walde" symphony will end the concert.

Manager Charles A. Ellis, of the Music Hall, has completed the organization of the Nordica Operatic Concert Company, and the artists engaged promise to supply an organization of most remarkable ability. Mme. Nordica's prominence in popular favor was shown most conclusively in the very successful tour she made last season, under Manager Ellis's direction, and during the coming months she will renew her triumphs throughout the country. The organization is, however, not alone strong in its prima donna, for all of the assisting artists have a world-wide reputation upon both the concert and opera stage. Mme. Sofia Scalchi is to be the contralto, with Miss Helen Dudley Campbell as associate; Sig. Italo Campanini, the tenor; Sig. Del Puente, the baritone; and Herr Emil Fischer, the basso; with Sig. Sapio as the conductor. It is designed to have the programme largely made up of the operatic selections in which these artists have gained renown on both sides of the Atlantic. The organization makes its first appearance at Music Hall, on Monday evening, the 16th inst., when a full orchestral accompaniment will be provided for the singers, and the selections will include both the old and more modern operatic gems, with the great "Lucia" sextet and "Lohengrin" numbers as prominent numbers. The sale of seats begins on Tuesday morning next.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 8.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Symphony, B-flat (B. & H. No. 12), Haydn; the "Letter" aria from Don Juan," Mozart; Suite No. 1, "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; Air, "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhauser," Wagner; and Overture "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. Madame Basta Tavary was the soloist. The Symphony was beautifully played throughout, though it was read in a somewhat too modern vein, and the first allegro was taken at a pace so rapid that its piquant grace was somewhat marred, and a vigor was imparted to the movement that misrepresented it. The charming Bizet suite was delightfully given in both the reading and the performance. The emphasis throughout was admirable and the coloring was rich and brilliant. Madame Tavary sang the Mozart aria with the ease and freedom of an experienced artist, though in a dry and perfunctory manner. The recitative would have been more effective had it been given with greater breadth. Some liberties were taken with the last movement, that cannot be approved. Mozart needs no gratuitous ornamentation, and the run that was interpolated and the high note that was given at the close could well have been spared. If the composer had wanted them he would have written them down. This "improving" a great master, especially when that master is a Mozart, assumes, very much, the aspect of an unpardonable impertinence. The "Tannhauser" air was spiritedly sung, though with an excess of sentimentality in the openening recitative. The artist was recalled twice after each aria. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "In the Spring," Goldmark; Symphony, "Im Walde," Raff, and a violin concerto. The soloist will be Monsieur Henri Marteau.

Manager Charles A. Ellis, of the Music Hall, has completed the organization of the Nordica Operatic Company, and the artists engaged promise to supply an organization of remarkable ability, Mme. Nordica's prominence in popular favor was shown conclusively in the very successful tour she made last season, under Manager Ellis's direction. The organization is, however, not alone strong in its prima donna, for all of the assisting artists have a world-wide reputation upon both the concert and opera stage. Mme. Sofia Scalchi is to be the contralto, with Miss Helen Dudley Campbell as associate; Sig. Italo Campanini, the tenor; Sig. Del Puente, the baritone, and Herr Emil Fischer, the basso; with Sig. Sapio as the conductor. It is designed to have the programme largely made up of the operatic selections in which these artists have gained renown on both sides of the Atlantic. The organization makes its first appearance at Music Hall, on Monday evening, the 16th inst., when a full orchestral accompaniment will be provided for the singers, and the selections will include both the old and more modern operatic gems, with the great "Lucia" sextet and "Lohengrin" numbers as prominent parts of the programme. The sale of seats begins on Tuesday morning next.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 9, 1893.

Mr. Nickisch had arranged an especially pleasing programme for the eleventh of the series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last Saturday evening. Mme. Basta-Tavary was the soloist of the evening, and the appearance of this eminent artist is always greeted with pleasure. She was first heard in the "Letter" aria from "Don Giovanni," which she sang with her accustomed care and skill. Her second selection was from "Tannhauser," the aria for Elizabeth, and this she gave with great dramatic effect and musical ability, which called forth such hearty applause and repeated recalls that Mme. Tavary was obliged to reappear several times and acknowledge with her accustomed grace. The Suite 1, from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," is singularly rich and telling in melodious numbers and instrumental coloring, with an occasional sprightly little movement, which was very enjoyable. Joseph Haydn symphony in B flat major and Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" were well rendered by the orchestra during the evening. Next week there will be no rehearsal or concert, as the orchestra will be away on one of its tours, to return Jan. 20, when Mr. Henri Marteau, the violinist, will be the soloist, and J. Raff's symphony "Im Walde."

The Nordica Concert Company, under the guidance of Manager Ellis, will make its first appearance at Music Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 16, when a full orchestral accompaniment will be provided for the singers, and the selections will include both the old and more modern operatic gems, with the great "Lucia" sextet and "Lohengrin" numbers as prominent parts of the programme. The sale of seats begins on Tuesday morning next.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1893.

DIRECTOR NIKISCH, who seldom appears on the concert stage away from his great orchestra, was the pianist at the fourth Kneisel Concert, in the Brahms Quartet in A, op. 26, a work of great beauty and power. In the second movement, Adagio, you see the moon rising over the turbulent waters. The other number was Beethoven's op. 131, the string quartet in C-sharp-minor. As usual a large audience was present, including the best known musicians of the city. It is a comfort to have these concerts again in Chickering Hall, from which some disagreement exiled them a few years ago. Christian Union Hall has advantages, but the stairs are many and the seats atrocious. This was probably Mr. Nikisch's first appearance here as a virtuoso, but it was very creditable, though doubtless we have better pianists among us. The quartet played nobly, as always.

[77]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 8, 1893.

Echoes From The Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Mme. Basta-Tavary was the soloist at the Symphony concert last evening, singing Donna Anna's letter song from "Don Giovanni" and an aria from Wagner's "Tannhæuser." The talented soprano is a favorite with Bostonians, and her reception was most cordial. In the Giovanni aria the recitative was given with excellent dramatic effect, although madame's voice was not at its best, and the rondo and closing part showed marked improvement in tone quality. More satisfactory was the "Tannhæuser" selection, the Wagner music suiting her voice better, and her strong, clear and true vocalizing rang out above the orchestra with telling effect. Although an opera singer, and heard to greater advantage with theatric surroundings, Mme. Tavary's concert work is always of a high order of merit, and in both selections she merely utilized her vocal abilities without any suggestion of dramatic action. She was recalled several times.

Haydn's symphony in B flat major, No. 12, was the opening number. Although this is scored for a full orchestra there are no clarinets introduced, and the part for the second flute is almost entirely done away with. The introduction, a lively allegro, resemble, a country dance tune and two themes play "hide and seek," as it were, until a sudden rest ensues; then at last the second theme is introduced by a phrase on the strings; an odd bit of orchestration. The opening was played with a delightful dash by the strings, while the sombre closing themes showed the almost perfect team work of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra in elaborate and heavily scored compositions.

In the second movement the cello parts, horn effects and measures for muted trumpets were beautifully played by the men. The minuet was given with dash and rythmical precision, and the finale was noticeably well done on the part of the wind contingent.

In Bizet's suite the work of the instruments in the opening, military-like theme in unison seemed perfect, the playing of the band being as of one man. The effect was grand. The minuet, a quaint little dance air with a peculiar bass, and the third movement, for strings only, were each delightfully interpreted.

The effect of the bell-like orchestration of the closing group was electrical, and the simulation of chimes was singularly beautiful and sonorous.

The familiar "Leonore" overture, No. 3, by Beethoven, closed the concert. The grand work was grandly given, perhaps, as a whole, receiving the best interpretation of the evening.

The next rehearsal and concert will occur Jan. 20 and 21, the programme being Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," Roff's symphony, "In Walde," and a concerto for violin and orchestra, with Henri Marteau as soloist.

Nordica Concert Company.

Manager Charles A. Ellis of Music Hall has completed the organization of the Nordica operatic concert company, and the artists engaged promise to supply an organization of remarkable ability. Mme. Nordica's prominence in popular favor was shown most conclusively in the very successful tour she made last season under Manager Ellis' direction.

The organization is, however, not alone strong in its prima donna, for all of the assisting artists have a world-wide reputation upon both concert and opera stage. Mme. Sofia Scalchi is to be the contralto, with Miss Helen Dudley Campbell as associate; Sig. Italo Campanini, the tenor; Sig. Del Puente, barytone, and Herr Emil Fischer, the basso, with Sig. Sapio as the conductor.

The organization makes its first appearance in Music Hall, on Monday evening, Jan. 16, when a full orchestral accompaniment will be provided for the singers. The selections will include both the old and more modern operatic gems. The sale of the seats begins on Tuesday morning next.

Mme. Tavary made an emphatic success as soloist at the Symphony rehearsal and concert last week. She looked finely Friday afternoon in a black gown of thin texture combined with pink. The square-cut bodice was all of pink under black lace. Her abundant blonde hair was most charmingly dressed. In the audience, which was exceedingly demonstrative for a rehearsal, were seen in seats near the platform Mrs. Gardiner, her first appearance; Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Lindall Winthrop, the Misses Stackpole, the Elliott W. Pratts, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. Henry Winsor, Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. G. B. Shattuck, Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Mrs. Charles Fairchild, Mrs. Templeman Coolidge, Jr., and Dr. Sturgis Bigelow.

—Mr. J. H. Baldwin gives a reception and dance for his daughter tomorrow night from 8 to 12, at his home on Cypress st.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JAN. 11, 1893.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Mme. Nordica and the company of great artists she has gathered about her for a concert tour of the country will give their first performance at Music Hall next Monday evening. The company includes Mme. Scalchi, the famous contralto; Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, mezzo soprano; Sig. Italo Campanini, Sig. Del Puente, and Emil Fischer, supported by a complete orchestra, under direction of R. Sapio. The opportunity to hear such a combination of vocalists is not often presented, and the brilliant programme of operatic music which has been arranged is well calculated to display their abilities to the best advantage.

Special features of the performance will be the Sextet from "Lucia" and extensive selections from "Faust." The sale of seats is now in progress.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 9, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday gave the impression of lightness and popularity, rather than of depth or of educational intent. A pretty Haydn symphony was followed by Bizet's popular "Suite Arlesienne" (No. 1), a work which one of the symphonic conductors used to relegate to the "Young People's Popular Concerts," and even the soloist of the evening had a light voice. Yet it is pleasant to hear a concert of such prettiness once in a way, and it is not always a matter of regret that our conductor does not allow the dignity of the symphony concerts to weigh heavily upon him.

There was a degree of modern fervor about the Haydn symphony that was not quite in the vein of the simple old master, but the conductor showed palpably, in the finale, that he fully understood the meaning of the Haydn tempi. The presto became an allegro, as was proper, for, a century ago, the quick tempi were taken slower and the slow ones quicker than nowadays. The points of excellence in the work were the shading of the trio of the minuet, the delicate work of the violins in the last movement, and the exquisite daintiness with which the interrupted phrases of the final coda were given. The only shortcomings were a too great dramatic force in the first movement and a lack of perfect ensemble in portions of the finale.

After the symphony came Mme. Basta-Tavary in the "Letter-Aria" from "Don Giovanni." This was not an entire success; there was palpable effort in almost every measure and the voice was thin and too much given to vibrato. These defects were still more marked in the "Greeting to the Hall" from "Tannhaeuser," which seemed spasmodic rather than broad, and, of course, the tremolo was quite in opposition to the Wagnerian ideal. It is due to the singer to say that she was twice recalled after each of her songs.

Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne" was excellently played; it seemed to suit the dashing, capricious vein of the conductor and none of its quaintness or brusquerie was lost in the performance, and the bold effects of orchestral color were made the most of. It is wise to put works of this character on the programme occasionally, for, while these concerts are supposed to be educational, they need not be pedantic, and in fact, Bizet's scoring has an educational value even to the advanced musician. The breadth of the strange march, given in unison by the deep strings, was peculiarly impressive, and the subsequent varying of this theme with unusual tone-colors served to show the different departments of the orchestra to much advantage. The drone bass in the pastoral second movement was given in the heartiest manner possible. The little adagio was sweetly given by the muted strings, and of course pleased the audience greatly. The final carillon was played with all its appropriate swing, and brought the attractive work to a worthy conclusion.

It was the last number of the concert that redeemed the programme from being unambitious, for this was the finest of all dramatic overtures—Beethoven's "Leonora, No. 3." The performance of this was brilliant in the extreme. Judged by any standard, it was a grand interpretation of a noble work. Especially noteworthy was the dramatic power of the passage immediately preceding the trumpet call which heralds the arrival of the governor of the province, a graphic picture (in outline) of the desperate attempt of Pizarro upon the life of Florestan, and the revealing of the heroine in her true character.

The trumpet calls were perfectly played, better than I can recall ever having heard them in these concerts. They are not intrinsically difficult, it is only the nicety of shading required, and the distance of the performer from the conductor, that makes them so. In fact, Beethoven never wrote a difficult trumpet passage. The so-called "Classical epoch" was an era of decadence in trumpet-playing and Beethoven seems to have recognized this fact, for while he uses the horns unmercifully at times, he demands but little of his trumpeters. Mozart's alterations of the obbligato in Handel's "The Trumpet Shall Sound" is a vivid proof of the statement above made. Entirely magnificent was the playing of the violins in the closing passages of this overture; one may search through America in vain for a body of musicians which shall rival our group of first violins.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JAN. 11.

The first concert of the Nordica operatic organization will be given at Music Hall next Monday evening. Mme. Nordica is to sing the great soprano aria from "La Reine de Saba," Mme. Scalchi will be heard in the "Nobil Signor" from the "Huguenots" and Helen Dudley Campbell, Sig. Campanini, Sig. Del Puente and Herr Emil Fischer will also take part. The great sextet from "Lucia" and scenes from Gounod's "Faust" are named among the evening's attractions. Manager Ellis, who controls the organization, will provide strong orchestral support for the singers, with Sig. Sapio as conductor.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 8, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

The eleventh symphony concert was genial, classic and quieting in the general effect of its programme; unlike too many of the concerts thus far, this season, the sound and fury-kind of music, signifying nothing, was conspicuous by its absence. The symphony was by Haydn—in B flat major, or No. 12 of the Breitkoff and Haertel collection—a work that even, yes and even forever, for that matter, should be admired for something more than its nominal value. Its venerable age seemed never more interesting, nor more nobly simple, and it was performed with all the fervency that the most fastidious listener would have demanded for it. The musical world owes much to Haydn. He was not the mere pedagogue, not simply the purest, that flippant musical opinion has frequently accredited him with being, but in both his homophony and polyphony there are interlocked in a rare degree certain epic and lyric elements of great value. Few symphonies so smack of the whole-heartedness of genius and are identified with such plastic clearness and harmonic fullness as the symphony in B flat major.

In the allegro vivace there is all the energy and strong youthful activity of a modern young athlete at his sport; and how ingenious it all is, especially at its transition period, no musician surely need be told. With the second movement, the expression becomes deeply fervent, and here we have indisputably the most beautiful movement of the symphony. It is deeply full of thought; and a devout and exalted tone pervades its strains.

The minuet has the same old formula that our grandparents in the Harvard Musical Association days used so much to admire, and with the finale there is a genial play of tones, but as is usually the case with Haydn symphonies, a deeper meaning is wanting. Many years will elapse before an estimate of Haydn's fame will cease to interfere with that just appreciation of his symphonies, which has but slightly more to do with homage than with enjoyment. The orchestral performance of the work was exceedingly good in points of tonal contrast and attention to some of the most delicate effects of light and shade, although the allegro vivace was taken at a rate of speed that was unjust if not inartistic in its effect.

The soloist for the Letter aria from Mozart's "Don Juan" and an aria from Tannhaeuser, Act II, Scene I, was Mme. Basta-Tavary.

Mme Tavary, with all her vocal endowments, which are rare, and her intelligence as a musician, which is by no means mediocre, was but partially successful with the Mozart aria. Her delivery lacked straightforwardness and decision, not sincerity, for Mme. Tavary is eminently a sincere artist. She is, furthermore, gifted with a sympathetically musical nature; but, paradoxical as it may seem, her tones are always not quite true. Although Mme. Tavary is a dramatic soprano, her vocalism was offensively plegmatic in her performance of the great aria from Tannhauser, "Dich theure Halle."

There was lively, piquant and ear-catching melody and plenty of it in Georges Bizet's suite No. 1 from L'Arlesienne and it is all worked out with great ingenuity and various kinds of imitations. It heightened the audience into a humor that had not before been experienced and won for the orchestra some of the very hearty plaudits. In the performance of the suite there was a rare amount of finesse and refinement, yet all due chic, all of which culminated in the aggregated excellence of a united effort.

The concert had for its overture Beethoven's Leonore "No. 3." The right chronological order of these important overtures would still seem to be an open question, but the programme-book to the contrary notwithstanding it would appear that overture No. 2 was composed in 1805 and not in 1806 in which year the overture performed last evening was composed.

An interesting note which the programme does not contain may be found in a letter which Beethoven's biographer, Mr. Alexander H. Thayer, wrote to the New York Tribune, March 5, 1888. It refers to Beethoven's intention regarding the well-known trumpet signal that is a popular characteristic in each of the three overtures. As the opera was given in 1805-6, the closing scene was down in the dungeons of the prison. "When the signal is first given," says Mr. Thayer, "it is heard lightly, because all the doors and passages are supposed to be closed. On repetition these are all open and the crowd is rushing into the vaults. The increased loudness of the trumpets shows Pizarro that the time to commit murder is now passed." The reading of this overture differed very materially from any other that has been heard here. The allegro was taken at a tempo that often dragged, yet which was either hurried or retarded in accordance with an exceedingly inappropriate tempo rubato. At the concert one week from next Saturday evening Monsieur Henri Martean, violinist, will appear; the overture will be Goldmark's "In the Spring;" and Raff's "In Walde" symphony will end the concert.

Manager Charles A. Ellis, of the Music Hall, has completed the organization of the Nordica Operatic Concert Company, and the artists engaged promise to supply an organization of most remarkable ability. Mme. Nordica's prominence in popular favor was shown most conclusively in the very successful tour she made last season, under Manager Ellis's direction, and during the coming months she will renew her triumphs throughout the country. The organization is, however, not alone strong in its prima donna, for all of the assisting artists have a world-wide reputation upon both the concert and opera stage. Mme. Sofia Scalchi is to be the contralto, with Miss Helen Dudley Campbell as associate; Sig. Italo Campanini, the tenor; Sig. Del Puente, the baritone; and Herr Emil Fischer, the basso; with Sig. Sapio as the conductor. It is designed to have the programme largely made up of the operatic selections in which these artists have gained renown on both sides of the Atlantic. The organization makes its first appearance at Music Hall, on Monday evening, the 16th inst., when a full orchestral accompaniment will be provided for the singers, and the selections will include both the old and more modern operatic gems, with the great "Lucia" sextet and "Lohengrin" numbers as prominent numbers. The sale of seats begins on Tuesday morning next.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 8.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Symphony, B-flat (B. & H. No. 12), Haydn; the "Letter" aria from Don Juan," Mozart; Suite No. 1, "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; Air, "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhauser," Wagner; and Overture "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. Madame Basta Tavary was the soloist. The Symphony was beautifully played throughout, though it was read in a somewhat too modern vein, and the first allegro was taken at a pace so rapid that its piquant grace was somewhat marred, and a vigor was imparted to the movement that misrepresented it. The charming Bizet suite was delightfully given in both the reading and the performance. The emphasis throughout was admirable and the coloring was rich and brilliant. Madame Tavary sang the Mozart aria with the ease and freedom of an experienced artist, though in a dry and perfunctory manner. The recitative would have been more effective had it been given with greater breadth. Some liberties were taken with the last movement, that cannot be approved. Mozart needs no gratuitous ornamentation, and the run that was interpolated and the high note that was given at the close could well have been spared. If the composer had wanted them he would have written them down. This "improving" a great master, especially when that master is a Mozart, assumes, very much, the aspect of an unpardonable impertinence. The "Tannhauser" air was spiritedly sung, though with an excess of sentimentality in the openening recitative. The artist was recalled twice after each aria. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "In the Spring," Goldmark; Symphony, "Im Walde," Raff, and a violin concerto. The soloist will be Monsieur Henri Marteau.

Manager Charles A. Ellis, of the Music Hall, has completed the organization of the Nordica Operatic Company, and the artists engaged promise to supply an organization of remarkable ability. Mme. Nordica's prominence in popular favor was shown conclusively in the very successful tour she made last season, under Manager Ellis's direction. The organization is, however, not alone strong in its prima donna, for all of the assisting artists have a world-wide reputation upon both the concert and opera stage. Mme. Sofia Scalchi is to be the contralto, with Miss Helen Dudley Campbell as associate; Sig. Italo Campanini, the tenor; Sig. Del Puente, the baritone; and Herr Emil Fischer, the basso; with Sig. Sapio as the conductor. It is designed to have the programme largely made up of the operatic selections in which these artists have gained renown on both sides of the Atlantic. The organization makes its first appearance at Music Hall, on Monday evening, the 16th inst., when a full orchestral accompaniment will be provided for the singers, and the selections will include both the old and more modern operatic gems, with the great "Lucia" sextet and "Lohengrin" numbers as prominent parts of the programme. The sale of seats begins on Tuesday morning next.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 9, 1893.

Mr. Nickisch had arranged an especially pleasing programme for the eleventh of the series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last Saturday evening. Mme. Basta-Tavary was the soloist of the evening, and the appearance of this eminent artist is always greeted with pleasure. She was first heard in the "Letter" aria from "Don Giovanni," which she sang with her accustomed care and skill. Her second selection was from "Tannhauser," the aria for Elizabeth, and this she gave with great dramatic effect and musical ability, which called forth such hearty applause and repeated recalls that Mme. Tavary was obliged to reappear several times and acknowledge with her accustomed grace. The Suite 1, from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," is singularly rich and telling in melodious numbers and instrumental coloring, with an occasional sprightly little movement, which was very enjoyable. Joseph Haydn symphony in B flat major and Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" were well rendered by the orchestra during the evening. Next week there will be no rehearsal or concert, as the orchestra will be away on one of its tours, to return Jan. 20, when Mr. Henri Marteau, the violinist, will be the soloist, and J. Raff's symphony "Im Walde."

The Nordica Concert Company, under the guidance of Manager Ellis, will make its first appearance at Music Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 16, when a full orchestral accompaniment will be provided for the singers, and the selections will include both the old and more modern operatic gems, with the great "Lucia" sextet and "Lohengrin" numbers as prominent parts of the programme. The sale of seats begins on Tuesday morning next.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1893.

DIRECTOR NIKISCH, who seldom appears on the concert stage away from his great orchestra, was the pianist at the fourth Kneisel Concert, in the Brahms Quartet in A, op. 26, a work of great beauty and power. In the second movement, Adagio, you see the moon rising over the turbulent waters. The other number was Beethoven's op. 131, the string quartet in C-sharp-minor. As usual a large audience was present, including the best known musicians of the city. It is a comfort to have these concerts again in Chickering Hall, from which some disagreement exiled them a few years ago. Christian Union Hall has advantages, but the stairs are many and the seats atrocious. This was probably Mr. Nikisch's first appearance here as a virtuoso, but it was very creditable, though doubtless we have better pianists among us. The quartet played nobly, as always.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 8, 1893.

Echoes From The Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Mme. Basta-Tavary was the soloist at the Symphony concert last evening, singing Donna Anna's letter song from "Don Giovanni" and an aria from Wagner's "Tannhæuser." The talented soprano is a favorite with Bostonians, and her reception was most cordial. In the Giovanni aria the recitative was given with excellent dramatic effect, although madame's voice was not at its best, and the rondo and closing part showed marked improvement in tone quality. More satisfactory was the "Tannhæuser" selection, the Wagner music suiting her voice better, and her strong, clear and true vocalizing rang out above the orchestra with telling effect. Although an opera singer, and heard to greater advantage with theatric surroundings, Mme. Tavary's concert work is always of a high order of merit, and in both selections she merely utilized her vocal abilities without any suggestion of dramatic action. She was recalled several times.

Haydn's symphony in B flat major, No. 12, was the opening number. Although this is scored for a full orchestra there are no clarinets introduced, and the part for the second flute is almost entirely done away with. The introduction, a lively allegro, resemble, a country dance tune and two themes play "hide and seek," as it were, until a sudden rest ensues; then at last the second theme is introduced by a phrase on the strings; an odd bit of orchestration. The opening was played with a delightful dash by the strings, while the sombre closing themes showed the almost perfect team work of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra in elaborate and heavily scored compositions.

In the second movement the cello parts, horn effects and measures for muted trumpets were beautifully played by the men. The minuet was given with dash and rythmical precision, and the finale was noticeably well done on the part of the wind contingent.

In Bizet's suite the work of the instruments in the opening, military-like theme in unison seemed perfect, the playing of the band being as of one man. The effect was grand. The minuet, a quaint little dance air with a peculiar bass, and the third movement, for strings only, were each delightfully interpreted.

The effect of the bell-like orchestration of the closing group was electrical, and the simulation of chimes was singularly beautiful and sonorous.

The familiar "Leonore" overture, No. 3, by Beethoven, closed the concert. The grand work was grandly given, perhaps, as a whole, receiving the best interpretation of the evening.

The next rehearsal and concert will occur Jan. 20 and 21, the programme being Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," Roff's symphony, "In Walde," and a concerto for violin and orchestra, with Henri Marteau as soloist.

Nordica Concert Company.

Manager Charles A. Ellis of Music Hall has completed the organization of the Nordica operatic concert company, and the artists engaged promise to supply an organization of remarkable ability. Mme. Nordica's prominence in popular favor was shown most conclusively in the very successful tour she made last season under Manager Ellis' direction.

The organization is, however, not alone strong in its prima donna, for all of the assisting artists have a world-wide reputation upon both concert and opera stage. Mme. Sofia Scalchi is to be the contralto, with Miss Helen Dudley Campbell as associate; Sig. Italo Campanini, the tenor; Sig. Del Puente, barytone, and Herr Emil Fischer, the basso, with Sig. Sapio as the conductor.

The organization makes its first appearance in Music Hall, on Monday evening, Jan. 16, when a full orchestral accompaniment will be provided for the singers. The selections will include both the old and more modern operatic gems. The sale of the seats begins on Tuesday morning next.

—Mme. Tavary made an emphatic success as soloist at the Symphony rehearsal and concert last week. She looked finely Friday afternoon in a black gown of thin texture combined with pink. The square-cut bodice was all of pink under black lace. Her abundant blonde hair was most charmingly dressed. In the audience, which was exceedingly demonstrative for a rehearsal, were seen in seats near the platform Mrs. Gardner, her first appearance; Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Lindall Winthrop, the Misses Stackpole, the Elliott W. Pratts, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. Henry Winsor, Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. G. B. Shattuck, Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Mrs. Charles Fairchild, Mrs. Templeman Coolidge, Jr., and Dr. Sturgis Bigelow.

—Mr. J. H. Baldwin gives a reception and dance for his daughter tomorrow night from 8 to 12, at his home on Cypress st.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JAN. 11, 1893.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Mme. Nordica and the company of great artists she has gathered about her for a concert tour of the country will give their first performance at Music Hall next Monday evening. The company includes Mme. Scalchi, the famous contralto; Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, mezzo soprano; Sig. Italo Campanini, Sig. Del Puente, and Emil Fischer, supported by a complete orchestra, under direction of R. Sapio. The opportunity to hear such a combination of vocalists is not often presented, and the brilliant programme of operatic music which has been arranged is well calculated to display their abilities to the best advantage.

Special features of the performance will be the Sextet from "Lucia" and extensive selections from "Faust." The sale of seats is now in progress.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 9, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday gave the impression of lightness and popularity, rather than of depth or of educational intent. A pretty Haydn symphony was followed by Bizet's popular "Suite Arlesienne" (No. 1), a work which one of the symphonic conductors used to relegate to the "Young People's Popular Concerts," and even the soloist of the evening had a light voice. Yet it is pleasant to hear a concert of such prettiness once in a way, and it is not always a matter of regret that our conductor does not allow the dignity of the symphony concerts to weigh heavily upon him.

There was a degree of modern fervor about the Haydn symphony that was not quite in the vein of the simple old master, but the conductor showed palpably, in the finale, that he fully understood the meaning of the Haydn tempi. The presto became an allegro, as was proper, for, a century ago, the quick tempi were taken slower and the slow ones quicker than nowadays. The points of excellence in the work were the shading of the trio of the minuet, the delicate work of the violins in the last movement, and the exquisite daintiness with which the interrupted phrases of the final coda were given. The only shortcomings were a too great dramatic force in the first movement and a lack of perfect ensemble in portions of the finale.

After the symphony came Mme. Basta-Tavary in the "Letter-Aria" from "Don Giovanni." This was not an entire success; there was palpable effort in almost every measure and the voice was thin and too much given to vibrato. These defects were still more marked in the "Greeting to the Hall" from "Tannhaeuser," which seemed spasmodic rather than broad, and, of course, the tremolo was quite in opposition to the Wagnerian ideal. It is due to the singer to say that she was twice recalled after each of her songs.

Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne" was excellently played; it seemed to suit the dashing, capricious vein of the conductor and none of its quaintness or brusquerie was lost in the performance, and the bold effects of orchestral color were made the most of. It is wise to put works of this character on the programme occasionally, for, while these concerts are supposed to be educational, they need not be pedantic, and in fact, Bizet's scoring has an educational value even to the advanced musician. The breadth of the strange march, given in unison by the deep strings, was peculiarly impressive, and the subsequent varying of this theme with unusual tone-colors served to show the different departments of the orchestra to much advantage. The drone bass in the pastoral second movement was given in the heartiest manner possible. The little adagio was sweetly given by the muted strings, and of course pleased the audience greatly. The final carillon was played with all its appropriate swing, and brought the attractive work to a worthy conclusion.

It was the last number of the concert that redeemed the programme from being unambitious, for this was the finest of all dramatic overtures—Beethoven's "Leonora, No. 3." The performance of this was brilliant in the extreme. Judged by any standard, it was a grand interpretation of a noble work. Especially noteworthy was the dramatic power of the passage immediately preceding the trumpet call which heralds the arrival of the governor of the province, a graphic picture (in outline) of the desperate attempt of Pizarro upon the life of Florestan, and the revealing of the heroine in her true character.

The trumpet calls were perfectly played, better than I can recall ever having heard them in these concerts. They are not intrinsically difficult, it is only the nicety of shading required, and the distance of the performer from the conductor, that makes them so. In fact, Beethoven never wrote a difficult trumpet passage. The so-called "Classical epoch" was an era of decadence in trumpet-playing and Beethoven seems to have recognized this fact, for while he uses the horns unmercifully at times, he demands but little of his trumpeters. Mozart's alterations of the obbligato in Handel's "The Trumpet Shall Sound" is a vivid proof of the statement above made. Entirely magnificent was the playing of the violins in the closing passages of this overture; one may search through America in vain for a body of musicians which shall rival our group of first violins.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JAN. 11.

The first concert of the Nordica operatic organization will be given at Music Hall next Monday evening. Mme. Nordica is to sing the great soprano aria from "La Reine de Saba," Mme. Scalchi will be heard in the "Nobil Signor" from the "Huguenots" and Helen Dudley Campbell, Sig. Campanini, Sig. Del Puente and Herr Emil Fischer will also take part. The great sextet from "Lucia" and scenes from Gounod's "Faust" are named among the evening's attractions. Manager Ellis, who controls the organization, will provide strong orchestral support for the singers, with Sig. Sapio as conductor.

[77]

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
MONDAY, JANUARY 9, 1893.

The Eleventh Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

Concerning Bizet's Music to "L'Arlesienne."

Basta-Tavary Sings Arias of Two Centuries.

The eleventh symphony concert gave much pleasure to a large audience. The programme was interesting, although there was no novelty; it was well contrasted and it was of reasonable length. The performance of the orchestra was almost always acceptable and often brilliant. The programme was as follows:

Symphony, B flat (B and H No. 12)..... Haydn
"Non mi dir" from "Don Giovanni"..... Mozart
Suite "L'Arlesienne," No. 1..... Bizet
"Dich, theure Halle," from "Tannhaeuser"..... Wagner
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3..... Beethoven

***

The feature of the concert was the excellent performance of Bizet's charming suite made by him from his incidental music to Daudet's play. The second suite from this music of 24 numbers in all was published after Bizet's death and was arranged for concert use by Ernest Guiraud.

***

The account of this suite that is published in the programme book is unsatisfactory. In the first place Bizet's name was Alexandre-Cesar-Leopold, and not "Charles," etc. Bizet's godfather preferred the name "Georges," and the composer of "Carmen" is thus named by the world.

The operetta "Docteur Miracle" was written in competition for performance at the Bouffes-Parisiens under Offenbach as manager. Bizet took the first prize ex aequo with Lecocq, and the two operettas were played alternately.

In the Entr'acte of the programme book there is a quotation from Zola in which "L'Arlesienne" is spoken of as a "failure," and there is no mention of the final success of Daudet's piece. It is true that when the play was first brought out at the Vaudeville, Oct. 1, 1872, it was a failure, and there were only 14 or 15 performances. But it was given at the Odeon in 1887, and then played 63 times. In 1887 at the same theatre it had 42 performances.

The simple play of Daudet is not so well-known to concert-goers that a sketch of it in explanation would have been impertinent. A young farmer, Frederi, is madly in love with a girl of Arles. He is about to marry her when it is discovered that she is an infamous woman. The unfortunate young man tries to forget her. He makes love to Vivette, a charming girl whom he has known from infancy, but the recollection of the cursed Arlesienne paralyzes his love-making and keeps alive his sorrow. One night, while the peasants celebrate the festival of Saint-Eloi and dance the farandole, he throws himself out of the lott of the farmhouse and breaks his skull on the pavement of the court.

The original music to this play was written for the orchestra of the Vaudeville, which was thus curiously made up: Seven first violins, no second violins, two violas, five 'cellos, two double basses, one flute, one oboe, one cornet, two horns, two bassoons, kettle drums, harmonium and pianoforte. The harmonium was behind the scene and it was played by Bizet and at times by Guiraud. The orchestra was directed by Constantin.

The suite now known in the concert halls of the world was rewritten by Bizet for concert use. He changed the instrumentation and arranged it for a full orchestra. The suite was first played in its new form at a Concert Pasdeloup, Nov. 10, 1872. It was admitted to the honor of Conservatory performance in 1875. When the drama was revived the second instrumentation of Bizet was used by Colonne, who directed the orchestra at the Odeon performances.

The programme book says that the Prelude opens with "a stern, march-like theme." Now this "march-like theme" is a march tune, and one that is well known throughout France. It is an old Provencal Noel (or Christmas song), the "Marcho dei Rei," the march of the Kings, the words of which are attributed to King Rene. The melody is two conturies older than the text. It is often called the March of Turenne.

The second part of the Prelude is composed of two distinct ideas that play a great part in the drama. The first is the "sweet and sympathetic theme, veiled by the sonority of the saxophone with a shadow of mysterious melancholy." And now comes an excellent illustration of the fact that music is an individual affair. A certain strain means one thing to one man, another thing to another man. The author of the programme book thought that Bizet drew "his inspiration from an idea akin to Mephistopheles's: 'O night, spread thy shade over them; Love, close their souls against prying remorse; and ye, flowers of subtle odor, complete the perturbation of Margaret's heart!'" In other words the music suggested guilty passion. The andante is "morbid, if you will, but it is of an unearthly beauty!" Alas for human conjecture! This theme is the music of the innocent, Frederi's pure and sweet brother, whose reason slumbers until it is awakened by the tragic death of the passionate young man. To a third or fourth hearer, unacquainted with the story and the fitting music, the phrase might mean something else, might awaken thoughts of a landscape, regret, a picture, or what-you-will."

The second idea in the second part of the prelude is the passion of Frederi, a strong, terrible lament, which cries out in agony and with convulsive sobs.

The exquisite adagietto accompanies the meeting of Balthazer, the old shepherd, and the grandmother of Vivette. They had loved each other in their youth, but she became the wife of another, and he then shunned her. They met for the first time in many years, although they had not been widely separated by distance, at the bethrothal of Frederi and Vivette. Listen to this speech of Mere Renaud: "And when I heard your dogs bark, and I recognized afar off your great cloak, it took all my might to keep me from running to you. Now our sorrow is over, and we can look at each other without blushing. Balthazer, would you be ashamed to kiss me, now that I am old and wrinkled? Press me close to your heart, my brave good man. I have owed you this kiss for 50 years."

Camille Bellaigue protests against the separation of the music from the drama: "As it one could detach the colors from the canvass; as if the supreme beauty of these melodies, these ritournelles, these chords (for sometimes they are only chords) did not consist in rigid adherence, so to speak, to the situations, the words and the gestures."

***

The suite was read and played in a most sympathetic manner. There is only one serious criticism to make in regard to the reading and that concerns the treatment of the "Innocent music" in the prelude. The languid, melancholy, unearthly air was taken at such a quick pace that the phrase seemed hurried, nervous, restless; its character was destroyed and there was little effect of any kind. With this exception the performance of the suite was one long to be remembered. Particularly delightful was the interpretation of the Intermezzo, generally known as the "Menuet des Vieillards," or the "Menuet Valse," in which the phrase which forms the middle part is thought by a fanciful French writer to "express well the gentle and resigned tenderness of two aged lovers in the drama, who interchange souvenirs full of subdued emotion." What Bizet thought of it is another matter; he was no doubt chiefly busied in writing good music.

***

The Haydn symphony was well played in spite of occasional traces of ultra-modern proclivities of the conductor, and the "Leonore" overture was read in a highly dramatic fashion. All in all, it was a most agreeable concert, and one of reasonable length.

***

A sketch of the career of Mrs Basta-Tavary appeared in the Journal of last Saturday, and there is now no need of calling attention to what she has done or left undone. She is fond of the "Letter-aria," from "Don Giovanni," and she sings it on all occasions. In the sketch published Saturday I forget to mention that in March, '92, Mrs. Tavary was Donna Anna in the poor performance of "Don Giovanni," by the Abbey, Schoffel & Grau Company at Mechanics' Hall. Saturday evening she showed herself to be a singer of experience. The recitative was lacking in breadth, and there was, on the whole, an absence of the "grand style." On the other hand, much of her detail in the larguetto was admirable. As for the bravura passages that follow, I confess that I sympathize with Berlioz and detest them, unless the performance is a triumph of the vocal art. Mrs. Tavary's delivery was uneven, and that which was good and that which was bad were close togetner. Breathing and consequent phrasing would be worthy of the highest praise; and then a pinched tone or a meaningless explosion would offend. She did not rise to true Wagnerian dramatic intensity in the "Tannhaeuser" air; that is to say, she did not follow the traditions. Whenever I heard this air sung by a stout, red-faced mistress of the Wagnerian art in Berlin, Dresden or Munich, the song was one long, heaven-defying howl. Then great was the enjoyment of the audience. Mrs. Tavary is to be thanked for her moderation.

***

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The programme of the rehearsal and concert Jan. 20, 21, will be as follows: Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," and Raff's Forest symphony. Mr. Henri Marteau, a young French violinist, will be heard in a concerto for violin and orchestra.

PHILIP HALE.

Manager Charles A. Ellis of the Music Hall has completed the organization of the Nordica Operatic Company, and the artists engaged promise to supply an organization of ability. Mrs. Nordica's prominence in popular favor was shown conclusively in the successful tour she made last season. The organization is, however, not alone strong in its prima donna, for all of the assisting artists have a reputation on the concert and opera stage. Mrs. Scalchi is to be the contralto, with Miss Helen Dudley Campbell as associate; Campanini, the tenor; Del Puente, the baritone, and Emil Fischer, the basso; with Mr. Sapio as the conductor. It is designed to have the programme largely made up of the operatic selections in which these artists have gained renown on both sides of the Atlantic. The organization makes its first appearance in Music Hall, Monday evening, the 16th inst., when a full orchestral accompaniment will be provided for the singers, and the selections will include both the old and more modern operatic gems, with the great "Lucia" sextet and "Lohengrin" numbers as prominent parts of the programme. The sale of seats begins Tuesday morning.

BOSTON IDEAS
JANUARY 8, 1893.

A new operatic concert company is coming into existence soon, with Mr. C. A. Ellis as manager. The organization will be called the Nordica Operatic Concert company, headed by Mme. Lilian Nordica, the well-known prima donna; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, contralto; Andreas Dippel, tenor; Sig. Del Puente, baritone; Emil Fischer, basso; also Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, the American alto. The date of the first concert is not yet fully decided, but will be announced later.

Boston Journal.
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1893.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Madame Lillian Nordica will make her first appearance in Boston this season at Music Hall next Monday evening in a grand operatic concert, in which she will have the support of the excellent company of artists who are to accompany her on a tour through the country. Mme. Nordica, Mme Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Mr. Campanini, Mr. Del Puente and Mr. Fischer form a combination of great vocalists who will be heard at their best in the brilliant operatic programme to be given. They will have the assistance of a large orchestra under the direction of Sig. R. Sapio. Among many attractive features of the programme will be the Sextet from "Lucia" and extensive selections from "Faust." The sale of seats is now in progress at Music Hall.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1893.

Personal and Miscellaneous.

The first concert in this city of the concert company organized by Mr. C. A. Ellis, with Mrs. Nordica at its head, will be given in the Music Hall, next Monday night. A programme of selections from operas of various schools is promised. In the company are Mrs. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Italo Campanini, Giuseppe del Puente and Emil Fischer, with Mr. Romualdo Sapio for conductor. This is a very strong company and the concerts cannot fail to be deeply satisfying. Seats are ready at the ticket office.

D'Albert has written a string quartet which will be played for the first time from the manuscript parts by the Kneisel Quartet.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 8.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 8, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mme. Tavary.

Nordica Operatic Concert—Notes.

The engagement of Mme. Tavary as the soloist at the Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening, the 11th of the season's series by the Boston orchestra, gave great satisfaction to those who have anticipated with pleasure this recognition of Mme. Tavary's eminent abilities.

The favor this singer has gained with the Boston public, in her appearances under other auspices here, was clearly shown in the hearty greeting which attended her first appearance, and she fully met the expectations of those familiar with her earlier local successes in both her numbers.

She was first heard in the "Letter aria" from "Don Giovanni," in which her singing of the melodious movements charmed all who heard her and quite merited the enthusiastic applause with which she was rewarded at its conclusion. Her eminent ability as an actress, quite as much as her skill as a musician, served her in good stead in this number, and the rare musical intelligence of the singer was prominently shown at all times.

She made an admirably contrasting choice in her second selection, the aria for Elizabeth in the second act of "Tannhauser," which was given with such a breadth of dramatic style and such a grand measure of artistic elegance in its delivery that it called out an ovation seldom given at these concerts. Repeated recalls after each selection were most gracefully recognized by Mme. Tavary.

Mr. Nikisch has not often given the patrons of these concerts a more enjoyable treat than that afforded by the playing of the first suite from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," the brilliant and dainty movements having a performance that brought out their captivating contrasts in the happiest manner.

A very satisfying reading of Hayon's symphony in B flat major No. 12 (B. & H.) introduced the evening's programme, and an equally pleasing performance of the "Leonore" overture No. 3 ended it.

The orchestra makes its occasional tour the coming week, and will resume its home concerts on the 20th inst., when M. Henri Marteau, violinist, is to be the soloist, and Raff's "Im Walde" the symphony.

NORDICA OPERATIC CONCERTS.

A very pleasing announcement is made this morning relating to the organization of the Nordica operatic concert company, an aggregation of artists assembled by Manager Ellis for an extended tour from Boston to San Francisco during the coming months.

Mme. Nordica's selection as the prima donna of this campany is sure to be a source of pleasure to music lovers all over the country, her brilliant career in past seasons giving ample assurance of her great popularity with all classes of concert patrons. She has made a name and fame for herself on both sides the Atlantic and stands today in the front rank of solo vocalists.

The organization is, however, not alone strong in its prima donna, for all of the assisting artists have a world-wide reputation upon both the concert and opera stage. Mme. Sofia Scalchi is to be the contralto, with Miss Helen Dudley Campbell as associate; Sig. Italo Campanini, the tenor; Sig. Del Puetne, the baritone, and Herr Emil Fischer, the basso, with Sig. Sapio as the conductor. It is designed to have the programme largely made up of the operatic selections in which these artists have gained renown on both sides of the Atlantic.

The organization makes its first appearance at Music Hall on Monday evening, the 16th inst., when a full orchestral accompaniment will be provided for the singers, and the selections will include both the old and more modern operatic gems, with the great "Lucia" sextet and "Lohengrin" numbers as prominent parts of the programme. The sale of seats begins on Tuesday morning next.

The Register.
MONDAY, JANUARY 9 1893.

86, 88 and 90 Crown Street,
NEW HAVEN, CONN.

The Symphony Concert To-night—"Eight Bells" to Be Given by the Brothers Byrne.

The magnificent performances with which Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were accustomed to favor this city in past seasons are well remembered, and the appearance of the distinguished conductor and his splendid combination of instrumentalists at the Hyperion theater this evening will undoubtedly call out in full force the best musical public. Regarding the company, this has been written by one familiar with it: "In the individual excellence of the players and the completeness of its equipment, the Boston Orchestra has scarcely a rival in the world, and its concerts have become synonymous of an evening of great musical enjoyment. For the concert to-night Mr. Nikisch, mindful of the fact that it will be the only appearance of the orchestra here this season, has made a program of great attractiveness and variety, and one in which the abilities of his players will be shown to the best advantage.

"An especial attraction to many will be the Wagner music, which brings into play all the resources of the modern orchestra. In his reading of the beautiful and poetic Schumann Symphony, with which the concert opens, Mr. Nikisch has been credited by the critics with a masterly and sympathetic interpretation. The solo numbers of the evening will be by F. Busoni, a young pianist who has not been heard here before but whose playing will make a great impression if the experience of Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago is repeated. Alwin Schroeder, the well known 'cellist will also be heard in solo numbers." The program in full is as follows:

Robert Alexander Schumann.....
.....Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61
Liszt.....
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in A major
Mr. Busoni.
Richard Wagner Vorspiel and "Liebestod"
(Prelude and "Love-death") from "Tristan und Isolde."
Soli for violoncello
a. Chopin.....Nocturne
b. Klengel.....Capriccio
Mr. Schroeder.
Richard Wagner.....
.....Kaiser-Marsch (B-flat major), 4-4

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, JANUARY 9, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eleventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Haydn: Symphony in B-flat major (No. 12, Breitkopf & Härtel Ed.)
Mozart: Recitative, "Crudele? Ah no, mio bene!" and Aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni," act ii. scene 13.
Bizet: Suite No. 1 from "L'Arlésienne."
Wagner: Aria, "Dich, theure Halle, grüss' ich wieder," from "Tannhäuser," act ii. scene 1.
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72.
Mme. Basta Tavary was the singer.

The Haydn symphony is in many ways a rather modern sounding work for the composer; it is not merely that it is Haydn at his best, and hence ever fresh and young; it is something in the general character of the themes, the more frequent and at times bold modulation, an occasional chromatic element in the harmony, an unwonted profusion and variety of wind-coloring in the orchestration. One feels in it more than once the influence of Mozart; indeed, the symphony was written in 1795, and Mozart died in 1791. The slow movement in particular, with its independent 'cello part, its muted trumpets and drums, and its rich scoring for the wind instruments, is a gorgeous piece of coloring of which, even as a bit of orchestration, any modern master might be proud. There is, too, a certain modern breadth of style, a length of breath so to speak, in the theme itself that anticipates the melodic style of Beethoven and other later masters. The symphony was admirably, beautifully played.

Bizet's first suite from his music to Alphonse Daudet's "l'Arlésienne" (decidedly the more interesting of the two) contains much that is charming. The opening march theme in the prelude is not only full of life and vigor in itself, but is treated with infinite spirituel skill. The little Andante molto that follows it is to us one of the most absolutely bewitching passages in all modern French music. Strange to say, however, this exquisite little passage was less effectively played than anything else in the whole suite. To us the tempo seemed decidedly too fast; and here one may well be in doubt as to precisely what Bizet meant by "andante molto." Bizet was a Grand Prix de Rome, and had been some time in Italy before he wrote his "l'Arlésienne music; he might thus be expected to use Italian terms in the Italian way. But "andante molto," in the literal sense of "very much going"—i. e. going briskly—does not in the least agree with the character of the music. On the other hand, if he used the term as any Frenchman or other non-Italian might, taking andante in its generally accepted technical sense to mean "slow," then "andante molto" would have to be interpreted "very slow"—something just short of larghetto, for instance—and this would indicate the proper tempo of the movement (to our thinking, at least) very correctly. At all events we remember the ravishing effect of the passage as it used to be played by Mr. Thomas, at a tempo, if not much slower, yet markedly slower than that taken by Mr. Nikisch last Saturday evening. Some other items, too, militated against the full effectiveness of the passage: the muted string parts were played with such exceeding delicacy that those cloyingly sweet and unctuous chromatic harmonies that underlie the reiterated E-flat, G, F, E-flat of the clarinet were hardly perceptible. Mr. Strasser played the saxophone solo very smoothly and nicely; but one might suspect that he is not so easily at home on the saxophone as he is on the clarinet, for there was a certain lack of abandon and romantic fervor in his performance such as we have never noticed in his clarinet playing. In short, for one reason or another, this delicious passage missed fire—so much to our disappointment that we cannot help dwelling upon it at perhaps greater length than it really deserves. The Minuet, per contra, was exquisitely played, with all due delicacy and sprightliness; the smorzando passage at the close was especially well done. The Carillon made its unfailing effect.

Beethoven's great "Leonore" overture was superbly given; the strings in particular are to be praised for giving certain passages of piano cantilena not only with artistic phrasing and expressiveness, but really piano, as they are written. The dramatic trumpet episode in the middle, with its alternating song of thanksgiving, was grandly led up to; Mr. Molé played the flute solo excellently well, and the rushing coda was given with immense effect. By the way, what can the individual who edits the programme-books have been thinking of when he said that, at the beginning of this overture, the harmony passed to the key of B major? The chord of B major with an obvious D-natural in it is something new!

Mme. Tavary sang Donna Anna's great aria with great expressiveness and no lack of vocal technique; but there was a certain want of breadth and heroic grandeur of style to be felt throughout, and the close of the allegretto ("Forse un giorno," etc.) needed more brilliant slancio and ecstatic exaltation of sentiment. It was pure, artistic singing, full of delicate and feminine feeling, but somehow one felt it not to be Donna Anna; it was not on a large enough scale. Elizabeth's greeting to the Minnesingers' Hall has no proper place in the concert-room. On the stage, as a sudden outpouring of intense feeling, as one short climax of buoyant emotion, its effect is enormous—coming, as it does, immediately after the exceedingly brilliant introduction on the orchestra. But in the concert-room it is merely an excerpt, and one that has not sufficient development to throw the listener into a sympathetic mood. It ends almost before it has begun. As well might a reciter select Gloster's first speech in "Richard III." and stop short at "the lascivious pleasing of a lute." The thing has, by itself alone, no proper musical existence: it is but the introduction to a scene, not a scene in itself. Mme. Tavary sang it with both sentiment and fire; but no singer ever made it effective in such conditions.

The next programme (for Jan. 21) is—Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring," optis 36; Raff, symphony No. 3, in F major ("Im Walde"), opus 153. Mr. Henri Marteau will play a concerto for violin, the title of which will be duly announced. There will be no rehearsal nor concert here this week.

[78]

The Washington Post

WASHINGTON, JANUARY 11, 1893.

DELIGHTFUL PROGRAMME GIVEN.

Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Metzerott Music Hall.

Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for the programme played last night at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Metzerott Music Hall. The eighth symphony and the Wagner Kaiser-Marsch have not been played before at these concerts, and the Dvorak suite not since Mr. Gericke's last season. The numbers were so varied in style as to suit all tastes. Beethoven's Eighth or "little" symphony, as it is called, is one of the most popular of the time, and although written in 1812, returns in form to the style of some of the earlier works. The second movement is the favorite and is regarded as one of the most complete in any of the symphonies. The programme quotes from Berlioz: "That sort of thing falls straight from heaven into the artist's thought. He writes it all at a sitting and we are dumb at hearing it." This is lavish praise and is hardly borne out by the facts. It was Beethoven's custom to leave Vienna during the summer months, and in 1812, just before starting out, he partook of a farewell dinner with a number of friends, among them Maelzel, the inventor of the metronome, to whom Beethoven said good-by in a droll canon, which was sung at the table, he himself singing the soprano part. This tune was worked up into the second movement of the Eighth symphony with Beethoven's usual labor and care.

Dvorak is now at the head of the National Conservatory of Music, New York, and his various compositions are heard with especial interest on that account. The suite in D is an excellent type of work of the Bohemian Berlioz and the individuality is so marked that there can be no doubt of the author. The Slavonic folk songs are predominant in all his works and seem to be a part of his nature. The pastorale, the fantastic harmony of the polka, of which Bohemia is the home, the wealth of instrumentation in the romanze, and the brilliant coloring and frenzy of the finale render this suite deservedly popular, and to satisfy the audience last night Mr. Nikisch repeated the finale, something he has not done before, except with the closing movement of the "Peer Gynt" suite. The Wagner Kaiser-Marsch, written to celebrate the result of the Franco-Prussian war, is hardly typical of the composer of "Parsifal." Wagner, aside from his opera, wrote only six separate compositions. The "Huldigungs March," written for the coronation ceremonies of Ludwig of Bavaria, and the Centennial March for the Philadelphia exposition also fall short of the composer's best work, as music written to order for special occasions is so likely to do. The orchestra was at its best throughout the evening, and left little to be desired. The second movement of the symphony might have been handled more delicately, and in one or two places the accompaniments were too heavy, but these are minor faults. It was in keeping with the reputation of the orchestra that while the greater part of the programme required little brass and none of the instruments of percussion aside from the tympani for the Wagner selection only fully ten men were brought from Boston.

The soloist was Mme. Basta Tavary, who was heard here last season with the Minnie Hank Opera Company, and was especially pleasing in "Cavalleria Rusticana." Mme. Tavary is of Russian parentage and has had a brilliant success in the few years she has been singing in public. As a child she was a phenomenal pianist and was received as a pupil by Liszt. Her voice developing she studied with Marchesi and the elder Lamperti, and has sung in opera in many European capitals, and in oratorio in England. She sang last evening "Non Mider" from "Don Giovanni," and an aria from "Traviata," being recalled several times after each number. She is to sing January 25 with the Choral Society in English, in which she was a favorite at the English festivals. The next concert will be given on Tuesday, February 7.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Mittwoch, 11. Januar 1893.

Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Dieses berühmte Orchester, welches aus 85 Musikern ersten Ranges zusammengesetzt ist und mit Recht eine hervorragende Stelle unter den Orchestern der Welt einnimmt, wird heute Abend unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch, einem der berühmtesten Wagner-Interpreten der Welt und ausgezeichneten Dirigenten, ein Konzert in der Academy of Music veranstalten, welches den Musikfreunden seltene Genüsse bieten wird. Als Solistin wird die berühmte Sängerin Mme. Basta Tavary mitwirken. Das Programm bietet die zweite Symphonie von Beethoven, Menuet und Tanz der Sylphiden aus „Damnation de Faust" von Berlioz und das symphonische Gedicht Tasso von Liszt für Orchester, ferner das berühmte Händelsche „Largo," welches von dem Konzertmeister Hrn. Kneisel vorgetragen werden wird. Madame Tavary wird Arien aus Don Juan und Traviata singen. Den Musikfreunden braucht der Besuch dieses Konzertes nicht noch besonders empfohlen zu werden.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 10. Januar 1893.

Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Dieses berühmte Orchester, welches aus 85 Musikern ersten Ranges zusammengesetzt ist und mit Recht eine hervorragende Stelle unter den Orchestern der Welt einnimmt, wird morgen Abend unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch, einem der berühmtesten Wagner-Interpreten der Welt und ausgezeichneten Dirigenten, ein Konzert in der Academy of Music veranstalten, welches den Musikfreunden seltene Genüsse bieten wird. Als Solistin wird die berühmte Sängerin Mme. Basta Tavary mitwirken. Das Programm bietet die zweite Symphonie von Beethoven, Menuet und Tanz der Sylphiden aus „Damnation de Faust" von Berlioz und das symphonische Gedicht Tasso von Liszt für Orchester, ferner das berühmte Händelsche „Largo," welches von dem Konzertmeister Hrn. Kneisel vorgetragen werden wird. Madame Tavary wird Arien aus Don Juan und Traviata singen. Den Musikfreunden braucht der Besuch dieses Konzertes nicht noch besonders empfohlen zu werden.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester in der Academy of Music. Am nächsten Mittwoch den 11. Januar findet wiederum ein großes Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters in der Academy of Music statt. Herr Arthur Nikisch wird mit seiner Künstlerschaar wiederum ein sehr interessantes und reichhaltiges Programm bieten. Als Solistin wird die Mme. Basta Tavary mitwirken. Tickets sind schon jetzt in No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

NORTH AMERICAN, PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 12, 1893.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert at the Academy of Music last evening, when the good effect of popularizing the programme was shown in an attendance visibly larger than that of last month. As the reserved seats were practically all sold at the opening of the season for each of the five concerts which it was announced the Orchestra would give, there is not scope for any very great variation in the size of the audiences from month to month. The only difference is that some months there are more people in the galleries or occupying standing room than others, and in this respect the difference last evening approached the maximum. It is reasonable to a tribute this to the greater attractiveness of the programme. In December Mr. Nikisch gave us four numbers—a Brahms symphony, a Dvorak suite, a Liszt concerto, and a Wagner march. Last evening his scheme was much more diversified. It included examples, both vocal and instrumental, of six composers, ranging from Handel and Beethoven to Berlioz and Liszt. The symphony was that by Beethoven, in D major, No. 2, and this beautiful work, so familiar to amateurs, received a most appreciative and poetic interpretation. There might sometimes with advantage be more vigor and freedom and a broader sonority in the playing of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, and the opening movement of the symphony was given in rather a cold and colorless way. But the lovely larghetto was played with a perfect balance and the utmost tenderness of feeling, and there was no lack of fire or force in the rendition of the closing allegro. Other orchestral numbers were the "Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps" and "Dance of the Sylphs," from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," which both went admirably and the last of which was rapturously and imperatively encored. Music of this character is peculiarly in Mr. Nikisch's genre, and the manner in which his orchestra plays it leaves nothing to be desired and could not be surpassed.

The soloist of the evening was Mme. Basta-Tavary, a charming singer and a fine artist, who deepened, by her rendering of Mozart's "Non mi dir" and Verdi's "Fors 'e lui" the favorable impression which she made here in opera last season. Her voice is sympathetic and her phrasing admirable, and while her manner is rather wanting in breadth, she sang with sincere feeling and an always adequate intelligence. The programme, which included Handel's "Largo," which so pleased the audience that it had to be repeated, and in which Mr. Kneisel's fine tone was heard to great advantage, closed with Lisz.'s symphonic poem of "Tasso."

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The Adamowski Quartet gave its third subscription concert at the New Century Drawing-Room yesterday afternoon, in the presence of a relatively large and fashionable audience. The leading quartet was that by Haydn in G major, No. 1, a bright, melodious, symmetrical composition, which was played with extreme delicacy and precision and with acutely appreciative taste. The other concerted number on the programme was Saint Saens' pianoforte quartet, op 41, which is a fine and typical example of modern chamber music. Its elaborate, complex, picturesque and richly colored score is in striking contrast with Haydn's single-minded simplicity and transparent ingenuousness. The quartet was to have had the valuable assistance of Mrs. Nikisch, but to the disappointment of the audience it was announced that a sore throat would prevent her from appearing.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER—JANUARY 12.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Excellent Program Given by Mr. Nikisch at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert of the present season at the Academy of Music last evening was unusually enjoyable. We have indulged in some criticism of Mr. Nikisch's recent program making, but that of last evening calls only for praise. It was as follows:

Beethoven..Symphony No. 2, in D minor, Op. 36.
Mozart..Recitative and Aria from "Don Giovanni," "Non mi dir."
Madame Basta-Tavary.
Handel.....Largo
Solo Violin, Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Berlioz..Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust," Op. 24.
Minuet des Feu-follets—Moderato (D major).
Valse des Sylphes: Allegro, mouvement de valse (D major).
Verdi..Grand Aria from "Traviata," "Ah, forse e lui."
Madame Basta-Tavary.
Franz Liszt..Symphonic Poem, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo."

This is a real symphony program as distinguished from so many we have had lately that have contained no symphony, or a mediocre one at best. Beethoven's No. 2 is a great work, one that is always delightful no matter how often repeated. It was played well last night, albeit lacking somewhat in virility in certain passages. A little freer use of the instruments would have added breadth to a most noble composition. The two Berlioz numbers were played to perfection. There is probably not an organization in the world that can play music of this character so well. Where delicacy of touch and refinement of tone are wanted to produce purely sensuous strains Mr. Nikisch is supreme. One cannot imagine an improvement on his work in these two numbers last night. The symphonic poem was played excellently and with more than usual satisfaction, since "Tasso" often becomes tedious to those who are not ardent admirers of Liszt.

The work of the soloists was satisfactory. Madame Basta-Tavary has a pleasing voice and good methods. Mr. Kneisel played the familiar Handel Largo with dignity and power.

Take it all in all, it was the most satisfactory concert that Mr. Nikisch has given us in a long time. The audience was the largest ever present at one of this orchestra's concerts.

The Press

THURSDAY, JANUARY 12, 1893.

PHILADELPHIA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

A symphony concert without a Wagner number is a phenomenon in Philadelphia, and not to be unreservedly commended. Your true Wagner lover does not walk out of such a concert in an "uplifted" state of mind as he does after hearing the noble, passionate strains of the great German master's music. And the success of the Wagner concert given here in November proved that Philadelphia cherishes Wagner. Even Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," splendid as it is, did not quite fill the place which is customarily filled by the Wagner numbers on a symphony programme.

But it was magnificently rendered. The orchestra has perhaps never in Philadelphia played with more power than it displayed in the finale. The gradual approach to the climax and the triumphal finish, with its great volume of tone, were performed with a freedom from constraint that is not always characteristic of the work of Mr. Nikisch's organization.

In general this orchestra shows best in very delicate pieces, where there are chances for its exquisite mobility to tell. The variations of tone in the Valse des Sylphs, by Berlioz, followed one another in charming succession, the piece was most artistically rendered.

The symphony, Beethoven's second, in D minor, also was finely given; the best-played movement, perhaps, was the second. Mr. Kneisel played Haendel's eternally acceptable Largo with all his characteristic richness of tone and breadth of conception. The other soloist, Madame Tavary, sang "Non Mi Dir," from "Don Giovanni," and "Ah forse e lui," from Traviata. Her tones were much purer than they are wont to be, and on the whole her singing was surprisingly good. The audience, as usual, was very large and approbative.

The Adamowski String Quartette.

The concert given by the Adamowski String Quartette in the New Century Drawing Room yesterday afternoon was very good, notwithstanding the absence of Mrs. Nikisch, who was advertised to sing, but who sent a telegram to say that she could not be present because she had a cold. This was disappointing, but Mr. Adamowski filled in the space that her absence left in the programme. He played with good effect two movements of a violin concerto by Bruch.

The quartette was in fine form in the not very difficult but beautiful Haydn quartette in G major, No. 1. In the first movements of Saint Saens quartette, Op. 41, for piano and strings, in which Mr. Nikisch played the piano, there was dash enough, but withal a certain roughness, but during the last movements the spirit of unity came to the players and they gave the fine music beautifully.

The audience was moderately large. A score of people lingering after the concert was over, were delighted to see Mr. Nikisch appear on the stage and to hear him run over parts of Chopin's polonaise and other things for a few minutes.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, Jan. 12, 1893.

Academy of Music—The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in the Academy of Music last evening was, in all probability, a somewhat refreshing experience to the crowded audience gathered to enjoy it. Instead of a rather heavy Brahms symphony, like the one given at the preceding concert, one of Beethoven's least familiar works, that in D (No. 2), was played, and proved an admirable change, while the whole list of numbers was so skilfully arranged as to appeal both to the advanced enthusiast as well as to slightly less technical persons. This is as it should be, for, while the admirer of abstruse and not over-inviting compositions is not without his claims upon the programme maker, it should be remembered that for a large and discerning class (among them very critical observers) a certain judicious attractiveness can be introduced into the selections with very good results. In other words, a concert can be classic and at the same time interesting. Last night's performance was of a nature to prove the truth of this assertion. After the Beethoven Symphony came an aria from "Don Giovanni" (sung by Madame Basta-Tavary), the Handel Largo, two movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the "Fors' e lui" from "Traviata," and Liszt's symphonic poem of "Tasso." It needs but a glance at this list to show the happiness of the combination. Each number was interesting from a different standpoint; each was worthy its place, and the general effect of the whole arrangement was of the most pleasing kind.

The symphony, which was wisely put first, had a treatment amply calculated to bring out its beauties, especially in the case of the lovely larghetto. For the matter of that, all the movements were given with that finish, wonderful accuracy and refinement of method so characteristic of Mr. Nikisch and his musicians. The Handel Largo, always an unusually welcome number when adequately presented, introduced Mr. Kneisel as the violin soloist, and those who know the work of this artist need hardly be told that he took due advantage of the generous opportunity thus offered him. So impressive, indeed, did the performance of the Largo prove that Mr. Nikisch obligingly had it repeated, in response to an enthusiastic tribute of applause from the house. Of the other instrumental contributions, comprising two excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" and "Tasso," it will do to say that the first named seelections were given with charming grace (the Valse des Sylphes had to be repeated), while the symphonic poem had a strikingly picturesque exposition that made a fine finale to the concert. The vocal soloist was Madame Basta-Tavary, who was heard at the Academy in opera some time ago. Last evening she sang a recitative and aria from "Don Giovanni" (the "Non mi dir"), and the florid "Ah, fors' e lui" from "La Traviata," making, perhaps, the better impression in the latter. Both numbers were given with pronounced artistic taste, and the listeners favored Madame Tavary with a cordial reception that must have been very gratifying to her.

New Century Drawing Room.

The Adamowski Quartet Concert was robbed of some of its expected attractiveness yesterday afternoon by the enforced absence of Mrs. Nikisch, from whom a telegram was received stating that indisposition would prevent her appearance. The programme that was carried out, however, was very enjoyable in itself, as seemed but natural in the case of so admirable a quartet as Mr. Adamowski's.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 12, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra in a Popular and Beautiful Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening. The house was filled, as usual, and the audience was more than usually earnest in its demonstrations of pleasure. For Mr. Nikisch had wisely, as well as mercifully, allowed a surcease of Brahms and Tschaikowsky, and had made up his programme of familiar and popular music, beginning with the D major symphony of Beethoven. Mr. Nikisch treats this brilliantly free and richly varied work with his own characteristic carefulness. As a piece of execution the orchestra has done nothing better. Beautiful in detail, it was also poetical in feeling, and gave the audience unfeigned delight. There were also heard the immortal largo of Handel, Mr. Kneisel playing the violin solo with the utmost refinement, and the two favorite movements of fairy dance music from Berlioz's "Faust," played with a delicacy in which this orchestra is unexcelled. The closing number was a fine and rich performance of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." The vocal soloist was that admirable artist, Madame Tavary, whose singing of the Mozart aria recalled the impression she made in "Don Giovanni" last season, and who also sang "Ah fors e lui," to the great pleasure of her hearers.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD, JANUARY 12.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The lovers of Beethoven's music were treated last evening at the Academy of Music to a fine rendering of the second symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has rarely been given here with more enthusiasm or classical finish by a band of instrumentalists. The Haendel "Largo," two movements from Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso" were also performed with all the grace and precision for which Mr. Nikisch's players are famous. Mme. Basta-Tavary, a soprano of high abilities as an executant and possessing a voice of rare sweetness and volume, was the soloist. She sang the grand aria from "Don Giovanni" and the Fors Lui from "Traviata," the latter number especially being rendered with fine dramatic and emotional expression. The house was crowded to the doors.

[79]

The Nordica Operatic Concert Co.

Under the direction of Mr. C. A. ELLIS.

Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,

The greatest living dramatic Soprano, whose triumphs in Grand Italian Opera at all of the Royal Opera Houses in Europe, including the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, London, and at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, are matters of musical record.

ONE NIGHT. MUSIC HALL, Buffalo,
Saturday Evening, Jan. 21, AT 8 O'CLOCK.

JEFFERSON S. LEERBURGER, Manager.
H. G. SNOW, - - Business Manager.

Sale of seats opens at Peter Paul & Bro. Bookstore, Wednesday, January 18.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1892.

The ninth symphony concert was distinguished by the first appearance in Boston of Miss Eugenia Castellano, the pianist. It was announced that she would be heard in the second concert of Tschaikowsky; but for some reason or other Miss Castellano did not play with the orchestra. She played three solo numbers: Chopin's E minor nocturne (op. posth); Chopin's B minor Scherzo, and Martucci's Étude de Concert. When she came before the public it was difficult to tell at first whether she was child or woman; it was also difficult after the first two numbers to pronounce any safe judgment concerning her merits as a pianist.

She did not make much out of the nocturne. She played it as though a teacher stood by her side, and yet at the same time she suggested, even when she did not reveal, a strong temperament. In the scherzo she proved herself a woman; for she showed feeling, yes, passion, in unexpected, almost incongruous passages, and when she might have palpitated with emotion, she preferred to be prosaic. That she owned well trained fingers and supple wrists was at once apparent. After her brilliant performance of the study by Martucci, she was applauded as a mistress of bravura; yet not alone from admiration of her digital dexterity. The hearer was curious to study further her musical equipment. She was recalled enthusiastically, and in response she gave a brilliant performance of a brilliant piece of the music box order, "Momento capriccioso," by Van Westerhaut, if I am not mistaken.

Again there was a universal shout, and Miss Castellano, who had already defied the solemn traditions of the symphony concerts by playing after a recall, concluded her recital by a delightful delivery of a charming gavotte in the ancient style. It is to be hoped that this interesting pianist will soon be heard in a concert where a more elaborate or rather diversified program will afford a better opportunity for judging of her temperament; there can now be little or no dispute concerning her admirable mechanism.

The orchestra numbers were Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys;" "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and Mendelssohn's fourth symphony. The orchestral performance was in the main excellent. The tempi of the first two movements of the symphony were open to criticism. The allegro was taken at a break neck pace, and the andante con moto was sluggish.

* * *

Mr. Schnitzler, a violinist of the Symphony orchestra, will make his début here the 30th and 31st in the D minor (No. 4) concerto of Vieuxtemps.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its third concert at Chickering Hall to-morrow evening. The program is as follows: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; concerto for piano in G minor No. 1, Mendelssohn; two movements from "La Damnation de Faust." Berlioz; two movements from the concerto for violin No. 1, Bruch, and overture, "Leonore No. 3," Beethoven. Eugenia Castellano and Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloists.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis' new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente with the orchestra under Sig. Sapio will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme which will end with the sextette and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounoud's "Faust" sung in Italian as concert music.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Signor Del Puente, with the orchestra under Signor Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Mme. Nordica; Siebel, Mme. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Campbell; Faust, Signor Campanini; Mephisto, Herr Fischer. The trio and finale of the fifth act will end the programme.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1893.

The Nordica operatic concert Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a brilliant programme. Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Scalchi and Del Puente, with the orchestra under Mr. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Nordica; Siebel, Scalchi; Martha, Campbell; Faust, Campanini; Mephisto, Fischer. The trio and finale of the last act will end the programme.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JAN. 14, 1893.

The concert announced for the introduction of the Nordica grand operatic organization at Music Hall next Monday evening will present the artists engaged by Manager Ellis in a very enjoyable programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente, together with the orchestra, under Sig. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will concluded with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of selections from the third and fifth acts of "Faust," given as concert music. The several roles will be sung by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Emil Fischer.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 189

The Nordica concert at Music Hall on Monday night promises to be one of the events of the season, as the company embraces, besides Mme. Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Italo Campinini, Guisseppe del Puente, and Emil Fischer, with a grand orchestra under the direction of Sig. Sapio. Mme. Nordica will sing the aria from "La Reine de Saba," Scalchi will sing the cavatina "Nobil Signor" from "The Huguenots," del Puente will sing the famous Toreador song, and the entire company will sing the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part will be the third act of "Faust," with Nordica as Marguerite, Scalchi as Siebel, Miss Campbell as Martha, Campanini as Faust, and Fischer as Mephistopheles. In this there will be introduced Mephistopheles' serenade from the fourth act and the trio and finale from the fifth act.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 14, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The eleventh symphony concert was well put together, and lasted just about the right length of time. It began with the B-flat major symphony of Haydn, known as the twelfth in the Breitkopf and Härtel numeration and always enjoyed as one of its composer's strongest and best. The key is a sonorous and agreeable one, and is only deserted in one movement—the adagio, which passes into the key of the dominant, F major. That the work abounds in melody, needs not to be said, and in the development of his themes Haydn here shows himself more liberal and varied than is his wont. The performance was generally excellent, even though a passage here and there was played rather demonstratively instead of being left to tell its own story without assistance. The first suite arranged from Bizet's incidental music for Daudet's "L'Arlésienne," was the next orchestral number, and had admirable interpretation in almost every extract, the sense and relation of one number only being really misunderstood. A good square standard reading of Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture ended the evening. Between these numbers Mme. Basta-Tavary sang the "Letter" scena from "Don Giovanni" and the "Hall of Song" air from "Tannhäuser," the latter of which does not suit with the concert stage, its perpetual declamatory excitement needing the justification of the pomp, the voluminous sound and the processional procedure of the opera. Mme. Tavary is an artist of deserved eminence and her singing was generally at the height of her reputation. But, like all singers who have made great exertion at one time or another, her voice does not always illustrate her evident intentions, and an ill-turned phrase or a group of thin tones may jarringly follow hard upon a large, resonant and noble passage. She treated the Wagner score with an elasticity which the German declaimers rarely give it; but on the other hand improperly added some fioriture to the Mozart air.

There will be no concert tonight, because of the absence during the week of the orchestra upon one of the periodical short tours.

THE NORDICA CONCERT COMPANY.

On Monday evening Mme. Nordica will make her rentrée for this season, appearing in the Music Hall at the head of the concert company which will bear her name. As has been mentioned in these columns, the other members of the company are Signora Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Signor Campanini, Signor Del Puente and Mr. Fischer. As the plan of the concerts makes them distinctly operatic, it is evident that such artists as these can sing anything in that line and [illegible] grave), you can hear a peculiar grinding noise—it is while the bird is quiescent—and is occasioned by its digestive process. I have heard it on several occasions, and I have also

[illegible] [80]

The Nordica Operatic Concert Co.

Under the direction of Mr. C. A. ELLIS.

Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,

The greatest living dramatic Soprano, whose triumphs in Grand Italian Opera at all of the Royal Opera Houses in Europe, including the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, London, and at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, are matters of musical record.

ONE NIGHT. MUSIC HALL, Buffalo, Saturday Evening, Jan. 21, AT 8 O'CLOCK.

JEFFERSON S. LEERBURGER, Manager.
H. G. SNOW, - - Business Manager.

Sale of seats opens at Peter Paul & Bro. Bookstore, Wednesday, January 18.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its third concert at Chickering Hall to-morrow evening. The program is as follows: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; concerto for piano in G minor No. 1, Mendelssohn; two movements from "La Damnation de Faust." Berlioz; two movements from the concerto for violin No. 1, Bruch, and overture, "Leonore No. 3," Beethoven. Eugenia Castellano and Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloists.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis' new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente with the orchestra under Sig. Sapio will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme which will end with the sextette and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounoud's "Faust" sung in Italian as concert music.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Signor Del Puente, with the orchestra under Signor Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Mme. Nordica; Siebel, Mme. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Campbell; Faust, Signor Campanini; Mephisto, Herr Fischer. The trio and finale of the fifth act will end the programme.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1893.

The Nordica operatic concert Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a brilliant programme. Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Scalchi and Del Puente, with the orchestra under Mr. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Nordica; Siebel, Scalchi; Martha, Campbell; Faust, Campanini; Mephisto, Fischer. The trio and finale of the last act will end the programme.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JAN. 14, 1893.

The concert announced for the introduction of the Nordica grand operatic organization at Music Hall next Monday evening will present the artists engaged by Manager Ellis in a very enjoyable programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente, together with the orchestra, under Sig. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will concluded with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of selections from the third and fifth acts of "Faust," given as concert music. The several roles will be sung by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Emil Fischer.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 189

The Nordica concert at Music Hall on Monday night promises to be one of the events of the season, as the company embraces, besides Mme. Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Italo Campinini, Guisseppe del Puente, and Emil Fischer, with a grand orchestra under the direction of Sig. Sapio. Mme. Nordica will sing the aria from "La Reine de Saba," Scalchi will sing the cavatina "Nobil Signor" from "The Huguenots," del Puente will sing the famous Toreador song, and the entire company will sing the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part will be the third act of "Faust," with Nordica as Marguerite, Scalchi as Siebel, Miss Campbell as Martha, Campanini as Faust, and Fischer as Mephistopheles. In this there will be introduced Mephistopheles' serenade from the fourth act and the trio and finale from the fifth act.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1892.

The ninth symphony concert was distinguished by the first appearance in Boston of Miss Eugenia Castellano, the pianist. It was announced that she would be heard in the second concert of Tschaikowsky; but for some reason or other Miss Castellano did not play with the orchestra. She played three solo numbers: Chopin's E minor nocturne (op. posth); Chopin's B minor Scherzo, and Martucci's Étude de Concert. When she came before the public it was difficult to tell at first whether she was child or woman; it was also difficult after the first two numbers to pronounce any safe judgment concerning her merits as a pianist.

She did not make much out of the nocturne. She played it as though a teacher stood by her side, and yet at the same time she suggested, even when she did not reveal, a strong temperament. In the scherzo she proved herself a woman; for she showed feeling, yes, passion, in unexpected, almost incongruous passages, and when she might have palpitated with emotion, she preferred to be prosaic. That she owned well trained fingers and supple wrists was at once apparent. After her brilliant performance of the study by Martucci, she was applauded as a mistress of bravura; yet not alone from admiration of her digital dexterity. The hearer was curious to study further her musical equipment. She was recalled enthusiastically, and in response she gave a brilliant performance of a brilliant piece of the music box order, "Momento capriccioso," by Van Westerhaut, if I am not mistaken.

Again there was a universal shout, and Miss Castellano, who had already defied the solemn traditions of the symphony concerts by playing after a recall, concluded her recital by a delightful delivery of a charming gavotte in the ancient style. It is to be hoped that this interesting pianist will soon be heard in a concert where a more elaborate or rather diversified program will afford a better opportunity for judging of her temperament; there can now be little or no dispute concerning her admirable mechanism.

The orchestra numbers were Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys;" "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and Mendelssohn's fourth symphony. The orchestral performance was in the main excellent. The tempi of the first two movements of the symphony were open to criticism. The allegro was taken at a break neck pace, and the andante con moto was sluggish.

* * *

Mr. Schnitzler, a violinist of the Symphony orchestra, will make his début here the 30th and 31st in the D minor (No. 4) concerto of Vieuxtemps.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 14, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The eleventh symphony concert was well put together, and lasted just about the right length of time. It began with the B-flat major symphony of Haydn, known as the twelfth in the Breitkopf and Härtel numeration and always enjoyed as one of its composer's strongest and best. The key is a sonorous and agreeable one, and is only deserted in one movement—the adagio, which passes into the key of the dominant, F major. That the work abounds in melody, needs not to be said, and in the development of his themes Haydn here shows himself more liberal and varied than is his wont. The performance was generally excellent, even though a passage here and there was played rather demonstratively instead of being left to tell its own story without assistance. The first suite arranged from Bizet's incidental music for Daudet's "L'Arlésienne," was the next orchestral number, and had admirable interpretation in almost every extract, the sense and relation of one number only being really misunderstood. A good square standard reading of Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture ended the evening. Between these numbers Mme. Basta-Tavary sang the "Letter" scena from "Don Giovanni" and the "Hall of Song" air from "Tannhäuser," the latter of which does not suit with the concert stage, its perpetual declamatory excitement needing the justification of the pomp, the voluminous sound and the processional procedure of the opera. Mme. Tavary is an artist of deserved eminence and her singing was generally at the height of her reputation. But, like all singers who have made great exertion at one time or another, her voice does not always illustrate her evident intentions, and an ill-turned phrase or a group of thin tones may jarringly follow hard upon a large, resonant and noble passage. She treated the Wagner score with an elasticity which the German declaimers rarely give it; but on the other hand improperly added some fioriture to the Mozart air.

There will be no concert tonight, because of the absence during the week of the orchestra upon one of the periodical short tours.

THE NORDICA CONCERT COMPANY.

On Monday evening Mme. Nordica will make her rentrée for this season, appearing in the Music Hall at the head of the concert company which will bear her name. As has been mentioned in these columns, the other members of the company are Signora Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Signor Campanini, Signor Del Puente and Mr. Fischer. As the plan of the concerts makes them distinctly operatic, it is evident that such artists as these can sing anything in that line and sing it well, while the necessary support will be supplied by a sufficient orchestra under Signor Sapio, a director and accompanist whose competency is well known. The full programme for this opening concert is not yet before us, but it will contain the great sextette from "Lucia" and the substance of one act from "Faust." The preliminary arrangements reflect great credit on Mr. C. A. Ellis and the tour which he has laid out must be a successful one.

The Nordica Operatic Concert Co.

Under the direction of Mr. C. A. ELLIS.

Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,

The greatest living dramatic Soprano, whose triumphs in Grand Italian Opera at all of the Royal Opera Houses in Europe, including the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, London, and at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, are matters of musical record.

ONE NIGHT. MUSIC HALL, Buffalo, Saturday Evening, Jan. 21, AT 8 O'CLOCK.

JEFFERSON S. LEERBURGER, Manager.
H. G. SNOW, - - Business Manager.

Sale of seats opens at Peter Paul & Bro. Bookstore, Wednesday, January 18.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its third concert at Chickering Hall to-morrow evening. The program is as follows: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; concerto for piano in G minor No. 1, Mendelssohn; two movements from "La Damnation de Faust." Berlioz; two movements from the concerto for violin No. 1, Bruch, and overture, "Leonore No. 3," Beethoven. Eugenia Castellano and Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloists.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis' new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente with the orchestra under Sig. Sapio will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme which will end with the sextette and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounoud's "Faust" sung in Italian as concert music.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Signor Del Puente, with the orchestra under Signor Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Mme. Nordica; Siebel, Mme. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Campbell; Faust, Signor Campanini; Mephisto, Herr Fischer. The trio and finale of the fifth act will end the programme.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1893.

The Nordica operatic concert Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a brilliant programme. Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Scalchi and Del Puente, with the orchestra under Mr. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Nordica; Siebel, Scalchi; Martha, Campbell; Faust, Campanini; Mephisto, Fischer. The trio and finale of the last act will end the programme.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JAN. 14, 1893.

The concert announced for the introduction of the Nordica grand operatic organization at Music Hall next Monday evening will present the artists engaged by Manager Ellis in a very enjoyable programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente, together with the orchestra, under Sig. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will concluded with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of selections from the third and fifth acts of "Faust," given as concert music. The several roles will be sung by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Emil Fischer.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 189

The Nordica concert at Music Hall on Monday night promises to be one of the events of the season, as the company embraces, besides Mme. Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Italo Campinini, Guisseppe del Puente, and Emil Fischer, with a grand orchestra under the direction of Sig. Sapio. Mme. Nordica will sing the aria from "La Reine de Saba," Scalchi will sing the cavatina "Nobil Signor" from "The Huguenots," del Puente will sing the famous Toreador song, and the entire company will sing the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part will be the third act of "Faust," with Nordica as Marguerite, Scalchi as Siebel, Miss Campbell as Martha, Campanini as Faust, and Fischer as Mephistopheles. In this there will be introduced Mephistopheles' serenade from the fourth act and the trio and finale from the fifth act.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1892.

The ninth symphony concert was distinguished by the first appearance in Boston of Miss Eugenia Castellano, the pianist. It was announced that she would be heard in the second concert of Tschaikowsky; but for some reason or other Miss Castellano did not play with the orchestra. She played three solo numbers: Chopin's E minor nocturne (op. posth); Chopin's B minor Scherzo, and Martucci's Étude de Concert. When she came before the public it was difficult to tell at first whether she was child or woman; it was also difficult after the first two numbers to pronounce any safe judgment concerning her merits as a pianist.

She did not make much out of the nocturne. She played it as though a teacher stood by her side, and yet at the same time she suggested, even when she did not reveal, a strong temperament. In the scherzo she proved herself a woman; for she showed feeling, yes, passion, in unexpected, almost incongruous passages, and when she might have palpitated with emotion, she preferred to be prosaic. That she owned well trained fingers and supple wrists was at once apparent. After her brilliant performance of the study by Martucci, she was applauded as a mistress of bravura; yet not alone from admiration of her digital dexterity. The hearer was curious to study further her musical equipment. She was recalled enthusiastically, and in response she gave a brilliant performance of a brilliant piece of the music box order, "Momento capriccioso," by Van Westerhaut, if I am not mistaken.

Again there was a universal shout, and Miss Castellano, who had already defied the solemn traditions of the symphony concerts by playing after a recall, concluded her recital by a delightful delivery of a charming gavotte in the ancient style. It is to be hoped that this interesting pianist will soon be heard in a concert where a more elaborate or rather diversified program will afford a better opportunity for judging of her temperament; there can now be little or no dispute concerning her admirable mechanism.

The orchestra numbers were Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys;" "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and Mendelssohn's fourth symphony. The orchestral performance was in the main excellent. The tempi of the first two movements of the symphony were open to criticism. The allegro was taken at a break neck pace, and the andante con moto was sluggish.

* * *

Mr. Schnitzler, a violinist of the Symphony orchestra, will make his début here the 30th and 31st in the D minor (No. 4) concerto of Vieuxtemps.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 14, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The eleventh symphony concert was well put together, and lasted just about the right length of time. It began with the B-flat major symphony of Haydn, known as the twelfth in the Breitkopf and Härtel numeration and always enjoyed as one of its composer's strongest and best. The key is a sonorous and agreeable one, and is only deserted in one movement—the adagio, which passes into the key of the dominant, F major. That the work abounds in melody, needs not to be said, and in the development of his themes Haydn here shows himself more liberal and varied than is his wont. The performance was generally excellent, even though a passage here and there was played rather demonstratively instead of being left to tell its own story without assistance. The first suite arranged from Bizet's incidental music for Daudet's "L'Arlésienne," was the next orchestral number, and had admirable interpretation in almost every extract, the sense and relation of one number only being really misunderstood. A good square standard reading of Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 overture ended the evening. Between these numbers Mme. Basta-Tavary sang the "Letter" scena from "Don Giovanni" and the "Hall of Song" air from "Tannhäuser," the latter of which does not suit with the concert stage, its perpetual declamatory excitement needing the justification of the pomp, the voluminous sound and the processional procedure of the opera. Mme. Tavary is an artist of deserved eminence and her singing was generally at the height of her reputation. But, like all singers who have made great exertion at one time or another, her voice does not always illustrate her evident intentions, and an ill-turned phrase or a group of thin tones may jarringly follow hard upon a large, resonant and noble passage. She treated the Wagner score with an elasticity which the German declaimers rarely give it; but on the other hand improperly added some fioriture to the Mozart air.

There will be no concert tonight, because of the absence during the week of the orchestra upon one of the periodical short tours.

THE NORDICA CONCERT COMPANY.

On Monday evening Mme. Nordica will make her rentrée for this season, appearing in the Music Hall at the head of the concert company which will bear her name. As has been mentioned in these columns, the other members of the company are Signora Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Signor Campanini, Signor Del Puente and Mr. Fischer. As the plan of the concerts makes them distinctly operatic, it is evident that such artists as these can sing anything in that line and sing it well, while the necessary support will be supplied by a sufficient orchestra under Signor Sapio, a director and accompanist whose competency is well known. The full programme for this opening concert is not yet before us, but it will contain the great sextette from "Lucia" and the substance of one act from "Faust." The preliminary arrangemen ts reflect great credit on Mr. C. A. Ellis and the tour which he has laid out must be a successful one.

[80]

Mr. C. A. ELLIS begs to announce that he has arranged a series of Grand Operatic Concerts, for which he has engaged the following eminent artists, forming an exceptionally strong organization.

Mme. Lillian Nordica, Prima Donna Soprano.

Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Prima Donna Contralto.

Miss Helen Dudley Campbell,
Mezzo Soprano.

Italo Campanini, Primo Tenor.

Giuseppe del Puente, Primo Baritone.

Emil Fischer, Basso.

ISIDORE LUCKSTONE,
PIANIST AND MUSICAL DIRECTOR.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its third concert at Chickering Hall to-morrow evening. The program is as follows: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; concerto for piano in G minor No. 1, Mendelssohn; two movements from "La Damnation de Faust." Berlioz; two movements from the concerto for violin No. 1, Bruch, and overture, "Leonore No. 3," Beethoven. Eugenia Castellano and Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloists.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis' new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente with the orchestra under Sig. Sapio will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme which will end with the sextette and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounoud's "Faust" sung in Italian as concert music.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Signor Del Puente, with the orchestra under Signor Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Mme. Nordica; Siebel, Mme. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Campbell; Faust, Signor Campanini; Mephisto, Herr Fischer. The trio and finale of the fifth act will end the programme.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1893.

The Nordica operatic concert Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a brilliant programme. Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Scalchi and Del Puente, with the orchestra under Mr. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Nordica; Siebel, Scalchi; Martha, Campbell; Faust, Campanini; Mephisto, Fischer. The trio and finale of the last act will end the programme.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JAN. 14, 1893.

The concert announced for the introduction of the Nordica grand operatic organization at Music Hall next Monday evening will present the artists engaged by Manager Ellis in a very enjoyable programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente, together with the orchestra, under Sig. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will concluded with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of selections from the third and fifth acts of "Faust," given as concert music. The several roles will be sung by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Emil Fischer.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 180

The Nordica concert at Music Hall on Monday night promises to be one of the events of the season, as the company embraces, besides Mme. Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Italo Campinini, Guisseppe del Puente, and Emil Fischer, with a grand orchestra under the direction of Sig. Sapio. Mme. Nordica will sing the aria from "La Reine de Saba," Scalchi will sing the cavatina "Nobil Signor" from "The Huguenots," del Puente will sing the famous Toreador song, and the entire company will sing the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part will be the third act of "Faust," with Nordica as Marguerite, Scalchi as Siebel, Miss Campbell as Martha, Campanini as Faust, and Fischer as Mephistopheles. In this there will be introduced Mephistopheles' serenade from the fourth act and the trio and finale from the fifth act.

MUSIC HALL, Buffalo.
Saturday Evening, Jan. 21, 1893.

Nordica Grand Operatic Concert.

PROGRAMME. PART I.

1. PIANO SOLO. Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 6. . . . . Liszt
Mr. LUCKSTONE.

2. ARIA. ("The Jewess.") . . . . . Halévy
Mr. FISCHER.

3. CAVATINA. "Nobil Signor." ("Les Huguenots.") . . . . Meyerbeer
Mme. SCALCHI.

4. SONG. "Toreador," from "Carmen." . . . . . Bizet
Signor DEL PUENTE.

5. ARIA. "Ah! fors è lui." ("La Traviata.") . . . . . Verdi
Mme. NORDICA.

6. QUARTETTE. ("Rigoletto.") . . . . . Verdi
Mme. NORDICA, Mme. SCALCHI, Sig. CAMPANINI, Sig. DEL PUENTE.

7. SONG. "The Wanderer." . . . . . Schubert
Mr. FISCHER.

8. HABANERA. ("Carmen.") . . . . . Bizet
Mme. SCALCHI.

PROGRAMME. PART II.

Mascagni's beautiful opera . . . .

CAVALLERIA RUSTICANA

. . . . In concert form and sung in Italian

CAST.

SANTUZZA	Mme. Lillian Nordica	TURRIDU	Sig. Campanini
LOLA	Miss Helen D. Campbell	ALFIO	Sig. Del Puente

PLOT OF THE OPERA.

TURIDDU, a young villager, is the son of LUCIA and the lover of LOLA (who is the wife of ALFIO, having married the latter during TURIDDU's prolonged absence in military service). TURIDDU wins the affections of SANTUZZA, whom he wrongs; while in the mean time he is in love with LOLA. On Easter morning (the opening of the opera) ALFIO is incidentally informed by SANTUZZA of his wife's unfaithful actions. He challenges TURRIDU (biting the ear, as was the rustic Sicilian custom). TURRIDU, though regretting his past evil course, accepts the challenge and is killed by ALFIO.

PRELUDE AND SICILLIENNE . . . . . Turiddu
SCENE AND ROMANCE . . . . . Santuzza
DUET . . . . . Santuzza and Turridu
LOLA'S DITTY AND SCENA . . . . . Santuzza, Lola, and Turiddu
CONTINUATION OF DUET . . . . . Santuzza and Turiddu
DUET . . . . . Santuzza and Alfio
INTERMEZZO (as an Ave Maria) . . . . . Santuzza
FINALE.

Mme. SOFIA SCALCHI.

MME. SOFIA SCALCHI is, without doubt, the greatest Contralto of our times. During the season, while singing with the diva, Patti, she fairly divided the honors and attention with that prima donna. Mme. Scalchi is the embodiment of grace and artistic finish. Her singing and acting are at once the wonder and admiration of all the critics and the public.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its third concert at Chickering Hall to-morrow evening. The program is as follows: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; concerto for piano in G minor No. 1, Mendelssohn; two movements from "La Damnation de Faust." Berlioz; two movements from the concerto for violin No. 1, Bruch, and overture, "Leonore No. 3," Beethoven. Eugenia Castellano and Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloists.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis' new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente with the orchestra under Sig. Sapio will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme which will end with the sextette and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounoud's "Faust" sung in Italian as concert music.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Signor Del Puente, with the orchestra under Signor Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Mme. Nordica; Siebel, Mme. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Campbell; Faust, Signor Campanini; Mephisto, Herr Fischer. The trio and finale of the fifth act will end the programme.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1893.

The Nordica operatic concert Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a brilliant programme. Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Scalchi and Del Puente, with the orchestra under Mr. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Nordica; Siebel, Scalchi; Martha, Campbell; Faust, Campanini; Mepnisto, Fischer. The trio and finale of the last act will end the programme.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JAN. 14, 1893.

The concert announced for the introduction of the Nordica grand operatic organization at Music Hall next Monday evening will present the artists engaged by Manager Ellis in a very enjoyable programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente, together with the orchestra, under Sig. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will concluded with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of selections from the third and fifth acts of "Faust," given as concert music. The several roles will be sung by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Emil Fischer.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 180

The Nordica concert at Music Hall on Monday night promises to be one of the events of the season, as the company embraces, besides Mme. Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Italo Campinini, Guisseppe del Puente, and Emil Fischer, with a grand orchestra under the direction of Sig. Sapio. Mme. Nordica will sing the aria from "La Reine de Saba," Scalchi will sing the cavatina "Nobil Signor" from "The Huguenots," del Puente will sing the famous Toreador song, and the entire company will sing the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part will be the third act of "Faust," with Nordica as Marguerite, Scalchi as Siebel, Miss Campbell as Martha, Campanini as Faust, and Fischer as Mephistopheles. In this there will be introduced Mephistopheles' serenade from the fourth act and the trio and finale from the fifth act.

The
NEW YOR
The ninth first appearan pianist. It w second concer other Miss Ca played three
(op. posth);
Étude de Con was difficult to man; it was a pronounce any pianist.
She did not it as though a same time she strong tempere woman; for s pected, almost have palpitated
That she owne at once apparer study by Mart bravura; yet terity. The musical equip and in respons iant piece of t
by Van Weste
Again there who had alrea phony concer recital by a the ancient sty pianist will so orate or rathe portunity for j
be little or n
anism.
The orchest d'Ys;" "Wal sohn's fourth was in the m movements of allegro was ta con moto was
Mr. Schnitz will make his
(No. 4) concert

Miss Helen Dudley Campbell is one of America's best Alto singers, who made a distinct success with the American Opera Company.

Miss HELEN DUDLEY CAMPBELL.

Signor Italo Campanini is the greatest Tenor and the favorite of the public of this country. His splendid work and the finish which he gives to every phase of his art, has stamped him as an artist whose name will always be connected with the great musical achievements of this country.

ITALO CAMPANINI.

Emil Fischer is the wonderful Basso who made the greatest hit of all the famous artists engaged for the opera at the Metropolitan Opera House during the season of 1890–91. Mr. Fischer is renowned as one of the most reliable artists on the operatic stage. His great experience, profound and musician like qualities as a singer, have gained for him a reputation as the best artist in his line who has ever appeared in America.

EMIL FISCHER.

Signor DEL PUENTE. The most experienced and accomplished Baritone in America, whose success has been heralded all over the world, and whose name stands foremost as one of the great artists of the present time.

SIG. DEL PUENTE.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its third concert at Chickering Hall to-morrow evening. The program is as follows: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; concerto for piano in G minor No. 1, Mendelssohn; two movements from "La Damnation de Faust," Berlioz; two movements from the concerto for violin No. 1, Bruch, and overture, "Leonore No. 3," Beethoven. Eugenia Castellano and Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloists.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis' new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente with the orchestra under Sig. Sapio will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme which will end with the sextette and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounoud's "Faust" sung in Italian as concert music.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Signor Del Puente, with the orchestra under Signor Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Mme. Nordica; Siebel, Mme. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Campbell; Faust, Signor Campanini; Mephisto, Herr Fischer. The trio and finale of the fifth act will end the programme.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1893.

The Nordica operatic concert Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a brilliant programme. Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Scalchi and Del Puente, with the orchestra under Mr. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's, "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Nordica; Siebel, Scalchi; Martha, Campbell; Faust, Campanini; Mephisto, Fischer. The trio and finale of the last act will end the programme.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JAN. 14, 1893.

The concert announced for the introduction of the Nordica grand operatic organization at Music Hall next Monday evening will present the artists engaged by Manager Ellis in a very enjoyable programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente, together with the orchestra, under Sig. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will concluded with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of selections from the third and fifth acts of "Faust," given as concert music. The several roles will be sung by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Emil Fischer.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 189

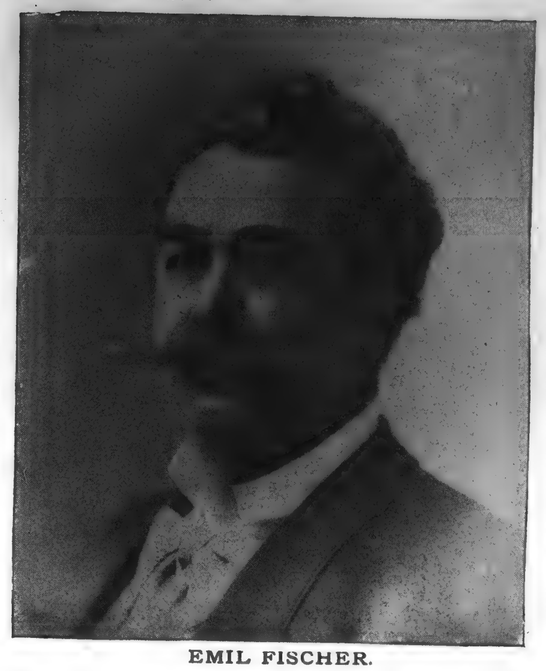
The Nordica concert at Music Hall on Monday night promises to be one of the events of the season, as the company embraces, besides Mme. Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Italo Campinini, Guisseppe del Puente, and Emil Fischer, with a grand orchestra under the direction of Sig. Sapio. Mme. Nordica will sing the aria from "La Reine de Saba," Scalchi will sing the cavatina "Nobil Signor" from "The Huguenots," del Puente will sing the famous Toreador song, and the entire company will sing the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part will be the third act of "Faust," with Nordica as Marguerite, Scalchi as Siebel, Miss Campbell as Martha, Campanini as Faust, and Fischer as Mephistopheles. In this there will be introduced Mephistopheles' serenade from the fourth act and the trio and finale from the fifth act.

Miss HELEN DUDLEY CAMPBELL.

Miss Helen Dudley Campbell is one of America's best Alto singers, who made a distinct success with the American Opera Company.

ITALO CAMPANINI.

Signor Italo Campanini is the greatest Tenor and the favorite of the public of this country. His splendid work and the finish which he gives to every phase of his art, has stamped him as an artist whose name will always be connected with the great musical achievements of this country.



EMIL FISCHER.

Emil Fischer is the wonderful Basso who made the greatest hit of all the famous artists engaged for the opera at the Metropolitan Opera House during the season of 1890–91. Mr. Fischer is renowned as one of the most reliable artists on the operatic stage. His great experience, profound and musician like qualities as a singer, have gained for him a reputation as the best artist in his line who has ever appeared in America.

SIG. DEL PUENTE.

Signor DEL PUENTE. The most experienced and accomplished Baritone in America, whose success has been heralded all over the world, and whose name stands foremost as one of the great artists of the present time.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its third concert at Chickering Hall to-morrow evening. The program is as follows: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; concerto for piano in G minor No. 1, Mendelssohn; two movements from "La Damnation de Faust," Berlioz; two movements from the concerto for violin No. 1, Bruch, and overture, "Leonore No. 3," Beethoven. Eugenia Castellano and Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloists.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis' new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente with the orchestra under Sig. Sapio will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme which will end with the sextette and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounoud's "Faust" sung in Italian as concert music.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Signor Del Puente, with the orchestra under Signor Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Mme. Nordica; Siebel, Mme. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Campbell; Faust, Signor Campanini; Mephisto, Herr Fischer. The trio and finale of the fifth act will end the programme.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1893.

The Nordica operatic concert Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a brilliant programme. Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Scalchi and Del Puente, with the orchestra under Mr. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Nordica; Siebel, Scalchi; Martha, Campbell; Faust, Campanini; Mephisto, Fischer. The trio and finale of the last act will end the programme.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JAN. 14, 1893.

The concert announced for the introduction of the Nordica grand operatic organization at Music Hall next Monday evening will present the artists engaged by Manager Ellis in a very enjoyable programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente, together with the orchestra, under Sig. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will conclude with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of selections from the third and fifth acts of "Faust," given as concert music. The several roles will be sung by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Fischer.

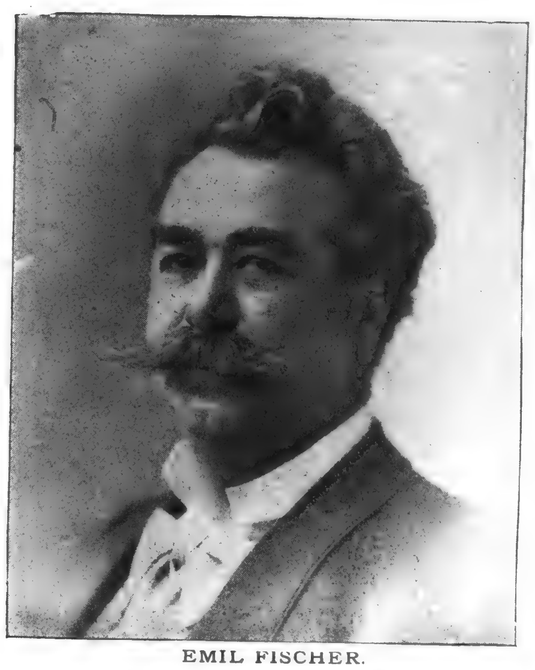
BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 189

The Nordica concert at Music Hall on Monday night promises to be one of the events of the season, as the company embraces, besides Mme. Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Italo Campinini, Guisseppe del Puente, and Emil Fischer, with a grand orchestra under the direction of Sig. Sapio. Mme. Nordica will sing the aria from "La Reine de Saba," Scalchi will sing the cavatina "Nobil Signor" from "The Huguenots," del Puente will sing the famous Toreador song, and the entire company will sing the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part will be the third act of "Faust," with Nordica as Marguerite, Scalchi as Siebel, Miss Campbell as Martha, Campanini as Faust, and Fischer as Mephistopheles. In this there will be introduced Mephistopheles' serenade from the fourth act and the trio and finale from the fifth act.

Miss HELEN DUDLEY CAMPBELL.

Miss Helen Dudley Campbell is one of America's best Alto singers, who made a distinct success with the American Opera Company.



EMIL FISCHER.

Emil Fischer is the wonderful Basso who made the greatest hit of all the famous artists engaged for the opera at the Metropolitan Opera House during the season of 1890–91. Mr. Fischer is renowned as one of the most reliable artists on the operatic stage. His great experience, profound and musician like qualities as a singer, have gained for him a reputation as the best artist in his line who has ever appeared in America.

ITALO CAMPANINI.

Signor Italo Campanini is the greatest Tenor and the favorite of the public of this country. His splendid work and the finish which he gives to every phase of his art, has stamped him as an artist whose name will always be connected with the great musical achievements of this country.

SIG. DEL PUENTE.

Signor DEL PUENTE. The most experienced and accomplished Baritone in America, whose success has been heralded all over the world, and whose name stands foremost as one of the great artists of the present time.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give its third concert at Chickering Hall to-morrow evening. The program is as follows: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; concerto for piano in G minor No. 1, Mendelssohn; two movements from "La Damnation de Faust," Berlioz; two movements from the concerto for violin No. 1, Bruch, and overture, "Leonore No. 3," Beethoven. Eugenia Castellano and Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloists.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis' new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente with the orchestra under Sig. Sapio will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme which will end with the sextette and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounoud's "Faust" sung in Italian as concert music.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert on Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a remarkably brilliant programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Signor Del Puente, with the orchestra under Signor Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Mme. Nordica; Siebel, Mme. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Campbell; Faust, Signor Campanini; Mephisto, Herr Fischer. The trio and finale of the fifth act will end the programme.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1893.

The Nordica operatic concert Monday evening at Music Hall will introduce Manager Ellis's new organization in a brilliant programme. Mrs. Nordica, Mrs. Scalchi and Del Puente, with the orchestra under Mr. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will end with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of the third act of Gounod's "Faust," sung in Italian as concert music, the music of the several roles being assigned as follows: Marguerite, Nordica; Siebel, Scalchi; Martha, Campbell; Faust, Campanini; Mephisto, Fischer. The trio and finale of the last act will end the programme.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JAN. 14, 1893.

The concert announced for the introduction of the Nordica grand operatic organization at Music Hall next Monday evening will present the artists engaged by Manager Ellis in a very enjoyable programme. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi and Sig. Del Puente, together with the orchestra, under Sig. Sapio, will take part in the preliminary miscellaneous programme, which will concluded with the sextet from "Lucia." The second part of the programme will consist of selections from the third and fifth acts of "Faust," given as concert music. The several roles will be sung by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Emil Fischer.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 180

The Nordica concert at Music Hall on Monday night promises to be one of the events of the season, as the company embraces, besides Mme. Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Italo Campinini, Guisseppe del Puente, and Emil Fischer, with a grand orchestra under the direction of Sig. Sapio. Mme. Nordica will sing the aria from "La Reine de Saba," Scalchi will sing the cavatina "Nobil Signor" from "The Huguenots," del Puente will sing the famous Toreador song, and the entire company will sing the sextet and finale from "Lucia." The second part will be the third act of "Faust," with Nordica as Marguerite, Scalchi as Siebel, Miss Campbell as Martha, Campanini as Faust, and Fischer as Mephistopheles. In this there will be introduced Mephistopheles' serenade from the fourth act and the trio and finale from the fifth act.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

12th SEASON, 1892-93.

January Itinerary.

Leave Boston Monday, January 9, at 1 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive New Haven, at 5.30, P.M.
—NEW HAVEN HOUSE.—
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P.M.
Leave New Haven after the concert. Sleeping cars ready at depot at 10 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Union Depot Pennsylvania R. R. Tuesday, January 10, at 9.37 A.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 8.50 A.M. Wednesday, January 11.
Arrive Philadelphia, 11.10 A.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, January 12, 8.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 10.55 A.M.
—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, January 13, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, January 14, at 8.15 P.M.
Leave New York Saturday, January 14, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, January 15, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, January 7, 1893.

HYPERION THEATRE, . . . NEW HAVEN,
Monday Evening, January 9, at 8.

ONLY GRAND CONCERT
BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, 75c., $1.00, and $1.50. On sale at the Hyperion Theatre on and after Monday, Jan. 2, 1893.

SCHOMACKER

The recognized Standard Piano of the World.

ESTABLISHED 1838.

SOLD TO EVERY PART OF THE GLOBE.
PREFERRED BY ALL THE LEADING ARTISTS

The Gold Strings

Emit a purer sympathetic tone, proof against atmospheric action, extraordinary power and durability, with great beauty and evenness of touch. Pre-eminently the best and most highly improved instrument now manufactured in this or any other country in the world.

HIGHEST HONORS EVER ACCORDED TO ANY MAKER
UNANIMOUS VERDICT.
1851 • • Jury Group, International Exposition • • 1876
. . FOR . .
GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOS.

Illustrated Catalogue mailed on application.

SCHOMACKER PIANOFORTE MFG. CO.,

WAREROOMS . . . . . { 1109 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.
12 East 16th Street, New York.
145 and 147 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

CHICKERING HALL, ... NEW YORK.
Thursday Evening, January 12, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

3

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Boston
Symphony Orchestra.

12th SEASON, 1892-93.

January Itinerary.

Leave Boston Monday, January 9, at 1 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive New Haven, at 5.30, P.M.
—NEW HAVEN HOUSE.—
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8 P.M.
Leave New Haven after the concert. Sleeping cars ready at depot at 10 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore, Union Depot Pennsylvania R. R. Tuesday, January 10, at 9.37 A.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 8.50 A.M. Wednesday, January 11.
Arrive Philadelphia, 11.10 A.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, January 12, 8.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 10.55 A.M.
—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, January 13, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, January 14, at 8.15 P.M
Leave New York Saturday, January 14, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, January 15, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, January 7, 1893.

SCHOMACKER

The recognized Standard Piano of the World.

ESTABLISHED 1838.

SOLD TO EVERY PART OF THE GLOBE.
PREFERRED BY ALL THE LEADING ARTISTS

The Gold Strings

Emit a purer sympathetic tone, proof against atmospheric action, extraordinary power and durability, with great beauty and evenness of touch. Pre-eminently the best and most highly improved instrument now manufactured in this or any other country in the world.

HIGHEST HONORS EVER ACCORDED TO ANY MAKER
UNANIMOUS VERDICT.
1851 • • Jury Group, International Exposition • • 1876
. . FOR . .
GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANOS.

Illustrated Catalogue mailed on application.

SCHOMACKER PIANOFORTE MFG. CO.,

WAREROOMS . . . . . { 1109 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.
12 East 16th Street, New York.
145 and 147 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

HYPERION THEATRE, ... NEW HAVEN,
Monday Evening, January 9, at 8.

ONLY GRAND CONCERT
BY THE

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, 75c., $1.00, and $1.50. On sale at the Hyperion Theatre on and after Monday, Jan. 2, 1893.

CHICKERING HALL, ... NEW YORK.
Thursday Evening, January 12, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

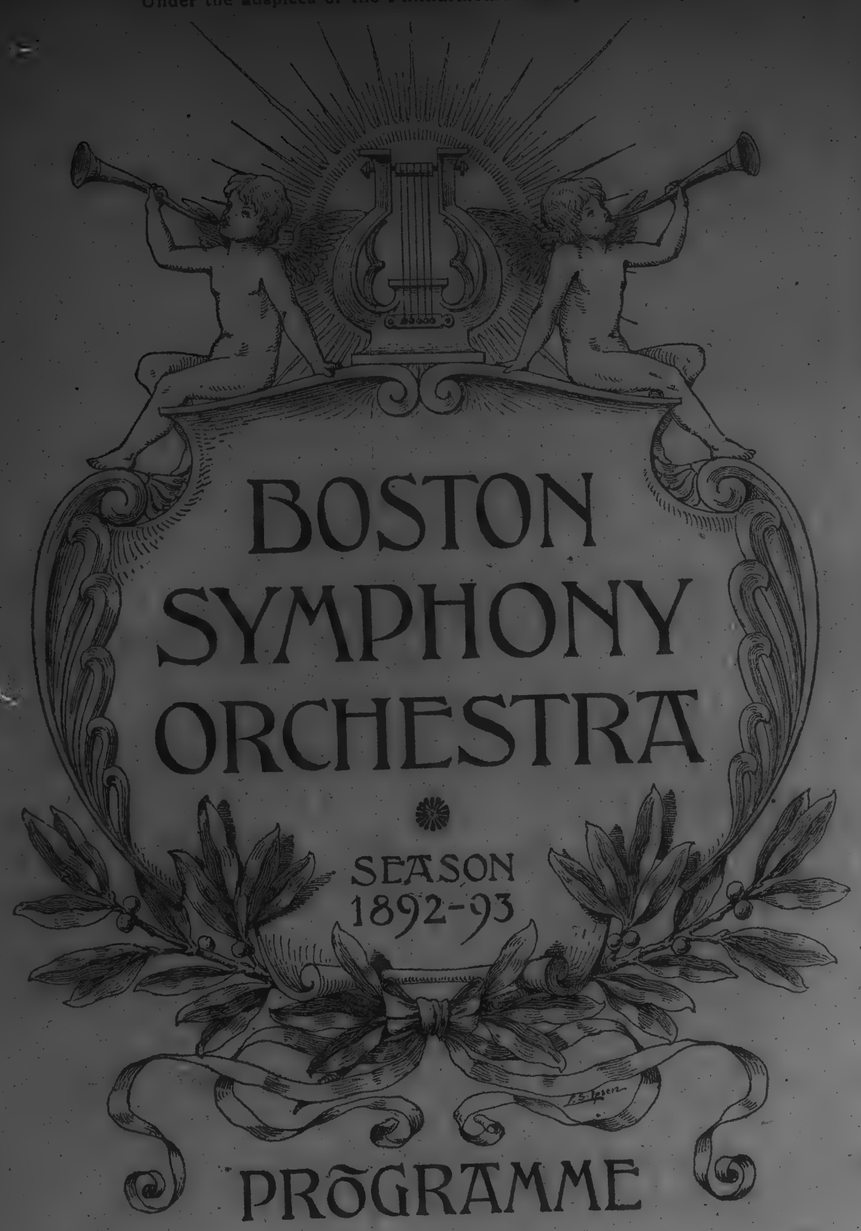
[81]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Jan. 13, at 3. Saturday Evening, Jan. 14, at 8.15

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

CHICKERING HALL, - - - NEW YORK.

THE

Kneisel Quartet

OF BOSTON.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

AND MR. ARTHUR FOOTE.

SECOND CONCERT

Saturday Afternoon, Jan. 14, at 3.

PROGRAMME

Schumann . . . QUARTET IN A MINOR, OP. 41, NO. 1
Introduzione, Andante espressivo — Allegro — Scherzo, Presto — Adagio.

Arthur Foote . . . PIANO QUARTET IN C MAJOR, OP. 23
Allegro comodo — Adagio ma non troppo — Scherzo; Vivace — Allegro non troppo.
(Piano part by the Composer.)

Schubert . . . . . QUARTET IN D MINOR
Allegro — Andante con moto — Allegro molto — Presto.

Tickets at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, and at Chickering Hall.

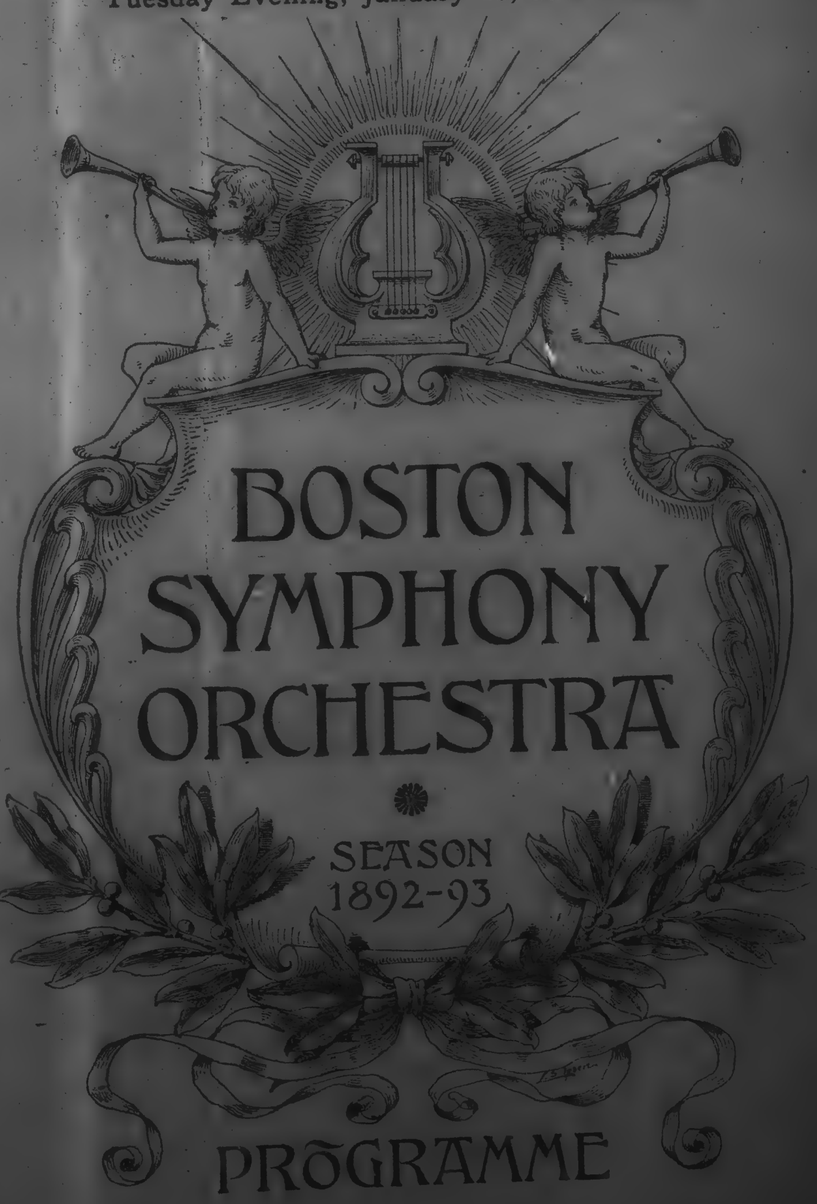
PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 13, 1893

60 FIFTH AVENUE

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,

Tuesday Evening, January 10, at 8 o'clock.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

[82]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Jan. 13, at 3. Saturday Evening, Jan. 14, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

PROGRAMME

Friday, January 13, 1893

60 Fifth Avenue

[82]

CHICKERING HALL, - - - NEW YORK.

THE

Kneisel Quartet

OF BOSTON.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

AND MR. ARTHUR FOOTE.

SECOND CONCERT

Saturday Afternoon, Jan. 14, at 3.

• • PROGRAMME • •

Schumann . . . Quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1

Introduzione, Andante espressivo — Allegro — Scherzo, Presto — Adagio.

Arthur Foote . . . Piano Quartet in C major, Op. 23

Allegro comodo — Adagio ma non troppo — Scherzo; Vivace — Allegro non troppo.

(Piano part by the Composer.)

Schubert . . . . . Quartet in D minor

Allegro — Andante con moto — Allegro molto — Presto.

Tickets at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, and at Chickering Hall.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,

Tuesday Evening, January 10, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN.

Friday Afternoon, Jan. 13, at 3. Saturday Evening, Jan. 14, at 8:15

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

Mr. NIKISCH

AND

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

: PROGRAMME :

I. Wagner . . . . . MARCH, "Tannhäuser"

II. Bizet . . . . . SUITE "L'Arlésienne," No. 1

I. Prelude.
II. Minuetto.
III. Adagietto.
IV. Carillon.

III. SOLI FOR PIANOFORTE.

a DeBeriot . . . . . ETUDE-CAPRICE
b Van Westerhout . . . . . GAVOTTE
c Martucci . . . . . ETUDE DE CONCERT

SIGNORINA EUGENIA CASTELLANO

IV. Gounod . . . . . HYMN TO ST. CECILIA

(Violin Solo, Mr FRANZ KNEISEL)

V. Tschaikowsky . THIRD MOVEMENT (Scherzo: Pizzicato ostinato), from Symphony No. 4

VI. Gillet . . . . . LOIN DU BAL

VII. Ambroise Thomas . . . OVERTURE, "Mignon"

[82]

CHICKERING [illegible]

Knei[illegible]

FRANZ KNEISEL, [illegible]
1st
OTTO ROTH,
2d Violin
AND M[illegible]

S[illegible]

Saturday A[illegible]

Schumann . . .
Intr
Alle

Arthur Foote . . .
Alle
trop non
(

Schubert . . . .
Alle
Alle

Tickets at Schuberth's

METZEROTT MUSIC HA[illegible]
Tuesday Evening,

BOS
SYMP
ORCH

SE 18

PRÖG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

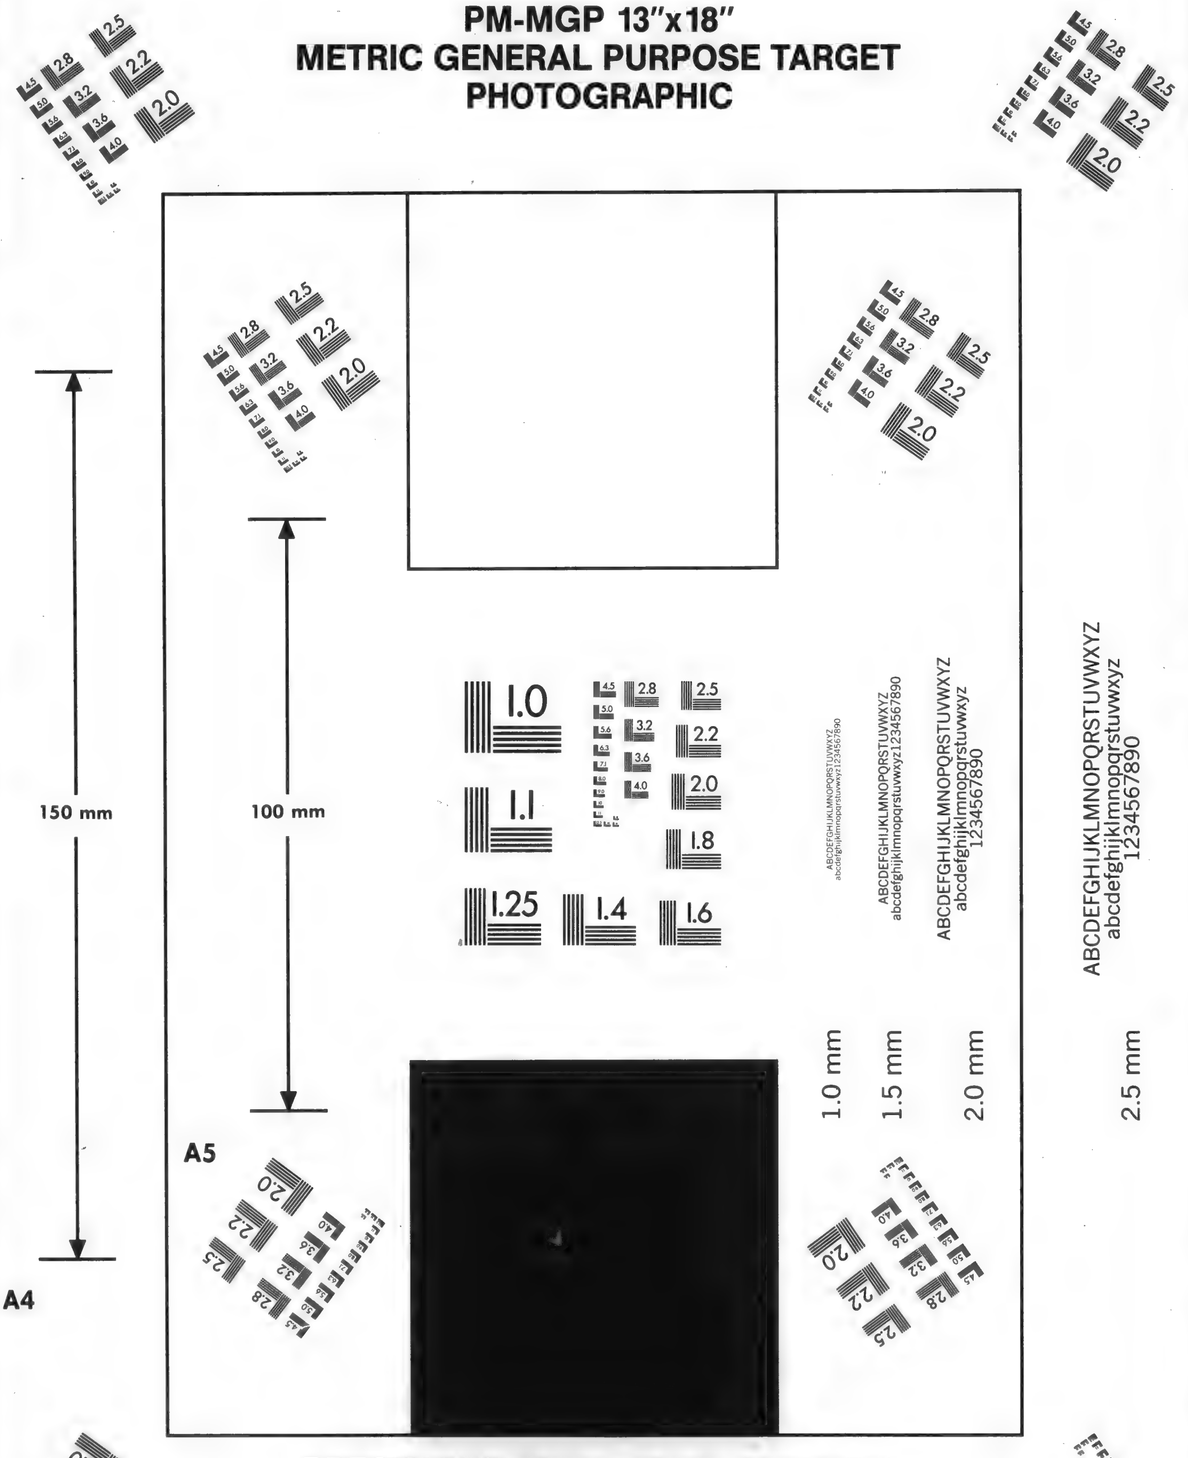
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Boston Journal.
MONDAY, JANUARY 16, 1893.

NORDICA.

She Tells the Story of Her Artistic Life.

The Illustrious Career of a Quondam Choir Singer.

The Roamings and Adventures of Lilian B. Norton.

It is possible that the theory of Emile Hennequin is true, and that neither birthplace nor land of adoption gives individuality to artistic work; but it certainly seems as though the Maine girl is fortunate in her birth State. Her sister of a sister State may be as highly endowed, she may work as zealously and be as deserving of success; and yet the girl from Maine seems born with one great characteristic that is not defined easily by single word or courteous phrase; the proper expression must be borrowed from the great dictionary of slang, and slang is language in the making. The characteristic, then, of the Maine girl is the faculty of "getting there."

⁂

The Journal reporter was therefore not surprised when Madame Nordica told him Saturday afternoon in her parlor at the Brunswick that she was born in Maine. The town is Farmington, well known, the home of "Little Blue" School. "Yes, I was born in Farmington, and when I was a little baby I was brought to Boston, which was my home until I went to Europe in 1878."

⁂

Here is a picture of Madame Nordica.

was about this time that I married, and I did not sing again in opera until 1887 in London.

⁂

"In '87 I was at Covent Garden, engaged by Col. Mapleson. I sang in 'Traviata,' 'Rigoletto' and 'Faust'. Soon afterward I engaged with Augustus Harris, and I appeared in heavier parts, in 'Aida,' 'Les Huguenots,' 'L'Africaine.' I have sung steadily ever since. I began to study the music of Wagner, and, I may as well tell you that I am very fond of it. I sang in 'Lohengrin.' Hans Richter has helped me, and it was at one of his concerts that I took the part of Brunhilde in the finale of 'Die Goetterdaemmerung.' Here is the flattering opinion of my performance written by Richter himself in the programme book. I am proud of it." And yet the singer spoke with the modesty of the true artist, even when she showed the Journal reporter the glowing tribute paid her by Fuller-Maitland of the London Times.

⁂

The widow of Wagner invited Madame Nordica to take the part of Elizabeth in "Tannhaeuser" at the last Bayreuth festival, but the singer was tired out and needed rest. When she was in Paris last summer Madame Nordica saw much of Gounod, and studied with him the great aria from the "Reine de Saba," which she sings to-night. "Gounod is growing feeble," said Madame Nordica, "but his enthusiasm for Mozart is not quenched, and we spent hours in singing the music of that master.

⁂

"I go, under the management of Mr. Ellis, as far west as San Francisco. I shall go back to London in time for the operatic season. I have been asked to sing in Mascagni's 'Rantzu' in London, and I am to create the soprano part in a new cantata by Dr. Mackenzie; this cantata will be afterwards given at Chicago, I believe. I am engaged for the next Worcester festival, and I understand that Gade's 'Psyche' will be then sung. In October I expect to sing in Chicago in opera, as a member of the Abbey, Schoeffel and Grau Company.

⁂

"I call London my home, and my name in private as well as on the stage is Madame Nordica, the name given me by San Giovanni. I live at 11 Clarence terrace, Regent's Park, and I am very happy with my black poodle, Turk, and my terrier Taffy. Yes, I have canary birds, and I have the dearest English thrush that sings until midnight."

⁂

The neighbors of Madame Nordica are known to the world. There is George R. Sims, the dramatist, and the poet who first and unconsciously brought fame to Mrs. James Brown Potter. There is Henri Rochefort, the journalist and

LILLIAN NORDICA.

But it does her injustice. Neither cold photograph nor colder cut can reproduce beauty that challenges the colors of the cunning painter. And even he would despair of preserving the changing fascinations of a mobile face. The one photograph liked by the original libels her sumptuous figure with its flowing lines that dainty stuffs caress. Suppleness is turned by photographic art into cardboard rigidity.

⁂

Madame Nordica wore an exquisite tea gown. It was evidently of Parisian invention, and a fantasy of Worth; a cream brocade of violet pattern. The throat of the singer was encircled tenderly by a collar of point lace, which once adorned a golden-haired Venetian of tragic memory. And now let the singer speak, nearly in her own words. The music of the voice that lent a charm to the recital of prosaic detail must be imagined by the reader.

⁂

"When I was old enough to take singing lessons I studied with Mr. John O'Neill. It is true that I went into the New England Conservatory, but my lessons with Mr. O'Neill were mostly private lessons. He laid the foundations; he 'placed' my voice; he taught me in oratorio, and I owe him much. It was in '75 or '76 that I had my first church position; it was in Grace Church, Temple street. Mr. Benson was the organist. There was a chorus choir of 100, and we used to sing extracts from masses, the 'Inflammatus' from Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' etc. In 1877 I was the soprano at Dr. Putnam's church in Roxbury, now Mr. De Normandie's. The organist was Charley Ford—he was an excellent musician, and such a delightful man—and Mrs. Flora Barry was the alto, Mr. Stickney the tenor—he is dead, I hear—and Mr. Babcock the bass. The people were all very kind to me. I did not read fluently then, and I remember they would send me the hymn tunes early in the week. I should not have so much trouble now.

⁂

"My first appearance in public in concert was in Bumstead Hall in 1876. It was a pupil's concert. I sang the entrance aria of Leonora in 'Il Trovatore.' Do you know that the Boston Journal then gave me the first notice of my performance? I sang in the Christmas Eve [illegible] and Mr. Weston said: 'Greatly.' The other singers were Rejoice Phillipps, William Winch and Myron Whitney.

⁂

"In 1878 I went with Gilmore's Band to Europe. I sang, for instance, at Paris in the Trocadero, which was hardly finished. I think I was the first to sing there. My selection was 'Vanne, Vanne,' from 'Roberto, il Diavolo.' I did not go with the band to Germany, for they played in the open, and, of course, I did not wish to thus expose myself. Ran legger came over to Paris from London and wanted to teach me oratorio. But I was crazy to sing in opera. I thought of nothing else, I dreamed of nothing else. I studied in Milan with San Giovanni, and it was he that fitted me for opera.

⁂

"You know how hard it is in Italy to get a hearing. I was lucky. Scovell, who is known as the Chevalier Scovello, took a little theatre in Brescia, managed it and sang tenor. There was no salary to speak of, but we all had a chance to sing. I made my debut in 'Traviata,' an opera that suits me well. Scovell was the tenor. If the critical in the audience had laughed or acted in the usual Italian manner when they do not care for a singer, Scovell could have closed the theatre, and there would then have been no opera. So they were polite, and contented themselves with reading newspapers, which they drew from their pockets when he began to sing.

⁂

"I then sang in 'Faust' at the fine opera [illegible] in Genoa, and in Novara I played Alice [illegible] berto.'

⁂

"I think it was in '80 that I went to St. Petersburg and sang in Italian. The company was excellent. Masini, Cotogni and Scalchi were chief singers. We all sang in concert at the Winter Palace the Sunday before the Czar was assassinated. He was always punctilious in his courtesy toward musicians, and he made it a point to find out the nationality of a singer or [illegible]. Of course the tragedy put an end to [illegible], and I sang in Dantsic and in Koenigsberg. I also sang at Kroll's in Berlin. Lassalle was the tenor.

⁂

"It was the 21st of July that I made my debut at the Paris Grand Opera in 'Faust.' The 25th [illegible] I first sang in 'Hamlet.' I have sung Ophelia to the Hamlet of Lasalle and [illegible]. The men are perhaps equally fine singers, but Laurel has the greater individuality. Hamlet is the finer creation. It duellist of the abnormal head, the bitter foe of Napoleon the Little. Rochefort, according to Madame Nordica, indulges himself in the singular habit of appearing every afternoon at 3 o'clock at the window of his drawing room in the scanty costume that is consecrated to the comfort of sleep. Near by dwells Archibald Forbes, the journalist.

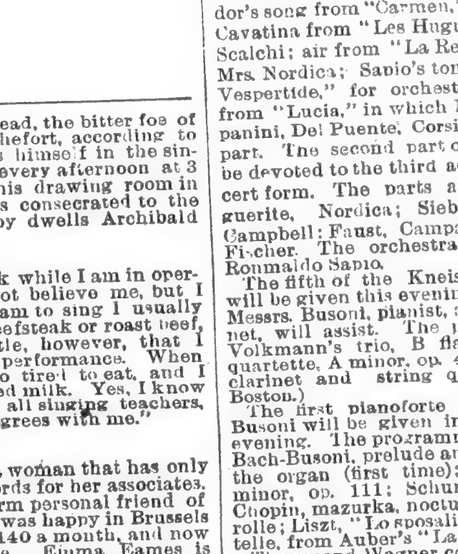
⁂

"What do I eat and drink while I am in operatic training? You may not believe me, but I am a light eater. When I am to sing I usually eat a plain dinner, with beefsteak or roast beef, at 5 o'clock. I eat so little, however, that I take beef tea during the performance. When the curtain falls I am too tired to eat, and I usually drink a glass of iced milk. Yes, I know I go against the advice of all singing teachers, but I find that iced milk agrees with me."

⁂

Mirabile dictu! Here is a woman that has only kind and appreciative words for her associates. Madame Nordica is a warm personal friend of Emma Calve, who in '81 was happy in Brussels when she received only $140 a month, and now she commands her price. Emma Eames is another of her intimate friends. Madame Nordica spoke in high terms of Oudin's merits. It seems that the real name of Geraldine Ulmer's husband is not Ivan Caryall, but Filkins. Of no one, however, did Madame Nordica speak in warmer terms than of Scalchi, the famous contralto, who is now associated with her and who sings to-night at Music Hall. Who does not know Scalchi?



SOFIA SCALCHI.

⁂

And yet these facts, concerning an artist that is admired throughout Europe and North and South America, may be of interest. Her husband is the Count Luigi Lolli, a member of an old and aristocratic family of Ferrara. Their home is a beautiful villa in Turin. They have one child, a boy of about 15 years. Sofia Scalchi made her debut at Bologna. Her most famous parts are Arsace in "Semiramide" and Orfeo in Gluck's opera of that name. She was trained for the latter part by Signor Augusto Rotoli, now of this city, and she was the godmother of Signor Rotoli's little son Romano, whose ill-timed death is still mourned by many. It is to be deplored that Madame Scalchi is not to be heard this season in either of the operatic parts that made her famous.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN. 15, 1893.

Nordica Opera Concert at Music Hall.

The appearance of the Nordica operatic concert company at Music Hall tomorrow evening will introduce an excellent combination of artists, who have been called together by Manager Charles A. Ellis for an extended tour throughout the country the present season. In the absence of organizations devoted to grand opera productions this season the company will devote a large part of each programme to scenes and acts from the repertoire of the grand opera stage, giving the principal numbers in concert form with full orchestral accompaniments.

The artists included in the Nordica company are Mme. Lillian Nordica, prima donna soprano; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, prima donna contralto; Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, mezzo-soprano; Italo Campanini, primo tenor; Giuseppe del Puente, primo barytone; Emil Fischer, basso, and Sig. R. Sapio, conductor.

The first part of tomorrow evening's programme, which will be of a miscellaneous character, is as follows:

Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Orchestra.
Toreador song, "Carmen".....Bizet
Mr. Del Puente.
Cavatina, "Nobil Signor." "Les Huguenots".....Meyerbeer
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria, "La Reine de Saba".....Gounod
Mme. Nordica.
Storm at vespertide, Tone Picture.....R. Sapio
Orchestra.
Sextette and finale, "Lucia di Lammermoor".....Donizetti
Mmes. Nordica, Scalchi, and MM. Campanini, Del Puente, Corsi and Fischer.

The second part will be made up of selections from the third and fifth acts of Gounod's "Faust," the several roles being sung as follows:

Marguerite.....Mme. Nordica
Siebel.....Mme. Scalchi
Martha.....Miss Campbell
Faust.....Mr. Campanini
Mephistopheles.....Mr. Fischer

The fifth concert in the Kneisel quartet series at Chickering Hall will be given on Monday night. The programme consists of Volkmann's trio in B-flat minor, Schumann's quartet, op. 41, No. 1, and Brahms quintet for clarinet and strings, new here. Mr. Busoni, pianoforte, and Mr. Goldschmidt, clarinet, will take part.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the fifth concert in the Sanders Theatre course next Thursday night. For the 12th concert in the Music Hall series, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," and Raff's symphony, "In the Forest," are announced, and Mr. Henri Marteau, a young Frenchman, will play a concerto for violin.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

The programme of the grand operatic concert of the Nordica company under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis in Music Hall this evening is as follows: Overture, "William Tell;" Toreador's song from "Carmen," sung by Del Puente; Cavatina from "Les Huguenots," sung by Mrs. Scalchi; air from "La Reine de Saba," sung by Mrs. Nordica; Sapio's tone-picture, "Storm at Vespertide," for orchestra, and the sextette from "Lucia," in which Nordica, Scalchi, Campanini, Del Puente, Corsi and Fischer will take part. The second part of the programme will be devoted to the third act of "Faust" in concert form. The parts are thus assigned: Marguerite, Nordica; Siebel, Scalchi; Martha, Campbell; Faust, Campanini; Mephistopheles, Fischer. The orchestra will be directed by Romualdo Sapio.

The fifth of the Kneisel Quartette concerts will be given this evening in Chickering Hall. Messrs. Busoni, pianist, and Goldschmidt, clarinet, will assist. The programme will include Volkmann's trio, B flat minor; Schumann's quartette, A minor, op. 41, No. 1, and Brahms's clarinet and string quintette (first time in Boston.)

The first pianoforte recital by Ferruccio Busoni will be given in Union Hall, Tuesday evening. The programme will be as follows: Bach-Busoni, prelude and fugue, D major, for the organ (first time); Beethoven, sonata, C minor, op. 111; Schumann, toccata, op. 7; Chopin, mazurka, nocturne, impromptu, barcarolle; Liszt, "Lo sposalizio," Gondoliera, Tarantelle, from Auber's "La Muette de Portici."

The second Wagner concert under the direction of Anton Seidl, with the co-operation of his Metropolitan Orchestra, will occur at the Boston Theatre Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 17. Selections from "Lohengrin," "Siegfried," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger," "Parsifal" and "Die Walkure" will be included in the programme. The soloists will be Emma Juch, Nina Rathbone, Fabris, Riegg, Dilthey, Metz, North-

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 15.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 15, 1893.

The Nordica Operatic Concert and the Wagner Matinee.

The Nordica operatic concert company will be introduced to the Boston public at Music Hall tomorrow evening by Manager Charles A. Ellis, in a list of vocal and instrumental selections well calculated to display the abilities of the several artists and give enjoyment to his patrons.

Although the organization, as such, is to make its first appearance here, the individual members of the company are all so well and favorably known to the music lovers of this vicinity that it is entirely safe to predict a very hearty and enthusiastic reception for all of the artists included in its make-up.

Mme. Nordica stands in the very front rank of the concert singers of the day, and in Boston, where she is claimed as a resident artist, her appearances are always anticipated with great interest. Few artists have had a more gratifying career of success on both sides the Atlantic than that which has been enjoyed by Mme. Nordica, and it is quite safe to predict a prosperous tour for the company organized for her support.

Manager Ellis has improved the opportunity given by the absence of grand opera organizations in this country the present season to plan his programmes so as to admit of a hearing, in concert form, of many scenes from the grand opera repertoire, and tomorrow evening his principal singers will be heard in many of the numbers of the third and fifth acts of Gounod's "Faust." The music of the several roles in these selections will be sung by the following artists: Marguerite, Mme. Nordica; Siebel, Mme. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Campbell; Faust, Mr. Campbell; Mephistopheles, Mr. Emil Fischer.

The first part of the programme will consist of the following miscellaneous selections:

Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Orchestra.
Toreador song, "Carmen".....Bizet
Mr. Del Puente.
Cavatina, "Nobil Signor," "Les Huguenots"..
Meyerbeer
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria, "La Reine de Saba".....Gounod
Mme. Nordica.
Storm at Vespertide, tone picture.....R. Sapio
Orchestra.
Sextette and finale, "Lucia di Lammermoor"..
Donizetti
Mmes. Nordica, Scalchi, and MM. Campanini, Del Puente, Corsi and Fischer.

An audience of vast proportions is already assured.

Tomorrow evening the Kneisel quartet, with the assistance of Mr. Busoni, pianist, and Mr. Goldschmidt, clarinet, will give its fifth concert at Chickering Hall. The programme will include Volkmann's trio for piano, violin and 'cello; Schumann's quartet in A minor, and Brahm's quintet for clarinet, the latter given for the first time in this city.

It is most gratifying to know that the Boston Symphony orchestra not only holds the advanced position it has gained on its tours to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, but steadily gains in favor with the lovers of good music in those cities. While in Washington last week a highly flattering invitation was extended by the committee having in charge the inauguration festivities to the orchestra to take an appropriate part in the day's exercises. In New York so many offers for additional concerts were received that it was impossible to accept the engagements. It is flattering to Boston supporters of this orchestra to know that Mr. Nikisch and his organization are engaged for a series of private concerts in New York at the residences of wealthy patrons, although the expense of the Boston band is about 50 per cent. over that of a resident New York organization of a similar character.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 15, 1893.

The Nordica Grand Operatic concert at Music hall tomorrow evening will introduce Manager Ellis's combination of artists in a most interesting programme. Mme. Nordica will sing the Aria from "La Rene de Saba," Mme. Schalchi the Cavatina from "The Huguenots," Sig. Del Puente the Torreador's song, and the first part of the programme will conclude with the Lucia Sextet. Selections from the third and fifth acts of Gounod's "Faust" will make the second part of the programme, the rôles being by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Fischer. The orchestra will also be heard in some notable selections. Complete programme in another column.

The last concert by the Adamowski quartette will take place in Chickering hall, Friday afternoon, Jan. 24.

The fifth concert by the Kneisel quartette will be given in Chickering hall tomorrow evening, with the following programme: Volkmann, trio in B flat minor; Schumann, quartette in A minor, op. 41, No. 1; Brahms, quintet for clarinet and strings (first time). They will be assisted by F. Busoni, pianist, and Mr. G. Goldschmidt, clarinet.

THE NORDICA CONCERT CO.

One of the leading musical events of the week will be the concert tomorrow night in Music hall by the Nordica Operatic Concert company, under the direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis.

The personnel of the company is remarkably strong, as follows: Mme. Lillian Nordica, prima donna soprano; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, prima donna contralto; Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, mezzo soprano; Italo Campanini, primo tenor; Giuseppe del Puente, primo bari tone; Emil Fischer, basso; and grand orchestra, Sig. R. Sapio, conductor.

Mr. Ellis has brought together a group of eminent vocal talent which it would be difficult to surpass. Mme. Nordica is a very great Boston favorite, and her triumphs all over the world are a part of musical history. Mme. Scalchi ranks as the greatest contralto of the present time, and holds a warm place in the hearts of the public everywhere. As a mezzo-soprano, Miss Campbell won fame with the American Opera company. Campanini, Fischer and Del Puente are familiar names, and pleasure is always assured when they appear upon the stage.

The programme arranged is one to display fully the abilities of the artists, as follows:

Overture. ("William Tell.")..... Rossini
Orchestra.
Toreador Song. ("Carmen")..... Bizet
Mr. Del Puente.
Cavatina. ("Nobil Signor.") ("Les Huguenot.")..... Meyerbeer
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria. ("La Reine de Saba")..... Gounod
Mme. Nordica.
Storm at Vespertide. (Tone Picture.)... R. Sapio
Orchestra.
Sextette and Finale. ("Lucia di Lammermoor.")..... Donizetti
Mmes. Nordica, Scalchi, and MM. Campanini, Del Puente, Corsi, and Fischer.

Third act of Gounod's "Faust" in Italian cast thus:

Marguerite..... Mme. Nordica
Siebel..... Mme. Scalchi
Martha..... Miss Campbell
Faust..... Mr. Campanini
Mephistopheles..... Mr. Fischer.

The ifollowing numbers will ibe given: Introduction and song, "Le parlate d' amor," Siebel; scena and recitative, "Cosi par," Faust and Mephisto; cavatina, "Salve dimora casta e pura," Faust; scena and air, "O' era un ré di Thulé," Marguerite; Air de Bijou, Marguerite; serenade (introduced from 4th act), Mephisto; Quando a te liela, Siebel; scena and quartette, Marguerite, Martha, Faust and Mephisto; Duet, Faust,—"Ah! ti scongiuro in van," Marguerite, —"O silenzio! O mister!" and trio finale, (5th act.), Marguerite, Faust and Mephisto.

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

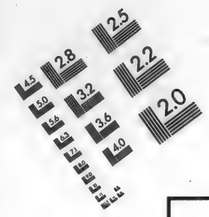
2.0 mm

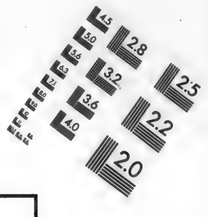
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

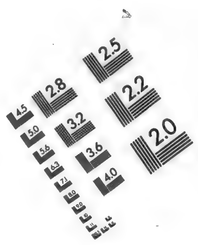
1.5 mm

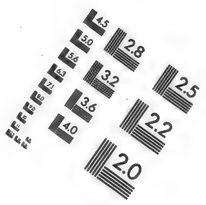
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



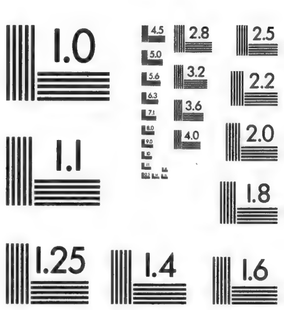






150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

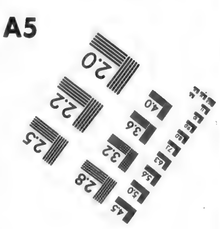
2.0 mm

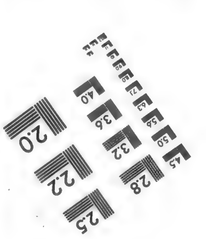
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

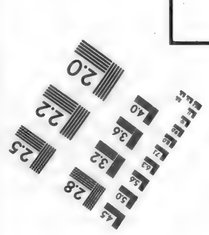
2.5 mm

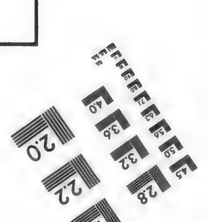
A5

A4









PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 16, 1893.

Mme. Lillian Nordica, Boston's brilliant prima donna; Mme. Scalchi, the famous contralto; Miss Campbell, I. Campanini, G. Del Puente, Emil Fischer, and a large orchestra under the direction of Sig. Sapio, comprise the company of artists who are to appear at Music Hall this evening in a grand operatic concert. The programme is one to delight the lovers of the melodies of Italian opera, and at the hands of these artists a splendid programme is assured. The concert will be listened to by a great audience.

For Symphony Orchestra's twelfth concert in the Music Hall series, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," and Raff's symphony, "In the Forest," are announced, and Henri Marteau, a young Frenchman, will play a concerto for violin.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 16.

MONDAY, JANUARY 16, 1893.

MME. SCALCHI ARRIVES.
[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Jan. 15, 1893. Manager Charles A. Ellis of Boston was made happy this afternoon by the message delivered him announcing that the steamer La Champagne had been sighted below.

For a few days the Boston manager has been a trifle uncertain as to just where Mme. Scalchi was, and as she is billed to appear with the Nordica operatic concert company in Boston tomorrow evening, his uncertainty was gradually assuming the condition of anxiety.

A cable received on Saturday notified him that Mme. Scalchi was on board La Champagne, and so he came over to meet the singer.

He will accompany her to Boston immediately upon the arrival of the steamer at her dock.

Boston Courier.

~~FOR SALE AND FOR RENT~~

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 15, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert at Music Hall tomorrow evening will introduce Manager Ellis's combination of artists in a most interesting programme. Mme. Nordica will sing the aria from "La Reine de Saba," Mme. Scalchi the Cavatina from "The Huguenots," Sig. Del Puente the Torreador's Song and the first part of the programme will conclude with the Lucia Sextet. Selections from the third and fifth acts of Gounod's "Faust" will make the second part of the programme, the roles being by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Fischer. The orchestra will also be heard in some notable selections. All the soloists stand foremost in the artistic world and together form a combination which for strength, finish and true merit cannot be surpassed.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 16, 1893.

Madame Lillian Nordica will renew her acquaintance with the Boston public this evening, appearing at the head of her newly organized company in a grand operatic concert. The organization is one of the strongest that has been heard here in a long time.

The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartette, assisted by Mr. F. Busoni and Mr. Goldschmidt, takes place at Chickering Hall this evening at 8.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MENDELSSOHN.	OVERTURE. "Midsummernight's Dream."
WEBER.	CONCERTSTÜCK for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA in F minor.
MENDELSSOHN.	a) SCHERZO. b) NOTTURNO. } from "Midsummernight's Dream."
	SOLI for PIANOFORTE.
a) CHOPIN.	NOCTURNE.
b) CHOPIN.	SCHERZO in B flat minor.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major, op. 61.

I. Sostenuto assai. C major.
Allegro ma non troppo. C major.
II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace. C major.
Trio I: The same tempo. G major,
Trio II: The same tempo. C major.
III. Adagio espressivo. C minor.
IV. Allegro molto vivace. C major.

SOLOIST:

MISS MINNIE WETZLER.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

HENRI MARTEAU

[84]

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 16, 1893.

Mme. Lillian Nordica, Boston's brilliant prima donna; Mme. Scalchi, the famous contralto; Miss Campbell, I. Campanini, G. Del Puente, Emil Fischer, and a large orchestra under the direction of Sig. Sapio, comprise the company of artists who are to appear at Music Hall this evening in a grand operatic concert. The programme is one to delight the lovers of the melodies of Italian opera, and at the hands of these artists a splendid programme is assured. The concert will be listened to by a great audience.

For Symphony Orchestra's twelfth concert in the Music Hall series, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," and Raff's symphony, "In the Forest," are announced, and Henri Marteau, a young Frenchman, will play a concerto for violin.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 16.

MONDAY, JANUARY 16, 1893.

MME. SCALCHI ARRIVES.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Jan. 15, 1893. Manager Charles A. Ellis of Boston was made happy this afternoon by the message delivered him announcing that the steamer La Champagne had been sighted below.

For a few days the Boston manager has been a trifle uncertain as to just where Mme. Scalchi was, and as she is billed to appear with the Nordica operatic concert company in Boston tomorrow evening, his uncertainty was gradually assuming the condition of anxiety.

A cable received on Saturday notified him that Mme. Scalchi was on board La Champagne, and so he came over to meet the singer.

He will accompany her to Boston immediately upon the arrival of the steamer at her dock.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 15, 1893.

The Nordica grand operatic concert at Music Hall tomorrow evening will introduce Manager Ellis's combination of artists in a most interesting programme. Mme. Nordica will sing the aria from "La Rene de Saba," Mme. Scalchi the Cavatina from "The Huguenots," Sig. Del Puente the Torreador's Song and the first part of the programme will conclude with the Lucia Sextet. Selections from the third and fifth acts of Gounod's "Faust" will make the second part of the programme, the roles being by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Fischer. The orchestra will also be heard in some notable selections. All the soloists stand foremost in the artistic world and together form a combination which for strength, finish and true merit cannot be surpassed.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 16, 1893.

Madame Lillian Nordica will renew her acquaintance with the Boston public this evening, appearing at the head of her newly organized company in a grand operatic concert. The organization is one of the strongest that has been heard here in a long time.

The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartette, assisted by Mr. F. Busoni and Mr. Goldschmidt, takes place at Chickering Hall this evening at 8.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MENDELSSOHN.	OVERTURE. "Midsummernight's Dream."
WEBER.	CONCERTSTÜCK for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA in F minor.
MENDELSSOHN.	a) SCHERZO. b) NOTTURNO. } from "Midsummernight's Dream."
	SOLI for PIANOFORTE.
a) CHOPIN.	NOCTURNE.
b) CHOPIN.	SCHERZO in B flat minor.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major, op. 61.

I. Sostenuto assai. C major.
Allegro ma non troppo. C major.
II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. C major.
Trio I: The same tempo. C minor.
Trio II: The same tempo. C major.
III. Adagio espressivo. C minor.
IV. Allegro molto vivace. C major.

SOLOIST:

MISS MINNIE WETZLER.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

HENRI MARTEAU

[84]

BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 15, 1893.

The Nordica Grand Operatic concert at Music hall tomorrow evening will introduce Manager Ellis's combination of artists in a most interesting programme. Mme. Nordica will sing the Aria from "La Reine de Saba," Mme. Scalchi the Cavatina from "The Huguenots," Sig. Del Puente the Torreador's song, and the first part of the programme will conclude with the Lucia Sextet. Selections from the third and fifth acts of Gounod's "Faust" will make the second part of the programme, the rôles being by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Fischer. The orchestra will also be heard in some notable selections. Complete programme in another column.

THE NORDICA CONCERT CO.

One of the leading musical events of the week will be the concert tomorrow night in music hall by the Nordica Operatic Concert company, under the direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis.

The personnel of the company is remarkably strong, as follows: Mme. Lillian Nordica, prima donna soprano; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, prima donna contralto; Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, mezzo soprano; Italo Campanini, primo tenor; Giuseppe del Puente, primo baritone; Emil Fischer, basso; and grand orchestra, Sig. R. Sapio, conductor.

Mr. Ellis has brought together a group of eminent vocal talent which it would be difficult to surpass. Mme. Nordica is a very great Boston favorite, and her triumphs all over the world are a part of musical history. Mme. Scalchi ranks as the greatest contralto of the present time, and holds a warm place in the hearts of the public everywhere. As a mezzo-soprano, Miss Campbell won fame with the American Opera company. Campanini, Fischer and Del Puente are familiar names, and pleasure is always assured when they appear upon the stage.

The programme arranged is one to display fully the abilities of the artists, as follows:

Overture. ("William Tell.")..... Rossini
Orchestra.
Toreador Song. ("Carmen")..... Bizet
Mr. Del Puente.
Cavatina. ("Nobil Signor.") ("Les Huguenot.")..... Meyerbeer
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria. ("La Reine de Saba")..... Gounod
Mme. Nordica.
Storm at Vespertide. (Tone Picture.)... R. Sapio
Orchestra.
Sextette and Finale. ("Lucia di Lammermoor.")..... Donizetti
Mmes. Nordica, Scalchi, and MM. Campanini, Del Puente, Corsi, and Fischer.

Third act of Gounod's "Faust" in Italian cast thus:

Marguerite..... Mme. Nordica
Siebel..... Mme. Scalchi
Martha..... Miss Campbell
Faust..... Mr. Campanini
Mephistopheles..... Mr. Fischer,

The following numbers will be given: Introduction and song, "Le parlate d' amor," Siebel; scena and recitative, "Cosi par," Faust and Mephisto; cavatina, "Salve dimora casta e pura," Faust; scena and air, "C' era un ré di Thulé," Marguerite; Air de Bijou, Marguerite; serenade (introduced from 4th act), Mephisto; Quando a te liela, Siebel; scena and quartette, Marguerite, Martha, Faust and Mephisto; Duet, Faust,—"Ah! ti scongiuro in van," Marguerite,—"O silenzio! O mister!" and trio finale, (5th act.), Marguerite, Faust and Mephisto.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, gave its third concert on Thursday evening in Chickering hall, New York. Mlle. Eugenia Castellano and Mr. T. Adamowski were the soloists, and following is the programme: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 1, Mendelssohn; two movements from "La Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; two movements from the concerto for violin No. 1, Bruch, and overture, "Leonore No. 3," Beethoven.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert at Ann Harbor, Mich., May 9.

The Kneisel quartette gave its second concert at Chickering hall, New York, yesterday afternoon, with the assistance of Mr. Arthur Foote, pianist. The programme included the quartette in A minor, op. 41, Schumann; piano quartette in C major, op. 23, Arthur Foote; and quartette in D minor, Schubert.

The last concert by the Adamowski quartette will take place in Chickering hall, Friday afternoon, Jan. 24.

The fifth concert by the Kneisel quartette will be given in Chickering hall tomorrow evening, with the following programme: Volkmann, trio in B flat minor; Schumann, quartette in A minor, op. 41, No. 1; Brahms, quintet for clarinet and strings (first time). They will be assisted by F. Busoni, pianist, and Mr. C. Goldschmidt, clarinet.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1893.

The Symphony concerts reach mid-season today; and it may be said of this series that it fully bears out even the lavish promises of its announcement and the expectations of the public. Last week's concert gave a varied programme, including a symphony by Haydn, a suite by Bizet (No, 1 from Arlésinne') and Beethoven's No. 3 'Leonore' overture. Madame Basta-Tavary was the soloist, singing the great arias of Donna Anna from 'Don Giovanni' and Elizabeth from 'Tannhäuser.' At this evening's concert, M. Henri Marteau plays the violin part in a concerto, and Raff's symphony, 'Im Walde,' and Goldmark's overture, 'In the Spring,' will be given.

The fifth concert by that incomparable organization, the Kneisel Quartet, is to be given on Monday evening at Chickering Hall. The programme is: Volkmann, trio in B-flat minor; Schumann, quartette in A minor, opus 41, No. 1; Brahms, quintet for clarinet and strings (first time), Mr. S. Goldschmidt taking the clarinet part, Mr. Busoni will assist at this concert as pianist.

The Nordica Concert Company is a new musical combination organized by Mr. C. A. Ellis, which will first appear at Music Hall on Monday evening, then starting for a tour of the United States. It is a remarkably strong organization, Madame Lillian Nordica being the prima donna soprano; beside whom Mr. Ellis has specially engaged Sofia Scalchi, who has just arrived in this country, Italo Campanini, Emil Fischer, Del Puente and Helen Campbell, who, in connection with a large orchestra, will make up the organization. The programme for Monday evening includes the third act of Gounod's 'Faust,' in Italian, in which are introduced Mephisto's serenade from the fourth act and the trio and finale of the fifth act. The great sextette from 'Lucia di Lammermoor' will be sung, together with selections by Madame Nordica, Madame Scalchi and Mr. Del Puente.

BOSTON IDEAS

JANUARY 15, 1893.

Tomorrow evening at Music hall the Nordica Operatic Concert Co. will give a concert whose promised attractions have already sold nearly the whole house. The fact of Mr. C. A. Ellis's direction of the company, together with the particular excellence of the talent composing the combination, naturally makes success an assured fact. These are the artists: Mme. Lillian Nordica, prima donna soprano; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, prima donna contralto; Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, mezzo soprano; Italo Campanini, primo tenor; Giuseppe del Puente, primo baritone; Emil Fisher, basso; orchestra conducted by Sig. R. Sapio. Jefferson S. Leerburger is manager and H. G. Snow business manager.

The first part of the programme will be: Overture ("William Tell,") Rossini, by orchestra; Toreador song ("Carmen,") Bizet, by Mr. Del Puente; Cavatina ("Nobil Signor,") ("Les Huguenots,") Meyerbeer, by Mme. Scalchi; Aria ("La Reine de Saba,") Gounod, by Mme. Nordica; Storm at Vespertide (Tone Picture,) R. Sapio, by orchestra; Sextette and Finale ("Lucia di Lammermoor,") Donizetti, by Mmes. Nordica, Scalchi, and Mm. Campanini, Del. Puente, Corsi and Fischer.

The programme will end with the third act of Gounod's "Faust," cast thus: Marguerite, Mme. Nordica; Siebel, Mme. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Campbell; Faust, Mr. Campanini; Mephistopheles, Mr. Fischer.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

JANUARY 14, 1893.

The operatic concert at Music Hall on Monday evening, when Mme. Lillian Nordica will appear at the head of her newly organized concert company, promises to be one of the most brilliant and interesting events of the musical season. The fair prima donna has surrounded herself with a company of great vocalists, including Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Mr. I. Campanini, Mr. G. Del

Puente and Mr. Emil Fischer. With the support of a large orchestra under the direction of Sig. R. Sapio an exceedingly attractive programme of operatic music will be given. Besides the solo numbers by the leading members of the company, which comprise the first part, important features will be the sextet from [illegible] and extensive selections from [illegible] including the most effective num-

---

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 15.

The fifth of this season's concerts by the Kneisel Quartet will be given to-morrow evening, Mr. F. Busoni, piano, and Mr. Goldschmidt, clarinet, assisting. The programme is: Trio in B-flat minor, Volkmann; Quartet in A-minor, op. 41. No. 1, Schumann, and Quintet for Clarinet and strings, Brahms, which will be given for the first time here.

A very attractive occasion to the large musical public that still find delight in the melodies of Italian opera, will be the concert at Music Hall to-morrow evening by Madame Nordica and the company of excellent artists who are to accompany her on a tour through the country. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Mr. Del Puente, and Mr. Fischer, certainly form a combination of vocalists of exceptional abilities and distinction, and in the brilliant operatic selections chosen for the performance they will be heard to the best possible advantage. They will have the support of a large orchestra, under the direction of Mr. R. Sapio. In the first part of the programme Madame Nordica will sing an aria from "La Reine de Saba;" Mme. Scalchi the cavatina "Nobil Signor" from "Les Huguenots;" Mr. Del Puente the Toreador's song from "Carmen;" and the great sextet from "Lucia" will be given. The second part of the programme will be directed devoted to selections from "Faust," including the most effective solos, duets, and quartets from the third and fifth acts. The sale of seats has been very large.

—The Nordica concert promises to be very successful. We have had no opera this season, and so little singing of an interesting nature, that a large element in our musical public will avail themselves of the opportunity to hear the familiar Italian and French opera tunes sung by eminent and long popular artists.

—Nordica, Scalchi, Campanini, Del Puente and Fischer, in the third act of "Faust," should draw opera lovers out in full force.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1893.

The programme for the first appearance of the Nordica Operatic Concert Company in Music Hall next Monday night is selected and arranged in order to display the several artists of the organization to the best advantage. Mrs. Nordica will sing the great aria from "La Reine de Saba," Gounod; Mrs. Scalchi will sing a cavatina from "The Huguenots"; and Miss Helen Campbell, Mr. Campanini, Mr. Del Puente and Mr. Fischer will be heard in fitting selections, including the sextet from "Lucia" and scenes from Gounod's "Faust." An orchestra will take part under the direction of Mr. Sapio.

The fifth concert in the Kneisel Quartet series at Chickering Hall will be given on Monday night. The programme consists of Volkmann's trio in B-flat minor, Schumann's quartet, op. 41, No. 1, and Brahms's quintet for clarinet and strings, new here. Mr. Busoni, pianoforte, and Mr. Goldschmidt, clarinet, will take part.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fifth concert in the Sanders Theatre course next Thursday night. For the twelfth concert in the Music Hall series, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," and Raff's symphony, "In the Forest," are announced, and Mr. Henri Marteau, a young Frenchman, will play a concerto for violin.

BUFFALO EXPRESS.

Office, 179 Washington Street.

Friday Morning, Jan. 13, 1893.

Nordica Operatic Concert Co,

Under direction of C. A. ELLIS,

MUSIC HALL,

Saturday Evening, Jan 21

MME. LILLIAN NORDICA

Mme. Sofia Scalchi

MISS HELEN DUDLEY CAMPBELL
Mezzo-Soprano.

SIG. ITALO CAMPANINI.....Tenor

SIG. DEL PUENTE.....Baritone

EMIL FISCHER.....Basso

ISIDOR LUCKSTONE, Musical Director.

A miscellaneous concert will be given, concluding with Mascagni's beautiful opera,

Cavelleria Rusticana

in concert form and sung in Italian, with the above artists in the cast.

Sale of seats opens Wednesday, Jan. 18th, at Peter Paul & Bro's bookstore. Prices $1.00, $1.50 and $2.00, according to location.

NORDICA'S OPERATIC CONCERT.

The Nordica Operatic Concert Company, under the direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is booked at Music Hall for Saturday evening, January 21st. The company includes Mme. Lillian Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Sig. Italo Campanini, Sig. Del Puente and Emil Fischer. The entertainment will consist of a miscellaneous concert, concluding with Mascagni's beautiful opera, "Cavelleria Rusticana," with the above artists in the cast. The sale of seats will open at Peter Paul & Bro's. next Wednesday morning.

"CAVALLERIA RUSTICANA"

Splendidly Rendered at the Concert Last Evening.

The concert at the Opera House last evening was an unqualified success. Seldom, if ever, have the music lovers of New Bedford had afforded an evening of so complete and enrapturing enjoyment.

It was a combination of attractions, any one of which should be sufficient to fill the Opera House at any time. Mme. Nordica is a favorite everywhere. Her reputation, already established here, ensures the success of any concert in which she may take part. Del Puente is always a drawing card. The Rheinberger Club is an organization which cannot be too highly appreciated. And the first rendition here of a world-famous musical work is always of great interest to music lovers. All these attractions were provided at one time and at their best in the concert of last evening.

The house was a good one. It might have been better. But the time when a musical feast can pack the largest building in the city has not yet come here. In this respect, however, there is a gradual and gratifying improvement.

It was, perhaps, a mistake to put so lengthy a programme ahead of the principal work of the evening. One likes to be devoid of the suspicion of weariness when a work like Mascagni's is to be heard. But the fault, if it were a fault, lay rather with the appreciative audience than with the generous programme-architect, for the artists were recalled again and again.

The first part opened with the playing of Liszt's "Rhapsodie No. 2," by Mr. Isidore Luckstone. It stamped Mr. Luckstone at once as an artist of fine instincts, capacity and technique. The softer passages were played with a delicacy of touch which was charming, while all the fire and dash that could be desired were thrown into those movements which demanded them. Mr. Luckstone is not only a fine soloist, but a particularly tasteful and effective accompanist. It must be a pleasure for the best artists to sing to such accompanying, as it certainly is a pleasure for all musicians to listen to it.

Miss Helen Dudley Campbell sang two vocal gems, Schumann's "Sunshine" and Chadwick's "Lullaby." She has a strong contralto, of pure tone and well in control, but somewhat lacking in the finer sympathetic qualities. She deserves credit for her artistic selections.

Mr. Payne Clarke made a bid for popular favor by singing the never-failing ballad "Come into the Garden, Maud" with which the great English tenor, Lloyd, always pulls down his houses. The audience, captivated by a fine "top-note," brought him back. He came, saw and conquered with Balfe's "When other Lips."

And then came Nordica, the ever beautiful, ever winning, ever-artistic Nordica, radiant in diamonds, radiant in dress, but more radiant in her own sweetness and that of her peerless voice. She sang the "Polacca" from Mignon as few can sing it. Her voice, method, manner, enunciation are alike beyond criticism. She was encored and responded with a bewitching love song.

From the heights of sweetness to the depths of terrificness and tragedy. Enter Del Puente, shirt front, red silk handkerchief, smile, big voice and all. It was the Toreador song again, rendered with a fiery force and a dramatic zeal peculiarly characteristic. Del Puente is a great singer. The world knows it and he knows it, and everybody concerned is quite satisfied to have it so. He is always good natured, and cheerfully responded to an encore with one of his humorous vocal effusions.

Then the Rheinberger Club made its first effort of the evening, the singing of Rheinberger's "Journey Song." Effort! A more inappropriate word could not have been used. The sweetest melody and harmony seemed to float upon the listener's ears with hardly the consciousness of where they came from.

Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana," which constituted the second part, is a work of the most romantic kind alike in its authorship and its character. From a musical standpoint it is a triumph of genius. Melodious throughout, it is noted for its rare and remarkable and yet perfect harmonies. It is a work which is very enjoyable at a first hearing, but a repeated hearing will fill the soul with the deepest enthusiasm for it.

The story of its authorship is well known. Pietro Mascagni, unknown, untutored, unrecognized, wrote it for a prize. It was an inspiration. It made him. From deepest poverty it took him. It left him known, courted, feted, throughout Europe.

Its rendition last evening in concert form was as nearly a perfect performance as we have ever had in this city. The soloists were particularly well suited to the work. Nordics and Del Puente were at their best, Mr. Clarke put an amount of vocal and dramatic force into his singing which was a revelation to those who had listened somewhat critically to his earlier efforts, and Miss Campbell sang her part well.

The chorus work was a marvel. Mr. F. L. Diman cannot have praise enough for getting such results out of a comparatively small chorus. To speak of the chorus work in detail would simply be to repeat adjectives of commendation. In balance, attack, expression, all was as it should be.

The accompanying of Mr. Luckstone at the piano was reinforced by Mr. B. Frank Donahoe at the organ. He wasn't heard much, but it isn't the place of an accompanist to make himself prominent.

[85]

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 15, 1893.

The Nordica Grand Operatic concert at Music hall tomorrow evening will introduce Manager Ellis's combination of artists in a most interesting programme. Mme. Nordica will sing the Aria from "La Rene de Saba," Mme. Schalchi the Cavatina from "The Huguenots," Sig. Del Puente the Torreador's song, and the first part of the programme will conclude with the Lucia Sextet. Selections from the third and fifth acts of Gounod's "Faust" will make the second part of the programme, the rôles being by Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Sig. Campanini and Herr Fischer. The orchestra will also be heard in some notable selections. Complete programme in another column.

THE NORDICA CONCERT CO.

One of the leading musical events of the week will be the concert tomorrow night in Music hall by the Nordica Operatic Concert company, under the direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis.

The personnel of the company is remarkably strong, as follows: Mme. Lillian Nordica, prima donna soprano; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, prima donna contralto; Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, mezzo soprano; Italo Campanini, primo tenor; Giuseppe del Puente, primo bari tone; Emil Fischer, basso; and grand orchestra, Sig. R. Sapio, conductor.

Mr. Ellis has brought together a group of eminent vocal talent which it would be difficult to surpass. Mme. Nordica is a very great Boston favorite, and her triumphs all over the world are a part of musical history. Mme. Scalchi ranks as the greatest contralto of the present time, and holds a warm place in the hearts of the public everywhere. As a mezzo-soprano, Miss Campbell won fame with the American Opera company. Campanini, Fischer and Del Puente are familiar names, and pleasure is always assured when they appear upon the stage.

The programme arranged is one to display fully the abilities of the artists, as follows:

Overture. ("William Tell.")..... Rossini
Orchestra.
Toreador Song. ("Carmen")..... Bizet
Mr. Del Puente.
Cavatina. ("Nobil Signor.") ("Les Huguenot.")..... Meyerbeer
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria. ("La Reine de Saba")..... Gounod
Mme. Nordica.
Storm at Vespertide. (Tone Picture.)... R. Sapio
Orchestra.
Sextette and Finale. ("Lucia di Lammermoor.")..... Donizetti
Mmes. Nordica, Scalchi, and MM. Campanini, Del Puente, Corsi, and Fischer.

Third act of Gounod's "Faust" in Italian cast thus:

Marguerite..... Mme. Nordica
Siebel..... Mme. Scalchi
Martha..... Miss Campbell
Faust..... Mr. Campanini
Mephistopheles..... Mr. Fischer.

The following numbers will be given: Introduction and song, "Le parlate d' amor," Siebel; scena and recitative, "Cosi par," Faust and Mephisto; cavatina, "Salve dimora casta e pura," Faust; scena and air, "C' era un ré di Thulé," Marguerite; Air de Bijou, Marguerite; serenade (introduced from 4th act), Mephisto; Quando a te liela, Siebel; scena and quartette, Marguerite, Martha, Faust and Mephisto; Duet, Faust,—"Ah! ti scongiuro in van," Marguerite,—"O silenzio! O mister!" and trio finale, (5th act.), Marguerite, Faust and Mephisto.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, gave its third concert on Thursday evening in Chickering hall, New York. Mlle. Eugenia Castellano and Mr. T. Adamowski were the soloists, and following is the programme: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 1, Mendelssohn; two movements from "La Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; two movements from the concerto for violin No. 1, Bruch, and overture, "Leonore No. 3," Beethoven.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert at Ann Harbor, Mich., May 9.

The Kneisel quartette gave its second concert at Chickering hall, New York, yesterday afternoon, with the assistance of Mr. Arthur Foote, pianist. The programme included the quartette in A minor, op. 41, Schumann; piano quartette in C major, op. 23, Arthur Foote; and quartette in D minor, Schubert.

The last concert by the Adamowski quartette will take place in Chickering hall, Friday afternoon, Jan. 24.

The fifth concert by the Kneisel quartette will be given in Chickering hall tomorrow evening, with the following programme: Volkmann, trio in B flat minor; Schumann, quartette in A minor, op. 41, No. 1; Brahms, quintet for clarinet and strings (first time). They will be assisted by F. Busoni, pianist, and Mr. G. Goldschmidt, clarinet.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1893.

The Symphony concerts reach mid-season today; and it may be said of this series that it fully bears out even the lavish promises of its announcement and the expectations of the public. Last week's concert gave a varied programme, including a symphony by Haydn, a suite by Bizet (No, 1 from Arlésinne') and Beethoven's No. 3 'Leonore' overture. Madame Basta-Tavary was the soloist, singing the great arias of Donna Anna from 'Don Giovanni' and Elizabeth from 'Tannhäuser.' At this evening's concert, M. Henri Marteau plays the violin part in a concerto, and Raff's symphony, 'Im Walde,' and Goldmark's overture, 'In the Spring,' will be given.

The fifth concert by that incomparable organization, the Kneisel Quartet, is to be given on Monday evening at Chickering Hall. The programme is: Volkmann, trio in B-flat minor; Schumann, quartette in A minor, opus 41, No. 1; Brahms, quintet for clarinet and strings (first time), Mr. S. Goldschmidt taking the clarinet part, Mr. Busoni will assist at this concert as pianist.

The Nordica Concert Company is a new musical combination organized by Mr. C. A. Ellis, which will first appear at Music Hall on Monday evening, then starting for a tour of the United States. It is a remarkably strong organization, Madame Lillian Nordica being the prima donna soprano; beside whom Mr. Ellis has specially engaged Sofia Scalchi, who has just arrived in this country, Italo Campanini, Emil Fischer, Del Puente and Helen Campbell, who, in connection with a large orchestra, will make up the organization. The programme for Monday evening includes the third act of Gounod's 'Faust,' in Italian, in which are introduced Mephisto's serenade from the fourth act and the trio and finale of the fifth act. The great sextette from 'Lucia di Lammermoor' will be sung, together with selections by Madame Nordica, Madame Scalchi and Mr. Del Puente.

BOSTON IDEAS

JANUARY 15, 1893.

Tomorrow evening at Music hall the Nordica Operatic Concert Co. will give a concert whose promised attractions have already sold nearly the whole house. The fact of Mr. C. A. Ellis's direction of the company, together with the particular excellence of the talent composing the combination, naturally makes success an assured fact. These are the artists: Mme. Lillian Nordica, prima donna soprano; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, prima donna contralto; Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, mezzo soprano; Italo Campanini, primo tenor; Giuseppe del Puente, primo baritone; Emil Fisher, basso: orchestra conducted by Sig. R. Sapio. Jefferson S. Leerburger is manager and H. G. Snow business manager.

The first part of the programme will be: Overture ("William Tell,") Rossini, by orchestra; Toreador song ("Carmen,") Bizet, by Mr. Del Puente; Cavatina ("Nobil Signor,") ("Les Huguenots,") Meyerbeer, by Mme. Scalchi; Aria ("La Reine de Saba,") Gounod, by Mme. Nordica; Storm at Vespertide (Tone Picture,) R. Sapio, by orchestra; Sextette and Finale ("Lucia di Lammermoor,") Donizetti, by Mmes. Nordica, Scalchi, and Mm. Campanini, Del. Puente, Corsi and Fischer.

The programme will end with the third act of Gounod's "Faust," cast thus: Marguerite, Mme. Nordica; Siebel, Mme. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Campbell; Faust, Mr. Campanini; Mephistopheles, Mr. Fischer.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

JANUARY 14, 1893.

The operatic concert at Music Hall on Monday evening, when Mme. Lillian Nordica will appear at the head of her newly organized concert company, promises to be one of the most brilliant and interesting events of the musical season. The fair prima donna has surrounded herself with a company of great vocalists, including Mme. Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Mr. L Campanini, Mr. G. Del Puente and Mr. Emil Fischer. With the support of a large orchestra under the direction of Sig. R. Sapio an exceedingly attractive programme of operatic music will be given. Besides the solo numbers by the leading members of the company, which comprise the first part, important features will be the sextet from "Lucia" and extensive selections from "Faust," including the most effective numbers from the third and fifth acts. The sale of seats has been very large.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 15.

The fifth of this season's concerts by the Kneisel Quartet will be given to-morrow evening. Mr. F. Busoni, piano, and Mr. Goldschmidt, clarinet, assisting. The programme is: Trio in B flat minor, Volkmun; Quartet in A-minor, op. 41. No. 1, Schumann, and Quintet for Clarinet and strings, Brahms, which will be given for the first time here.

A very attractive occasion to the large musical public that still find delight in the melodies of Italian opera, will be the concert at Music Hall to-morrow evening by Madame Nordica and the company of excellent artists who are to accompany her on a tour through the country. Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Mr. Del Puente, and Mr. Fischer, certainly form a combination of vocalists of exceptional abilities and distinction, and in the brilliant operatic selections chosen for the performance they will be heard to the best possible advantage. They will have the support of a large orchestra, under the direction of Mr. R. Sapio. In the first part of the programme Madame Nordica will sing an aria from "La Reine de Saba;" Mme. Scalchi the cavatina "Nobil Signor" from "Les Huguenots;" Mr. Del Puente the Toreador's song from "Carmen;" and the great sextet from "Lucia" will be given. The second part of the programme will be directed devoted to selections from "Faust," including the most effective solos, duets, and quartets from the third and fifth acts. The sale of seats has been very large.

—The Nordica concert promises to be very successful. We have had no opera this season, and so little singing of an interesting nature, that a large element in our musical public will avail themselves of the opportunity to hear the familiar Italian and French opera tunes sung by eminent and long popular artists.

—Nordica, Scalchi, Campanini, Del Puente and Fischer, in the third act of "Faust," should draw opera lovers out in full force.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1893.

The programme for the first appearance of the Nordica Operatic Concert Company in Music Hall next Monday night is selected and arranged in order to display the several artists of the organization to the best advantage. Mrs. Nordica will sing the great aria from "La Reine de Saba," Gounod; Mrs. Scalchi will sing a cavatina from "The Huguenots"; and Miss Helen Campbell, Mr. Campanini, Mr. Del Puente and Mr. Fischer will be heard in fitting selections, including the sextet from "Lucia" and scenes from Gounod's "Faust." An orchestra will take part under the direction of Mr. Sapio.

The fifth concert in the Kneisel Quartet series at Chickering Hall will be given on Monday night. The programme consists of Volkmann's trio in B-flat minor, Schumann's quartet, op. 41, No. 1, and Brahms's quintet for clarinet and strings, new here. Mr. Busoni, pianoforte, and Mr. Goldschmidt, clarinet, will take part.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fifth concert in the Sanders Theatre course next Thursday night. For the twelfth concert in the Music Hall series, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," and Raff's symphony, "In the Forest," are announced, and Mr. Henri Marteau, a young Frenchman, will play a concerto for violin.

BUFFALO EXPRESS.

Office, 179 Washington Street.

Friday Morning, Jan. 13, 1893.

Nordica Operatic Concert Co,

Under direction of C. A. ELLIS,

MUSIC HALL,

Saturday Evening, Jan 21

MME. LILLIAN NORDICA

Mme. Sofia Scalchi

MISS HELEN DUDLEY CAMPBELL
Mezzo-Soprano.

SIG. ITALO CAMPANINI.....Tenor
SIG. DEL PUENTE.....Baritone
EMIL FISCHER.....Basso

ISIDOR LUCKSTONE, Musical Director.

A miscellaneous concert will be given, concluding with Mascagni's beautiful opera,

Cavelleria Rusticana

In concert form and sung in Italian, with the above artists in the cast.

Sale of seats opens Wednesday, Jan. 18th, at Peter Paul & Bro's bookstore. Prices $1.00, $1.50 and $2.00, according to location.

NORDICA'S OPERATIC CONCERT.

The Nordica Operatic Concert Company, under the direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is booked at Music Hall for Saturday evening, January 21st. The company includes Mme. Lillian Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Sig. Italo Campanini, Sig. Del Puente and Emil Fischer. The entertainment will consist of a miscellaneous concert, concluding with Mascagni's beautiful opera, "Cavelleria Rusticana," with the above artists in the cast. The sale of seats will open at Peter Paul & Bro's. next Wednesday morning.

8 Journal

"CAVALLERIA RUSTICANA"

Splendidly Rendered at the Concert Last Evening.

The concert at the Opera House last evening was an unqualified success. Seldom, if ever, have the music lovers of New Bedford had afforded an evening of so complete and enrapturing enjoyment.

It was a combination of attractions, any one of which should be sufficient to fill the Opera House at any time. Mme. Nordica is a favorite everywhere. Her reputation, already established here, ensures the success of any concert in which she may take part. Del Puente is always a drawing card. The Rheinberger Club is an organization which cannot be too highly appreciated. And the first rendition here of a world-famous musical work is always of great interest to music lovers. All these attractions were provided at one time and at their best in the concert of last evening.

The house was a good one. It might have been better. But the time when a musical feast can pack the largest building in the city has not yet come here. In this respect, however, there is a gradual and gratifying improvement.

It was, perhaps, a mistake to put so lengthy a programme ahead of the principal work of the evening. One likes to be devoid of the suspicion of weariness when a work like Mascagni's is to be heard. But the fault, if it were a fault, lay rather with the appreciative audience than with the generous programme-architect, for the artists were recalled again and again.

The first part opened with the playing of Liszt's "Rhapsodie No. 2," by Mr. Isidore Luckstone. It stamped Mr. Luckstone at once as an artist of fine instincts, capacity and technique. The softer passages were played with a delicacy of touch which was charming, while all the fire and dash that could be desired were thrown into those movements which demanded them. Mr. Luckstone is not only a fine soloist, but a particularly tasteful and effective accompanist. It must be a pleasure for the best artists to sing to such accompanying, as it certainly is a pleasure for all musicians to listen to it.

Miss Helen Dudley Campbell sang two vocal gems, Schumann's "Sunshine" and Chadwick's "Lullaby." She has a strong contralto, of pure tone and well in control, but somewhat lacking in the finer sympathetic qualities. She deserves credit for her artistic selections.

Mr. Payne Clarke made a bid for popular favor by singing the never-failing ballad "Come into the Garden, Maud" with which the great English tenor, Lloyd, always pulls down his houses. The audience, captivated by a fine "top-note," brought him back. He came, saw and conquered with Balfe's "When other Lips."

And then came Nordica, the ever beautiful, ever winning, ever-artistic Nordica, radiant in diamonds, radiant in dress, but more radiant in her own sweetness and that of her peerless voice. She sang the "Polacca" from Mignon as few can sing it. Her voice, method, manner, enunciation are alike beyond criticism. She was encored and responded with a bewitching love song.

From the heights of sweetness to the depths of terrificness and tragedy. Enter Del Puente, shirt front, red silk handkerchief, smile, big voice and all. It was the Toreador song again, rendered with a fiery force and a dramatic zeal peculiarly characteristic. Del Puente is a great singer. The world knows it and he knows it, and everybody concerned is quite satisfied to have it so. He is always good natured, and cheerfully responded to an encore with one of his humorous vocal effusions.

Then the Rheinberger Club made its first effort of the evening, the singing of Rheinberger's "Journey Song." Effort! A more inappropriate word could not have been used. The sweetest melody and harmony seemed to float upon the listener's ears with hardly the consciousness of where they came from.

Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana," which constituted the second part, is a work of the most romantic kind alike in its authorship and its character. From a musical standpoint it is a triumph of genius. Melodious throughout, it is noted for its rare and remarkable and yet perfect harmonies. It is a work which is very enjoyable at a first hearing, but a repeated hearing will fill the soul with the deepest enthusiasm for it.

The story of its authorship is well known. Pietro Mascagni, unknown, untutored, unrecognized, wrote it for a prize. It was an inspiration. It made him. From deepest poverty it took him. It left him known, courted, feted, throughout Europe.

Its rendition last evening in concert form was as nearly a perfect performance as we have ever had in this city. The soloists were particularly well suited to the work. Nordica and Del Puente were at their best, Mr. Clarke put an amount of vocal and dramatic force into his singing which was a revelation to those who had listened somewhat critically to his earlier efforts, and Miss Campbell sang her part well.

The chorus work was a marvel. Mr. F. L. Diman cannot have praise enough for getting such results out of a comparatively small chorus. To speak of the chorus work in detail would simply be to repeat adjectives of commendation. In balance, attack, expression, all was as it should be.

The accompanying of Mr. Luckstone at the piano was reinforced by Mr. B. Frank Donahoe at the organ. He wasn't heard much, but it isn't the place of an accompanist to make himself prominent.

[85]

Gazette.

MONTREAL, FRIDAY, JAN. 13.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

The Coming Musical Attraction—Next Week's Engagements.

The company of artists which Mr. C. A. Ellis, of Boston (manager of Music hall and the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra), will bring here for two concerts at Windsor hall, January 18 and 19, is one which would at once command attention and arouse the musical enthusiasts in any city of America or Europe, as their names are equally as well known on the other side of the water as here. To adequately present such dramatic and stirring works as "Cavalleria Rusticana" and third act of "Faust" (which form the second part of the programme), requires a company out of the ordinary and thoroughly skilled in the Italian operatic school. Heading the company, and who, with Mr. Ellis, secured the artists, is that general Montreal favorite,

MME. LILLIAN NORDICA.

The story of her life is an interesting one and contains much that is romantic. Filling a position in England second only to Albani, her great triumphs at all the leading English festivals and at the Royal Italian Opera house, Covent Garden, under Sir Aug. Harris, also in all the leading opera houses of Europe, fairly entitle her to a place among the leading great singers of the world, at the present time while in America, her oratorio and concert work as well as her engagements with Abbey and Grau at the Metropolitan Opera house, have made her equally well known. Next we mention but hardly second in reputation or ability comes that magnificent operatic artist, who has been brought to this country especially for the present tour. She is undeniably the greatest contralto of modern times. Even when singing with Patti she fairly divided the honors and attention with La Diva. She is the embodiment of grace and artistic finish, and her acting and singing are at once the wonder and admiration of the critics and the public. Often relieving her better known confrere and doing all the English and oratorio work taken by this company is the distinguished New York and Philadelphia singer, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell. Miss Campbell has been heard here in oratorio and received great praise from the local press. At one time she was the highest paid contralto in the New York church choir, but gave up this work to enter the American Opera company under Mr. Thomas, later under Mr. Heinrichs in Philedelphia and for her oratorio work.

MME. SOFIA SCALCHI,

First among the names of the male singers is that tried, true and sterling artist, Italo Campanini, whose last appearance here over a year ago with the Thomas orchestra at Sohmer park surprised the audience so much, and proved that he still retained his old fire and artistic fervor.

Another singer known here through his participation in many great events is Sig. del Puente, the prince of baritones and good fellows, who has sung with every grand opera company for the past dozen years and whose success has been heralded all over the civilized world. One singer, however, will make his first appearance in Montreal, that grand, noble artist, Herr Emil Fischer, the basso profundo the past few years of the German opera seasons at the Metropolitan opera house, New York, under the [illegible] of Anton Seidl. With one exception only, no basso that has sung in America for years has done such satisfactory work and created such enthusiasm. With such an array of artists and the magnificent programme offered, the seat sale, which opened yesterday morning, should be one of the largest ever held in Montreal.

THE EVENING STA

CAVALLERIA RUSTICANA.

Magnificent Concert in the Opera House Last Evening.

The twelve hundred and odd people that heard Mascagni's Cavalleria Rusticana on its first performance in this city last evening can consider themselves in luck. Probably it was the finest choral work ever performed in this section of the State, and had it not been for the existence in our midst of such a chorus, trained and competent, as the Rheinberger Club, an opera of such magnitude as this could not have been performed with such soloists here. The cost of production would have rendered it far too expensive. As it was the expense of the concert was not far from $700.

Although the performance was given with the local chorus, critics who have heard the opera often, say that the chorus work was never better performed in this country in point of vocalism.

In point of vocalism, I said, because it was sung as a concert with no attempt at dramatic effect.

The chorus comprised 55 voices, 33 ladies and 22 men, under the leadership of Fred L. Diman. The solo talent was as follows: Mme. Lillian Nordica, soprano; Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, contralto; Mr. Payne Clarke, tenor; Sig. Guiseppe Del Puente, baritone; Mr. Isidore Luckstone, pianist; Mr. J. Frank Donahoe, organist.

The opera was preceded by the following programme:

Piano Solo—Rhapsodie, No. 2, Liszt
Mr. Luckstone.
Songs for Contralto—a Sunshine, Schumann
b Lullaby, Chadwick
Miss Campbell.
Tenor Solo—"Come into the Garden Maud."
Mr. Clarke.
Polacca—Mignon, Thomas
Mme. Nordica.
Aria for Barytone—Toreador song, Carmen, Bizet
Sig. Del Puente.
Chorus—Journey Song, Rheinberger
Rheinberger Club.

The soloists captured the audience at once, particularly the gentlemen. Of course Mme. Nordica was the favorite. Her remarkably flexible voice was shown to fine advantage in the "Mignon" selection. Her technique was exhibited in a marked degree in the difficult runs and trills of the work, and her "skyrocket" efforts did not fall on unappreciative ears. Her reception was most hearty and so vigorous that she was obliged to respond. Her encore number was "When Love is Kind." If we say that her success lay in the artistic polacca, it would be difficult to qualify her rendition of the simple ditty that followed it. From the technical effects in the former the prima donna's voice became entirely different in its exhibition of light, vivacious, sympathetic tones in the ballad. She was heartily encored.

Sig. Del Puente always creates an impression. He cannot help it. On this occasion he repeated the selections he so successfully sung here when he appeared here a year or two ago. His voice, rich and mellow, is ranged over a broad register, and is equally pleasing in every part. His style is dramatic and piquant, and his rendition in every respect musical and artistic. When encored he sung the jolly "Tarantelle" so daintily as to be redemanded, and repeated it. Though in Italian, the rendition was so dramatic that his very style indicated the sentiment, though all did not understand his words.

Mr. Clarke has a voice powerful and of good musical quality and great strength, though his enunciation was not pleasing to all. A peculiar nasal quality marked his articulation and somewhat marred the otherwise magnificent vocalization. Mr. Clarke's solo was also encored, and the return number rendered was "Then You'll Remember Me."

Miss Campbell by many is not considered a contralto. In fact her upper register is fully as strong and beautiful as her lower tones, and in all places she sings most pleasingly. She sings easily and with a style that delighted the audience.

Whatever may be said of Mr. Luckstone may be said of the whole performance, for in the opera he carried the whole work along by his masterly execution. In his solo number he displayed only inklings of the talent that shone forth most brilliantly in the accompaniment of the opera. He was heartily received.

The latter half of the programme—the opera—was the gem of the evening. The story of the opera is already familiar to Standard readers. The cast was as follows:

Santuzza, Mme. Nordica
Lola, Lucia, Miss Campbell
Turridu, Mr. Clarke
Alfio, Sig. Del Puente

Incidental to the opera the following numbers appeared:

Prelude and Sicilienne.
Introductory Chorus.
Scene and Arrival of Alfio.
Scene and Prayer.
Romance and Scene.
Duet. (Santuzza and Turridu.)
Lola's Ditty.
Continuation of Duet. (Santuzza and Turridu.)
Duet. (Santuzza and Alfio.
Intermezzo.
Scene, Chorus and Drinking Song.
Finale.

Not only did the soloists sing their numbers magnificently, but the chorus fairly surprised its most sanguine friends. The spirit and snap that marked every chorus number showed the club was not only sure of the music but was able to render it with skill seldom attained by like amateur organizations. The volume of tone was equal to that of the average chorus of thrice its size, while the quality of tone was more indicative of the cultivated vocalist than of the amateur. Not a useless voice existed in the chorus. Mr. Diman had his singers in perfect subjection, and the response to his direction was prompt and accurate. No lagging of entrance or weakness in termination was discernible, but in its place the utmost intelligence was evident in the work. Considering that the music is one of the most difficult compositions of modern time, it seemed hardly possible that the chorus had had only four rehearsals on the work, though such is the fact. The sacred chorus was magnificently performed, and was vigorously applauded.

Probably the gems of the solo parts were the duets between Santuzza and Turridu and Santuzza and Alfio, in which a magnificent of dramatic vocalism was displayed. Mr. Clarke sung to excellent advantage in the opera.

Mme. Nordica was right in her element and sung charmingly, while Del Puente's impassioned recitatives were splendidly rendered. Lola's ditty was sung charmingly by Miss Campbell.

The famous "Intermezzo" that is so much talked about was not a success. Poor Mr. Donahoe, instead of finding, as he expected, a full church organ, discovered himself seated at a tame instrument, entirely inadequate for the part it was intended to sustain. He played it finely, however, but did not appear to advantage.

The most unsatisfactory thing in the whole performance and the only one open for severe criticism was the fact that no less than three editions of the opera were used on the stage. Two of them, and different at that, were in English and the third in Italian. Frequently in duets the two soloists would be singing in different languages, and in the majority of cases while the chorus sung in "United States" the soloists used the liquid Italian. The effect on the audience was a little ludicrous.

But, all considered, the concert was the finest of its kind ever heard in this city, and New Bedford can feel proud of the part her amateur singers took in it. So well did they acquit themselves that it is not improbable

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

FRIDAY, JANUARY 13, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in Chickering Hall last night had a troublesome drawback to contend against, in the form of unfortunate atmospheric conditions. The band has never before sounded so crude comparatively as it did last night, and at no concert so far as we can recall were there so many technical mishaps. Several passages in Beethoven's eighth symphony which opened the concert were marred by bad intonation and want of precision, and at no time in the course of the evening were the instruments perfectly in tune with each other. Under the circumstances the faults were venial, but they prevent the recording of another such success as was put to the credit of the orchestra on the occasion of its last visit. Concerning the symphony, however, it must be said that it commended itself with especial forcefulness to the admirers of the composition and the believers in Beethoven's knowledge touching his own intentions, in being free from the most flagrant of the innovations which have crept into the readings of the work since Wagner wrote his condemnation of the careless and perfunctory style in which the conductors of Germany were in the habit of playing it. Mr. Nikisch is not overburdened with devotion to tradition, but it is a pleasure to record the fact that neither does he seem to care to pose as a revolutionist simply for the sake of revolution. He permitted the dainty Allegretto Scherzando, to occupy the place of the slow movement of the symphony instead of transforming the characteristics of such a movement to the Tempo di Menuetto as has been done by Dr. Von Bulow and others. The orchestral numbers in the scheme besides the symphony were two movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" (the minuet of the will-o-the-wisps, and the dance of sylphs, which latter bit of fairy tracery in music was demanded and given a second time), and the third "Leonore" overture by Beethoven.

The solo performers were Miss Eugenia Castellano, pianoforte, and Mr. Trinother Adamowski, violin. Miss Castellano is a young woman of sixteen years, who hails from Italy and who has been generously exploited since her arrival in New-York a few weeks ago. She played at one of the Boston concerts two weeks ago and succeeded in impressing the New-England capital with the idea that she was made of rare artistic metal. It is possible that the quantity and quality of the praise that has been lavished upon her, and has been trumpeted forth into the world, led us to expect too much; at any rate, from a musical point of view, her performance of the G minor concerto of Mendelsohn was distinctly disappointing. It was notable, if at all, simply as a mechanical achievement. In color it was monotonous, in the matter of expression sterile. The reason why the composition was chosen remained an unanswerable enigma until the finale was reached, when it became evident that the young lady's fingers and wrists had been kept in training for the purpose of exhibiting a degree of bravura which would please the average audience. In this finale, but more especially in a concert study by her teacher, Martucci, a bit of showy but empty music, she caused something like a sensation and persuaded the judicious of her possession of a sufficient technical equipment to justify hopes of her future. But she did not persuade the judicious that she is now a ripe artist, and she is too old to be listened to as a prodigy.

Mr. Adamowski played the first two movements of Bruch's first violin concerto tastefully and intelligently, but, probably on account of the weather, his tone sounded strangely muffled and unsympathetic in the lower strings.

Mrs. Nikisch, who was to have sung at the Brooklyn concerts of the orchestra to-day and to-morrow, is ill. Madame Tavary has been substituted, and will sing Mozart's "Non Mi Dir" and Wagner's "Dich Theure Halle."

Morning Advertiser.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 13, 1893.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Their Third Concert Greeted by an Overflowing House.

The third in the series of concerts for this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Chickering Hall, and for the third time encountered tempestuous weather, but filled the hall nevertheless.

The programme was made up with Mr. Nikisch's usual good taste, not so long as to weary and composed of effectively contrasting compositions. It opened with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, at which some have been disposed to carp, because not projected on quite so large a scale as some of the others. Happily, artistic quality does not depend on magnitude, else would the jackass be a finer vocalist than the nightingale. This symphony is of finely conceived and accomplished symmetry, as fluently and gracefully expressed and as marked by melodic distinctness and depth as its larger fellows.

After all, the immortality of these works dwells in this melodic depth perhaps more than in anything else. melody that means something, and that carries the conviction of such meaning even to those who cannot wholly understand it. Mr. Nikisch's reading of it is profoundly sympathetic and appreciative of its poetic meaning, not excluding its touches of subtle humor, and the interpretation of his band has this sympathetic appreciation impressed on it. That of the second movement was especially fine and true, and the last movement presented an almost flawless example of shading that was broad without overdoing.

In fine contrast with this was the later delicious playing of two of the dance movements from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust." Nothing in orchestral interpretation could be more exquisite in fanciful delicacy and grace than that of that most airy and gossamer like bit of music the "Waltz of the Sylphs." So delightfully was it played that the recall was too imperious to be resisted, and it had to be repeated.

The programme closed with that immortal masterpiece, the "Lenore" No. 3 overture, expressed with a breadth and insight worthy of the great work. To speak in general terms of the playing would be but to reiterate the warm praises heretofore spoken. One can only say that they seem better deserved with each hearing.

Miss Eugenia Castellano played Mendelssohn's piano concerto in G minor with brilliant and facile technique, especially in final presto, but hardly with interpretative breadth or coloring. This will probably develop in time. She is not airy or pretentious in style and appears to be wholly absorbed in her work and not in exploiting herself. She was warmly recalled and responded with an unrecognized composition, unaccompanied, which displayed more fully her facile and brilliant technique, a little cloudy and lacking crispness sometimes.

The other soloist was the violinist, Mr. Adamowski, an artist one always hears with very great pleasure. He played the first and second movements of Bruch's violin concerto in G minor, with artistic finish and fine discrimination. His playing is still marked by the faultlessly clean and sweet intonation, the firm and delicate bowing and the unfailing executive truth that have long distinguished him. He excels in that peculiarly flexile and clinging legato in which some of the greatest violinists have been somewhat deficient. Within a season or two he has made considerable gain in breadth and more in interpretative insight. He was most enthusiastically applauded.

The orchestra will be heard this afternoon and Saturday evening in Brooklyn. A sudden severe cold will prevent Mrs. Nikisch, who was announced to sing, from appearing, and Mme. Basta-favary will fill her place, singing the "Non mi dir" avra from "Don Giovanni," and Elizabeth's avra from "Tannhauser."

The New York Recorder.

BY GEORGE W. TURNER.

FRIDAY, January 13, 1893.

ADAMOWSKI'S EVENING.

The Third Boston Symphony Orchestral Concert Gives the Violinist a Chance.

It was a night to try an orchestral conductor's soul. The weather imps got into Chickering Hall, and in gelid, damp sport played the deuce with Mr. Nikisch's orchestra from Boston town. The evening opened with Beethoven's Eight Symphony, which was exceedingly well read by Mr. Nikisch, his orchestra playing, however, some queer pranks in intonation. The minuetto was most admirable.

Two movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" were given, with the greatest virtuosity. Only one orchestra in the country can play Berlioz in this fashion, though the wind departments must have again harrowed Mr. Nikisch's ears. The Beethoven overture was most dramatically played, and, indeed, stirred the pulse.

Mr. Adamowski, who is one of the familiar faces in the orchestra, played the first two movements from Bruch's G minor violin concerto in a most finished and artistic style. His poetical interpretation of the adagio gained for him half a dozen recalls.

Owing to the illness of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, her place will be attempted to be filled by Mme. Basta Tavary, the soprano, this afternoon at the Brooklyn Philharmonic concert in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Mr. Nikisch will conduct an excellent programme.

[86]

The Sun.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 13, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch's most interesting concert, the third of this winter's New York series, was attended by an audience that tested to the utmost the seating capacity of Chickering Hall. A perfectly rounded and satisfactory programme was played, beginning with Beethoven's eighth Symphony. This is one of the symphonies that possesses the greatest continued charm. The fifth and the seventh, with this one, make up the trinity of greatest beauty among the symphonies. That heavenly calm and serene majesty which are the characteristics of the symphony given last evening were set forth in their highest power by Mr. Nikisch's excellent judgment in tempi and from the absolute and rigid command in which he holds his band. The time in which each movement was set seemed slower than most renditions that we are accustomed to, but there can be no doubt of the good resultant effect. It is remarkable, too, how each set of instruments, each choir, effaces itself in turn, as the music demands, leaving its neighbor room to come into prominence for the moment. In this way the most exquisite variety of tone color and of variety in expression are produced. Nikisch plays upon his orchestra as though that were his instrument and he the virtuoso.

Not the least interesting and exciting part of last night's concert was the début before our public of Signorina Castellano, a young Italian pianist, who, though only 16 years old, has played often in Italy with the largest orchestras, and now comes to win fame in our country. Her natural gifts are of the highest. She seems endowed with every attribute that is necessary to the grandest success in her art, and there can be no doubt that she will meet it. Her reception last evening and the enthusiastic encore, where the applause was undiminished after two recalls, testified the delight of her hearers. Signorina Castellano played Mendelssohn's G minor concerto, with orchestra taking the first movement and the last at a tempo which would be impossible to any pianist that was not endowed with a marvellous facility. This indeed, she has in an extraordinary measure. Her technique is perfect and absolutely astonishing. There is immense strength and an unending supply of nervous force. Her serenity is undisturbed in the midst of the greatest physical exertion, and the union of fire and dash with dignified reserve is something rarely if ever before found in a woman pianist. As an encore "La Castellano" played a presto by Turini not known to our concert rooms. Much of her music has the charm of novelty as well as of beauty, as will be heard in her recitals that are soon to take place.

Mr. Adamowski, the favorite violinist of Boston, played two movements from Bruch's G minor concerto with that ease, elegance, and precision which have won for him an enviable position in the world of art.

What gave most piquant pleasure to the audience was probably the two extracts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the minuet of the "Will-o-the-Wisps," and the "Waltz of the Sylphs." The latter was played in such a manner as to be beyond criticism. None but words that would sound very like flattery could be applied to the performance of this most dainty and delicate bit of orchestration. It represents the sylphs, who have, at Mephistopheles' bidding, brought to the sleeping Faust dreams of love and Marguerite, as gliding and dancing away through the air after the performance of their magic task. The audience redemanded this fairy-like bit, which was played so deliciously as to be equal in rendering to the perfection of its composition.

It should be announced that a sudden and severe cold will prevent Mrs. Nikisch from appearing at the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon and Saturday evening. Mme. Basta Tavary will sing the "Non mi dir" from "Don Giovanni," and Elizabeth's aria from "Tannhäuser."

The fourth Symphony concert of the Boston Orchestra will take place on Thursday evening, Feb. 9.

NEW YORK HERALD.

TWELVE PAGES.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, JANUARY 13, 1893.

THIRD BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra has a following in New York that scoffs at snow storms. For the third concert of the present series Chickering Hall was packed last night.

Yet the programme was not, upon the whole, an interesting one. It contained too little music of an ultra-modern character. An orchestral programme from which the names of Schumann, Brahms, Rubinstein and Wagner are missing is apt to prove a trifle tame, and neither the smooth manner in which Mr. Nikisch's forces played Beethoven's Eighth symphony nor the dramatic power they put into the "Leonore" overture, No. 3, quite atoned for the lack of the later giants' music. The orchestra played, to be sure, the "Will o' the Wisp" menuet and the Sylphs' waltz from "The Damnation of Faust" with marvellous delicacy and brilliancy; but, although the audience insisted upon a repetition of the waltz, neither movement has any real music in it.

Miss Eugenia Castellano, a young Italian pianist, played Mendelssohn's G minor concerto in a brilliant manner, technically considered, but without much appreciation of its musical possibilities. Miss Castellano is very young and within a few years may get deeper under the surface of music. Her technical equipment is very remarkable, as she showed in a concert study by Martucci, played as an encore. Mr. Timothy Adamowski gave a careful and fairly effective performance of two movements of Bruch's first violin concerto.

The Times - Republic.

Every Evening and Sunday Morning.

NORMAN E. MACK

EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

FRIDAY, JAN. 13, 1893

Nordica Opera Company Coming.

The Nordica Operatic Concert company, which includes Miss Lillian Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Sig. Italo Campanini, Sig. Del Puente and Emil Fischer, will be heard at Music hall Saturday evening, Jan. 21, in a miscellaneous concert concluding with Mascagni's beautiful opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana," with the above artists in the cast. This company is under the direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The sale of seats will open Wednesday morning next at Peter Paul's.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 14, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Nikisch certainly did not tax his hearers yesterday, for he gave them a programme that lasted only an hour and a half. While it is possible to overdo, it is also possible to give too little, and another number might easily have been added to the bill; but perhaps one reason for its brevity was the illness of Mrs. Nikisch who was to have been the soloist. She had been announced to give the soprano part in the Fata Morgana from Nicode's "Sea," and to sing to piano some shorter things by Busoni, R. Strauss and Brahms. Her place was taken by Basta Tavary, whose appearance with Abbey's Italian Opera company here is remembered, and who sings in concert rather better than she does in opera. She sang two solos yesterday, both with orchestra; an air from "Don Juan," pure and, like so many things that are pure, rather colorless, and Elizabeth's remarks to the hall in "Tannhauser," that Mrs. Norton sang with the orchestra last season. Mrs. Tavary was in unusually good voice and sang with expression and dramatic effect, her solos being received with more applause than anything else on the programme, for there was a strange lack of warmth in the audience, perhaps because there was not quite as much warmth in the theater as usual. The piece of the programme—the piece—was Schumann's Second symphony, and seldom has a more perfect work been more perfectly played. Age seems to have clarified the symphonies of this most refined and intellectual writer and we are beginning to understand them for what they are, the grandest utterances of absolute music that we have had since Bach, excepting possibly those of Beethoven. This one is called the Second because it is the third, there being no other reason. It was written at a time when Schumann's mind had begun to cloud, yet it is as triumphant, as joyous, as free, as magnificent as anything that he ever wrote. Several years before he set about it he said that he could not get power enough out of the piano: that he wanted to crush it, and the aspiration toward a greater expression that he felt at that time he realized. It has been said that his lack of training in orchestral writing and the lateness of his abandonment of law for music resulted in some weakness and coarseness in his work, but, if such defects exist in this symphony, it would not be interesting to know where. There is not a bar, not a note that is not precious. Of prettiness and suavity there is a want, if that is all that music is to be judged by, but of the almost fierce creative spirit there is no lack. It is music that fits itself to majestic images. It is thought to tell of a triumph—and, indeed, it was a triumph of the spirit over mind, for, as Schumann was losing his mind, it can hardly be likened to a success of mind over matter—but it speaks of any great thing that imagination wishes to voice in music and to picture to its tones; the might or the repose of armies, the heaving of the sea, the march of clouds, the roll of worlds. Admirably was this work rendered, with smoothness, spirit, tenderness and feeling. There were but two other orchestral pieces, Lalo's overture to the "King of Ys," an opera that has long and ineffectually been promised by New York managers and the suite in D major by Dvorak. The overture is fresh, melodic, sensational and sensuous—a type of French music in its aims, but better than most French music in its accomplishment. Its orchestration has several originalities, and it is not easy to say that in these days. The Dvorak suite is rustic in character, the text, so to speak, being announced in the pastoral, with its drone bass, that opens the set of pieces. A hardly recognizable polka, a hardly recognizable minuet, a smooth romance and a lively finale succeed. In order to make unity among them Dr. Dvorak has repeated certain figures and by so doing has threatened monotony, but has never really committed it. The Wagner accompaniment was delightfully played and had that strange effect of seething, as if elemental forces, the very earth heats, were rising in the music. This evening the bill is to be repeated.

BUFFALO EXPRESS.

Sunday Morning, Jan. 15, 1893.

This will be a brilliant week in music—Paderewski on Monday, the orchestra concerts on Thursday, and on Saturday night the appearance at Music Hall of a remarkable musical constellation: Lillian Nordica, Sofia Scalchi and Helen Dudley Campbell, and Campanini, Del Puente and Emil Fischer, forming the Nordica Operatic Company. Following is the first part of the programme:

Piano solo. Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 6.....Liszt
Mr. Luckstone.

Aria. From "The Jewess".....Halevy
Mr. Fischer.

Cavatina. "Nobil Signor," from "Les Huguenots".....Meyerbeer
Mme. Scalchi.

Song. "Toreador," from "Carmen".....Bizet
Sig. Del Puente.

Aria. "Ah! fors e lui," from "La Traviata".....Verdi
Mme. Nordica.

Quartette. From "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Mme. Nordica, Mme. Scalchi, Sig. Campanini, Sig. Del Puente.

Song. "The Wanderer".....Schubert
Mr. Fischer.

Habanera. From "Carmen".....Bizet
Mme. Scalchi.

The second part of the programme will be devoted to Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana," which will be given entire in concert form, with Mme. Nordica as Santuzza, Miss Campbell as Lola, Campanini as Turridu and Del Puente as Alfio. Mr. Isidor Luckstone will act as musical director.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, JAN. 13, 1893.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall last night was not an unmixed joy. It had its moments of dullness, but fortunately for the record of the organization in New-York, where, so far as the press is concerned, it gets more appreciation than it does at home, the minutes of interest were much in the majority. We have learned to look for so much from Mr. Nikisch and his men that we perhaps expect from them more than we ought to. However, the shortcomings of last night were not theirs. To be sure the first clarinet showed signs of being under the weather in the tempo di menuetto of the symphony, but he could not be blamed altogether. The main cause of complaint in last night's performance was one of the soloists.

This was a young Italian pianist, Signorina Eugenia Castellano, a pupil of Martucci. She has already been heard in Boston, where she received considerable praise. She is very young yet and will undoubtedly improve, but it is certain that her performance last night revealed no remarkable gifts. She chose as the medium for the exhibition of her abilities Mendelssohn's G minor piano concerto, a work which abounds in rapid passages and has one gracefully sentimental theme of which a mature artist could make a good deal. Signorina Castellano displayed excellent skill in the rapid use of her fingers. She played scales, arpeggios, and octaves with great rapidity and clearness. But there are many pupils in the local conservatories who can do the same thing.

In all that goes to make piano playing poetic Signorina Castellano showed that she was painfully deficient. Her touch is as hard as iron. We do not remember hearing any pianist of late who could make a piano sound so wooden. The young lady's playing was absolutely devoid of singing quality, and it was equally wanting in symmetry of phrasing, wisdom in accentuation, and repose. If we were asked to give this young person what we should deem good advice, it would be to go home and study music for at least five years before again appearing in public. She might not regard such advice as kind, but it would be so.

Mr. Nikisch gave his hearers two soloists last night. The second was Timothee Adamowski, one of the first violins of the orchestra, and a player who needs no introduction to this public. Mr. Adamowski's work came like the breath of Spring flowers after that of the other soloist. His selection was the first two movements of Bruch's G minor violin concerto, a lovely and always welcome composition. The performer played it delightfully. His tone, for obvious atmospheric reasons, was somewhat smaller and less resonant than it usually is, but it was of sweet quality, and the intonation was always accurate. It is not of Mr. Adamowski's excellent bowing and stopping that special mention should now be made. His reading was so full of poetry and so satisfying in the serenity and repose of its artistic mood that it performed the highest office of music. It produced emotion and demanded the emphatic approval of the intellect. The audience was quick to see its merit, and the applause was of the very warmest kind.

The orchestral numbers were Beethoven's eighth symphony, the minuet and "Waltz of the Sylphs," from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," and Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 overture. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "little eighth" contained nothing of a revolutionary nature. Barring the shortcoming already mentioned, the work was well played. The Berlioz music, of course, served to display the virtuosity of the orchestra in a high light, and the valse had to be repeated. The overture was performed in a vigorous manner and with satisfactory precision.

Mrs. Nikisch, who was to sing at the Brooklyn concerts of the orchestra this afternoon and tomorrow night, is indisposed, and her place will be taken by Mme. Basta Tavary.

THE SUNDAY NEWS.

EDWARD H. BUTLER,

BUFFALO, JANUARY 15, 1893.

The Nordica Operatic Concert Company, which is booked for Saturday evening next, the 21st inst., at Music Hall, is a strong company, for, aside from its principal soprano, Mrs. Lillian Nordica, it embraces the following eminent artists: Sofia Scalchi, Helen Dudley Campbell, Campanini, Del Puente and Emil Fischer.

It was in December of 1882 that I heard the eminent contralto, Sofia Scalchi, make her local debut in New York as Arsace in Rossini's "Semiramide" with Patti, who sustained the title role. The great interest of the evening was of course centered in the appearance of the famous contralto. The distinguished artiste was born in Turin, Nov. 29, 1851, and made her first appearance as Ulrica in Verdi's opera, "The Masked Ball," at Mantua in 1867. Her first appearance in England was in London at the Covent Garden, as Azucena, in "Il Trovatore," in 1869. In 1875 she married Signor Luigi Alberto Lolli, a gentleman of Ferrara. Under the management of Col. Mapleson, the well-known impressario, she visited all the leading English, Scotch and Irish cities, going afterwards to St. Petersburg, where she sang for nine consecutive seasons. From there she went to Warsaw, Vienna, Madrid, and in 1881 she was engaged to sing in Rio Janeiro at a salary of $1000 a night. On leaving Rio Janeiro she was almost shipwrecked and was at sea no less than 25 days, and frequently practically under water for hours at a time, living upon what provisions were saved. Sofia Scalchi is one of the greatest artists and decidedly the greatest contralto that has ever been heard upon the operatic stage in this country.

A pleasing change from the usual concert programme will be the appearance of all the artists in a complete representation—minus chorus—of Mascagni's opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana."

The sale of seats for this affair begins Wednesday morning, the 18th, at Peter Paul & Bros.'

The Times - Republic.

Every Evening and Sunday Morning.

NORMAN E. MACK

EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

SUNDAY, JAN. 15, 1893.

Nordica Operatic Concert Company.

A more than usually attractive entertainment, and one that is most likely to draw a crowd of the best people to Music hall, will be given Saturday evening, Jan. 21st, by the Nordica Opera company. On looking over the names one is assured that Mr. C. A. Ellis of the Boston Symphony orchestra has gathered together the finest artists and singers that money can secure. The company is, of course, headed by the famous Madam Lillian Nordica, the American soprano. Associated with her are the following celebrated singers: Madam Sofia Scalchi, who, today, stands unrivaled as a contralto, and perhaps the most experienced artiste in her line that the world can offer; Signor Campanini, the celebrated tenor, is also one of the members; Miss Campbell, who was one of the most conscientious of the young artistes of the American Opera company, has been specially engaged by Mr. Ellis, as has also Signor Del Puente, the famous baritone. Aside from those mentioned, Emil Fischer, the grandest basso who has ever appeared in Buffalo, and the favorite of the public, will be numbered as one of the artists. The programme will consist of selections from popular grand operas, including the Rigoletto quartette and will conclude with a magnificent representation of Mascagni's complete opera Cavelleria Rusticana, with the following remarkable cast: Santuzza, Madam Nordica; Lola, Madam Scalchi; Lucia, Miss Helen Campbell; Turiddu, Signor Campanini; and Alfio, Signor Del Puente. Certainly no vocal musical attraction has been seen in Buffalo for many a day as strong as the Nordica company, and it certainly ought to draw. The sale of seats begins Wednesday, Jan. 18th at Peter Paul & Brothers. Prices are $1, $1.50 and $2, according to location.

Madam Lillian Nordica.

Buffalo Commercial

JAMES E. WARREN'S SONS, Proprietors.

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 14, 1893.

On next Saturday evening another fine concert will be given by the Nordica Concert Company. Nordica is an American (Lillian Norton) who has won fame abroad and the reputation of the best dramatic soprano in the country. Scalchi, a contralto singer, who also has world-wide fame, is a member of the company, with Miss Canbell, mezzo soprano, and Emil Fischer, who perhaps has received more honor from Buffalo audiences than any basso ever appearing in this city. The first of the program will be devoted to miscellaneous selections, "Cavelaria Rusticani" Mascagni's successful opera will be sung later. The sale of seats will open at Peter Paul's Wednesday next. The lack of interest shown by the general public in the works of the old composers is not wholly due to indifference but rather to lack of opportunity of becoming familiar with them. In this respect Buffalo is decidedly provincial, as almost every city of its size, number of inhabitants and musical cultivation has for some years supported a society for the production of oratorios. The attention of the public was called to this want in the COMMERCIAL some weeks ago, and an appeal made for the formation of such a society. We are happy to say it has been done by Mr. Frank Wilmhurst who has organized a chorus for the production of oratorio under the name of the Buffalo Sacred Harmonic Society, the first rehearsal of which was held on Jan. 12th at 641 Main street. Handel's Messiah is the first work to be produced, but as the society is yet in its infancy it is impossible to say exactly when it will be presented. Many more voices are wanted for each section and any one desiring to study oratorios will now be afforded an excellent opportunity. The rehearsals will take place on Thursday evenings at half past eight for ladies and Monday at the same time for gentlemen. All further information can be obtained by addressing Mr. Wilmhurst, Denton, Cottier & Daniels. It is to be hoped that singers will respond to this call and that we may soon be able to say Buffalo has a permanently organized society for the production of the highest form of music.

[87]

QUIPS OF BUFFALO.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

VOL. I. BUFFALO, N. Y., JAN. 14, 1893. No. 13.

Saturday evening, January 21st the Nordica Operatic Concert Co will give a concert at Music Hall. The simple enumeration of the gifted artists who are associated together in this organization would be enough to warrant a crowded house. Madame Lillian Nordica from whom the company takes its name is the soprano and one whose triumphs in opera and concert in London are very well known. She is one of the younger group of prima donnas and has achieved a world-wide reputation. She is ably seconded by Madame Schalchi, the great contralto, by Italo Campanini and Signor Del Puente, the famous tenor and baritone of the Italian school, by Emil Fischer who has sung for so many consecutive seasons during the reign of German opera at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City, and by Mrs. Helen Dudley Campbell who is a singer of recognized ability in this country. The whole organization is under the direction of Isidor Luckstone. These are great names in the production of opera and operatic selections and will undoubtedly attract the attention of the Buffalo public to a high degree. The program to be presented by the company is unique and will consist of two parts, the time devoted to the first part being taken up with an elaborate list of operatic selections suitable for concert rendition, while the second half of the program will be devoted to the production in concert of Cavelleria Rusticano by Mascagni. The role of Santuzza, the heroine of the opera will be assumed by Madame Nordica, the part of Lolo by Madame Schalchi, and Lucia by Mrs. Campbell. Signor Campanini will take the character of Turiddu and Signor Del Puente that of Alfio. As these artists are all thorougly at home in all Italian operas and are equal in every respect to the requirements of the same, it means a grand opportunity for this city to hear the latest production of the Italian school of composers, rendered by artists belonging to the same school of performers. They have already revealed their large repertoire in Boston and New York by similiar performances of Gounod's Faust and other works of the great opera composers, and hence a magnificent concert may safely be prophesied.

—THE MUSICIAN.

The Buffalo Commercial

JAMES D. WARREN'S SONS.

FRIDAY EVENING, JANUARY 13, 1893.

A Grand Operatic Concert.

The Nordica Operatic Concert company, under the direction of Mr. Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consisting of Mme. Lillian Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Sig. Italo Campanini, Sig. Del Puente, Emil Fischer and Isadore Luckstone, musical director, will be heard at Music Hall, Saturday Jan. 21st, in a miscellaneous concert, concluding with Mascayni's beautiful opera "Cavelleria Rusticana" with the above artists in the cast. The sale of seats begins at Peter Paul & Brothers Wednesday morning next.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 17, 1893.

The Nordica concert company, under the direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis, called out a brilliant gathering at Music Hall last evening. Music Hall has seldom held a larger or more critical audience, which was worked up to the highest pitch of enthusiasm by the magnificent work of the various artists, and encores and recalls were frequent. The programme was quite lengthy, but the selections were particularly happy and gave an opportunity for a most brilliant display of vocal gifts. Mme. Nordica was tendered a most cordial greeting and was in splendid voice, her high notes were perfectly sustained, and her shading and runs aroused the greatest enthusiasm.

Mme. Scalchi arrived in New York from Europe this morning, and was late in arriving at the hall. The management announced that although Mme. Scalchi was very much fatigued she would sing rather than disappoint the audience. At the close of her solo she was given an ovation that her artistic singing fully warranted. The gems of the evening were the selections from Gounod's "Faust." Messrs. Campanini and Fischer sang their solos and concerted numbers with great spirit and expression, and their trio with Mme. Nordica evoked tremendous applause. Mr. Ellis is to be congratulated on the magnificent success of his concert, which was a decided treat to the musical public. Floral tributes were both beautiful and numerous.

The Kneisel Quartet concert at Chickering Hall last evening drew an audience that was thoroughly pleased, the concert rendered being perhaps the finest of the season. The programme was: Trio in B flat minor, piano and violins, from Volkmann; quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, from Schumann; and quintet for clarinet, violins, viola and 'cello, in B minor, Op. 115, from Brahms. Messrs. F. Busoni and G. Goldschmidt were the assisting artists.

EDITION HEBDO.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. VOL. XCIII, NO. 17.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1893.

THE NORDICA CONCERT COMPANY.

Few of those now engaged in catering to the ever-changing whims of pleasure seekers possess that sixth sense which enables one to keep in touch with the public in a larger degree than Manager Charles A. Ellis, who last evening gave new evidence of this characteristic in presenting to the music lovers of Boston the Nordica operatic concert company.

Any lingering doubt as to the wisdom and sound financial sense of this action was at once removed by a glance inside the doors of Music Hall, for a bigger audience has never been known to assemble there, and one that made evident its enjoyment of the things musical offered for its entertainment cannot be recalled. It was an audience that knew what it liked, and had no hesitation in letting its tastes be known.

The organization and the programme presented by its members alike justify the enthusiasm shown during the evening in the applause of the audience, and the two and a half hours passed away all too quickly for those who made up the attendance.

Manager Ellis has again shown his intelligent estimate of the public taste by choosing Mme. Lillian Nordica as the prima donna of his concert organization for the transcontinental tour he has mapped out, and the public's approval of this choice last evening was most unmistakably shown. He has, with equal good judgment, surrounded his star with a company of singers both popular and of the highest artistic talent, having full confidence in the ability of his prima donna to maintain her pre-eminence, however brilliant her associates.

The artists engaged to support Mme. Nordica are Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Sig. Italo Campanini, Sig. Giuseppe Del Puente and Herr Emil Fischer, with Sig. R. Sapio as conductor and Mr. I. Luckstone as accompanist.

All these names are familiar to the public, and the fact that all the artists have a well established popularity with the local public was fully attested by the hearty greeting given each and all upon their entrance.

The programme had for its first part a list of miscellaneous numbers made familiar to regular attendants upon concerts in seasons past, but their lasting popularity was amply shown in the enjoyment their performance gave last night's audience, and this fact should be remembered by the limited few who found them ever familiar.

Mme. Nordica, as might be expected, took her place as first in the hearts of the people the instant she stepped upon the stage. There was no need for her to sing to gain the favor of the audience, for a single glance at the queenly figure of the singer, arrayed in a gorgeous but indescribable gown, quite captivated all who had any sense of artistic effects and satisfied the eye so thoroughly that the ear was necessarily prejudiced in favor of Mme. Nordica before she began the "Keine de Saba" aria, from Gounod's opera.

The ear of the listener, however, coincided with his or her eye at the conclusion of the aria, and the unanimous verdict in favor of the evening's prima donna was manifested by a storm of applause, as well as many and elegant floral tributes. Mme. Nordica was in superb voice, and, after bowing her acknowledgments of the ovation given her again and again, sung, to piano accompaniment, a pretty French song by Delibes, called "The Daughters of Cadix." The greater triumphs of this singer came, however, in the second part of the programme, which was made up of excerpts from Gounod's "Faust," in which Mme. Nordica's singing of the "Jewel Song" and her work in the duet with Faust and the final trio were truly grand and inspiring.

Mme. Scalchi did not need the apologetic words uttered in her behalf, which told the audience that she was aboard the Champagne in New York harbor yesterday forenoon, and only reached the hall in season by a most fatiguing railroad ride and a series of pitched battles in overcoming the red tape proceedings of the customs department incidental to her landing. Her action in "getting there" certainly proved that the ability to "hustle" is not confined to the people of this side the Atlantic, and the storm of applause which rewarded her appearance showed how fully her Boston admirers appreciated her successful efforts to avoid their disappointment. She sung the familiar "Nobil Signor" in her own grand, broad style, and was recalled with marked enthusiasm to add an encore number.

Herr Fischer's popularity here in Boston is proverbial, and he was compelled to return after the aria from "La Juive," and responded to the applause with Dessaur's "Enticement." The ever popular Sig. Del Puente, who was never in better voice than on this occasion, sung the ever popular "Toreador's Song," and added that of Figara in "Il Barbiere," and Sig. Campanini again won almost unlimited admiration for his thoroughly artistic vocal work.

Sig. Sapio, in addition to doing excellent work as conductor, contributed a delightful "tone picture" for orchestra, called "Storm at Vespertide," which was greatly appreciated, as was all the work of the excellent orchestra.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The series of chamber concerts by the Kneisel quartet was continued last evening at Chickering Hall, the subscribers for the season attending in so large numbers as so fill the auditorium.

The string players of the quartet had the assistance of Mr. F. B. Busoni at the piano and Mr. Goldschmidt as clarinet player, the works of the evening's programme being Volkman's trio for violin, piano and 'cello, Schumann's quartet in A minor, and, as a novelty, Brahm's quintet for clarinet.

The assisting artists were entirely equal to the demands of the evening, and fairly shared with Mr. Kneisel and his associates in the good work done in the programme, the performance of which gained the heartiest applause from the critical audience of regular patrons.

The quintet, which had its first hearing here on this occasion, is in the most tuneful style of the composer, and presents difficulties for the clarinet which only a master of the instrument can interpret with success.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1893.

The Nordica Concert Company.

The company organized by Mr. Charles A. Ellis of the Music Hall for a tour through the United States, under the name The Nordica Operatic Concert Company, gave its first concert in this city at the Music Hall last night. The steamer that brought Scalchi from the shores of France was late; she had started from New York in the forenoon and was so late in getting from her hotel to the hall that her first song came after Nordica's aria and the orchestral piece, and she rested during the selection from "Lucia," so that the sextet became a quintet. Excepting these slight changes the band and singers followed this programme:

Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Toreador's Song from "Carmen".....Bizet
Giuseppe del Puente.
Aria from "La Juive".....Halévy
Emil Fischer.
Cavatina, Nobil Signor, from "Les Huguenots".....Meyerbeer
Mrs. Sofia Schalchi.
Aria from "La Reine de Saba".....Gounod
Mrs. Lillian Nordica.
Tone Picture: "Storm at Vespertide".....R. Sapio
Sextet and Finale from "Lucia di Lammermoor."
Donizetti
Mmes. Nordica and Scalchi, and Messrs. Campanini, Del Puenti, George W. Want and Fischer.
Third act of "Faust".....Gounod
Maguerita, Mrs. Nordica; Siebel, Mrs. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell; Faust, Mr. Campanini; Mefistofele, Mr. Fischer.
Romualdo Sapio, director; I. Luckstone, accompanist.

It was a great popular first night at Music Hall. The house was filled with an enthusiastic audience so ready to be pleased that applause was constant, even waiting upon certain vocal and physical struggles; and when any artist made a genuine hit—and there were numbers of these—the audience showed its delight and its welcome of old favorites in unbounded measure. Mr. Del Puente sang for his first recall Figaro's song from "The Barber of Seville" and smilingly shared the pleasure of his hearers. Mr. Fischer, with his big organ-like voice embosoming all the melancholy of a race, sang the Cardinal's song from "La Juive" with great effect. Then Nordica sang. She was never more brilliant in voice, in manner, in looks. Her artistic and personal poise were quite as effective on the concert stage as in opera. Her voice in her first selection was so sweet, so well in control, so full of melody, that she more than won the generous and repeated recalls, which she repaid with "The Girls of Cadiz."

Mrs. Scalchi was tired and she put her hand to her throat and coughed a little once or twice, while the sympathetic audience tried in vain to repress sympathetic clickings of the throat. But silence was perfect during her hearty singing of her cavatina and Gounod's song. "Marguerite," for, of course, a second song was demanded from the newly-arrived voyager. The famous "Lucia" quintet was repeated. Then came the scenes from "Faust," and certainly in spite of the lack of red clothes for Mephistopheles, a garden for Faust and a spinning-wheel for Marguerite, the voices in happy accord, and the warmth of interest in the audience lent dramatic illusion and made a success. Nordica re-captured everybody when she sang alone, and there was, so to speak, rosy fire in the air when all was done, although there was no curtain to fall upon the scene.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1893.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

The concert given by the Nordica Operatic Concert Company last evening in Music Hall was "one of the real old kind." There was an audience that crowded the hall; there was enthusiasm: there were floral tributes that were awarded at the proper moment, and there was some good singing. The orchestra, made up of members of the Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Sapio, played the "William Tell" overture. Mr. Del Puente then gave his celebrated version of the Toreador's song, which was followed by Figaro's air from "The Barber of Seville." Mr. Luckstone played a pianoforte accompaniment to the latter number, and by his performance belied his name. Mr. Fischer delivered the Cardinal's air from "The Jewess" with fine effect; his trill, however, seemed strangulated. He added a pretty and simple German song. And then an announcement was made, viz.: that Mrs. Scalchi landed in New York this morning, and begged the indulgence of the audience. The name of the hotel where she stops was mentioned, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith. Mrs. Nordica sang the aria of Balkis from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" exceedingly well, and she fully deserved the generous applause. In response to an imperious recall, she sang Delibes's "Girls of Cadiz" with vocal skill and with finesse. Mr. Sapio's "Tone-picture, Storm at Vespertide," was played by the orchestra. The "Tone-picture" included a vesper hymn, percussion thunder and piccolo lightning; there was also a quotation from Wagner's "Waldweben." Mrs. Scalchi was greeted with hearty applause. Although she was evidently not in good condition, she pleased the audience mightily by her singing of the cavatina from "The Huguenots" and Gounod's song "Marguerite." The sextet from "Lucia" was performed by a quintette, and at the start there was vocal discussion concerning the true pitch. The sextette was redemanded, and the second performance was better. Mr. Want of this city assisted in this number.

Then followed scenes from the third act of "Faust," in which Nordica, Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Campanini and Fischer took part. All of the singers were loudly applauded, but the feature of the second part of the entertainment was the superb singing of Nordica. She has improved of late in her delivery, and there was no trace last evening of harsh and metallic tones that even two years ago marred at times her performance. The Mephistopheles of Fischer has lately been studying Italian, and although his pronunciation is at present neither Tuscan nor Roman, the audience was spared the enormity of a polyglot quartette.

These singers who should be on the operatic stage are obliged in this country to sing operatic selections without costume, scenery and action. Mephistopheles wore eyeglasses and sat close to a harp. He and Martha sang amiably from the printed book. Faust wooed in evening dress, and Marguerite listened in a gorgeous robe. And yet it was a pleasure to hear once more the tunes of France and Italy.

PHILIP HALE.

[88.]

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1893.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

Mr. Kneisel and the other members of his quartet gave a somewhat lengthy concert programme in Chickering Hall last night.

The programme had three long numbers—the Volkmann trio in B flat minor for piano, violin and 'cello; Schumann's quartet in A minor, and Brahm's quintet in B minor for clarinet, two violins, viola and 'cello. The regular quartet was assisted by Mr. F. Busoni and Mr. G. Goldschmidt.

The gem of the evening was the Schumann quartet, which was no able in a programme generally excellent. The scherzo-presto movement in particular was superbly played, and the adagio, in which the first violin had a long obligato part, also roused the greatest enthusiasm among the audience.

The Brahm's quintet has never before been played in Boston; it is well worth a second hearing. The performance last night was an excellent one in almost every particular, although the violins sometimes obscured the work of the clarinet. The next concert will be given on Feb. 13.

QUIPS OF BUFFALO.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

VOL. I. BUFFALO, N. Y., JAN. 14, 1893. No. 13.

Saturday evening, January 21st the Nordica Operatic Concert Co will give a concert at Music Hall. The simple enumeration of the gifted artists who are associated together in this organization would be enough to warrant a crowded house. Madame Lillian Nordica from whom the company takes its name is the soprano and one whose triumphs in opera and concert in London are very well known. She is one of the younger group of prima donnas and has achieved a world-wide reputation. She is ably seconded by Madame Schalchi, the great contralto, by Italo Campanini and Signor Del Puente, the famous tenor and baritone of the Italian school, by Emil Fischer who has sung for so many consecutive seasons during the reign of German opera at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City, and by Mrs. Helen Dudley Campbell who is a singer of recognized ability in this country. The whole organization is under the direction of Isidor Luckstone. These are great names in the production of opera and operatic selections and will undoubtedly attract the attention of the Buffalo public to a high degree. The program to be presented by the company is unique and will consist of two parts, the time devoted to the first part being taken up with an elaborate list of operatic selections suitable for concert rendition, while the second half of the program will be devoted to the production in concert of Cavelleria Rusticano by Mascagni. The role of Santuzza, the heroine of the opera will be assumed by Madame Nordica, the part of Lolo by Madame Schalchi, and Lucia by Mrs. Campbell. Signor Campanini will take the character of Turiddu and Signor Del Puente that of Alfio. As these artists are all thoroughly at home in all Italian operas and are equal in every respect to the requirements of the same, it means a grand opportunity for this city to hear the latest production of the Italian school of composers, rendered by artists belonging to the same school of performers. They have already revealed their large repertoire in Boston and New York by similiar performances of Gounod's Faust and other works of the great opera composers, and hence a magnificent concert may safely be prophesied.

—THE MUSICIAN.

The Buffalo Commercial

JAMES D. WARREN'S SONS.

FRIDAY EVENING, JANUARY 13, 1893.

A Grand Operatic Concert.

The Nordica Operatic Concert company, under the direction of Mr. Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consisting of Mme. Lillian Nordica, Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Sig. Italo Campanini, Sig. Del Puente, Emil Fischer and Isadore Luckstone, musical director, will be heard at Music Hall, Saturday Jan. 21st, in a miscellaneous concert, concluding with Mascayni's beautiful opera "Cavelleria Rusticana" with the above artists in the cast. The sale of seats begins at Peter Paul & Brothers Wednesday morning next.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 17, 1893.

The Nordica concert company, under the direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis, called out a brilliant gathering at Music Hall last evening. Music Hall has seldom held a larger or more critical audience, which was worked up to the highest pitch of enthusiasm by the magnificent work of the various artists, and encores and recalls were frequent. The programme was quite lengthy, but the selections were particularly happy and gave an opportunity for a most brilliant display of vocal gifts. Mme. Nordica was tendered a most cordial greeting and was in splendid voice, her high notes were perfectly sustained, and her shading and runs aroused the greatest enthu iasm.

Mme. Scalchi arrived in New York from Europe this morning, and was late in arriving at the hall. The management announced that although Mme. Scalchi was very much fatigued she would sing rather than disappoint the audience. At the close of her solo she was given an ovation that her artistic singing fully warranted. The gems of the evening were the selections from Gounod's "Faust." Messrs. Campanini and Fischer sang their solos and concerted numbers with great spirit and expression, and their trio with Mme. Nordica evoked tremendous applause. Mr. Ellis is to be congratulated on the magnificent success of his concert, which was a decided treat to the musical public. Floral tributes were both beautiful and numerous.

The Kneisel Quartet concert at Chickering Hall last evening drew an audience that was thoroughly pleased, the concert rendered being perhaps the finest of the season. The programme was: Trio in B flat minor, piano and violins, from Volkmann; quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, from Schumann; and quintet for clarinet, violins, viola and 'cello, in B minor, Op. 115, from Brahms. Messrs. F. Busoni and G. Goldschmidt were the assisting artists.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 17.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1893.

THE NORDICA CONCERT COMPANY.

Few of those now engaged in catering to the ever-changing whims of pleasure seekers possess that sixth sense which enables one to keep in touch with the public in a larger degree than Manager Charles A. Ellis, who last evening gave new evidence of this characteristic in presenting to the music lovers of Boston the Nordica operatic concert company.

Any lingering doubt as to the wisdom and sound financial sense of this action was at once removed by a glance inside the doors of Music Hall, for a bigger audience has never been known to assemble there, and one that made evident its enjoyment of the things musical offered for its entertainment cannot be recalled. It was an audience that knew what it liked, and had no hesitation in letting its tastes be known.

The organization and the programme presented by its members alike justify the enthusiasm shown during the evening in the applause of the audience, and the two and a half hours passed away all too quickly for those who made up the attendance.

Manager Ellis has again shown his intelligent estimate of the public taste by choosing Mme. Lillian Nordica as the prima donna of his concert organization for the transcontinental tour he has mapped out, and the public's approval of this choice last evening was most unmistakably shown. He has, with equal good judgment, surrounded his star with a company of singers both popular and of the highest artistic talent, having full confidence in the ability of his prima donna to maintain her pre-eminence, however brilliant her associates.

The artists engaged to support Mme. Nordica are Mme. Sofia Scalchi, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Sig. Italo Campanini, Sig. Giuseppe Del Puente and Herr Emil Fischer, with Sig. R. Sapio as conductor and Mr. I. Luckstone as accompanist.

All these names are familiar to the public, and the fact that all the artists have a well established popularity with the local public was fully attested by the hearty greeting given each and all upon their entrance.

The programme had for its first part a list of miscellaneous numbers made familiar to regular attendants upon concerts in seasons past, but their lasting popularity was amply shown in the enjoyment their performance gave last night's audience, and this fact should be remembered by the limited few who found them ever familiar.

Mme. Nordica, as might be expected, took her place as first in the hearts of the people the instant she stepped upon the stage. There was no need for her to sing to gain the favor of the audience, for a single glance at the queenly figure of the singer, arrayed in a gorgeous but indescribable gown, quite captivated all who had any sense of artistic effects and satisfied the eye so thoroughly that the ear was necessarily prejudiced in favor of Mme. Nordica before she began the "Keine de Saba" aria, from Gounod's opera.

The ear of the listener, however, coincided with his or her eye at the conclusion of the aria, and the unanimous verdict in favor of the evening's prima donna was manifested by a storm of applause, as well as many and elegant floral tributes. Mme. Nordica was in superb voice, and, after bowing her acknowledgments of the ovation given her again and again, sung, to piano accompaniment, a pretty French song by Delibes, called "The Daughters of Cadix." The greater triumphs of this singer came, however, in the second part of the programme, which was made up of excerpts from Gounod's "Faust," in which Mme. Nordica's singing of the "Jewel Song" and her work in the duet with Faust and the final trio were truly grand and inspiring.

Mme. Scalchi did not need the apologetic words uttered in her behalf, which told the audience that she was aboard the Champagne in New York harbor yesterday forenoon, and only reached the hall in season by a most fatiguing railroad ride and a series of pitched battles in overcoming the red tape proceedings of the customs department incidental to her landing. Her action in "getting there" certainly proved that the ability to "hustle" is not confined to the people of this side the Atlantic, and the storm of applause which rewarded her appearance showed how fully her Boston admirers appreciated her successful efforts to avoid their disappointment. She sung the familiar "Nobil Signor" in her own grand, broad style, and was recalled with marked enthusiasm to add an encore number.

Herr Fischer's popularity here in Boston is proverbial, and he was compelled to return after the aria from "La Juive," and responded to the applause with Dessaur's "Enticement." The ever popular Sig. Del Puente, who was never in better voice than on this occasion, sung the ever popular "Toreador's Song," and added that of Figara in "Il Barbiere," and Sig. Campanini again won almost unlimited admiration for his thoroughly artistic vocal work.

Sig. Sapio, in addition to doing excellent work as conductor, contributed a delightful "tone picture" for orchestra, called "Storm at Vespertide," which was greatly appreciated, as was all the work of the excellent orchestra.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The series of chamber concerts by the Kneisel quartet was continued last evening at Chickering Hall, the subscribers for the season attending in so large numbers as so fill the auditorium.

The string players of the quartet had the assistance of Mr. F. B. Busoni at the piano and Mr. Goldschmidt as clarinet player, the works of the evening's programme being Volkman's trio for violin, piano and 'cello, Schumann's quartet in A minor, and, as a novelty, Brahm's quintet for clarinet.

The assisting artists were entirely equal to the demands of the evening, and fairly shared with Mr. Kneisel and his associates in the good work done in the programme, the performance of which gained the heartiest applause from the critical audience of regular patrons.

The quintet, which had its first hearing here on this occasion, is in the most tuneful style of the composer, and presents difficulties for the clarinet which only a master of the instrument can interpret with success.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1893.

The Nordica Concert Company.

The company organized by Mr. Charles A. Ellis of the Music Hall for a tour through the United States, under the name The Nordica Operatic Concert Company, gave its first concert in this city at the Music Hall last night. The steamer that brought Scalchi from the shores of France was late; she had started from New York in the forenoon and was so late in getting from her hotel to the hall that her first song came after Nordica's aria and the orchestral piece, and she rested during the selection from "Lucia," so that the sextet became a quintet. Excepting these slight changes the band and singers followed this programme:

Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Toreador's Song from "Carmen".....Bizet
Giuseppe del Puente.
Aria from "La Juive".....Halévy
Emil Fischer.
Cavatina, Nobil Signor, from "Les Huguenots"
Meyerbeer
Mrs. Sofia Schalchi.
Aria from "La Reine de Saba".....Gounod
Mrs. Lillian Nordica.
Tone Picture, "Storm at Vespertide".....R. Sapio
Sextet and Finale from "Lucia di Lammermoor,"
Donizetti
Mmes. Nordica and Scalchi, and Messrs. Campanini, Del Puenti, George W. Want and Fischer.
Third act of "Faust".....Gounod
Maguerita, Mrs. Nordica; Siebel, Mrs. Scalchi; Marta, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell; Faust, Mr. Campanini; Mefistofele, Mr. Fischer.
Romualdo Sapio, director; I. Luckstone, accompanist.

It was a great popular first night at Music Hall. The house was filled with an enthusiastic audience so ready to be pleased that applause was constant, even waiting upon certain vocal and physical struggles; and when any artist made a genuine hit—and there were numbers of these—the audience showed its delight and its welcome of old favorites in unbounded measure. Mr. Del Puente sang for his first recall Figaro's song from "The Barber of Seville" and smilingly shared the pleasure of his hearers. Mr. Fischer, with his big organ-like voice embosoming all the melancholy of a race, sang the Cardinal's song from "La Juive" with great effect. Then Nordica sang. She was never more brilliant in voice, in manner, in looks. Her artistic and personal poise were quite as effective on the concert stage as in opera. Her voice in her first selection was so sweet, so well in control, so full of melody, that she more than won the generous and repeated recalls, which she repaid with "The Girls of Cadiz."

Mrs. Scalchi was tired and she put her hand to her throat and coughed a little once or twice, while the sympathetic audience tried in vain to repress sympathetic clickings of the throat. But silence was perfect during her hearty singing of her cavatina and Gounod's song, "Marguerite," for, of course, a second song was demanded from the newly arrived voyager. The famous "Lucia" quintet was repeated. Then came the scenes from "Faust," and certainly in spite of the lack of red clothes for Mephistopheles, a garden for Faust and a spinning-wheel for Marguerite, the voices in happy accord, and the warmth of interest in the audience lent dramatic illusion and made a success. Nordica re-captured everybody when she sang alone, and there was, so to speak, rosy fire in the air when all was done, although there was no curtain to fall upon the scene.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1893.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

The concert given by the Nordica Operatic Concert Company last evening in Music Hall was "one of the real old kind." There was an audience that crowded the hall; there was enthusiasm: there were floral tributes that were awarded at the proper moment, and there was some good singing. The orchestra, made up of members of the Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Sapio, played the "William Tell" overture. Mr. Del Puente then gave his celebrated version of the Toreador's song, which was followed by Figaro's air from "The Barber of Seville." Mr. Luckstone played a pianoforte accompaniment to the latter number, and by his performance belied his name. Mr. Fischer delivered the Cardinal's air from "The Jewess" with fine effect; his trill, however, seemed strangulated. He added a pretty and simple German song. And then an announcement was made, viz.: that Mrs. Scalchi landed in New York this morning, and begged the indulgence of the audience. The name of the hotel where she stop, was mentioned, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith. Mrs. Nordica sang the aria of Balkis from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" exceedingly well, and she fully deserved the generous applause. In response to an imperious recall, she sang Delibes's "Girls of Cadiz" with vocal skill and with finesse. Mr. Sapio's "Tone-picture, Storm at Vespertide," was played by the orchestra. The "Tone-picture" included a vesper hymn, percussion thunder and piccolo lightning; there was also a quotation from Wagner's "Waldweben." Mrs. Scalchi was greeted with hearty applause. Although she was evidently not in good condition, she pleased the audience mightily by her singing of the cavatina from "The Huguenots" and Gounod's song "Marguerite." The sextet from "Lucia" was performed by a quintette, and at the start there was vocal discussion concerning the true pitch. The sextette was redemanded, and the second performance was better. Mr. Want of this city assisted in this number.

Then followed scenes from the third act of "Faust," in which Nordica, Scalchi, Miss Campbell, Campanini and Fischer took part. All of the singers were loudly applauded, but the feature of the second part of the entertainment was the superb singing of Nordica. She has improved of late in her delivery, and there was no trace last evening of harsh and metallic tones that even two years ago marred at times her performance. The Mephistopheles of Fischer has lately been studying Italian, and although his pronunciation is at present neither Tuscan nor Roman, the audience was spared the enormity of a polyglot quartette.

These singers who should be on the operatic stage are obliged in this country to sing operatic selections without costume, scenery and action. Mephistopheles wore eyeglasses and sat close to a harp. He and Martha sang amiably from the printed book. Faust wooed in evening dress, and Marguerite listened in a gorgeous robe. And yet it was a pleasure to hear once more the tunes of France and Italy.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Globe

TUESDAY, JAN. 17, 1893.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

Mr. Kneisel and the other members of his quartet gave a somewhat lengthy concert programme in Chickering Hall last night.

The programme had three long numbers—the Volkmann trio in B flat minor for piano, violin and 'cello; Schumann's quartet in A minor, and Brahm's quintet in B minor for clarinet, two violins, viola and 'cello. The regular quartet was assisted by Mr. F. Basoni and Mr. G. Goldschmidt.

The gem of the evening was the Schumann quartet, which was no able in a programme generally excellent. The scherzo-presto movement in particular was superbly played, and the adagio, in which the first violin had a long obligato part, also roused the greatest enthusiasm among the audience.

The Brahm's quintet has never before been played in Boston; it is well worth a second hearing. The performance last night was an excellent one in almost every particular, although the violins sometimes obscured the work of the clarinet. The next concert will be given on Feb. 13.

[88.]

The Musical Herald of the United States

(Formerly the BO[illegible] tablished 1882.)

JANUARY, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The epithets of praise which suggest themselves at each recurring concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are becoming trite, and if Mr. Nikisch is not careful he will soon have nothing for the reviewer to do but to make a record of his performances. We do not know that such a contingency would be in any respect deplorable. Talk about music and musical performances is frequently very unentertaining when it is not amusing because of its rhapsodic hysteria, and if the time shall come when so delightful an entertainment as Mr. Nikisch provides can be disposed of with a hearty "well done, good and faithful servant of the beautiful," it will be an indication of advancing culture, at least on the part of the critic, and possibly also on the part of the public that shall be willing to accept such a criticism.

Concerning the second concert by the Boston orchestra we leave the reader to recall to memory the warmest praise that has been spoken of Mr. Nikisch and his band of virtuosi in these columns, and to imagine them repeated with such emphasis as is invited by the fact that on this occasion there was a special appeal to gratitude on the score of a performance of Brahms' symphony in F. It may be that there are some enthusiastic admirers of this composer who go too far in their estimation of him. That question may be left open. There is no doubt, however, that he is being too persistently neglected in our concert rooms since the departure of Mr. Thomas.

The other orchestral numbers on the program were a suite in D major, Op. 39, by Dvorak, and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch." The suite is a dainty and extremely characteristic bit of music, in which all of the composer's marvelous ingenuity and skill are expended in dance rhythms of peculiar piquancy and grace. Between the symphony and the suite Miss Suza Doane, a young woman, native, we believe, of New York, and recently returned from four years' study in Leipsic, played Chopin's "Andante Spianato and Polonaise." Miss Doane was honored beyond the usual measure meted out to novices in being introduced to the public at such a concert. She is far from being a ripe pianist, though she has some of the elements which go into the education of one. Her style is dry, unelastic and unpoetical. This was obvious enough in her reading of the Chopin composition, with its wholly superfluous accompaniment, but it was emphasized in Heller's transcription of Mendelssohn's "Auf Fluegeln des Gesanges," which she played in recognition of a kind recall.

The seventh concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra course at Music Hall, came on December 3, with this program: Bach: Suite, D major. D'Albert: Symphony, Op. 4. Wagner: Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

The novelty was the symphony—Mr. Damrosch played it in New York in 1888, by the way—which as the story runs, was written when the composer was but nineteen years old; it is known that he was but twenty-two when it was first performed. It has been declared that the marks of youth and inexperience abound through the work, its very length and fullness being included among these evidences. Then, too, there are the signs of the influence of others, which always appear in the compositions of young musicians. In this case Brahms and Wagner have been named as the controlling spirits, the former being much the stronger. All this is but another way of saying that the work has its vague moments—and very long moments they are; but, somehow, in spite of passages that are painfully lacking in euphony, and in spite, too, of its length and over-elaboration, the symphony is interesting and gives an impression of genius in its origin.

The Symphony Orchestra at its eighth concert, on December 17, celebrated the 121st anniversary of the birth of Beethoven, by performing the eighth and ninth symphonies of the master. The audience was as large as the house could legally hold, and the work of the orchestra was distinguished by unusual vigor. In the last movement of the choral symphony the voice parts were sung by Miss Priscilla White, soprano; Miss Louise Leimer, contralto; Mr. W. J. Winch, tenor; Mr. H. Meyn, bass, and a chorus. The last named element was small, but was zealous and determined, and these qualities went far toward compensating for a lack of volume in the tone.

For the ninth concert, December 24, the following was the program:

Lalo: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys. Chopin: Three pianoforte solos—nocturne in E minor (posthumous) and scherzo in B minor. Martucci: Concert study. Wagner: "Waldweben" from "Siegfried." Mendelssohn: symphony, "Italian."

The only new feature was the appearance of a pianist from Italy. Miss Eugenia Castellano has the figure and carriage of a girl under twenty, and the look of a woman of thirty. Her playing was remarkable for its clearness of tone and steadiness of movement, but considered as "interpretations" her performances of the selections from Chopin were of no value; they had too much the air of well committed tasks. She made the best effect in the bit by Martucci, a scherzo-like sort of thing, which she played with exceptional brightness. Two recalls, with an extra contribution from her for each, testified to the pleasure of her hearers.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1893.

The Nordica Concert Company.

The company organized by Mr. Charles A. Ellis of the Music Hall for a tour through the United States, under the name The Nordica Operatic Concert Company, gave its first concert in this city at the Music Hall last night. The steamer that brought Scalchi from the shores of France was late; she had started from New York in the forenoon and was so late in getting from her hotel to the hall that her first song came after Nordica's aria and the orchestral piece, and she rested during the selection from "Lucia," so that the sextet became a quintet. Excepting these slight changes the band and singers followed this programme:

Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Toreador's Song from "Carmen".....Bizet
Giuseppe del Puente.
Aria from "La Juive".....Halévy
Emil Fischer.
Cavatina, Nobil Signor, from "Les Huguenots"
Meyerbeer
Mrs. Sofia Scalchi.
Aria from "La Reine de Saba".....Gounod
Mrs. Lillian Nordica.
Tone Picture, "Storm at Vespertide".....R. Sapio
Sextet and Finale from "Lucia di Lammermoor."
Donizetti
Mmes. Nordica and Scalchi, and Messrs. Campanini, Del Puenti, George W. Want and Fischer.
Third act of "Faust".....Gounod
Maguerita, Mrs. Nordica; Siebel, Mrs. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell; Faust, Mr. Campanini; Mefistofele, Mr. Fischer.
Romualdo Sapio, director; I. Luckstone, accompanist.

It was a great popular first night at Music Hall. The house was filled with an enthusiastic audience so ready to be pleased that applause was constant, even waiting upon certain vocal and physical struggles; and when any artist made a genuine hit—and there were numbers of these—the audience showed its delight and its welcome of old favorites in unbounded measure. Mr. Del Puente sang for his first recall Figaro's song from "The Barber of Seville" and smilingly shared the pleasure of his hearers. Mr. Fischer, with his big organ-like voice embosoming all the melancholy of a race, sang the Cardinal's song from "La Juive" with great effect. Then Nordica sang. She was never more brilliant in voice, in manner, in looks. Her artistic and personal poise were quite as effective on the concert stage as in opera. Her voice in her first selection was so sweet, so well in control, so full of melody, that she more than won the generous and repeated recalls, which she repaid with "The Girls of Cadiz."

Mrs. Scalchi was tired and she put her hand to her throat and coughed a little once or twice, while the sympathetic audience tried in vain to repress sympathetic clickings of the throat. But silence was perfect during her hearty singing of her cavatina and Gounod's song, "Marguerite," for, of course, a second song was demanded from the newly arrived voyager. The famous "Lucia" quintet was repeated. Then came the scenes from "Faust," and certainly in spite of the lack of red clothes for Mephistopheles, a garden for Faust and a spinning-wheel for Marguerite, the voices in happy accord, and the warmth of interest in the audience lent dramatic illusion and made a success. Nordica re-captured everybody when she sang alone, and there was, so to speak, rosy fire in the air when all was done, although there was no curtain to fall upon the scene.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

At Chickering Hall, last night, the Kneisel Quartet gave the fifth in the current series of chamber concerts, with this programme:

Volkmann—Trio in B-flat minor for pianoforte, violin and violoncello.
Schumann—Quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, for strings.
Brahms—Quintet in B minor, Op. 115, for clarinet and strings.
Pianoforte, Mr. F. Busoni; clarinet, Mr. G. Goldschmidt.

The recurrence of minor keys suggests a sad, not to say gloomy evening, which was hardly the case. There was much of pathos, however, in the trio and the quintet. Volkmann's trio has the charm that attaches to any work of which melody is a feature, provided its distinctness is not nullified by thickened harmony. Though Volkmann never surprises by the exhibition of a strong originality, his works have a freshness, at least when first heard, that commands attention, and you are always impressed by his sincere devotion to a high ideal. A sentimentalist might easily mould a story from the matter in the trio under notice. For instance, at the close there is a disjointed dialogue, with broken phrases between the pianoforte and the violin, that is as suggestive of a long-drawn leave-taking between lovers as could well be imagined for these instruments. The trio was superbly played, Mr. Busoni giving a sympathetic and becomingly repressed performance of his part. Schumann's quartet we all know. This, too, was finely played, though one might ask for more warmth at moments—more pepper and less treacle, so to speak.

Brahms's work was the novelty of the occasion. Not often does one come away from the first hearing of a composition in high form by Brahms with so little sense of strain as was the experience (with some, at least) at the close of this concert. Can it be that Brahms has come to his second artistic childhood? Is it possible that he has learned to appreciate the dignity of simplicity? Or was it because that as most of us go to hear Brahms with a latent idea that we are to be perplexed with abstractions and confounded with vagueness, we put on our best thinking caps for the moment and were amazed to find that there was small cause for amazement? In other words, all, or pretty much all, seemed lucid instead of turgid, and in the serenest order instead of in tangled masses. The quintet is a delightful, wholesome, refreshing and reposeful work that promises to hold its charm without fading, especially when played so well as at this concert. As a technical exploit, the skill with which the composition is warmed, at moments judiciously chosen, by the clarinet tone is beyond all praise.

A PINK EVENING.

It was a pink evening at Music Hall. Nordica was all radiant in the color which Paris most delights in at this moment. Scalchi had plenty of pink for trimming on her gray gown; Del Puente wore a pink in his buttonhole, and there was a most surprising amount of pink in the big audience. New pink feather boas trailed over the shoulders of city women, who wore them as if fresh from the hands of Santa Claus or Felix). And over the shoulders of many fair suburbans the pale yellow Liberty scarfs of the past few years had been transformed into a like rosy fashion. There were pink ostrich tips on many little hats and big ones. And one man on the platform whose face was at a certain moment even more than pink (how could a heartless audience laugh at such a [illegible] might have noted more, en-

"sea of faces" on which the singers looked was like Boston Harbor on a summer's eve, when the sunset clouds have toyed with the roseate waves and everybody is happy coming up on a Nantasket boat.

Nordica's round train puzzled and charmed many of her feminine beholders. She managed this full-skirted cross between a peasant girl's short gown and an opera singer's trailing robes with plenty of aplomb, losing her grip a little of course when she had to let it go to gather up a few of the flowers which were heaped at her feet. Scalchi's dress was even more of a puzzle when she first appeared. For had she not come breathless, late, hastening from Paris to this presence? And therefore must the scant band of pink crape which was caught back from the front of her bodice be a herald and a sign of paniers on their way from Paris? This question must have mixed with the music in many modish minds while Scalchi was first singing, and while she was going off the stage, hugging her flowers in that whole-souled, hearty way of hers. But what can you expect? Que voulez vous? Hasty dressing is no better for artists than for other women, and the ways of rebellious plaquet-hooks are all their own. When Scalchi came back for her encore, that pink crape hung where it ought to hang, gracefully down from the front of the bodice to the hem of her gown skirt, and she was not husky-voiced as at first, and her music had added charms to soothe the savage breast of critical and popular Boston.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

JANUARY 17, 1893.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Those who thought that the miscellaneous concert was dead in Boston must have been somewhat surprised last night, for a very large sized and enthusiastic audience was gathered in Music Hall to welcome the American prima donna, Lillian Nordica, back to the scenes of her early triumphs. Although not a Bostonian, Mme. Nordica's artistic education emphatically belongs to this city, and it is something to be recorded, in these days of musical renunciation and disloyalty, that the singer has always acknowledged her vocal debt to Mr. John O'Neill, her old teacher. The name of Nordica is one to conjure with; she is a singer who appeals directly to the public, yet has abundant ability in the classical direction as well. Her dramatic fervor is something to be admired, and her voice has as yet no sign of decadence; add to these qualities a most attractive stage presence, and the causes of success are not far to seek. But the singer was not alone as the attraction of the evening. Campanini, Del Puente, Emil Fischer and the regal Scalchi were there, and the concert was an evening of those old Italian and French melodies that no Wagner can abolish. Yet one can heartily agree with a part of Wagner's dictum in this matter. Such a concert is "a string of pearls" rather than one perfect whole. One impression jostles the other, and each thought is crowded by its neighbor. One gets no decided impression of anything because of the oppositional character of the various numbers, and as for the "Garden Scene" in its isolated state, one can but regard it as a fragment of a fragment.

MADAME SCALCHI.

The Musical Herald of the United States

(Formerly the BC[illegible] stablished 1882.)

JANUARY, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The epithets of praise which suggest themselves at each recurring concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are becoming trite, and if Mr. Nikisch is not careful he will soon have nothing for the reviewer to do but to make a record of his performances. We do not know that such a contingency would be in any respect deplorable. Talk about music and musical performances is frequently very unentertaining when it is not amusing because of its rhapsodic hysteria, and if the time shall come when so delightful an entertainment as Mr. Nikisch provides can be disposed of with a hearty "well done, good and faithful servant of the beautiful," it will be an indication of advancing culture, at least on the part of the critic, and possibly also on the part of the public that shall be willing to accept such a criticism.

Concerning the second concert by the Boston orchestra we leave the reader to recall to memory the warmest praise that has been spoken of Mr. Nikisch and his band of virtuosi in these columns, and to imagine them repeated with such emphasis as is invited by the fact that on this occasion there was a special appeal to gratitude on the score of a performance of Brahms' symphony in F. It may be that there are some enthusiastic admirers of this composer who go too far in their estimation of him. That question may be left open. There is no doubt, however, that he is being too persistently neglected in our concert rooms since the departure of Mr. Thomas.

The other orchestral numbers on the program were a suite in D major, Op. 39, by Dvorak, and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch." The suite is a dainty and extremely characteristic bit of music, in which all of the composer's marvelous ingenuity and skill are expended in dance rhythms of peculiar piquancy and grace. Between the symphony and the suite Miss Suza Doane, a young woman, native, we believe, of New York, and recently returned from four years' study in Leipsic, played Chopin's "Andante Spianato and Polonaise." Miss Doane was honored beyond the usual measure meted out to novices in being introduced to the public at such a concert. She is far from being a ripe pianist, though she has some of the elements which go into the education of one. Her style is dry, unelastic and unpoetical. This was obvious enough in her reading of the Chopin composition, with its wholly superfluous accompaniment, but it was emphasized in Heller's transcription of Mendelssohn's "Auf Fluegeln des Gesanges," which she played in recognition of a kind recall.

The seventh concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra course at Music Hall, came on December 3, with this program: Bach: Suite, D major. D'Albert: Symphony, Op. 4. Wagner: Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

The novelty was the symphony—Mr. Damrosch played it in New York in 1888, by the way—which as the story runs, was written when the composer was but nineteen years old; it is known that he was but twenty-two when it was first performed. It has been declared that the marks of youth and inexperience abound through the work, its very length and fullness being included among these evidences. Then, too, there are the signs of the influence of others, which always appear in the compositions of young musicians. In this case Brahms and Wagner have been named as the controlling spirits, the former being much the stronger. All this is but another way of saying that the work has its vague moments—and very long moments they are; but, somehow, in spite of passages that are painfully lacking in euphony, and in spite, too, of its length and over-elaboration, the symphony is interesting and gives an impression of genius in its origin.

The Symphony Orchestra at its eighth concert, on December 17, celebrated the 121st anniversary of the birth of Beethoven, by performing the eighth and ninth symphonies of the master. The audience was as large as the house could legally hold, and the work of the orchestra was distinguished by unusual vigor. In the last movement of the choral symphony the voice parts were sung by Miss Priscilla White, soprano; Miss Louise Leimer, contralto; Mr. W. J. Winch, tenor; Mr. H. Meyn, bass, and a chorus. The last named element was small, but was zealous and determined, and these qualities went far toward compensating for a lack of volume in the tone.

For the ninth concert, December 24, the following was the program:

LALO: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys. Chopin: Three pianoforte solos—nocturne in E minor (posthumous) and scherzo in B minor. Martucci: Concert study. Wagner: "Waldweben" from "Siegfried." Mendelssohn: symphony, "Italian."

The only new feature was the appearance of a pianist from Italy. Miss Eugenia Castellano has the figure and carriage of a girl under twenty, and the look of a woman of thirty. Her playing was remarkable for its clearness of tone and steadiness of movement, but considered as "interpretations" her performances of the selections from Chopin were of no value; they had too much the air of well committed tasks. She made the best effect in the bit by Martucci, a scherzo-like sort of thing, which she played with exceptional brightness. Two recalls, with an extra contribution from her for each, testified to the pleasure of her hearers.

[89]

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1893.

The Nordica Concert Company.

The company organized by Mr. Charles A. Ellis of the Music Hall for a tour through the United States, under the name The Nordica Operatic Concert Company, gave its first concert in this city at the Music Hall last night. The steamer that brought Scalchi from the shores of France was late; she had started from New York in the forenoon and was so late in getting from her hotel to the hall that her first song came after Nordica's aria and the orchestral piece, and she rested during the selction from "Lucia," so that the sextet became a quintet. Excepting these slight changes the band and singers followed this programme:

Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Toreador's Song from "Carmen".....Bizet
Giuseppe del Puente.
Aria from "La Juive".....Halévy
Emil Fischer.
Cavatina, Nobil Signor, from "Les Huguenots"
Meyerbeer
Mrs. Sofia Schalchi.
Aria from "La Reine de Saba".....Gounod
Mrs. Lillian Nordica.
Tone Picture, "Storm at Vesperlide".....R. Sapio
Sextet and Finale from "Lucia di Lammermoor."
Donizetti
Mmes. Nordica and Scalchi, and Messrs. Campanini, Del Puenti, George W. Want and Fischer.
Third act of "Faust".....Gounod
Maguerita, Mrs. Nordica; Siebel, Mrs. Scalchi; Martha, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell; Faust, Mr. Campanini; Mefistofele, Mr. Fischer.
Romualdo Sapio, director; I. Luckstone, accompanist.

It was a great popular first night at Music Hall. The house was filled with an enthusiastic audience so ready to be pleased that applause was constant, even waiting upon certain vocal and physical struggles; and when any artist made a genuine hit—and there were numbers of these—the audience showed its delight and its welcome of old favorites in unbounded measure. Mr. Del Puente sang for his first recall Figaro's song from "The Barber of Seville" and smilingly shared the pleasure of his hearers. Mr. Fischer, with his big organ-like voice embosoming all the melancholy of a race, sang the Cardinal's song from "La Juive" with great effect. Then Nordica sang. She was never more brilliant in voice, in manner, in looks. Her artistic and personal poise were quite as effective on the concert stage as in opera. Her voice in her first selection was so sweet, so well in control, so full of melody, that she more than won the generous and repeated recalls, which she repaid with "The Girls of Cadiz."

Mrs. Scalchi was tired and she put her hand to her throat and coughed a little once or twice, while the sympathetic audience tried in vain to repress sympathetic clickings of the throat. But silence was perfect during her hearty singing of her cavatina and Gounod's song, "Marguerite," for, of course, a second song was demanded from the newly arrived voyager. The famous "Lucia" quintet was repeated. Then came the scenes from "Faust," and certainly in spite of the lack of red clothes for Mephistopheles, a garden for Faust and a spinning-wheel for Marguerite, the voices in happy accord, and the warmth of interest in the audience lent dramatic illusion and made a success. Nordica re-captured everybody when she sang alone, and there was, so to speak, rosy fire in the air when all was done, although there was no curtain to fall upon the scene.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

At Chickering Hall, last night, the Kneisel Quartet gave the fifth in the current series of chamber concerts, with this programme:

Volkmann—Trio in B-flat minor for pianoforte, violin and violoncello.
Schumann—Quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, for strings.
Brahms—Quintet in B minor, Op. 115, for clarinet and strings.
Pianoforte, Mr. F. Busoni; clarinet, Mr. G. Goldschmidt.

The recurrence of minor keys suggests a sad, not to say gloomy evening, which was hardly the case. There was much of pathos, however, in the trio and the quintet. Volkmann's trio has the charm that attaches to any work of which melody is a feature, provided its distinctness is not nullified by thickened harmony. Though Volkmann never surprises by the exhibtion of a strong originality, his works have a freshness, at least when first heard, that commands attention, and you are always impressed by his sincere devotion to a high ideal. A sentimentalist might easily mould a story from the matter in the trio under notice. For instance, at the close there is a disjointed dialogue, with broken phrases between the pianoforte and the violin, that is as suggestive of a long-drawn leave-taking between lovers as could well be imagined for these instruments. The trio was superbly played, Mr. Busoni giving a sympathetic and becomingly repressed performance of his part. Schumann's quartet we all know. This, too, was finely played, though one might ask for more warmth at moments—more pepper and less treacle, so to speak.

Brahms's work was the novelty of the occasion. Not often does one come away from the first hearing of a composition in high form by Brahms with so little sense of strain as was the experience (with some, at least) at the close of this concert. Can it be that Brahms has come to his second artistic childhood? Is it possible that he has learned to appreciate the dignity of simplicity? Or was it because that as most of us go to hear Brahms with a latent idea that we are to be perplexed with abstractions and confounded with vagueness, we put on our best thinking caps for the moment and were amazed to find that there was small cause for amazement? In other words, all, or pretty much all, seemed lucid instead of turgid, and in the serenest order instead of in tangled masses. The quintet is a delightful, wholesome, refreshing and reposeful work that promises to hold its charm without fading, especially when played so well as at this concert. As a technical exploit, the skill with which the composition is warmed, at moments judiciously chosen, by the clarinet tone is beyond all praise.

A PINK EVENING.

It was a pink evening at Music Hall. Nordica was all radiant in the color which Paris most delights in at this moment. Scalchi had plenty of pink for trimming on her gray gown; Del Puente wore a pink in his buttonhole, and there was a most surprising amount of pink in the big audience. New pink feather boas trailed over the shoulders of city women, who wore them as if fresh from the hands of Santa Claus or Felix). And over the shoulders of many fair suburbans the pale yellow Liberty scarfs of the past few years had been transformed into a like rosy fashion. There were pink ostrich tips on many little hats and big ones. And one man on the platform whose face was at a certain moment even more than pink (how could a heartless audience laugh at such a musical faux pas?) might have noted none on [illegible] memory of the cold outer air. And there was so much applause that even pale faces were flushed with exertion of hand-clapping. The "sea of faces" on which the singers looked was like Boston Harbor on a summer's eve, when the sunset clouds have toyed with the roseate waves and everybody is happy coming up on a Nantasket boat.

Nordica's round train puzzled and charmed many of her feminine beholders. She managed this full-skirted cross between a peasant girl's short gown and an opera singer's trailing robes with plenty of aplomb, losing her grip a little of course when she had to let it go to gather up a few of the flowers which were heaped at her feet. Scalchi's dress was even more of a puzzle when she first appeared. For had she not come breathless, late, hastening from Paris to this presence? And therefore must the scant band of pink crape which was caught back from the front of her bodice be a herald and a sign of paniers on their way from Paris? This question must have mixed with the music in many modish minds while Scalchi was first singing, and while she was going off the stage, hugging her flowers in that whole-souled, hearty way of hers. But what can you expect? Que voulez vous? Hasty dressing is no better for artists than for other women, and the ways of rebellious plaquet-hooks are all their own. When Scalchi came back for her encore, that pink crape hung where it ought to hang, gracefully down from the front of the bodice to the hem of her gown skirt, and she was not husky-voiced as at first, and her music had added charms to soothe the savage breast of critical and popular Boston.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

JANUARY 17, 1893.

THE NORDICA CONCERT.

Those who thought that the miscellaneous concert was dead in Boston must have been somewhat surprised last night, for a very large sized and enthusiastic audience was gathered in Music Hall to welcome the American prima donna, Lillian Nordica, back to the scenes of her early triumphs. Although not a Bostonian, Mme. Nordica's artistic education emphatically belongs to this city, and it is something to be recorded, in these days of musical renunciation and disloyalty, that the singer has always acknowledged her vocal debt to Mr. John O'Neill, her old teacher. The name of Nordica is one to conjure with; she is a singer who appeals directly to the public, yet has abundant ability in the classical direction as well. Her dramatic fervor is something to be admired, and her voice has as yet no sign of decadence; add to these qualities a most attractive stage presence, and the causes of success are not far to seek. But the singer was not alone as the attraction of the evening. Campanini, Del Puente, Emil Fischer and the regal Scalchi were there, and the concert was an evening of those old Italian and French melodies that no Wagner can abolish. Yet one can heartily agree with a part of Wagner's dictum in this matter. Such a concert is "a string of pearls" rather than one perfect whole. One impression jostles the other, and each thought is crowded by its neighbor. One gets no decided impression of anything because of the oppositional character of the various numbers, and as for the "Garden Scene" in its isolated state, one can but regard it as a fragment of a fragment.

MADAME SCALCHI.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 17, 1893.

The Nordica Concert.

Those who thought that the miscellaneous concert was dead in Boston must have been somewhat surprised last night, for a very large sized and enthusiastic audience was gathered in Music Hall to welcome the American prima donna, Lillian Nordica, back to the scenes of her early triumphs. Although not a Bostonian, Mme. Nordica's artistic education emphatically belongs to this city, and it is something to be recorded, in these days of musical renunciation and disloyalty, that the singer has always acknowledged her vocal debt to Mr. John O'Neill, her old teacher. The name of Nordica is one to conjure with; she is a singer who appeals directly to the public, yet has abundant ability in the classical direction as well. Her dramatic fervor is something to be admired, and her voice has as yet no sign of decadence; add to these qualities a most attractive stage presence, and the causes of success are not far to seek. But the singer was not alone as the attraction of the evening. Campanini, Del Puente, Emil Fischer and the regal Scalchi were there, and the concert was an evening of those old Italian and French melodies that no Wagner can abolish. Yet one can heartily agree with a part of Wagner's dictum in this matter. Such a concert is "a string of pearls" rather than one perfect whole. One impression jostles the other, and each thought is crowded by its neighbor. One gets no decided impression of anything because of the oppositional character of the various numbers, and as for the "Garden Scene" in its isolated state, one can but regard it as a fragment of a fragment.

Nor must the seemingly extraneous circumstance of the hall not awakening operatic associations, be forgotten. The regular concert-goer does not fall into the operatic mood where the echoes of the symphonies are ringing,—at least not into the mood of the Italian opera. This, however, is but individual impression, for the main part of the audience seemed to have no bounds to their delight, and the encore fiend emerged from his retirement and used his utmost persistence.

It is difficult to know just what standard to apply in the review of such an entertainment; naturally the orchestra did not attain a symphonic level,—but then, they had no symphonies to play; and the enthusiasm of the vocalists would have atoned for many more than the very few faults committed. The orchestra gave the "Wm. Tell" overture with considerable spirit, and just a few lapses from intonation in the important cello phrases. The only other instrumental number was a second storm of which Mr. Sapio was the composer. It had the fault of the tempest in the "Wm. Tell" overture,—it cleared up too suddenly. Two thunderstorms in one programme seemed rather too severe a spell of orchestral weather, particularly as Mr. Sapio's had the same pastoral adjuncts as that of Rossini. Of course, Sig. del Puente sang well, and equally, of course, he sang the "Toreador" song. That particular bull dies very hard; even Bizet cannot stand such constant repetition as this song has had at the hands of this artist. As an encore the famous baritone sang "Largo al Factotum" splendidly. It may as well be stated at once that every singer received an encore.

Mr. Fischer sang "Si pel Rigor" from "The Jewess," in German, and followed it with a delightful lied which was much better sung than the original number which caused the encore.

Then came Nordica and sang "Plus grande dans son obscurité" in excellent manner. Not only was their breadth and nobility of style in her work, but in the passage—"Resigne-toi mon Coeur, oubliez"—there was ineffable tenderness and true sympathetic feeling. The chansonette that followed was the perfection of daintiness and brio.

An apology was made for Scalchi, as having just returned from Europe, and being fatigued. An ocean voyage is surely sufficient reason for a singer's throwing up an engagement, but the great contralto only omitted her part in the sextette from "Lucia," which therefore became an unexpected quintette. Nevertheless, Scalchi sang "Nobil Signor" in a way that proved that her magnificent voice is unimpaired, and added the seldom-sung number from "Faust"—"Quando a te liete"—in just a little less perfect manner. Her reception at the hands of the audience was scarcely less hearty than that accorded to Nordica.

The quintette-sextette was given with rather rough ensemble but Nordica sang gloriously in this and so did Companini and Del Puente, and the individual excellences so glossed over the short comings that recall after recall followed, and finally a repetition of part of the number.

It was pleasant to find that the "Faust" selections which terminated the concert were not given with any puerile attempts at costume and scenery, and this made it possible to give other numbers beside those of the "Garden Scene," Scalchi sang the "Flower-Song" and then departed to well-earned repose. Then came the old favorite, Campanini, in "Salve Dimora," and sang it well, but eluded a few of the highest passages. His voice was in excellent condition, and he sang with the same old enthusiasm that is so contagious. Mme. Nordica's numbers again proved the brilliancy of her technique and her great dramatic force. Her tones in highest register are pure and secure, and work up the ensemble passages to a power which could not be attained otherwise.

Altogether, the concert was a success, and if the musician desired something more solid in the way of a programme, something a little less heterogeneous, the public emphatically did not, and to the manager and the singers, too, it will always be "Vox Populi—Vox Dei." And, after all, tunes have their uses in music.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Kneisel Quartette.

The programme of the Kneisel concert last evening at Chickering Hall was a continuous crescendo in interest.

The opening selection was the Volkmann trio, op. 5, in B-flat major, by Messrs. Kneisel, Schroeder and Busoni. Volkmann's strong leaning on Schumann is well known and here he seemed to out-Schumann Schumann, so to speak.

One is led to wonder what gives the work its popularity in Germany. Hints of Hungarian rhythm and characteristic color appear occasionally, induced possibly by the composer's long residence in that land. One might think the leading thought to be not how much you can say, but how long [illegible] at the piano gave [illegible] satisfaction, barring an occasional harsh tone produced by stiff attack. The work gave him some opportunity for the display of his technical equipment but undoubtedly other works would give better proof of both the technical and poetical sides of his ability.

The Schumann quartette, the first of the three forming op. 41 was a far more satisfactory composition. Here the Beethovian depth and intensity is present with straightforward themes and clear development. It was given with the finish that always characterizes the playing of the four artists composing the Kneisel Quartette.

The chorale episode in the Presto lends charming variety to that movement, all the greater because of the novelty of its introduction. The final number was the Brahms op. 115, a quintette, the clarinet being the added member. This instrument in the hands of Mr. Goldschmidt blended with the strings with excellent effect.

In adding the clarinet to the string quartette new colors are placed on the palette, and Brahms has used these most skilfully in producing changeable tone tints of subdued yet rich effect. The themes are spontaneous in their beauty and simplicity, and the development is logical, with a true warmth of feeling, which with the rich tone coloring appeals at once to the highest musical instincts of the listener.

These later works of Brahms show a growth in power of thought, a greater fecundity of ideas and more depth by the very tendency toward simplicity of the treatment.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1893.

The Nordica Concert.

That the desire to hear the melodious music of the Italian school still exists in this city was proved by the presence in Music Hall last night of an audience that filled it to overflowing, assembled to listen to the performance of the Nordica Operatic Concert Company, which is now on a tour through the country under the direction of C. A. Ellis. Mrs. Nordica was assisted by Mrs. Scalchi, Miss Helen Campbell, Mr. Campinini, Mr. Del Puente, Mr. Fischer and Mr. Want. Mr. Sapio conducted, and Mr. Luckstone was accompanist. There was an orchestra of the Boston Symphony players. The first part of the programme was as follows:

Overture. (William Tell).....Rossini
Orchestra.
Toreador Song. (Carmen).....Bizet
Mr. Del Puente.
Air. La Juive.....Halevy
Mr. Emil Fischer.
Cavatina. (Nobil Signor.) (Les Huguenots).....Meyerbeer
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria, (La Reine de Saba)..... .... Gounod
Mme. Nordica.
Storm at Vespertide. (Tone Picture), R. Sapio
Orchestra.
Sextet. (Lucia di Lammermoor) Donizetti
Mmes. Nordica, Scalchi, and Messrs. Campanini, Del Puente, Want and Fischer.

Following this were selections from the third act of Gounod's "Faust"; the serenade from the fourth act, and the trio and finale from the fifth act.

These were, of course, given in concert form, without any of the accessories of the stage.

The central figure of the evening's performance was Mrs. Nordica, who was most warmly received on her appearance before the vast audience. It is with pleasure that one notes the constant broadening of this singer in artistic capacity. There is also a great improvement in her vocal efforts technically.

There is still the weakness in the middle voice that has always handicapped her seriously in much of the music upon the staff below the C of the third space, but there is now an absence of the so-called "chest-tones" that formerly vulgarized the lower notes of her scale, for which let us congratulate her and be thankful. The elimination of these sounds will greatly help the preservation of her fine voice. Could she but learn to direct the column of air forward, and thereby lift up the middle notes of her scale, she would find herself in possession of extraordinary vocal powers.

There is a fervidness and intensity in the singing of Mrs. Nordica, when she keeps within the better scope of her musical ability (the lyric works of the modern Italian school of opera), that is most gratifying to observe. Nor is she devoid of dramatic power. This she proved in her rendering of the music of Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" at a concert in the Music Hall a year ago, when she sang some numbers of Santuzza's role with an intensity of passion and a breadth of dramatic power that was thrilling to the most exacting critic. Other than the technical shortcoming mentioned above, Mrs. Nordica's efforts last evening call only for high praise.

Of her associates Mrs. Scalchi proved to be just as popular and just as bad, vocally, as ever. Del Puente sang the Toreador's Song, and as an encore the "Lo the factotum," from Rossini's "Barber," to the delight of the audience, although his vocal efforts were not above reproach. Mr. Campinini skilfully presented his best efforts. It is needless to criticise his singing. Were not Mr. Fischer's voice so dry in quality his artistic singing would be much more enjoyable. He was recalled after his "La Juve" number, and sang a German song in a most admirable manner.

Little need be said of the concerted singing during the evening, for it was not creditable always to those engaged in it. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Sapio, did fairly well. The "tone-picture" of Mr. Sapio's composition cannot be praised for its originality. It, however, served as a divertissement for the audience.

Mr. Ellis has a company that will undoubtedly prove a drawing card wherever he presents it, judging from the enthusiasm of the audience last evening and the manner in which its attention was held through the quite long programme.

WARREN. DAVENPORT.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartet took place at Chickering Hall last evening, with the assistance of Mr. Busoni, pianist, and Mr. Goldschmidt, clarinet. The programme was Volkmann's trio in B-flat minor, Schmann's quartet in A minor, and the quintet for clarinet and strings by Brahms. It is needless to say that this excellent quartet of musicians played in a faultless manner, and that their associates were artistically sympathetic and proficient in their assistance on the programme.

The Montreal Herald.
THURSDAY MORNING, JAN. 19.

A DELIGHTED AUDIENCE AT THE WINDSOR LAST NIGHT.

The Scalchi-Nordica Concert a Great Success—Present and Coming Attractions at the Theatres—A Chat With Mrs. Potter.

The audience which filled the Windsor hall last night was large and brilliant, and, what is much more uncommon for Montreal, it was wildly enthusiastic. In fact it was just such an audience as was calculated to inspire an artist and show him that his efforts were appreciated.

The standard of musical entertainments has been a high one this season, and many have been the occasions of true artistic significance. The present concert company is certainly worthy of the name, and every individual member of it is an artist. The programme was an exacting one. It opened with Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody," which was vigorously played by Mr. Isidore Luckstone, who also supplied the accompaniments for the evening, assisted by Mr. Emery Lavigne on the harmonium.

Herr Emil Fischer was heard for the first time. He sang an aria from Halevy's "Jewess," and as an encore, Dessauer's "Enticement."

The Halevy selection was substituted for Schubert's "Wanderer," and the change was not an improvement, for although it served to show off the full rich tones of Herr Fischer's voice, which is a very heavy baritone, it gave no opportunity to judge of the vast dramatic and lyric power that has held the boards at the New York operetta and concert stage for several years past. He has a grand voice and will be heard to better advantage to-night. Madame Scalchi appeared for the first time for several years, and the disappointment experienced from her failure to appear last time seemed to give additional zest to the greeting she received. Her voice is in splendid form and almost as powerful as of old. The nobility and largeness of her phrasing and the ease with which she passes from one register to another, coupled with the beautiful tone, make her work a treat to listen to. She sang "Nobil Signor," from "The Huguenots," and as an encore the "Gavotte," from "Mignon." Signor Campanini was in almost his old form for the most of the concert, and gave a beautiful rendering of Beethoven's "Adelaide." It was, indeed, a beautiful number, and recalled the triumphs of his brilliant career. Clear and penetrating, the tone is sweet and thrilling, and his style, that will ever remain his individual attribute, perfection.

Madame Nordica had by far the hardest part of the program, and did not spare herself in any particular. She possesses every attribute of a finished artiste, a voice powerful, flexible, clear and brilliant; a style that is versatile and refined, and a personal magnetism that would take any audience by storm, and inspire it with her grace, vigor and enthusiasm. She sang "Ah fors' e lui," from "Traviata," and for an encore, although she had much yet to sing, Delibe's brilliant "Felia Cadix," which was exquisitely rendered. Signor Del Puente is an old favorite here. He was in good voice, and his selection, the "Torreador" sang from "Carmen," is a favorite and naturally incited much applause, to which he responded with "the Tarantella" from "Il Barbiere."

The first part of the program concluded with a magnificent quartette, which ought to have been a quintette, but Madame Scalchi did not appear, although her share of the program was comparatively light.

Much anticipation has been aroused by the announcement of the performance of "Cavalleria Rusticana" in concert form, for the second part of the program, and it was well justified by the realization. "Cavalleria Rusticana," or "Rustic Chivalry," is a short tragic opera in one act by Mascagni, a young Italian composer, and has had one of the most brilliant successes of any work in the last ten years, having held the boards on nearly every operatic stage in Europe. The story is that of a young Sicilian viliager, "Turridu," who was the lover of "Sola." During a prolonged absence "Sola" marries "Alfio," and "Turridu" finds her lost to him when he returns fresh from the scenes of a military life. He wrongs "Santugga," who, in revenge, informs "Alfio" of his former relations with "Sola," who immediately challenges "Turridu." He, although remorseful for the past, cannot brook the insult, and accepts the challenge, and fights "Alfio," who kills him. The selections given, eight in number, were sufficient to demonstrate how vivid is the force of dramatic power which has made the opera such an instant success. The style is peculiar. It is strongly tinged with a forcible and striking personality, but there is very little of the old Italian school about it. In fact it may be said that the French, modern Italian, and Wagnerian schools have shadowed it with their best influences, without destroying its originality or bringing it within the possibility of a charge of plagiarism. In short it is a work of marvellous dramatic possibility and eminent aesthetic work. Much of the music is of a peculiarly devotional color, similar to Gounod's "Faust," yet it never surrenders its dramatism or lapses into a commonplace or careless phrase. It is fresh, novel and striking, and a beautiful piece of writing and composition.

The work of the artists on this selection was very meritorious and painstaking. Madame Nordica had the principal part of the work and did not spare herself, nor did Signor Campanini, whose voice, however, showed wear before the arduous task was ended. Madame Scalchi and Signor Del Puente were both good. As an ensemble the concert was worthy of the program of the artists, the audience and also of Mrs. Page Thrower, who is the impressario and who, time after time, takes the risk of these great artistic enterprises solely in the cause of the art itself, and always with success.

The Daily Star.
Montreal
THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1893.

OPERATIC CONCERT.

A GRAND SUCCESS AT THE WINDSOR HALL.

Nordica, Scalchi, Campanini, Fischer and Del Puente Receive a Great Ovation—Cavalleria Rusticana.

The Nordica operatic concert company gave its first concert last evening. The company contains artists of world wide fame and acknowledged merit, who come as princes and princesses of song, claiming and receiving homage from all who love the divine art. Madame Nordica is now well known to Montrealers who have heard her twice under the auspices of the Mendelssohn Choir. Further acquaintance rather increases than diminishes admiration for her exquisite voice and consummate taste. Though of pure and delicate quality her voice does not lack robustness and power of endurance, and was as fresh and beautiful at the close of a somewhat exacting programme as at the beginning. Mad. Nordica was heard in an aria from La Traviata, in a quartette with Herr Fischer, and Sigs. Campanini and Del Puente. She also sang the part of Santuzza in the excerpts from Cavalleria Rusticana. Being enthusiastically recalled she sang one of Delibes' charming chansons in a very arch and brilliant manner. Mr. Isidore Luckstone had the honor of opening the programme. His appearance on the platform was greeted with discouraging silence, probably because he had not been heralded as a distinguished pianist and his demeanor and aspect were modest and unassuming. Nothing daunted, however, Mr. Luckstone plunged into one of those Liszt Rhapsodies, No. 6 it was, which produce anything but rhapsody in the average pianist who attempts them. A very flexible and untiring wrist is demanded in this number, and this qualification Mr. Luckstone possesses. The borderland between great talent and genius is vague and ill-defined, particularly, perhaps, as regards piano performances. It is besides difficult for any pianist to win deserving recognition in these days when Paderewski fills the air, obscuring even such great lights as Rummel, Joseffy and D'Albert. Mr. Luckstone was deft and sure and tasteful

IN ALL HIS ACCOMPANIMENTS.

Of Herr Emil Fischer great things have been said, but few probably expected to hear so rich and majestic a voice combined with so finished and artistic a style. Herr Fischer's singing was a great delight and regrets were many that he was not heard more frequently. His singing is marked by easy and natural control of an uncommonly rich and well developed voice, which is used with absolute ease, and yet with musicianly earnestness and thorough skill. His single aria last evening was "The Jewess," by Halévy, and, being recalled in a very emphatic manner, he sang Dessauers' "Enticement," with a fine, though not exaggerated sentiment.

Sig. Campanini, at one time the darling of the operatic stage, received a cordial reception, and essayed Beethoven's great song, "Adelaide." A pure style, a noble conception and fine phrasing were all manifest, but, alas! the glorious voice that once thrilled thousands has lost much of its charm and only the shadow of the former glory remains. Let justice be done, however, to his splendid dramatic instinct, his astonishing memory and faultless style.

Signor Del Puente's cheerful countenance always bespeaks for him a hearty greeting even although so well worn a theme as the Toreador song from Carmen is set down for him. His robust energetic style is well known. Being recalled he sang La Tarantelle from "La Barbiere with a fine humorous expression.

Mme. Scalchi is, of course, one of the foremost singers of the day. Her voice is of phenomenal beauty, and every note vibrates with intelligence. We hardly think that any will gainsay the title given to her in the playbills as the greatest contralto of our time. In the cavatina "Nobil Signor," all the graces of her voice and style were vividly shown, and won immense applause from an audience that at first seemed disposed to enjoy its music without enthusiasm. The dainty gavotte from Mignon was given in response to unequivocal demonstrations of delight, and, needless to say, was sung with inimitable grace.

THE SECOND PART of the programme was devoted to selections from Mascagni's now celebrated "Cavalleria Rusticani." The critics are all agreed that this work shows great power and originality, but being essentially a dramatic opera, requires appropriate setting for its proper appreciation. The duet between Santuzza and Turridu contains some fine melodic passages and was sung in superb style by Mad. Nordica and Sig. Campanini. The Intermezzo as an Ave Maria was also a very pleasing number.

This evening, in addition to a miscellaneous programme, selections from Gounod's Faust with scenery, costumes, etc., as far as practicable are announced. "Le parlate d'amor," "Salve dinora," "The jewel song," and other gems will be included. The opportunity of listening to such eminent artists comes so seldom that another large audience is sure to fill the Windsor Hall.

[90]

The Gazette.

...REAL, THURSDAY, JAN. 19.

The Nordica Concert.

Last night the Nordica Operatic Concert company fairly well filled the Windsor hall. There should have been a much better audience when such sterling attractions as Nordica, Scalchi and other artists appear in Montreal. It is so rare indeed that grand opera is performed here, and when operatic artists of such world wide reputation as these who appeared last night, combined with the first rendition of "Cavalleria Rusticana," are with us, "standing room only," ought to have been the notice. The first item on the programme was Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodie No. 6. This was played by Mr. Isidore Luckstone in such a way as to show that this gentleman was a master of his instrument. He also accompanied the various artists in excellent style. Herr Emil Fischer possesses a grand bass voice, and his singing of Halevy's aria (The Jewess) was an artistic treat. In response to an encore he sang a ballad by Dessawe. Mde. Sofia Scalchi showed that her rich contralto voice has lost none of its power and sweetness, and her rendition of Meyerbeer's well-known aria, "Nobil Signor," was well-nigh perfection. On being encored she sang the "Gavotte" from "Mignon," and showed her wonderful vocalization. Signor Italo Campanini sang Beethoven's "Adelaide" in a way which shows that time has dealt kindly with his voice, and his beautiful phrasing was as marked as ever. Of Madame Nordica it is difficult to say more than has been said already of her at her former appearances here. Last night the same bird-like notes, execution and wonderful pianissimo effects caused the greatest enthusiasm. She sang Verdi's "Ah, fors e lui," from "La Traviata," excellently, and after being called on the stage several times, sang an encore. Signor Del Puente's singing of the "Toreador" was as full of fire as ever, and on being encored he sang the buffo song from the "Barber of Seville." A quartette was sung by Messrs. Signor Campanini, Del Puente, Fischer and Madame Nordica. The concert finished with extracts from Mascagni's famous opera "Cavalleria Rusticana." This lovely work was heard for the first time in Montreal, and proved to be well worthy of its reputation. The choicest gems were the duet between Santuzza and Turridu, the well known "Intermezzo," arranged as an "Ave Maria," sung by Santuzza, and the "Finale" sung by Turridu. The parts were Santuzza, Mde. Nordica; Lola, Mde. Scalchi; Turridu, Sig. Campanini, and Alfio, Sig. Del Puente. To-night there will be an operatic concert finishing with the third act of "Faust" played in costume, and there should be a large crowd to hear this magnificent organization.

LA PRESSE

MONTREAL, 19 JANVIER 1893

Concert Scalchi-Nordica

La vaste salle du Windsor était presque remplie hier soir pour entendre les artistes amenés à Montréal par Mme Page Thrower. L'attente du public n'a pas été trompée. M. Isidore Luckstone a ouvert le concert par la "Rapsodie hongroise" de Listz, vigoureusement jouée. M. Herr Emil Fischer, basse, se faisait entendre pour la première fois à Montréal. Il a chanté un air dramatique de "La Juive" de Ludovic Halevy et a eu les honneurs du rappel.

Mme Scalchi est une connaissance de Montréal, même son absence dans la troupe d'Albani, l'année dernière, a créé une telle lacune que les tribunaux ont dû consoler le public qui voulait entendre la contralto italienne dans les "Huguenots" et "Faust."

Mme Scalchi a chanté l'air du petit page des "Huguenots" et en rappel, la "Gavotte de Mignon." Elle a été applaudie à outrance.

Mme Lilian Nordica est une étoile de première grandeur, qui a sa place à côté de la Patti et d'Albani. Elle s'est presque prodiguée, hier soir, et a pu montrer toutes les qualités de sa voix merveilleuse.

Le ténor Campanini et le baryton Del Puente ont été entendus avec plaisir et ont reçu leur part des applaudissements.

L'opéra dramatique de Mascagni "Cavalleria Rusticana" a été un véritable bouquet de duos, trios, fort goûté de l'auditoire.

BUFFALO EXPRESS.

Wednesday Morning, Jan. 18, 1893.

AN OPERATIC CONCERT.

The Nordica Operatic Concert Company, an unusually strong musical organization, under the direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Lillian Nordica, Sofia Scalchi, Helen Dudley Campbell, Sig. Campanini, Sig. Del Puente and Emil Fischer, will appear at Music Hall on Saturday evening in a miscellaneous programme, concluding with Mascagni's beautiful opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana," with the well-named artists in the cast. The sale of seats opens this morning at Peter Paul

LE MONDE

MONTREAL, 19 JANVIER

Un superbe Concert

Les brillants concerts se suivent de près à Montréal par le temps qui court. Cette semaine nous avons eu Nordica et Scalchi et lundi prochain le 23, le "Ladies Schubert Quartette" de Boston viendra se faire entendre à la salle Windsor, avec le concours du "Harmony Male Quartette de Montréal." Les artistes du "Ladies Schubert Quartette" ont une grande réputation par tous les Etats-Unis et nous sommes sûrs que les membres du "Harmony Male" au nombre desquels nous voyons les noms de nos amis Duquette et Bourdon, sauront soutenir dignement la réputation des amateurs de Montréal.

Billets en vente chez Sheppard, 2274 rue Ste-Catherine. 131-3

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 21, 1893

THE NORDICA COMPANY.

Mr. C. A. Ellis has organized a concert company which is surely going to carry all before it. Monday evening proved that. Music Hall was filled, and in the audience were a great many representatives of the Four Hundred of the musical world; indeed, there would have been many more "carriage folks" and dilettanti had not the date clashed with that of a Kneisel concert, which none of the elect would miss for any other delight without pang and penance. The programme was of the standard style—solos for the principals in the first part, and then an operatic second part, made up in this case of selections from "Faust." To Mr. Ellis's extreme credit, be it said, that he made none of those ridiculous attempts to rig up diminutive and tottering scenery on the stage, and to insert amid it incongruously-dressed singers making believe act. His artists took their places like sensible soloists, on the beautiful and costly chairs with which Music Hall audiences are familiar, got up when they had to sing, and sat down peaceably until their turns came round again. One didn't get opera, but one did get opera music sung well, straightforwardly and without distraction, which was a refreshing novelty. Everybody seemed to have a gorgeous time; the singers sang as if their salvation depended on generous tone, full feeling and entire élan, and the auditors applauded till they got two songs for one in every possible place. Campanini had his high notes ready and launched them electrically; Del Puente simply lifted the roof; Fischer shook the foundations and Scalchi beamed and tossed out her quaint, telling tones as if she had been so long ashore as to have forgotten the sea which she had left only a few hours before, while Nordica sang more richly, ringingly and brilliantly than she has ever done here before. But although the "Toréador" and the "Chi mi frena" were sung as if all the United States were meant to hear, there was yet no lack of nice, fine, sympathetic and elegant singing, and the critical had no occasion to go home lamenting that the concert had been so filled with the enthusiasm of melody and free voice that it was all abandon and no reserve. Mr. Sapio conducted the orchestra admirably in the accompaniments and very well in the "William Tell" overture and a storm-piece of his own writing.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1893

At the third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Chickering Hall, New York, on the evening of the 12th, a remarkable success was achieved by a young girl quite unknown to the musical public. She was simply announced as the Signorina Eugenia Castellano, and very few in the audience knew anything about her. Her selection was the well-known Mendelssohn concerto in G minor, No. 1. It requires great agility of execution and daintiness of fingering, in both of which qualities the new pianist excelled. She has dash, taste, delicacy, and gave a delightful interpretation of a most melodious and charming composition. Her success was instantaneous.

Two musical treats in one day was what Newton enjoyed on Tuesday. The afternoon found sixty fashionably gowned ladies, with the carriage which only the thousands reating on their shoulders justifies, assembled in the spacious music room of the elegant new residence of Mrs. Henry E. Cobb on Bellevue Street, to listen to soothing strains from the instruments of a selected few of the Symphony Orchestra. It was the fourth of a successful series of matinees under the auspices of Mrs. E. Charles Fitch, and a fifth entertainment, on even a grander scale, is soon to follow at the latter's residence on Sargent Street.

....

The evening found many of the same set, increased in numbers and accompanied by gentlemen, in the concert hall of the Newton Club house, entranced by the rendering of the overture, "Mignon," by thirty picked musicians from the same fashionable orchestra. With Mr. Arthur Nikisch as conductor and Mr. Franz Kneisel as soloist the frequenters of Music Hall declared they never had heard music before, and thrilled to the utmost, applause resounded from pit to dome, and the light of pleasure beamed from every eye.

.....

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 18, 1893.

The Third Boston Symphony Concert.

THE third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Chickering Hall last Thursday evening in the presence of the usual large and modish audience. The concert was not so excellent as its predecessors, owing to the weather and the construction of the evening's program. Beethoven's eighth symphony was played in anything but a finished style, though Mr. Nikisch adhered to common sense tempo, the menuet particularly being played in traditional tempo. The trio was marred in part by some eccentricities on the part of the woodwind, which also misbehaved itself in a Berlioz number. The wretched weather without was undoubtedly to blame for this and for the lack of resonance in the string department.

Two movements from Berlioz, "The Damnation of Faust," the "Menuette des Feux-Follets," and the "Valse des Sylphes" were fairly well given, and then Mr. Timothée Adamowski played the first two movements of Bruch's G minor concerto, a superfluous proceeding, for mutilations are at all times to be descried. The best orchestral number was the playing of Beethoven's "Leonora Overture" the third. This was read with great dramatic vigor, and even the prolonged ritardando at the end of the introduction was agreeably impressive.

The event of the evening was the extraordinary brilliant piano playing of Eugenia Castellano, a girl in her early teens, but already a full fledged virtuosa, though not a finished artist. She gave Mendelssohn's hackneyed G minor concerto, but imparted to its trite measures a buoyancy, a life and a dash that were most refreshing. This young virtuosa has remarkable technical control of the keyboard, and her pliant wrists might be envied by any pianist. Her scales are crystalline, and her touch musical and warm. She has great certainty, and her presto playing is furious but exact. She took our breath away in the last movement of the concerto. In response to a tremendous encore Miss Castellano played an étude by Martucci at a tremendous tempo, full of skips, hand crossings, runs and involved figures. She is a technical wonder, and will be heard in a piano recital this evening in Chickering Hall and in one next Saturday afternoon.

The Kneisel Quartet.—This noble organization, the fine fleur of its sort in this country, gave its second concert in this city at Chickering Hall last Saturday afternoon. The club played Schumann's A minor quartet, op. 41, No. 1; Schubert's well-known D minor quartet, and with Arthur Foote, the pianist, his own interesting C major quartet for piano and strings. The performance throughout was characterized by refinement, delicacy and earnest musical feeling.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert.—Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the Boston soprano, was too ill to sing at the third Brooklyn Philharmonic concert, given at the Academy of Music, in that city, last Saturday evening. Basta Tavary was engaged in her place and sang "Non Mi Dir," from "Don Giovanni," and "Dich Theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," in her usual unsatisfying manner. The orchestra under Mr. Nikisch played in excellent form Lalo's delightful "Le Roi d'Ys" overture, Dvorák's suite in D and Schumann's C major symphony. The usual public rehearsal occurred last Friday afternoon.

The Gazette.

MONTREAL, THURSDAY, JAN. 19.

The Nordica Concert.

Last night the Nordica Operatic Concert company fairly well filled the Windsor hall. There should have been a much better audience when such sterling attractions as Nordica, Scalchi and other artists appear in Montreal. It is so rare indeed that grand opera is performed here, and when operatic artists of such world wide reputation as those who appeared last night, combined with the first rendition of "Cavalleria Rusticana," are with us, "standing room only," ought to have been the notice. The first item on the programme was Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodie No. 6. This was played by Mr. Isidore Luckstone in such a way as to show that this gentleman was a master of his instrument. He also accompanied the various artists in excellent style. Herr Emil Fischer possesses a grand bass voice, and his singing of Halevy's aria (The Jewess) was an artistic treat. In response to an encore he sang a ballad by Dessawe. Mde. Sofia Scalchi showed that her rich contralto voice has lost none of its power and sweetness, and her rendition of Meyerbeer's well-known aria, "Nobil Signor," was well-nigh perfection. On being encored she sang the "Gavotte" from "Mignon," and showed her wonderful vocalization. Signor Italo Campanini sang Beethoven's "Adelaide" in a way which shows that time has dealt kindly with his voice, and his beautiful phrasing was as marked as ever. Of Madame Nordica it is difficult to say more than has been said already of her at her former appearances here. Last night the same bird-like notes, execution and wonderful pianissimo effects caused the greatest enthusiasm. She sang Verdi's "Ah, fors e lui," from "La Traviata," excellently, and after being called on the stage several times, sang an encore. Signor Del Puente's singing of the "Toreador" was as full of fire as ever, and on being encored he sang the buffo song from the "Barber of Seville." A quartette was sung by Messrs. Signor Campanini, Del Puente, Fischer and Madame Nordica. The concert finished with extracts from Mascagni's famous opera "Cavalleria Rusticana." This lovely work was heard for the first time in Montreal, and proved to be well worthy of its reputation. The choicest gems were the duet between Santuzza and Turridu, the well known "Intermezzo," arranged as an "Ave Maria," sung by Santuzza, and the "Finale" sung by Turridu. The parts were Santuzza, Mde. Nordica; Lola, Mde. Scalchi; Turridu, Sig. Campanini, and Alfio, Sig. Del Puente. To-night there will be an operatic concert finishing with the third act of "Faust" played in costume, and there should be a large crowd to hear this magnificent organization.

LA PRESSE

MONTREAL, 19 JANVIER 1893

Concert Scalchi-Nordica

La vaste salle du Windsor était presque remplie hier soir pour entendre les artistes amenés à Montréal par Mme Page Thrower. L'attente du public n'a pas été trompée. M. Isidore Lucastone a ouvert le concert par la "Rapsodie hongroise" de Liatz, vigoureusement jouée. M. Herr Emil Fischer, basse, se faisait entendre pour la première fois à Montréal. Il a chanté un air dramatique de "La Juive" de Ludovic Halevy et a eu les honneurs du rappel.

Mme Scalchi est une connaissance de Montréal, même son absence dans la troupe d'Albani, l'année dernière, a créé une telle lacune que les tribunaux ont dû consoler le public qui voulait entendre la contralto italienne dans les "Huguenots" et "Faust."

Mme Scalchi a chanté l'air du petit page des "Huguenots" et en rappel, la "Gavotte de Mignon." Elle a été applaudie à outrance.

Mme Lilian Nordica est une étoile de première grandeur, qui a sa place à côté de la Patti et d'Albani. Elle s'est presque prodiguée, hier soir, et a pu montrer toutes les qualités de sa voix merveilleuse.

Le ténor Campanini et le baryton Del Puente ont été entendus avec plaisir et ont reçu leur part des applaudissements.

L'opéra dramatique de Mascagni "Cavalleria Rusticana" a été un véritable bouquet de duos, trios, fort goûté de l'auditoire.

BUFFALO EXPRESS.

Wednesday Morning, Jan. 18, 1893.

AN OPERATIC CONCERT.

The Nordica Operatic Concert Company, an unusually strong musical organization, under the direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Lillian Nordica, Sofia Scalchi, Helen Dudley Campbell, Sig. Campanini, Sig. Del Puente and Emil Fischer, will appear at Music Hall on Saturday evening in a miscellaneous programme, concluding with Mascagni's beautiful opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana," with the above-named artists in the cast. The sale of seats opens this morning at Peter Paul

LE MONDE

MONTREAL, 19 JANVIER 1893

Un superbe Concert

Les brillants concerts se suivent de près à Montréal par le temps qui court. Cette semaine nous avons eu Nordica et Scalchi et lundi prochain le 23, le "Ladies Schubert Quartette" de Boston viendra se faire entendre à la salle Windsor, avec le concours du "Harmony Male Quartette de Montréal." Les artistes du "Ladies Schubert Quartette" ont une grande réputation par tous les Etats-Unis et nous sommes sûrs que les membres du "Harmony Male" au nombre desquels nous voyons les noms de nos amis Duquette et Bourdon, sauront soutenir dignement la réputation des amateurs de Montréal.

Billets en vente chez Sheppard, 2274 rue Ste-Catherine. 131-3

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 21, 1893

THE NORDICA COMPANY.

Mr. C. A. Ellis has organized a concert company which is surely going to carry all before it. Monday evening proved that. Music Hall was filled, and in the audience were a great many representatives of the Four Hundred of the musical world; indeed, there would have been many more "carriage folks" and dilettanti had not the date clashed with that of a Kneisel concert, which none of the elect would miss for any other delight without pang and penance. The programme was of the standard style—solos for the principals in the first part, and then an operatic second part, made up in this case of selections from "Faust." To Mr. Ellis's extreme credit, be it said, that he made none of those ridiculous attempts to rig up diminutive and tottering scenery on the stage, and to insert amid it incongruously-dressed singers making believe act. His artists took their places like sensible soloists, on the beautiful and costly chairs with which Music Hall audiences are familiar, got up when they had to sing, and sat down peaceably until their turns came round again. One didn't get opera, but one did get opera music sung well, straightforwardly and without distraction, which was a refreshing novelty. Everybody seemed to have a gorgeous time; the singers sang as if their salvation depended on generous tone, full feeling and entire élan, and the auditors applauded till they got two songs for one in every possible place. Campanini had his high notes ready and launched them electrically; Del Puente simply lifted the roof; Fischer shook the foundations and Scalchi beamed and tossed out her quaint, telling tones as if she had been so long ashore as to have forgotten the sea which she had left only a few hours before, while Nordica sang more richly, ringingly and brilliantly than she has ever done here before. But although the "Toréador" and the "Chi mi frena" were sung as if all the United States were meant to hear, there was yet no lack of nice, fine, sympathetic and elegant singing, and the critical had no occasion to go home lamenting that the concert had been so filled with the enthusiasm of melody and free voice that it was all abandon and no reserve. Mr. Sapio conducted the orchestra admirably in the accompaniments and very well in the "William Tell" overture and a storm-piece of his own writing.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1893

At the third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Chickering Hall, New York, on the evening of the 12th, a remarkable success was achieved by a young girl quite unknown to the musical public. She was simply announced as the Signorina Eugenia Castellano, and very few in the audience knew anything about her. Her selection was the well-known Mendelssohn concerto in G minor, No. 1. It requires great agility of execution and daintiness of fingering, in both of which qualities the new pianist excelled. She has dash, taste, delicacy, and gave a delightful interpretation of a most melodious and charming composition. Her success was instantaneous.

Two musical treats in one day was what Newton enjoyed on Tuesday. The afternoon found sixty fashionably gowned ladies, with the carriage which only the thousands resting on their shoulders justifies, assembled in the spacious music room of the elegant new residence of Mrs. Henry E. Cobb on Bellevue Street, to listen to soothing strains from the instruments of a selected few of the Symphony Orchestra. It was the fourth of a successful series of matinees under the auspices of Mrs. E. Charles Fitch, and a fifth entertainment, on even a grander scale, is soon to follow at the latter's residence on Sargent Street.

....

The evening found many of the same set, increased in numbers and accompanied by gentlemen, in the concert hall of the Newton Club house, entranced by the rendering of the overture, "Mignon," by thirty picked musicians from the same fashionable orchestra. With Mr. Arthur Nikisch as conductor and Mr. Franz Kneisel as soloist the frequenters of Music Hall declared they never had heard music before, and thrilled to the utmost, applause resounded from pit to dome, and the light of pleasure beamed from every eye.

.....

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 18, 1893.

The Third Boston Symphony Concert.

THE third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Chickering Hall last Thursday evening in the presence of the usual large and modish audience. The concert was not so excellent as its predecessors, owing to the weather and the construction of the evening's program. Beethoven's eighth symphony was played in anything but a finished style, though Mr. Nikisch adhered to common sense tempo, the menuet particularly being played in traditional tempo. The trio was marred in part by some eccentricities on the part of the woodwind, which also misbehaved itself in a Berlioz number. The wretched weather without was undoubtedly to blame for this and for the lack of resonance in the string department.

Two movements from Berlioz, "The Damnation of Faust," the "Menuette des Feux-Follets," and the "Valse des Sylphes" were fairly well given, and then Mr. Timothée Adamowski played the first two movements of Bruch's G minor concerto, a superfluous proceeding, for mutilations are at all times to be descried. The best orchestral number was the playing of Beethoven's "Leonora Overture" the third. This was read with great dramatic vigor, and even the prolonged ritardando at the end of the introduction was agreeably impressive.

The event of the evening was the extraordinary brilliant piano playing of Eugenia Castellano, a girl in her early teens, but already a full fledged virtuosa, though not a finished artist. She gave Mendelssohn's hackneyed G minor concerto, but imparted to its trite measures a buoyancy, a life and a dash that were most refreshing. This young virtuosa has remarkable technical control of the keyboard, and her pliant wrists might be envied by any pianist. Her scales are crystalline, and her touch musical and warm. She has great certainty, and her presto playing is furious but exact. She took our breath away in the last movement of the concerto. In response to a tremendous encore Miss Castellano played an étude by Martucci at a tremendous tempo, full of skips, hand crossings, runs and involved figures. She is a technical wonder, and will be heard in a piano recital this evening in Chickering Hall and in one next Saturday afternoon.

The Kneisel Quartet.—This noble organization, the fine fleur of its sort in this country, gave its second concert in this city at Chickering Hall last Saturday afternoon. The club played Schumann's A minor quartet, op. 41, No. 1; Schubert's well-known D minor quartet, and with Arthur Foote, the pianist, his own interesting C major quartet for piano and strings. The performance throughout was characterized by refinement, delicacy and earnest musical feeling.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert.—Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the Boston soprano, was too ill to sing at the third Brooklyn Philharmonic concert, given at the Academy of Music, in that city, last Saturday evening. Basta Tavary was engaged in her place and sang "Non Mi Dir," from "Don Giovanni," and "Dich Theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," in her usual unsatisfying manner. The orchestra under Mr. Nikisch played in excellent form Lalo's delightful "Le Roi d'Ys" overture, Dvorák's suite in D and Schumann's C major symphony. The usual public rehearsal occurred last Friday afternoon.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 22.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 22, 1893.

M. Henri Marteau's Triumphant Debut at the Symphony Concert—Third Paderewski Recital—The Busoni Programmes—The Heinrich Concerts—Scharwenka's Coming.

The soloist at the Symphony concert last evening, the 12th of the present season's series, was M. Henri Marteau, a young French violinist, who made his first appearance here on this occasion.

M. Marteau is a very young man, being credited with having gained his present prominence at the age of 19, but he has the qualities of maturity in his playing, and has no call to ask consideration on account of his lack of experience upon the concert stage.

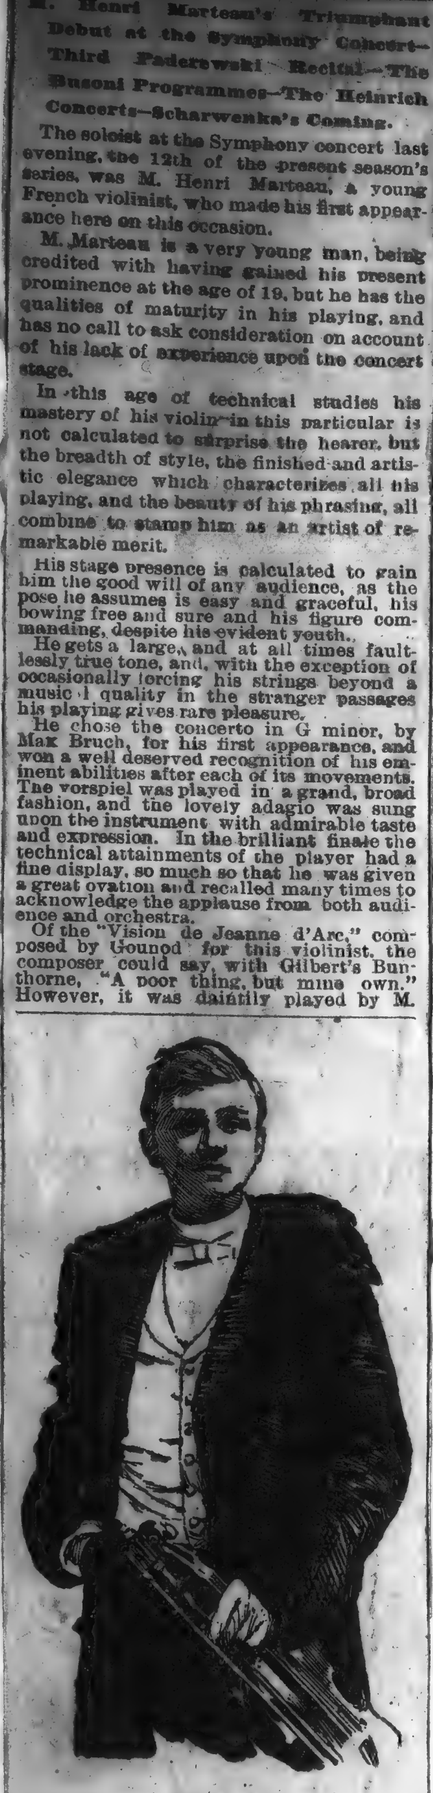
In this age of technical studies his mastery of his violin in this particular is not calculated to surprise the hearer, but the breadth of style, the finished and artistic elegance which characterizes all his playing, and the beauty of his phrasing, all combine to stamp him as an artist of remarkable merit.

His stage presence is calculated to gain him the good will of any audience, as the pose he assumes is easy and graceful, his bowing free and sure and his figure commanding, despite his evident youth.

He gets a large, and at all times faultlessly true tone, and, with the exception of occasionally forcing his strings beyond a musical quality in the stranger passages his playing gives rare pleasure.

He chose the concerto in G minor, by Max Bruch, for his first appearance, and won a well deserved recognition of his eminent abilities after each of its movements. The vorspiel was played in a grand, broad fashion, and the lovely adagio was sung upon the instrument with admirable taste and expression. In the brilliant finale the technical attainments of the player had a fine display, so much so that he was given a great ovation and recalled many times to acknowledge the applause from both audience and orchestra.

Of the "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," composed by Gounod for this violinist, the composer could say, with Gilbert's Bunthorne, "A poor thing, but mine own." However, it was daintily played by M.



HENRI MARTEAU.

Marteau as his second contribution to the programme, and the reputation of the composer made it acceptable.

The work of the orchestra in the concerto calls for the highest commendation, as a better support for the soloist could hardly have been supplied.

The orchestral numbers on the programme of the evening were the overture "In the Spring," Goldmark; "Mephisto Waltz," Liszt, and the symphony, "Im Walde," Raff.

The selections seemed a bit out of season for spring scenes, and thoughts of the woods were not in keeping with the atmospheric conditions of the ouside world. Despite this fact the programme gave great pleasure by reason of its many brilliant characteristics. The Goldmark overture is an excellent example of the ability of this master of tone color, and the playing of the composition under Mr. Nikish's baton fairly challenged criticism.

The "Faust" episode by Liszt had a most fascinating performance, the reading given it realizing all its ever varying suggestions in the most enjoyable fashion.

Raff's "Im Walde" symphony has always been popular here, and deservedly so, as it is a notable success in the line of programme music, and appeals to even the unimaginative mind by reason of its tuneful characteristics and wonderfully clever orchestration. It was capitally played throughout.

At next Saturday evening's concert Mr Paderewski is to be the soloist, and the programme will include Schumann's symphony No. 1, in B flat; Paderewski's concerto for pianoforte, in A minor; MacDowell's poems for orchestra, 1, Hamlet," 2, "Ophelia," soli for pianoforte, and Wagner's vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger."

The last of the season's series of concerts by the Adamowski quartet will be given at Chickering Hall next Tuesday afternoon, the assisting artist being Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The programme will be: Quartet in G, Haydn; suite for violin and piano, Goldmark; quartet for piano, violin, viola and violoncello, Saint-Saens.

[92]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 23, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

It was an exciting concert from beginning to end, and although the programme was longer than usual, the interest of the auditor was not suffered to flag for an instant. Saturday's concert may therefore be spoken of as one of the best of the entire series. Goldmark's "Spring" overture is not of the effeminate, cloying style that is a defect in some of his works; its opening phrase, a three-noted figure from dominant to tonic and back, bursts forth with a heartiness that at once gives a clue to the boisterous heartiness that is to rule. The work is not without contrast however, and there are some celestial passages which picture ecstacy a la Wagner, on the violins in the highest positions. Touches of drone-bass, and other conventional portrayals of rusticity appear, but the work is so robust and exhilarating that one can readily excuse a lack of novelty. The performance was appropriately brusque. The violins began with an incisive power (it sounded like sul ponticello work) that gave the keynote to the entire performance, which was brilliant from this sudden entrance, to the fiery Coda. The flute did especially artistic work in this number.

Boston is tending toward musical polytheism. A second object of worship has arisen in the concert room. This time it is a violinist—the Paderewski of the catgut. Henri Marteau is yet a youth, but he is an artist in whose work no trace of juvenility can be discerned. He presented his visiting card in the shape of Bruch's G minor concerto, and long before he had finished the introductory movement every one knew that a great artist was on the platform. He played the work as if he loved it, and there is certainly much to love in its stately measures.

The first movement, which may be called almost an improvised introduction, demands far more than mere technique from the performer; it requires dramatic instinct, and a broad, declamatory style; the arpeggios and other brilliant passages, here become a means and not an end; it is the French style applied to a German purpose. It is in such a movement that one can best judge of an artist, for here the individual nature speaks most freely. M. Marteau achieved his great success in this important movement.

The gem of the work, musically considered, is the Adagio. What a wealth of expression there is in the sub-theme here! How it appears in constantly new guises, on the G string, in canonic imitations between soloist and orchestra, and in tenderest pianissimo! Here was the romantic side of the artist, and it proved more abundantly equipped even than the dramatic. The finale has just a touch of war and heroism in its bold measures, and it was very natural for Bruch, who may be called the Tyrtaeus of modern music, to employ this vein; its dashing measures are the truly technical part of the great concerto. Constant double-stopping, difficult skips, furious runs are everywhere present. Again the artist made a triumph, and the recalls which followed showed an enthusiasm on the part of the audience that was entirely in place.

One may commend the choice made by the young violinist for his introductory number, for the three contrasted styles of its movements afford the most abundant opportunity to judge of the soloist who undertakes it, and musically the concerto is not far behind the great one by Beethoven, and may certainly be ranked with the famous Mendelssohn concerto. Not as much can be said of the second number of M. Marteau; it was Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," a treacly bit which the artist gave with appropriate sentimentality, but which seemed terribly diaphanous after the powerful concerto. The public, however, as is often the case, preferred molasses to music, and five recalls followed the termination of the sweet effusion.

The orchestra played finely in the concerto, and continued its excellent work throughout the concert. The "Mephisto Waltz" was as full of diablerie as the wildest sensationalist could wish. It is a fine study of tone-color, if nothing else, and its eerie character lost nothing in the interpretation. The ensemble was surprisingly good, for the work fairly bristles with syncopations and rhythmic difficulties, and these were overcome in excellent style. The violoncello, flute, and harp solos were finely executed, and deserve especial mention. Mr. Schuecker was most brilliant in the last named.

Raff's "Im Walde" symphony ended the concert. It is the best of the symphonies of this master, as the "Lenore" is the most popular. The first movement was beautifully shaded, and the rich modulations of the figure of two notes (like the chief figure of the "Spring" symphony, which began the concert, this is simply the dominant and tonic) were expressively rendered. The clarinette did excellent work in its important phrases in the Reverie, and the flute fioriture against the theme on the strings were finely played and with judicious balance. The "Dance of the Dryads" gave splendid opportunity to the woodwind, and the blending of the pretty skipping phrases with the pizzicato effects was perfect. That uncomfortable Northern deity, Frau Hulda, rode around in the finale in the usual sensational manner. Raff is fond of musical equestrianism, for both in the "Lenore" symphony and in this work the auditor is treated to a horseback ride. One cannot say, however, that the realism of Berlioz or the dash of Wagner in the same kind of cavalry work is attained. This is, however, one of the very best of the Raff finales, for in this movement of his symphonies one often finds Raff rather too diffuse.

That Raff was master of the symphonic form is undeniable; he shows it in the first movement of this very symphony. But his love of programme effects is not a merit, and just such a symphony leads the non-musician to expect a story in every instrumental work. Beethoven, to be sure, opened the door to this, but it is a defect all the same. When classical instrumental music endeavors to picture definite things, it is not so powerful as painting or poetry, and it by choice, becomes the weakest in the sisterhood of arts. The fact needs frequent statement, for the laity still prefer Beethoven's weak Sixth symphony to his strong Seventh, and Raff's "Im Walde" does not take the public out of the woods in this popular misunderstanding of the true scope and mission of music.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston [illegible].

MONDAY, JANUARY 23, 1893.

The Twelfth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

Henri Marteau, Violinist, Plays and Conquers.

In Memoriam—Julius Eichberg, Violinist and Teacher.

The programme of the twelfth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture—"In the Spring," op. 36.....Goldmark
Concerto for violin No. 1, G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Mephisto Waltz.....Liszt
"Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for Violin and Orchestra, Gounod
Symphony No. 3 ("Im Walde"), op. 153.....Raff

⁂

Goldmark once delighted in musical pictures of strange lands and strange men and women that swooned alike under a blazing sun. He dreamed of Balkis, the Queen of Sheba, and her wild desire to see the court of Solomon. He was an Oriental, studying devoutly the Kama Soutra. He wandered in Shushan in the third year of the reign of the King Ahasuerus, and he sat at the feast in the court of the garden of the King's palace, "where were white, green and blue hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble; the beds were of gold and silver upon a pavement of red and blue and white and black marble." He, too, coveted the beauty of Tamar.

And so his music was full of sandal wood and pungent incense, camels and nodding palms, long-bearded men that knew the languages of the animals, women that were courted by the Barmecides. And the hot sun struck fiercely his notes and turned them into mingled blood and wine. That was the Goldmark of "Sakuntala," and the "Queen of Sheba." The Goldmark of the "Spring overture" is an excellent and amiable musician who writes pretty and agreeable music. His name might be Schmidt, Schulz or Mueller. I prefer the Goldmark of the inexorable desert, the bird-haunted forest, the player to the graceful movements of heavy-eyed dancing girls.

⁂

The music of this concert was largely descriptive and romantic. Spring means something to an Englishman or a dweller on the Continent. We have no spring in staid New England. There is a dangerous leap from winter to summer, and the realistic music of accompaniment is a cacophony of coughs.

⁂

The "Mephisto Waltz" is an indecent setting of a lewd text. This episode in Lenau's "Faust" is coarse and brutal; musical embellishment does not better it. Liszt's music is not without strength; the strength is the strength of Diogenes. The beauty is momentary and infrequent; morbid, it is akin to the charm of a poem by Baudelaire on "Carrion" or "Spleen."

⁂

The symphony gave great pleasure. There was no need of following Raff's directions for proper enjoyment. The music may have meant this or it may have portrayed that; the success of the portrayal is immaterial; the music itself, particularly in the first three movements, fascinates and holds the hearer.

⁂

The performance of the orchestra was admirable from the beginning to the end. In solo passages and in ensemble there was almost nothing to be desired. In beauty of conception and in perfection of performance the concert of Saturday evening was the finest of the present series.

⁂

The solo violinist was Henri Marteau. The story of the career of this remarkable young man was told at length in the Journal of Saturday, and there is no need of referring to his triumphs in France, Germany and England. Besides we have heard him.

Marteau does not need the rare charm of his personality. He could be older by many years, for in his performance there is no suggestion of the wonder-child. He could conquer without the aid of his handsome face with dangerous dimples; without the impression made by his manly, nervous and aristocratic bearing. Were he the Gwynplaine of Victor Hugo, the hearer would not notice the carved and eternal laugh. The ugliest of singers charmed thousands by the passion of his song, and the greatest Arsace was hideous to the view.

But when such physical attractions and such modesty of bearing are added to supreme musical gifts and acquirements, then indeed must the violinist be irresistible.

This young man was fortunate, it is true, in his teachers. There was Hubert Leonard, who succeeded Charles de Beriot. There was Garcin, the pupil of Alard. Marteau has also enjoyed the counsel of colleagues and composers.

But Marteau has one thing that cannot be given by the most experienced teacher. It is not to be learned in private lesson or in long-established conservatory. Intimate knowledge of tradition is here of no avail.

For this young man has the sacred fire of genius.

Destiny promised him at his birth that he could go forth into the world and by his violin draw all hearts unto him.

Nor is he merely an emotional player, of rare technique and lascivious ear. He plays with breadth and he is not dominated by an heroic role. He is master of the situation. He sounds the entire gamut of human passion.

His strength is never brutal. His virility is never muscularity. His tenderness is not effeminacy.

He does not play to the eye. He does not call attention to a difficulty. The good old cantor and organist Karl August Haupt—now at rest—would have seen in him the living exemplification of his advice to a pupil. "When you come to a trying passage you should persuade the hearer by your ease and accuracy that it is the simplest passage in the composition."

⁂

There are excellent violinists that honor this town by choosing it as the home of their adoption. Wandering stars of the first magnitude have brightened our sky for a night. But an audience in Music Hall has not been so thoroughly captivated by a violinist since the apparition of Martin Meliton Sarasate.

⁂

And yet the joy of greeting a master is lessened by the thought of the departure from us, the same week, of one of the most revered musicians of this country. Many in this city remember the beauty and the purity of the performance of the violinist. Hundreds acknowledge gratefully the sound and wise instruction that came from him.

Set oration or solemn funeral line would be distasteful to Julius Eichberg. It was his custom of an afternoon, when he was through with the exhausting labors of the day, to sit at ease in the club, where he was loved and respected from the time of its foundation. There would he talk on subjects musical, on topics of the day. There would he tell of musicians of the past. There would he give kind and unostentatious advice, which is now doubly precious. There would he parry jest and speak in epigram.

His use of English was most felicitous. One adjective would color a terse and witty sentence. He was a master of sarcasm, which, however, was only used in denunciation of that which was hypocritical, mean or impure. He scorned pretence and affectation. He was the champion of the unrecognized deserving, and of the humble, and of the oppressed.

His learning was never openly exposed. It crept into his conversation almost secretly and shame-faced, for great was the modesty of the man.

To the very last he was faithful in the discharge of his duty. He had exchanged the passing glory of the virtuoso for the enduring honor of the teacher. Although fatigued, he did not complain. That noble head was not bowed; those piercing eyes were not dimmed. The wit was nimble. The heart was great with kindness.

Now that he has left us there seems to be less music in this world, and nature itself seems less kindly. But surely such purity, such courage, such nobility and purity of life are not now extinct.

⁂

"O strong soul, by what shore
Tarriest thou now? For that force
[illegible]
[illegible]
In the [illegible] that was
Of heaven is [illegible] and strength,
Zealous, beneficent, firm."

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 22.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:—Overture, "In the Spring," Goldmark; Concerto for violin, No. 1, Max Bruch; "Mephisto Waltz," Liszt; "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for violin and orchestra, Gounod; Symphony, "Im Walde," Raff. The orchestra was at its very best, and its work as a whole was in advance of any that it has hitherto vouchsafed this season. The Goldmark overture, in particular, was beautifully read and played, and a strong and characteristic interpretation was given of Liszt's bit of programme bluster. The feature of the concert, however, was the first appearance here of the violinist, Henri Marteau. This young man is already entitled to a place by the side of the most eminent of contemporary violinists. He has a large and beautiful tone; a style perfect in finish; elegant yet virile, exquisitely refined, and yet broad and manly. His technique is brilliant and faultless, his bowing free, graceful and masterly; his intonation immaculately true. Fire, self-poise, dignity, immense vitality and artistic beauty of the highest order delightfully characterize his playing. He is, taken for all in all, the finest violinist who has been heard here in many a day. In all that he does he manifests the born artist, and his style is marked by an innate aristocratic nobility that proclaims him at once as one of the favored of those children of art who have been dowered in the cradle. His performance of the concerto was fascinating in the beauty of its sentiment, its impressive, romantic feeling, and its freedom from all that savored of affectation. We have been somewhat surfeited on violin playing, of late, but the playing of this young genius, in its high perfection of technique and style, was a new sensation, that was stimulating in effect. Many have played this concerto here before, but no one has performed it so beautifully, or has made it so well worth the hearing. At the end of the first movement, the audience expressed its surprise and delight with prolonged applause, and when the work was ended, gave way to a storm of enthusiasm, recalling the artist three times. His wonderful cantabile playing in the Gounod selection again stirred it to a fury of plaudits that did not cease until the player came forward five times to bow his acknowledgements. His success was overwhelming, and what is more, it was wholly deserved. The brilliant future of this young master is already assured. At the next concert the programme will be: Symphony, No. 1, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte, A-minor, Paderewski; two poems for orchestra, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia" Mac Dowell (first time); pianoforte solos, and Wagner's "Meistersingers" overture. The soloist is Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its fifth concert of the season in Chickering Hall, on Monday evening, assisted by Mr. F. Busoni and Mr. G. Goldschmidt. The programme was: Trio in B-flat minor for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, Volkmann; Quartet in A-minor, op. 41, No. 1, for strings, Schumann; Quintet in B-minor, op. 115, for clarinet and strings, Brahms. The Volkmann trio is a charming work, clear in form, affluent in chaste melody, and characterized by a delightful sincerity, frankness, and freshness. It was beautifully played, Mr. Busoni giving a brilliant and sympathetic reading of the piano part, and showing keen artistic discretion in refraining from obtruding the instrument unduly. The Schumann quartet was perfectly played, though with something now and then of over-sentimentalism. A little more of fire, occasionally, would made it less monotonous. The Brahms work was a surprise in its clearness, its freedom from too-apparent pedagogy, its effect of broad simplicity, and its frequent warm tunefulness. It is quite comprehensible on a first hearing. It was admirably played, and was applauded with fervent delight. It is a composition that will always be heard with pleasure, and, taken altogether, it seems to us one of the most genial and most perfect of Brahms's achievements in chamber music. The next concert will be given Feb. 13.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 23, 1893.

The reception accorded to the young violinist, Henri Marteau, who made his first appearance in this city as the soloist of the twelfth symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening, was most hearty and well merited. All that has been said of his successes, which have fired the enthusiasm of the musical centres of Europe can no longer be doubted, he is an artist of a rare type and plays with the quiet ease of a master. There is a breadth, power and musical sentiment in his playing seldom met with in the greatest artists, and his tone, rich, warm and of perfect smoothness, is simply exquisite, leaving little to be desired, and promises for him a most brilliant future career. He is quite young in years, having been born in Reims, France, in 1874, and showed signs of his musical genius at the age of 5, though it was not until April, 1884, that he made his public debut before an audience of 2500 in his native city. His stage presence is easy and graceful and he has a bright and winning face. He chose for his first number Bruch's concerto in G minor for violin. There was a perceptible nervousness which soon wore away and he played the Vorspiel with broad and technical skill. The adagio was full of expression and refinement; in the finale the purity of his tones were remarkable, and his runs and chromatics were given with great rapidity and evenness of bow. The second number, Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," and which was dedicated to Marteau by the composer, was played in a dainty and charming manner, full of thoughtful expression. At the conclusion of each of his numbers, a perfect ovation was accorded him to which he gracefully bowed acknowledgement. The rest of the programme consisted of overture in A minor, "In the Spring," by Karl Goldmark, which was given in Mr. Nikisch's best manner. The "Mephisto Waltz" by Listz, is one of the liveliest of Listz's orchestral tone-pictures, and was played with life and color. The long 'cello part was excellently done. Raff's "Im Walde" is full of picturesque and poetic beauty, and that highly colored orchestration in which Raff delights, and was a fitting ending to a thoroughly enjoyable programme. Next Saturday evening and Friday rehearsal Mr. Ignace Paderewski will be the soloist.

The last of the season's series of concerts by the Adamowski quartet will be given at Chickering Hall next Tuesday afternoon, the assisting artist being Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 22.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 22, 1893.

M. Henri Marteau's Triumphant Debut at the Symphony Concert—Third Paderewski Recital—The Busoni Programmes—The Heinrich Concerts—Scharwenka's Coming.

The soloist at the Symphony concert last evening, the 12th of the present season's series, was M. Henri Marteau, a young French violinist, who made his first appearance here on this occasion.

M. Marteau is a very young man, being credited with having gained his present prominence at the age of 19, but he has the qualities of maturity in his playing, and has no call to ask consideration on account of his lack of experience upon the concert stage.

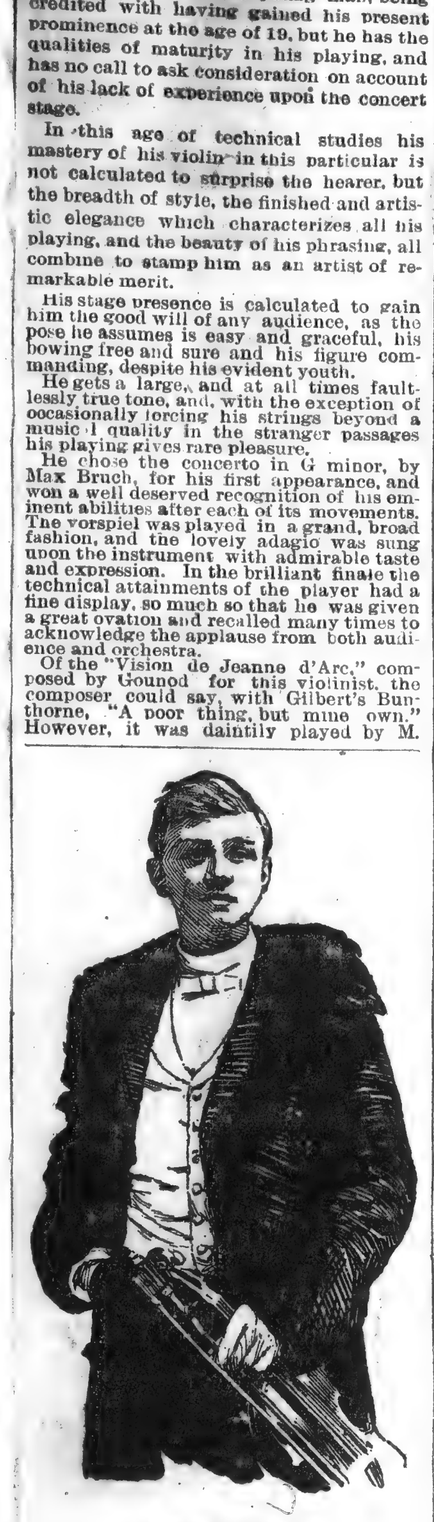
In this age of technical studies his mastery of his violin in this particular is not calculated to surprise the hearer, but the breadth of style, the finished and artistic elegance which characterizes all his playing, and the beauty of his phrasing, all combine to stamp him as an artist of remarkable merit.

His stage presence is calculated to gain him the good will of any audience, as the pose he assumes is easy and graceful, his bowing free and sure and his figure commanding, despite his evident youth.

He gets a large, and at all times faultlessly true tone, and, with the exception of occasionally forcing his strings beyond a musical quality in the stranger passages his playing gives rare pleasure.

He chose the concerto in G minor, by Max Bruch, for his first appearance, and won a well deserved recognition of his eminent abilities after each of its movements. The vorspiel was played in a grand, broad fashion, and the lovely adagio was sung upon the instrument with admirable taste and expression. In the brilliant finale the technical attainments of the player had a fine display, so much so that he was given a great ovation and recalled many times to acknowledge the applause from both audience and orchestra.

Of the "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," composed by Gounod for this violinist, the composer could say, with Gilbert's Bunthorne, "A poor thing, but mine own." However, it was daintily played by M.



HENRI MARTEAU.

Marteau as his second contribution to the programme, and the reputation of the composer made it acceptable.

The work of the orchestra in the concerto calls for the highest commendation, as a better support for the soloist could hardly have been supplied.

The orchestral numbers on the programme of the evening were the overture "In the Spring," Goldmark; "Mephisto Waltz," Liszt, and the symphony, "Im Walde," Raff.

The selections seemed a bit out of season for spring scenes, and thoughts of the woods were not in keeping with the atmospheric conditions of the ouside world. Despite this fact the programme gave great pleasure by reason of its many brilliant characteristics. The Goldmark overture is an excellent example of the ability of this master of tone color, and the playing of the composition under Mr. Nikish's baton fairly challenged criticism.

The "Faust" episode by Liszt had a most fascinating performance, the reading given it realizing all its ever varying suggestions in the most enjoyable fashion.

Raff's "Im Walde" symphony has always been popular here, and deservedly so, as it is a notable success in the line of programme music, and appeals to even the unimaginative mind by reason of its tuneful characteristics and wonderfully clever orchestration. It was capitally played throughout.

At next Saturday evening's concert Mr Paderewski is to be the soloist, and the programme will include Schumann's symphony No. 1, in B flat; Paderewski's concerto for pianoforte, in A minor; MacDowell's poems for orchestra, 1, Hamlet," 2, "Ophelia," soli for pianoforte, and Wagner's vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger."

The last of the season's series of concerts by the Adamowski quartet will be given at Chickering Hall next Tuesday afternoon, the assisting artist being Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The programme will be: Quartet in G. Haydn; suite for violin and piano, Goldmark; quartet for piano, violin, viola and violoncello, Saint-Saens.

[92]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 23, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

It was an exciting concert from beginning to end, and although the programme was longer than usual, the interest of the auditor was not suffered to flag for an instant. Saturday's concert may therefore be spoken of as one of the best of the entire series. Goldmark's "Spring" overture is not of the effeminate, cloying style that is a defect in some of his works; its opening phrase, a three-noted figure from dominant to tonic and back, bursts forth with a heartiness that at once gives a clue to the boisterous heartiness that is to rule. The work is not without contrast however, and there are some celestial passages which picture ecstacy a la Wagner, on the violins in the highest positions. Touches of drone-bass, and other conventional portrayals of rusticity appear, but the work is so robust and exhilarating that one can readily excuse a lack of novelty. The performance was appropriately brusque. The violins began with an incisive power (it sounded like sull' ponticello work) that gave the keynote to the entire performance, which was brilliant from this sudden entrance, to the fiery Coda. The flute did especially artistic work in this number.

Boston is tending toward musical polytheism. A second object of worship has arisen in the concert room. This time it is a violinist—the Paderewski of the catgut. Henri Marteau is yet a youth, but he is an artist in whose work no trace of juvenility can be discerned. He presented his visiting card in the shape of Bruch's G minor concerto, and long before he had finished the introductory movement every one knew that a great artist was on the platform. He played the work as if he loved it, and there is certainly much to love in its stately measures.

The first movement, which may be called almost an improvised introduction, demands far more than mere technique from the performer; it requires dramatic instinct, and a broad, declamatory style; the arpeggios and other brilliant passages, here become a means and not an end; it is the French style applied to a German purpose. It is in such a movement that one can best judge of an artist, for here the individual nature speaks most freely. M. Marteau achieved his great success in this important movement.

The gem of the work, musically considered, is the Adagio. What a wealth of expression there is in the sub-theme here! How it appears in constantly new guises, on the G string, in canonic imitations between soloist and orchestra, and in tenderest pianissimo! Here was the romantic side of the artist, and it proved more abundantly equipped even than the dramatic. The finale has just a touch of war and heroism in its bold measures, and it was very natural for Bruch, who may be called the Tyrtaeus of modern music, to employ this vein; its dashing measures are the truly technical part of the great concerto. Constant double-stopping, difficult skips, furious runs are everywhere present. Again the artist made a triumph, and the recalls which followed showed an enthusiasm on the part of the audience that was entirely in place.

One may commend the choice made by the young violinist for his introductory number, for the three contrasted styles of its movements afford the most abundant opportunity to judge of the soloist who undertakes it, and musically the concerto is not far behind the great one by Beethoven, and may certainly be ranked with the famous Mendelssohn concerto. Not as much can be said of the second number of M. Marteau; it was Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," a treacly bit which the artist gave with appropriate sentimentality, but which seemed terribly diaphanous after the powerful concerto. The public, however, as is often the case, preferred molasses to music, and five recalls followed the termination of the sweet effusion.

The orchestra played finely in the concerto, and continued its excellent work throughout the concert. The "Mephisto Waltz" was as full of diablerie as the wildest sensationalist could wish. It is a fine study of tone-color, if nothing else, and its eerie character lost nothing in the interpretation. The ensemble was surprisingly good, for the work fairly bristles with syncopations and rhythmic difficulties, and these were overcome in excellent style. The violoncello, flute, and harp solos were finely executed, and deserve especial mention. Mr. Schuecker was most brilliant in the last named.

Raff's "Im Walde" symphony ended the concert. It is the best of the symphonies of this master, as the "Lenore" is the most popular. The first movement was beautifully shaded, and the rich modulations of the figure of two notes (like the chief figure of the "Spring" symphony, which began the concert, this is simply the dominant and tonic) were expressively rendered. The clarinette did excellent work in its important phrases in the Reverie, and the flute fioriture against the theme on the strings were finely played and with judicious balance. The "Dance of the Dryads" gave splendid opportunity to the woodwind, and the blending of the pretty skipping phrases with the pizzicato effects was perfect. That uncomfortable Northern deity, Frau Hulda, rode around in the finale in the usual sensational manner. Raff is fond of musical equestrianism, for both in the "Lenore" symphony and in this work the auditor is treated to a horseback ride. One cannot say, however, that the realism of Berlioz or the dash of Wagner in the same kind of cavalry work is attained. This is, however, one of the very best of the Raff finales, for in this movement of his symphonies one often finds Raff rather too diffuse.

That Raff was master of the symphonic form is undeniable; he shows it in the first movement of this very symphony. But his love of programme effects is not a merit, and just such a symphony leads the non-musician to expect a story in every instrumental work. Beethoven, to be sure, opened the door to this, but it is a defect all the same. When classical instrumental music endeavors to picture definite things, it is not so powerful as painting or poetry, and it by choice, becomes the weakest in the sisterhood of arts. The fact needs frequent statement, for the laity still prefer Beethoven's weak Sixth symphony to his strong Seventh, and Raff's "Im Walde" does not take the public out of the woods in this popular misunderstanding of the true scope and mission of music.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JANUARY 23, 1893.

The Twelfth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

Henri Marteau, Violinist, Plays and Conquers.

In Memoriam—Julius Eichberg, Violinist and Teacher.

The programme of the twelfth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture—"In the Spring," op. 36.....Goldmark
Concerto for violin No. 1, G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Mephisto Waltz.....Liszt
"Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for Violin and Orchestra, Gounod
Symphony No. 3 ("Im Walde"), op. 153.....Raff

***

Goldmark once delighted in musical pictures of strange lands and strange men and women that swooned alike under a blazing sun. He dreamed of Balkis, the Queen of Sheba, and her wild desire to see the court of Solomon. He was an Oriental, studying devoutly the Kama Soutra. He wandered in Shushan in the third year of the reign of the King Ahasuerus, and he sat at the feast in the court of the garden of the King's palace, "where were white, green and blue hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble; the beds were of gold and silver upon a pavement of red and blue and white and black marble." He, too, coveted the beauty of Tamar.

And so his music was full of sandal wood and pungent incense, camels and nodding palms, long-bearded men that knew the languages of the animals, women that were courted by the Barmecides. And the hot sun struck fiercely his notes and turned them into mingled blood and wine. That was the Goldmark of "Sakuntala" and the "Queen of Sheba." The Goldmark of the "Spring overture" is an excellent and amiable musician who writes pretty and agreeable music. His name might be Schmidt, Schulz or Mueller. I prefer the Goldmark of the inexorable desert, the bird-haunted forest, the player to the graceful movements of heavy-eyed dancing girls.

***

The music of this concert was largely descriptive and romantic. Spring means something to an Englishman or a dweller on the Continent. We have no spring in staid New England. There is a dangerous leap from winter to summer, and the realistic music of accompaniment is a cacophony of coughs.

***

The "Mephisto Waltz" is an indecent setting of a lewd text. This episode in Lenau's "Faust" is coarse and brutal; musical embellishment does not better it. Liszt's music is not without strength; the strength is the strength of Diogenes. The beauty is momentary and infrequent; morbid, it is akin to the charm of a poem by Baudelaire on "Carrion" or "Spleen."

***

The symphony gave great pleasure. There was no need of following Raff's directions for proper enjoyment. The music may have meant this or it may have portrayed that; the success of the portrayal is immaterial; the music itself, particularly in the first three movements, fascinates and holds the hearer.

***

The performance of the orchestra was admirable from the beginning to the end. In solo passages and in ensemble there was almost nothing to be desired. In beauty of conception and in perfection of performance the concert of Saturday evening was the finest of the present series.

***

The solo violinist was Henri Marteau. The story of the career of this remarkable young man was told at length in the Journal of Saturday, and there is no need of referring to his triumphs in France, Germany and England. Besides we have heard him.

Marteau does not need the rare charm of his personality. He could be older by many years, for in his performance there is no suggestion of the wonder-child. He could conquer without the aid of his handsome face with dangerous dimples; without the impression made by his manly, nervous and aristocratic bearing. Were he the Gwynplaine of Victor Hugo, the hearer would not notice the carved and eternal laugh. The ugliest of singers charmed thousands by the passion of his song, and the greatest Arsace was hideous to the view.

But when such physical attractions and such modesty of bearing are added to supreme musical gifts and acquirements, then indeed must the violinist be irresistible.

This young man was fortunate, it is true, in his teachers. There was Hubert Leonard, who succeeded Charles de Beriot. There was Garcin, the pupil of Alard. Marteau has also enjoyed the counsel of colleagues and composers.

But Marteau has one thing that cannot be given by the most experienced teacher. It is not to be learned in private lesson or in long-established conservatory. Intimate knowledge of tradition is here of no avail.

For this young man has the sacred fire of genius.

Destiny promised him at his birth that he could go forth into the world and by his violin draw all hearts unto him.

Nor is he merely an emotional player, of rare technique and fastidious ear. He plays with breadth and he is not dominated by an heroic role. He is master of the situation. He sounds the entire gamut of human passion.

His strength is never brutal. His virility is never muscularity. His tenderness is not effeminacy.

He does not play to the eye. He does not call attention to a difficulty. The good old cantor and organist Karl August Haupt—now at rest—would have seen in him the living exemplification of his advice to a pupil, "When you come to a trying passage you should persuade the hearer by your ease and accuracy that it is the simplest passage in the composition."

***

There are excellent violinists that honor this town by choosing it as the home of their adoption. Wandering stars of the first magnitude have brightened our sky for a night. But an audience in Music Hall has not been so thoroughly captivated by a violinist since the apparition of Martin Meliton Sarasate.

***

And yet the joy of greeting a master is lessened by the thought of the departure from us, the same week, of one of the most revered musicians of this country. Many in this city remember the beauty and the purity of the performance of the violinist. Hundreds acknowledge gratefully the sound and wise instruction that came from him.

Set oration or solemn funeral line would be distasteful to Julius Eichberg. It was his custom of an afternoon, when he was through with the exhausting labors of the day, to sit at ease in the club, where he was loved and respected from the time of its foundation. There would he talk on subjects musical, on topics of the day. There would he tell of musicians of the past. There would he give kind and unostentatious advice, which is now doubly precious. There would he parry jest and speak in epigram.

His use of English was most felicitous. One adjective would color a terse and witty sentence. He was a master of sarcasm, which, however, was only used in denunciation of that which was hypocritical, mean or impure. He scorned pretence and affectation. He was the champion of the unrecognized deserving, and of the humble, and of the oppressed.

His learning was never openly exposed. It crept into his conversation almost secretly and shame-faced, for great was the modesty of the man.

To the very last he was faithful in the discharge of his duty. He had exchanged the passing glory of the virtuoso for the enduring honor of the teacher. Although fatigued, he did not complain. That noble head was not bowed; those piercing eyes were not dimmed. The wit was nimble. The heart was great with kindness.

Now that he has left us there seems to be less music in this world, and nature itself seems less kindly. But surely such energy, such courage, such nobility and purity of life are not now extinct.

***

"O strong soul, by what shore
Tarriest thou now? For that force
Surely, has not been left vain!
Somewhere, surely, afar,
In the sounding labor-house vast
Of being, is practiced that strength,
Zealous, beneficent, firm."

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 22.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:—Overture, "In the Spring," Goldmark; Concerto for violin, No. 1, Max Bruch; "Mephisto Waltz, Liszt; "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for violin and orchestra, Gounod; Symphony, "Im Walde," Raff. The orchestra was at its very best, and its work as a whole was in advance of any that it has hitherto vouchsafed this season. The Goldmark overture, in particular, was beautifully read and played, and a strong and characteristic interpretation was given of Liszt's bit of programme bluster. The feature of the concert, however, was the first appearance here of the violinist, Henri Marteau. This young man is already entitled to a place by the side of the most eminent of contemporary violinists. He has a large and beautiful tone; a style perfect in finish; elegant yet virile, exquisitely refined, and yet broad and manly. His technique is brilliant and faultless, his bowing free, graceful and masterly; his intonation immaculately true. Fire, self-poise, dignity, immense vitality and artistic beauty of the highest order delightfully characterize his playing. He is, taken for all in all, the finest violinist who has been heard here in many a day. In all that he does he manifests the born artist, and his style is marked by an innate aristocratic nobility that proclaims him at once as one of the favored of those children of art who have been dowered in the cradle. His performance of the concerto was fascinating in the beauty of its sentiment, its impressive, romantic feeling, and its freedom from all that savored of affectation. We have been somewhat surfeited on violin playing, of late, but the playing of this young genius, in its high perfection of technique and style, was a new sensation, that was stimulating in effect. Many have played this concerto here before, but no one has performed it so beautifully, or has made it so well worth the hearing. At the end of the first movement, the audience expressed its surprise and delight with prolonged applause, and when the work was ended, gave way to a storm of enthusiasm, recalling the artist three times. His wonderful cantabile playing in the Gounod selection again stirred it to a fury of plaudits that did not cease until the player came forward five times to bow his acknowledgements. His success was overwhelming, and what is more, it was wholly deserved. The brilliant future of this young master is already assured. At the next concert the programme will be: Symphony, No. 1, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte, A minor, Paderewski; two poems for orchestra, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia" MacDowell (first time); pianoforte solos, and Wagner's "Mastersingers" overture. The soloist is Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its fifth concert of the season in Chickering Hall, on Monday evening, assisted by Mr. F. Busoni and Mr. G. Goldschmidt. The programme was: Trio in B-flat minor for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, Volkmann; Quartet in A-minor, op. 41, No. 1, for strings, Schumann; Quintet in B-minor, op. 115, for clarinet and strings, Brahms. The Volkmann trio is a charming work, clear in form, affluent in chaste melody, and characterized by a delightful sincerity, tenderness, and freshness. It was beautifully played, Mr. Busoni giving a brilliant and sympathetic reading of the piano part, and showing keen artistic discretion in refraining from obtruding the instrument unduly. The Schumann quartet was perfectly played, though with sometaing now and then of over-sentimentalism. A little more of fire, occasionally, would made it less monotonous. The Brahms work was a surprise in its clearness, its freedom from too-apparent pedagogy, its effect of broad simplicity, and its frequent warm tunefulness. It is quite comprehensible on a first hearing. It was admirably played, and was applauded with fervent delight. It is a composition that will always be heard with pleasure, and, taken altogether, it seems to us one of the most genial and most perfect of Brahms's achievements in chamber music. The next concert will be given Feb. 13.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 23, 1893.

The reception accorded to the young violinist, Henri Marteau, who made his first appearance in this city as the soloist of the twelfth symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening, was most hearty and well merited. All that has been said of his successes, which have fired the enthusiasm of the musical centres of Europe can no longer be doubted, he is an artist of a rare type and plays with the quiet ease of a master. There is a breadth, power and musical sentiment in his playing seldom met with in the greatest artists, and his tone, rich, warm and of perfect smoothness, is simply exquisite, leaving little to be desired, and promises for him a most brilliant future career. He is quite young in years, having been born in Reims, France, in 1874, and showed signs of his musical genius at the age of 5, though it was not until April, 1884, that he made his public debut before an audience of 2500 in his native city. His stage presence is easy and graceful and he has a bright and winning face. He chose for his first number Bruch's concerto in Gminor for violin. There was a perceptible nervousness which soon wore away and he played the Vorspiel with broad and technical skill. The adagio was full of expression and refinement; in the finale the purity of his tones were remarkable, and his runs and chromatics were given with great rapidity and evenness of bow. The second number, Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," and which was dedicated to Marteau by the composer, was played in a dainty and charming manner, full of thoughtful expression. At the conclusion of each of his numbers, a perfect ovation was accorded him to which he gracefully bowed acknowledgement. The rest of the programme consisted of overture in A minor, "In the Spring," by Karl Goldmark, which was given in Mr. Nikisch's best manner. The "Mephisto Waltz" by Listz, is one of the liveliest of Listz's orchestral tone-pictures, and was played with life and color. The long 'cello part was excellently done. Raff's "Im Walde" is full of picturesque and poetic beauty, and that highly colored orchestration in which Raff delights, and was a fitting ending to a thoroughly enjoyable programme. Next Saturday evening and Friday rehearsal Mr. Ignace Paderewski will be the soloist.

The last of the season's series of concerts by the Adamowski quartet will be given at Chickering Hall next Tuesday afternoon, the assisting artist being Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 22, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

Carl Goldmark, Max Bruch, Franz Liszt, Charles Gounod and Joachim Raff were the composers represented at the twelfth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening. The overture was that in A major entitled "In the Spring," by Carl Goldmark. It was the jocose fancy of the late Sterndale Bennett that the well known fondness of German composers for Fruhlingslieder or spring songs was owing to the fact that Germany had no springs and that their tone-pictures of this favorite season were more derived from the idealization of poets than from reality; but as has been well said there must have been a vernal season in Vienna when Goldmark penned his opus 36 or "In the Spring" overture. It seemed somewhat incongruous of Mr. Nikisch to select at this season of the year a programme that contained two such works as the one by Goldmark referred to and the symphony "Im Walde," by Raff. The best parts of the overture are with its bright and tuneful theme of the allegro; the contrapuntal embellishment of the antithetical theme and the attending imitation of the singing of birds; the broadly flowing and impassioned melody that soon follows which is complimented by a series of sequences treated in the manner of a duet between strings and wood-wind; and the recapitulation section where the scoring becomes much fuller than before and the several subjects meet with a wide variety of treatment. The "Im Walde" symphony by Raff was first produced here at a concert given by Theodore Thomas and his orchestra Dec. 8, 1871. The first part is true in every way to the general subject of the work, cheerfully supporting as it does the exhilaration produced by the pure and aromatic air of the woods, and the joyous life of animated nature. Then follows a Twilight reverie, which opens with somewhat vague and mysterious harmonies, the strings leading to the dominant seventh chord of A flat whereupon a recitative is given out by the clarinet. This theme, taken up by harps and violas with flute accompaniment in sextuples was especially well played. Very picturesque effects were excellently reproduced by the orchestra, such as the episode in E major which follows, and where by many a various instrumental device there is represented the roaring of wild beasts. This episode gradually leads back to the principal theme sustained by solos for 'cello and viola with accompaniment by muted strings. Here is a charming bit of realism reminding one of the hum of myriads of insects. Towards the close of this we again hear the chief theme with rhythmical prolongations, during which tender strains after the manner of recitative are given out by the clarinet, somewhat as at the beginning. The second movement here forms a scherzo, allegro assai 3-4 time, D minor, entitled the Dryads' Dance. It presents reminiscences of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. With part 3 comes a "Night in the Forest," with a somewhat weird melody taken in octaves for celli and contra bass, afterwards taken up by violas and second violins. The music now becomes agitated and indicates the approach of the hunters and of Frau Holle and Wotan. The music that follows has much of the wildness and dramatic character of the spectral ride in the Lenore symphony. The theme of three measures frequently recurs with a different treatment each time, finally suggesting the departure of the huntsmen. Day now begins to break. Near the conclusion we have a return of one of the themes in the first part of the "Daytime" portion of the work.

The soloist for the concerto by Max Bruch in G minor, op. 26, was Mr. Henri Marteau, who judging alone from his performance last evening, is evidently one of the most gifted and interestiug of men. Performing a masterpiece the exacting demands of which have long been known among violinists, he was yet enabled to conceal his own impressions of its difficulty and to become so absorbed in his interpretation, that while the eye was gratified by the virtuosity he displayed, the ear was none the less charmed. It was the performance of a young prodigy, it is true, but its traits were so identical with what one might expect from an experienced master that the accomplishment may justly be referred to as phenomenal. The composer has indeed aimed in this work at accumulating all intricate and skilful devices of complex passage writing, yet the voluptuary of all this is clothed with many an ingenious and gaudy device. There was also a rich healthful vein of sentiment in young Marteau's performance which was none the less charmingly true to nature than invariably artistic. In brief, his first playing in this city afforded abundant proof not only of his technical proficiency and his possession of a rare amount of artistic individuality, but alike of his poetic sense and his refined culture.

Young Marteau was born in Reims, France, in 1874. He made his debut in 1884 at Reims before an audience of nearly three thousand persons. Since then he has performed in Paris, London, Vienna, Berlin and other large cities and invariably with very much the same success that attended his Boston debut last evening, where everyone present could but have realized that all heralding of his European fame had been amply fulfilled, and the enthusiasm of the audience was raised to the highest pitch. Following the concerto the orchestra played the Mephisto Waltz in the episode from Lenau's "Faust," by Franz Liszt,—which was time wasted upon a thoroughly bad work—after which Mr. Marteau again appeared and with great charm interpreted with the orchestra the "Vision de Jeanne D'Arc," by Charles Gounod. The concert ended with a fine performance of the Raff symphony above quoted.

FIFTH CONCERT BY THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Volkmann, Schumann and Brahms were the composers whose art-works were represented at the fifth concert by the Kneisel Quartet in Chickering Hall on Monday evening. The quartet, consisting as usual of Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, Louis Svencenski and Alwin Schroeder, had the assistance of F. Busoni and G. Goldschmidt. The trio in B flat minor for violin, 'cello and pianoforte, by Volkmann, with which the concert opened, proved a luscious appetizer. The opus number, which is five, was not stated on the programme; yet attention might well have been called to the fact of its being the work that first called public attention to Volkmann as a composer. With this work, too, the most sanguine expectations for the composer's future were connected. "Really," says Louis Ehlert, "after so leonine a creation, the public cannot be blamed for feeling astonished at the numerous tame domestic animals that succeeded it." True enough, Volkmann never surpassed his B flat minor trio. It was the hand of genius that guided it; no limping after strange gods here; even after the manner of Æschylus of olden time, the work is plainly dedicated to a discerning future; and from the first bar of the largo to the last note of the finale the composer's cry is onwards. An impassioned, yet exalted, tone pervades the largo, and the whole movement is extremely rich in passages of real beauty; albeit the sum total of the artistic impressions conveyed is unmistakably that of a study in gray. The allegretto is imbued with a thoroughly graceful spirit, with which the brightest sunshine comes, and the entire movement conveys the impression of its being a genuine bear idyll. With the finale sparks of passion again flash forth and the whole spirit of the movement is that of a soul on fire, while the musical form and structure of the movement is masterly. In brief the trio as a whole is a creation of the utmost artistic ripeness exquisitely finished even to the minutest details. The piano-forte part of the work was played by Mr. Busoni and with the utmost ease, quietude and mastery; in artistic sympathy with which were his worthy associates, Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder, all three artists investing their performance with a poetic charm and unity of expression that seemed admirable beyond praise. The remaining selections on the programme were the familiar quartet in A minor by Schumann, and, heard here for the first time, a masterly quintet for clarinette and strings in B minor, op. 115, Brahms. The severely orthodox character of the concert was its distinguishing feature, yet no 6 of the music performed seemed to transcend the heartfelt appreciation of the audience, while the skilful playing of the quartet and their associates kept the interest constantly alive. The artistic sympathy existing between the performers has seldom been more noticeable; and with the Brahms quartet the playing was especially refined as well as brilliant in tonal quality, and as prompt and clear in attack as one could wish. At a first hearing the new quintet by Brahms appears to be one of the composer's very ablest works, somewhat overcrowded with details, it is true, and proportionately foggy; but it is nevertheless a work that displays abundant spirit in as perfect an ensemble as one would care to hear.

The American Hebrew

Love ye the truth and the peace. והאמת והשלם אהבו

PHILIP COWEN, Publisher.

New York, Shebat 3, 5653, January 20, 1893.

Even so nearly perfect an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not proof against atmospheric conditions, such as prevailed on Thursday night of last week when it gave its third concert at Chickering Hall, and which seemed to materially affect it in its playing of Beethoven's eighth symphony, which was the first number on the programme. We are accustomed to expect such almost absolute perfection in the work of this band that even the slightest faults seem excessive, but the crudeness and want of precision and lack of tunefulness in the balance of instruments shown in the playing of the symphony must be set down to the weather. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the symphony was such as to satisfy the greatest stickler for classical traditions. The other orchestral numbers on the programme were two movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" (the minuet of the Will-o' Wisps and the Waltz of Sylphs) exquisitely and daintily played, and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, which was finally given with every regard to its great dramatic effects and possibilities. The concert served to introduce to a New York audience, for the first time, a young Italian girl of sixteen years, Miss Eugenia Castellano, as a pianist. She played Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor No. 1, a work not particularly interesting. We presume it was chosen for the purpose of displaying the young lady's technical ability, as was also the encore she played. Certainly she gave no evidence of a remarkable musical temperament or of anything beyond great mechanical dexterity. With this she seemed to be liberally endowed and it undoubtedly give her the confidence which was apparent the moment she played the first notes of the concerto. She plays, too, with great vigor, but her touch is metallic. She is still young, however, and may blossom out into a great pianist. It must be confessed, however, that a soloist of much different calibre to Miss Castellano is to be expected at a Boston symphony concert. In marked contrast to the pianist, was Mr. Adamowsky's playing of two movements of Max Bruch's first violin concerto, which won great applause.

On Saturday night the third concert of this orchestra this season in Brooklyn was given at the Academy of Music and there drew an immense audience. The programme comprised the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" by Lalo, the suite in D major by Dvorak and Schuman's second symphony. The orchestra played in magnificent form and fully justified all the expectations concerning it. There was considerable disappointment that Mrs. Nikisch was too ill to sing; but her place was taken by Mme. Tavary at short notice. It is gratifying to know that the music lovers of Brooklyn appreciate so thoroughly this fine series of concerts.

American Art Journal

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY

Boston Symphony Society's Third Concert.

The third of this popular series of concerts took place on Thursday evening, Jan. 12, at Chickering Hall, before the usual large and discriminating audience. The program opened and closed with Beethoven numbers, the first being his Eighth Symphony, the last the famous "Leonore" overture No. 3. The Eighth Symphony is one that Mr. Nikisch appears to be greatly in sympathy with, for his conducting of it might be said to be one of the best examples of his interpretation of a classic work. The "Kleine Symphonie," as it is frequently called, has a peculiar neatness and refinement about it that, coupled with a humorous vein, render it one of the least moody of Beethoven's great works. The allegretto scherzando is one of the happiest inspirations of his life and the finale is truly great. The orchestra was not at its best on this occasion owing to the effect of the prevailing storm upon the strings, but they played well enough to give the keenest enjoyment to their hearers, and their wonderful accuracy and unison nothing can disturb. Some of the effects in the finale were exceedingly well brought out by Mr. Nikisch, who evidently delights to throw a climax into strong relief, even at the sacrifice of some of the less important episodes. The Leonore overture was not as successful, generally speaking, as the Symphony. The subduing of almost the entire work so as to bring out the dramatic finale with bold strokes can be done and has frequently been heard with good effect from this same orchestra, but the instruments being in poor condition made it impossible to really make it interesting until the more powerful moments arrived and then Nikisch and the orchestra were "themselves again." Two dainty numbers by Berlioz, "Menuet des Feu-follets" and "Valse des Sylphes" from the "Damnation of Faust," were given most effectively by the orchestra and afforded great enjoyment to the audience, the latter being encored. There were two soloists on this occasion, the first being Signorina Eugenia Castellano, a newly arrived pianist, who made a success in Boston upon a recent appearance, and Mr. Timothee Adamowski, a well known and highly regarded Boston violinist, also one of the members of the admirable orchestra, who stepped forward from the ranks and gave the first two movements of the Bruch G minor Concerto, displaying fine artistic skill and musicianship in spite of the fact that, owing to the breaking of a string, he was compelled to substitute Mr. Kneisel's violin for his own. This also may have been the reason why he did not show much abandon or fire in his work. As far as a good and sonorous tone went and finished phrasing, Mr. Adamowski's playing was perfectly satisfactory. His work was highly polished but the adagio lacked emotional power.

Signorina Castellano is a young Italian pianiste whose age is said to be sixteen and her diminutive stature and immature appearance bear out the statement. She is comely and interesting in her stage presence, which has that indescribable placidity and self-possession characteristic of her race. Her playing shows the evident results of a long and rigid course of training, and does not in the least resemble that of the race of Wunder-Kinder, to which class a more fully developed artistic and emotional instinct would condemn her. This is, in many respects, an advantage to the young girl, for the children whose strong emotional senses are forced beyond their years are mostly short-ived in their artistic careers. The candle of their genius burns too fiercely, and soon gives out. Signorina Castellano gave that ancient and somewhat musty friend, Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto. She played its classic measures with an esprit that infused somewhat of vigor to its antiquated bones. In many respects this child shows a command of the keyboard that is astonishing; she has a tremendous amount of technique, her fingers are supple and exact to a degree that few virtuosi can excel; they are also strong and enduring; she can play a difficult passage with power and accuracy, and repeat it with a soft staccato-like touch that is exceedingly delicate and refined—and all in a very swift tempo. Her wrists are as light and airy as the flight of a bird and her octave passages are clear, swift, discreetly shaded and accurate. These qualities were all appreciated in her rendering of the concerto, especially in the presto, which she took in a style that might better be called prestissimo, and played delightfully. In answer to a hearty encore the Signorina gave a new and very difficult etude by her instructor—Martucci—wherein the display of technique developed all her resources, and her active fingers seemed to revel in the tremendous tasks they had to perform all over the keyboard.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 22, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

Carl Goldmark, Max Bruch, Franz Liszt, Charles Gounod and Joachim Raff were the composers represented at the twelfth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening. The overture was that in A major entitled "In the Spring," by Carl Goldmark. It was the jocose fancy of the late Sterndale Bennett that the well known fondness of German composers for Fruhlingslieder or spring songs was owing to the fact that Germany had no springs and that their tone-pictures of this favorite season were more derived from the idealization of poets than from reality; but as has been well said there must have been a vernal season in Vienna when Goldmark penned his opus 36 or "In the Spring" overture. It seemed somewhat incongruous of Mr. Nikisch to select at this season of the year a programme that contained two such works as the one by Goldmark referred to and the symphony "Im Walde," by Raff. The best parts of the overture are with its bright and tuneful theme of the allegro; the contrapuntal embellishment of the antithetical theme and the attending imitation of the singing of birds; the broadly flowing and impassioned melody that soon follows which is complimented by a series of sequences treated in the manner of a duet between strings and wood-wind; and the recapitulation section where the scoring becomes much fuller than before and the several subjects meet with a wide variety of treatment. The "Im Walde" symphony by Raff was first produced here at a concert given by Theodore Thomas and his orchestra Dec. 8, 1871. The first part is true in every way to the general subject of the work, cheerfully supporting as it does the exhilaration produced by the pure and aromatic air of the woods, and the joyous life of animated nature. Then follows a Twilight reverie, which opens with somewhat vague and mysterious harmonies, the strings leading to the dominant seventh chord of A flat whereupon a recitative is given out by the clarinet. This theme, taken up by harps and violas with flute accompaniment in sextuples was especially well played. Very picturesque effects were excellently reproduced by the orchestra, such as the episode in E major which follows, and where by many a various instrumental device there is represented the roaring of wild beasts. This episode gradually leads back to the principal theme sustained by solos for 'cello and viola with accompaniment by muted strings. Here is a charming bit of realism reminding one of the hum of myriads of insects. Towards the close of this we again hear the chief theme with rhythmical prolongations, during which tender strains after the manner of recitative are given out by the clarinet, somewhat as at the beginning. The second movement here forms a scherzo, allegro assai 3-4 time, D minor, entitled the Dryads' Dance. It presents reminiscences of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. With part 3 comes a "Night in the Forest," with a somewhat weird melody taken in octaves for celli and contra bass, afterwards taken up by violas and second violins. The music now becomes agitated and indicates the approach of the hunters and of Frau Holle and Wotan. The music that follows has much of the wildness and dramatic character of the spectral ride in the Lenore symphony. The theme of three measures frequently recurs with a different treatment each time, finally suggesting the departure of the huntsmen. Day now begins to break. Near the conclusion we have a return of one of the themes in the first part of the "Daytime" portion of the work.

The soloist for the concerto by Max Bruch in G minor, op. 26, was Mr. Henri Marteau, who judging alone from his performance last evening, is evidently one of the most gifted and interesting of men. Performing a masterpiece the exacting demands of which have long been known among violinists, he was yet enabled to conceal his own impressions of its difficulty and to become so absorbed in his interpretation, that while the eye was gratified by the virtuosity he displayed, the ear was none the less charmed. It was the performance of a young prodigy, it is true, but its traits were so identical with what one might expect from an experienced master that the accomplishment may justly be referred to as phenomenal. The composer has indeed aimed in this work at accumulating all intricate and skilful devices of complex passage writing, yet the voluptuary of all this is clothed with many an ingenious and gaudy device. There was also a rich healthful vein of sentiment in young Marteau's performance which was none the less charmingly true to nature than invariably artistic. In brief, his first playing in this city afforded abundant proof not only of his technical proficiency and his possession of a rare amount of artistic individuality, but alike of his poetic sense and his refined culture.

Young Marteau was born in Reims, France, in 1874. He made his debut in 1884 at Reims before an audience of nearly three thousand persons. Since then he has performed in Paris, London, Vienna, Berlin and other large cities and invariably with very much the same success that attended his Boston debut last evening, where everyone present could but have realized that all heralding of his European fame had been amply fulfilled, and the enthusiasm of the audience was raised to the highest pitch. Following the concerto the orchestra played the Mephisto Waltz in the episode from Lenau's "Faust," by Franz Liszt,—which was time wasted upon a thoroughly bad work—after which Mr. Marteau again appeared and with great charm interpreted with the orchestra the "Vision de Jeanne D'Arc," by Charles Gounod. The concert ended with a fine performance of the Raff symphony above quoted.

FIFTH CONCERT BY THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Volkmann, Schumann and Brahms were the composers whose art-works were represented at the fifth concert by the Kneisel Quartet in Chickering Hall on Monday evening. The quartet, consisting as usual of Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, Louis Svencenski and Alwin Schroeder, had the assistance of F. Busoni and G. Goldschmidt. The trio in B flat minor for violin, 'cello and pianoforte, by Volkmann, with which the concert opened, proved a luscious appetizer. The opus number, which is five, was not stated on the programme; yet attention might well have been called to the fact of its being the work that first called public attention to Volkmann as a composer. With this work, too, the most sanguine expectations for the composer's future were connected. "Really," says Louis Ehlert, "after so leonine a creation, the public cannot be blamed for feeling astonished at the numerous tame domestic animals that succeeded it." True enough, Volkmann never surpassed his B flat minor trio. It was the hand of genius that guided it; no limping after strange gods here; even after the manner of Æschylus of olden time, the work is plainly dedicated to a discerning future; and from the first bar of the largo to the last note of the finale the composer's cry is onwards. An impassioned, yet exalted, tone pervades the largo, and the whole movement is extremely rich in passages of real beauty; albeit the sum total of the artistic impressions conveyed is unmistakably that of a study in gray. The allegretto is imbued with a thoroughly graceful spirit, with which the brightest sunshine comes, and the entire movement conveys the impression of its being a genuine heart-idyll. With the finale sparks of passion again flash forth and the whole spirit of the movement is that of a soul on fire, while the musical form and structure of the movement is masterly. In brief the trio as a whole is a creation of the utmost artistic ripeness exquisitely finished even to the minutest details. The piano-forte part of the work was played by Mr. Busoni and with the utmost ease, quietude and mastery; in artistic sympathy with which were his worthy associates, Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder, all three artists investing their performance with a poetic charm and unity of expression that seemed admirable beyond praise. The remaining selections on the programme were the familiar quartet in A minor by Schumann, and, heard here for the first time, a masterly quintet for clarinette and strings in B minor, op. 115, Brahms. The severely orthodox character of the concert was its distinguishing feature, yet no one of the music performed seemed to transcend the heartfelt appreciation of the audience, while the skilful playing of the quartet and their associates kept the interest constantly alive. The artistic sympathy existing between the performers has seldom been more noticeable; and with the Brahms quartet the playing was especially refined as well as brilliant in tonal quality, and as prompt and clear in attack as one could wish. At a first hearing the new quintet by Brahms appears to be one of the composer's very ablest works, somewhat overcrowded with details, it is true, and proportionately foggy; but it is nevertheless a work that displays abundant spirit in as perfect an ensemble as one would care to hear.

The American Hebrew

Love ye the truth and the peace. והאמת והשלם אהבו

PHILIP COWEN, Publisher.

New York, Shebat 3, 5653, January 20, 1893.

Even so nearly perfect an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not proof against atmospheric conditions, such as prevailed on Thursday night of last week when it gave its third concert at Chickering Hall, and which seemed to materially affect it in its playing of Beethoven's eighth symphony, which was the first number on the programme. We are accustomed to expect such almost absolute perfection in the work of this band that even the slightest faults seem excessive, but the crudeness and want of precision and lack of tunefulness in the balance of instruments shown in the playing of the symphony must be set down to the weather. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the symphony was such as to satisfy the greatest stickler for classical traditions. The other orchestral numbers on the programme were two movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" (the minuet of the Will-o' Wisps and the Waltz of Sylphs) exquisitely and daintily played, and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, which was finally given with every regard to its great dramatic effects and possibilities. The concert served to introduce to a New York audience, for the first time, a young Italian girl of sixteen years, Miss Eugenia Castellano, as a pianist. She played Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor No. 1, a work not particularly interesting. We presume it was chosen for the purpose of displaying the young lady's technical ability, as was also the encore she played. Certainly she gave no evidence of a remarkable musical temperament or of anything beyond great mechanical dexterity. With this she seemed to be liberally endowed and it undoubtedly give her the confidence which was apparent the moment she played the first notes of the concerto. She plays, too, with great vigor, but her touch is metallic. She is still young, however, and may blossom out into a great pianist. It must be confessed, however, that a soloist of much different calibre to Miss Castellano is to be expected at a Boston symphony concert. In marked contrast to the pianist, was Mr. Adamowsky's playing of two movements of Max Bruch's first violin concerto, which won great applause.

On Saturday night the third concert of this orchestra this season in Brooklyn was given at the Academy of Music and there drew an immense audience. The programme comprised the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" by Lalo, the suite in D major by Dvorak and Schuman's second symphony. The orchestra played in magnificent form and fully justified all the expectations concerning it. There was considerable disappointment that Mrs. Nikisch was too ill to sing; but her place was taken by Mme. Tavary at short notice. It is gratifying to know that the music lovers of Brooklyn appreciate so thoroughly this fine series of concerts.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, [illegible]

Boston Symphony Society's Third Concert.

The third of this popular series of concerts took place on Thursday evening, Jan. 12, at Chickering Hall, before the usual large and discriminating audience. The program opened and closed with Beethoven numbers, the first being his Eighth Symphony, the last the famous "Leonore" overture No. 3. The Eighth Symphony is one that Mr. Nikisch appears to be greatly in sympathy with, for his conducting of it might be said to be one of the best examples of his interpretation of a classic work. The "Kleine Symphonie," as it is frequently called, has a peculiar neatness and refinement about it that, coupled with a humorous vein, render it one of the least moody of Beethoven's great works. The allegretto scherzando is one of the happiest inspirations of his life and the finale is truly great. The orchestra was not at its best on this occasion owing to the effect of the prevailing storm upon the strings, but they played well enough to give the keenest enjoyment to their hearers, and their wonderful accuracy and unison nothing can disturb. Some of the effects in the finale were exceedingly well brought out by Mr. Nikisch, who evidently delights to throw a climax into strong relief, even at the sacrifice of some of the less important episodes. The Leonore overture was not as successful, generally speaking, as the Symphony. The subduing of almost the entire work so as to bring out the dramatic finale with bold strokes can be done and has frequently been heard with good effect from this same orchestra, but the instruments being in poor condition made it impossible to really make it interesting until the more powerful moments arrived and then Nikisch and the orchestra were "themselves again." Two dainty numbers by Berlioz, "Menuet des Feu-follets" and "Valse des Sylphes" from the "Damnation of Faust," were given most effectively by the orchestra and afforded great enjoyment to the audience, the latter being encored. There were two soloists on this occasion, the first being Signorina Eugenia Castellano, a newly arrived pianist, who made a success in Boston upon a recent appearance, and Mr. Timothee Adamowski, a well known and highly regarded Boston violinist, also one of the members of the admirable orchestra, who stepped forward from the ranks and gave the first two movements of the Bruch G minor Concerto, displaying fine artistic skill and musicianship in spite of the fact that, owing to the breaking of a string, he was compelled to substitute Mr. Kneisel's violin for his own. This also may have been the reason why he did not show much abandon or fire in his work. As far as a good and sonorous tone went and finished phrasing, Mr. Adamowski's playing was perfectly satisfactory. His work was highly polished but the adagio lacked emotional power.

Signorina Castellano is a young Italian pianiste whose age is said to be sixteen and her diminutive stature and immature appearance bear out the statement. She is comely and interesting in her stage presence, which has that indescribable placidity and self-possession characteristic of her race. Her playing shows the evident results of a long and rigid course of training, and does not in the least resemble that of the race of Wunder-Kinder, to which class a more fully developed artistic and emotional instinct would condemn her. This is, in many respects, an advantage to the young girl, for the children whose strong emotional senses are forced beyond their years are mostly short-lived in their artistic careers. The candle of their genius burns too fiercely, and soon gives out. Signorina Castellano gave that ancient and somewhat musty friend, Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto. She played its classic measures with an esprit that infused somewhat of vigor to its antiquated bones. In many respects this child shows a command of the keyboard that is astonishing; she has a tremendous amount of technique, her fingers are supple and exact to a degree that few virtuosi can excel; they are also strong and enduring; she can play a difficult passage with power and accuracy, and repeat it with a soft staccato-like touch that is exceedingly delicate and refined—and all in a very swift tempo. Her wrists are as light and airy as the flight of a bird and her octave passages are clear, swift, discreetly shaded and accurate. These qualities were all appreciated in her rendering of the concerto, especially in the presto, which she took in a style that might better be called prestissimo, and played delightfully. In answer to a hearty encore the Signorina gave a new and very difficult etude by her instructor—Martucci—wherein the display of technique developed all her resources, and her active fingers seemed to revel in the tremendous tasks they had to perform all over the keyboard.

Boston Sunday

SUNDAY, JAN. 22, 1893.

BOSTON'S NEW MUSICAL IDOL.

HENRI MARTEAU.

Boston society musical circles have a new idol in Henri Marteau, who is but 18 years old. It is not that the local devotees of music love "The Human Chrysanthemum" less, but there is a fair prospect of them loving the latest addition to the ranks of celebrities among artists more, at least it will be so if all signs go not astray.

M. Marteau made his first appearance before a Boston audience yesterday afternoon at the rehearsal. He has been in this country about three months, and was the talk of Paris and London and Berlin long, long ago, but it is safe to say that the majority of the fashionables at the Symphony rehearsal and a good many of the students and amateur musicians in the audience had never heard of M. Marteau.

Some of them were even overheard wondering who the soloist was, but it did not take many bars of his first number, Bruch's lovely concerto, to prove that here was a virtuoso though almost entirely unheralded.

The slight, boyish looking youth proved a master indeed of the violin and swept everybody at once into his train of admirers, and when the last strains died away enthusiasm broke loose. Where there is usually a modicum of nice, polite or even cordial "kid-glove applause," there was a burst of enthusiasm, and it was kept up until those who counted said there had been 12 recalls, and at the last some of the girls threw their corsage posies of violets at the feet of the violinist.

M. Marteau is as magnetic and charming personally as is his playing. He speaks almost no English as yet, but converses with much fluency in his native tongue, French, and quite as volubly in German.

"Henri," as his friends among Europe's musicians all affectionately term him, was born in Rheims, France, in the spring of '74. His family was one of wealth and position, and both of his parents were leading amateur musicians of the place.

Henri's first inspiration to become a great violinist came from hearing Sivori, the famous Paganini's pupil, play at the Marteaus' home when the little aspirant for honors was but 5 years old. As he grew older he was given the best teachers, Bunzl, Hubert Leonard and Garcin at the Paris conservatory.

When but 10 years old he made his first appearance in his native city, playing before an audience of 2500 people. A year or two later he went to Berlin and Vienna, and shortly afterward made a tour of France.

From his first meeting with Richter, the famous Vienna musician and teacher, the latter looked upon young Marteau as a genius. Five years ago Richter told Mr. Rudolph Aronson, who was endeavoring to secure him for an American tour, that he could not come, but that he recommended as one bound to be a success young Henri Marteau, who at that time was already creating a great deal of enthusiasm.

But Mr. Aronson had not heard of him, and through not coming at that time into personal contact with the lad nothing farther was said or done in the matter. It is really to the manager's pretty wife that America is indebted just now for its pleasure. Mrs. Aronson last summer heard M. Marteau play at a musicale in Paris, and was so charmed that she besought her husband to hear him, and that settled the matter.

Two years ago M. Marteau won a first prize at the Paris conservatory, playing Vieuxtemp's 5th concerto, the prize being one of the coveted large silver medals, in itself a work of art.

Massenet was the chief of the judges who awarded the medals, and has ever since been one of Henri's warmest admirers. So highly indeed does he think of his technique and sympathy and compelling charm as a player he is writing a violin concerto for him at the present time.

At the concert last evening there was a repetition of the pronounced favor shown M. Marteau, and a disposition on the part of the big audience not to let the soloist pass from their view at the conclusion of his numbers. He came back numerous times to bow his acknowledgments.

Twelfth Symphony Concert.

The principal feature at the symphony rehearsal and concert was the introduction of a young violinist, Henri Marteau, whose fame abroad, to judge from his performances here, has been justly earned. He is a youth of about 19 years of age, but young as he is, he is an artist "to the finger tips."

He is modest in bearing and boyish in appearance, and his bright, smiling face instantly wins the hearts of his auditors.

His first number, Bruch's first concerto for violin, immediately showed his almost perfect command of the instrument. The opening allegro was not so smoothly played as has been heard before in this city, but this defect was evidently due to the artist's nervousness, for his subsequent adagio and finale were beautifully performed.

The purity of his tones are remarkable. His legato runs and chromatics were given with great rapidity and precision, and the evenness of his bowing was also noticeable. At times, perhaps, he lacked power; but that is but a slight fault time will remedy. His interpretations plainly denote his artistic and sympathetic temperament, and the digital difficulties of the piece were skilfully surmounted by the young performer.

Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," his second number, was dedicated to young Marteau by the composer, and the charming manner in which it was performed elicited several recalls to the platform.

The artist chatted with Mr. Nikisch while waiting for the orchestra to lead off, and at the conclusion of his last solo the two indulged in hearty hand shakes.

The high attainments of young Marteau promise a brilliant career for him. The applause was spontaneous and long prolonged, especially after his second number.

Goldmark's brilliant "Spring" overture was the first selection played by Mr. Nikisch's men. The various moods of the composer were given with due dramatic effect. Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, as its name implies, is a revel of melody, broken into bits by desonants and percussion interruptions, and the dash and vim with which it was played imparted to it all the tone coloring required. The long 'cello parts were capitally given.

Raff "Im Walde" symphony, with its picturesque and poetic orchestration, served as a delightful finale to the concert.

——The Kneisel concert Monday night drew to Steinert Hall a goodly audience of subscribers in spite of the other potent attractions. It was a choice programme delightfully rendered. In the hall were Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. Arthur Foote, Miss Elise Fay, Mr. W. P. Blake, Dr. and Mrs. Hamilton Osgood, Mr. J. S. Dwight, Mr. William Heinrich, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner Lamson, Miss Daggett, Mr. Theodore Chase, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. E. Ewing, Mrs. Chamberlin, Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. B. L. Whelpley, Mr. Elliot Pratt, Mr. Edward Frothingham and many more.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 23, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture in A major, "Im Frühling," Opus 36.
Max Bruch: Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in G minor, Opus 26.
Liszt: Episode aus Lenaus "Faust:" Szene in der Dorf-Schenke (Mephisto-Walzer).
Gounod: "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for Violin and Orchestra.
Raff: Symphony No. 3, in F major ("Im Walde"), Opus 153.
Mr. Henri Marteau was the violinist.

Goldmark's overture was finely played, but the composition does not wear over-well; there is a want of geniality in the leading theme, an occasional hardness in the harmony, and, although there is not a little undeniably good work in the working-out, the thing lacks true inspiration. The second theme is the best part of its material.

Liszt's "Mephisto-Walzer" has always seemed to us one of the best things in his orchestral baggage; it has more originality than "Les Préludes"—which is characteristic of the composer only in its form and treatment, but by no means especially so in its thematic material, which latter borders dangerously upon the commonplace—and more real dash and go to it than the other symphonic poems. To be sure, it does not rise to any great musical or poetic height; but it does admirably well all that it pretends to do. It is a tone-picture of a very "glowing"—as the French would say, a very brûlant—scene, treated in a spirit which is half sympathetically enthusiastic, half cynical. Here, if anywhere, Liszt shows himself as really geistreich; he is picturesque, suggestive, and expressive without tediousness, and seems for once to have had a real inspiration. The thing is written with evident gusto—a feeling in which the listener is also able to share. For one thing, this work, far more than the symphonic poems, seems to be the true prototype of most of the things Saint-Saëns has done in a similar line.

The oftener one hears the "Im Walde" the more is one impressed with it as decidedly Raff's best symphony; it has all his virtues and fewer of his faults than any other extended orchestral work of his we can call to mind. Both in musical material and workmanship, it stands markedly higher than the "Lenore" symphony, while its poetic essence is at once finer and more truly human. It lacks the "popular" element that will always make the "Lenore" the favorite with the mass of the public; poetically considered, too, its subject is less strongly appealing to the average mind than that of Bürger's dramatic ballad. But the "popular" side of Raff's genius too often has a somewhat over-strong smack of the vulgar, not to say the meretricious—faults from which neither the march nor the slow movement of the "Lenore" are wholly free. And one of the most pleasant points in the "Im Walde" is that, with all its finer material and stouter workmanship, with all its more truly poetic atmosphere, it is just as individual in accent, just as unmistakably characteristic of the composer as anything he ever wrote. The middle part (working out) and coda of the first movement are equal to the best work of the sort Raff has done anywhere in his chamber music, which is saying a good deal. In the corresponding part of the "Lenore," on the other hand, he sinks more than once down to the rather helpless level of Rubinstein. The Scherzo (Dance of Dryads) is a gem; nothing could be more dainty and at the same time more spirited than those little passages in double-tonguing for the wooden wind. Mr. Nikisch made a heroic, but in every way admirable, cut in the last movement—in which, as a certain German critic once said, Raff, out of respect for the sonata-form, had made the day break twice on the same morning—a cut which infinitely improves the movement. There was really no artistic sense in making Wotan and Frau Holle go through their "wild hunt" all over again, after they had once bagged their game and departed. Can it have been that Raff (who once wrote a pamphlet on the "Wagner Question") had got it ineradicably fixed in his mind that Wotan was a person who always did everything at least twice? Mr. Nikisch cuts the second edition of the "wild hunt"; would that all conductors might follow him in this! The daybreak and sunrise with which this movement ends are a positive master-stroke; here Raff has done successfully what no other orchestral composer we know of has succeeded in doing; he has brought back a bit of sentimental cantilena (the second theme of the first movement) in glowing apotheosis fashion at the end of a stirring final climax, and made it sound really strong and grand. From Flotow's overture to "Martha" to Reineck's overture to "König Manfred," we can recall no other instance of this sort of thing's being done without a certain weakness that borders on the ludicrous. Raff has done it really powerfully and impressively! The whole symphony was admirably played.

Mr. Henri Marteau, the young violinist (we believe he is only twenty) made an exceedingly fine impression. His tone is unusually large, brilliant and penetrating, and holds its own against the orchestra with perfect ease. His technique is extremely brilliant and sure, and he plays with contagious warmth of sentiment. His phrasing is, if not invariably, yet generally artistic and musical. In short, the young man has very conspicuous and unusual talent; he is born and bred to his business! A certain immaturity, a lack of repose and perfect mastery over himself, are only natural—thank heaven he is human and not a monstrosity! But his playing has infinite charm, and is full of high artistic quality. One regrets that he has begun starring quite so early; for he has still something to learn that can best be acquired through patient, retired study, and can hardly be learnt at all in the concert room; and his talent is so plainly above the ordinary run that it is worth cultivating to the highest pitch. His playing of the fine Bruch concerto was admirable, and created the wildest enthusiasm in the audience. Gounod's "Vision of Joan of Arc" is a sort of thing that it is gratifying to have dedicated to one (it is dedicated to Mr. Marteau) from a famous composer; but it cannot be quite so ffratifying to have to play it, and it is certainly no gratification at all to have to listen to it. It has the virtue of brevity—a virtue which it would have been easy to increase still further—and is undeniably a charming piece of tone-color; but it is hardly strong enough to hold together even with Mr. Marteau's playing.

The next programme is: Schumann, symphony No. 1, in B-flat major; Paderewski, concerto for pianoforte, in A minor; MacDowell, two poems for orchestra—I. "Hamlet," II. "Ophelia;" Wagner, Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg." Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski will be the pianist.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1893.

Chickering Hall: The Adamowski Quartet

The Adamowski Quartet gave the third and last concert of this, its fifth, season, in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon. The quartet had the assistance of Mr. Arthur Nikisch in the following programme:

Haydn: Quartet in G major.
Goldmark: Suite for violin and pianoforte in E, Opus 11.
Saint-Saëns: Quartet for pianoforte, violin, viola and 'cello, in B-flat, Opus 41.

The Haydn quartet, a perfect little gem in its way, was beautifully played—with nice attention to detail and fine ensemble. Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. Nikisch gave a most effective performance of the Goldmark suite; the work itself is one of the most pleasing things we have yet heard by the composer, and the manner in which it was played showed it for its full value. In the Saint-Saëns quartet Mr. Nikisch found the severest task that he has yet had here as a pianist; unlike the Brahms A major quartet, the pianoforte part in this one by Saint-Saëns is treated in quite a special way and with a view to certain special pianoforte effects; Brahms wrote his quartet like a musician, Saint-Saëns wrote this one distinctly like a pianist. And to do full justice to this sort of writing, one must be a good deal of a pianist oneself. It is not a question of technical difficulty, exactly, of which of two things is the harder to play, but a question of style in playing. Mr. Nikisch stood the test admirably, and his playing was highly to be enjoyed; all he does is so musical and sympathetic that one can easily pardon an occasional lack of the highest technical finish. It is a great thing to hear music played by a musician! The whole quartet went admirably; as a work it seems about the best thing of the sort that we have yet had from a French composer. The contrapuntal work in the second movement may have a little smack of the stage, but it is earnest, effective counterpoint, and really says something. The whole work gives evidence both of executive ability and inspiration.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JAN. 25, 1893.

The Adamowski Quartette.

The Adamowski String Quartette gave the last concert of the series in Chickering Hall yesterday (Tues.) afternoon. The quartette was assisted by Mr. Arthur Nikisch, pianist. The concert opened with the quartette in G major by Haydn. The ensemble work of the quartette was good, although the second violin was a trifle weak in a few cases, but this was not often, and the quartette was generally excellently played. The next number was Goldmark's suite for violin and piano, op. 11. This was a favorite suite of Goldmark himself, and he played it very often in his concerts.

Mr. Adamowski was seen at his best in this work, and his playing of the beautiful adagio was especially noteworthy. His tone was broad and free, and his playing was always marked with the greatest expression. Mr. Nikisch played the piano very acceptably, and the ensemble was always good. The concert ended with Saint-Saëns' Quartette in B-flat major, op. 41.

The quartette was well played throughout, and the work of all is to be commended.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 25.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1893.

NO TICKETS LEFT.

The quickest sale on record was made in disposing of the tickets for the rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Monday and Tuesday of this week. The soloist is to be Paderewski the pianist.

For the rehearsal on Friday there were 450 or more seats in the upper balcony at 25 cents each, and about 300 admission tickets at the same price. It took just 33 minutes to sell these.

For the Saturday night concert only the admission tickets are sold, and these were disposed of in just 11 minutes.

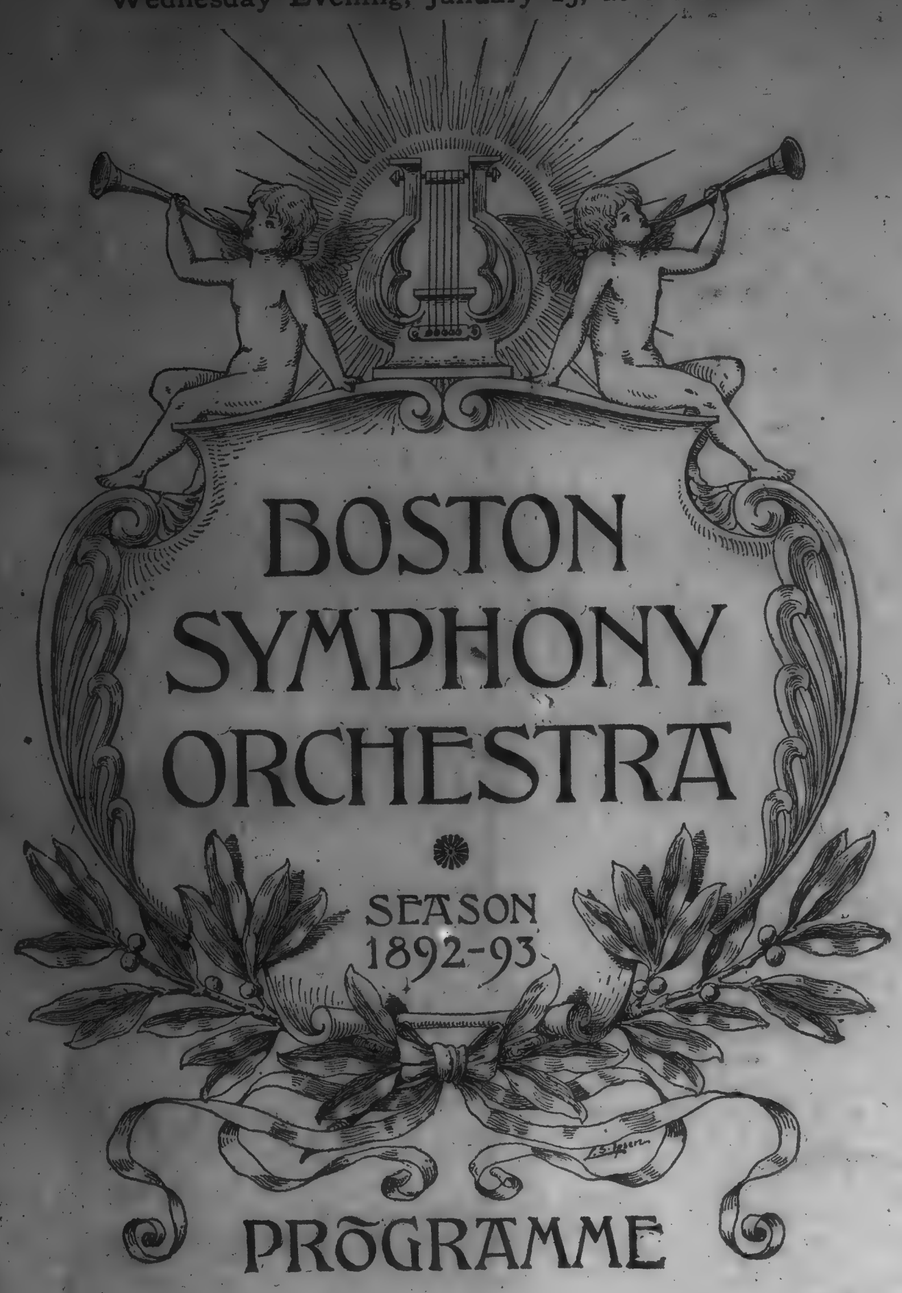
There are no tickets of any kind for either of these performances left at the box office.

[94]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, January 25, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Single tickets, $1.25 each, now on sale at 170 Westminster St.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1893.

Marteau carried all before him Friday and Saturday at the Symphony rehearsal and concert. Applause that was furious and long continued, flowers and tender glances from the more impressionable of Friday frequenters, the warm congratulations of the conductor—the young man had all of these, and he deserved them all.

He played the first concerto of Bruch and Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc." His tone was large and beautiful; his technic was sure; his bowing was a model for older violinists, and his intonation was delightfully pure. No one who has appeared at these concerts as soloist during the past three years has provoked such enthusiasm.

The orchestra played exceedingly well these selections: Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, Raff's "Im Walde" symphony and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, a dirty musical representation of a dirty scene.

The Kneisel Quartet gave a concert the evening of the 17th. Mr. Busoni, pianist, and Mr. Goldschmidt, clarinetist, assisted. The program included Volkman's trio, op. 5; Schumann's A minor quartet, op. 41, No. 1, and Brahms' quintet for clarinet and strings. I am told on good authority that the concert was one of unusual excellence, and that the quintet is a thoroughly charming work, full of melody and color.

* * *

[95]

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1893.

INFANTRY HALL.

Fourth Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There were few empty seats in Infantry Hall last night, and the large audience bestowed an unmistakably hearty welcome on Mr. Arthur Nikisch as he stepped to the conductor's desk. The evident expectation of a feast of musical good things was destined to be realized, for the programme presented was full of interest and variety, and played as only this finest of orchestras could have played it. It is safe to say that our musical public would gladly extend their patronage to a larger number of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra each season. Meanwhile, a gratifying indication of the growth of musical culture here is to be noted in the fact that they now play in Providence oftener than in any other New England city, outside, of course, of Boston.

Last night's concert began with the overture to Wagner's "Der Fliegende Hollander." The romantic and tragical legend of the "Flying Dutchman" easily appealed to Wagner's vivid imagination, and he took it for the subject of one of his earliest operas, it being preceded only by "Rienzi" and a still earlier work, which was never produced during his lifetime. Although at this time Wagner was as yet content to work after existing models, and had not begun to formulate the original theories which were destined at a later period to throw the musical world into convulsions, there are to be found in the bold and powerful instrumentation of this overture plenty of hints of what was to come. The tendency already impelling him to disregard pedagogic rules for the sake of producing strange effects is clearly shown in the weird and ghostly opening tremolo, given fortissimo upon bare fifths and octaves. Other daring innovations, such as the frequent use of diminished chords and original modes of resolving the same, are to be found, while his favorite device of giving full chords to the brass is already manifest. The overture effectively typifies the ghostly storm-driven ship and the desolate mood of her heaven-cursed commander. It was played by the orchestra with tremendous vigor and sonority, and received a hearty round of applause.

The soloist of the evening, Miss Lena Little, next appeared and sang the familiar and beautiful aria, "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orpheus." Those who remember the wonderful manner in which the greatest contraltos of this generation, Annie Louise Cary, used to sing this, one of her favorite concert numbers, will never be satisfied with anybody else's rendering. Miss Little possesses a contralto voice of considerable power and an agreeable quality, although unevenly developed, the lower and medium registers being much the best part. She phrases well and sings with much intelligence. Her rendering of the aria was, on the whole, a praiseworthy one, and she was honored with a double recall.

Gounod's "Hymn to Saint Cecelia" was the next number on the programme. It is not at all in Gounod's best style, and contains little of interest save a long and somewhat melodious solo for the first violin and a prominent part for the harp. These, however, were so well played by Messrs. Kneisel and Schnecker that a repeat was demanded and acceded to. This was followed by a "valse leute" from Volkmann's Serenade (No. 1) for string orchestra. The string department is the foundation of the whole orchestra, and it is right here that the Boston Symphony—more conspicuously than at any other point—excel all similar organizations. The body of tone they produce is organ-like in its solid and sonorous smoothness, while they move together with such remarkable unanimity that each part sounds like a single instrument. Their attack, shading, and accuracy of intonation are beyond all praise. The simple, but pretty slow waltz was a treat to listen to, as they played it.

Miss Little sang again, this time to Mr. Nikisch's accompaniment on the piano, three songs, "Nur wer die Sehn sucht Kennt," by Tschaikowsky, "Charmante Marguerite," an old French song, and "Meine Leib ist gruen," by Brahms. These were all sung in an artistic manner, and especially with such admirable enunciation that one was tempted to wish that among all this array of foreign tongues something of our native speech had been permitted. This, however, is too much to hope for so long as the present fad of singing in all possible languages but English endures. In France and Germany they do not sing in English to French and German audiences, and why American singers should warble to American audiences in every language under the sun except their own, is one of those things that—to quote the eminent Lord Dundreary—"no fellow can find out." It is a serious tax upon the singers to acquire a smattering, at least, of the four or five chief Continental tongues, and no one can tell how soon Turkish or Sanscrit may be necessary to round out an artist's equipment. Linguistic acquirements are very admirable, but the exploiting of them upon a concert platform is not at all what audiences wish to hear, in spite of the rapid growth of this freak of fashion. The English language is the most powerful, varied and expressive on the face of the globe, and lends itself more easily to musical phrase and accent than any other, though less liquid than Spanish or Italian. It would be well for our singers to give it at least as much consideration as any other, and for our audiences to express their true sentiments instead of pretending to admire what they do not understand.

Raff's symphony "Im Walde" closed the concert. The forest has always been a fruitful source of inspiration to composers, and a strong family likeness exists between most works bearing that or other titles. Leaving out the subjective view, and regarding Raff's symphony as pure music, it is one of the best of its kind. Its second movement, a largo in A flat, is a beautiful bit of orchestral coloring and full of charming melody, while the "Dance of Dryads" which follows, is in strong contrast, but full of interest with its fairy-like harmonies and quaint rhythms. The opening and closing movements are more pretentious and are richly scored in the traditional symphony form. It is hardly necessary to say that it was admirably played.

The next concert, the fifth in the series, takes place on the evening of Wednesday, March 1.

THE EVENING BULLETIN.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1893.

INFANTRY HALL.

Fourth Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There were few empty seats in Infantry Hall last night, and the large audience bestowed an unmistakably hearty welcome on Mr. Arthur Nikisch as he stepped to the conductor's desk. The evident expectation of a feast of musical good things was destined to be realized, for the programme presented was full of interest and variety, and played as only this finest of orchestras could have played it. It is safe to say that our musical public would gladly extend their patronage to a larger number of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra each season. Meanwhile, a gratifying indication of the growth of musical culture here is to be noted in the fact that they now play in Providence oftener than in any other New England city, outside, of course, of Boston.

Last night's concert began with the overture to Wagner's "Der Fliegende Hollander." The romantic and tragical legend of the "Flying Dutchman" easily appealed to Wagner's vivid imagination, and he took it for the subject of one of his earliest operas, it being preceded only by "Rienzi" and a still earlier work, which was never produced during his lifetime. Although at this time Wagner was as yet content to work after existing models, and had not begun to formulate the original theories which were destined at a later period to throw the musical world into convulsions, there are to be found in the bold and powerful instrumentation of this overture plenty of hints of what was to come. The tendency already impelling him to disregard pedagogic rules for the sake of producing strange effects is clearly shown in the weird and ghostly opening tremolo, given fortissimo upon bare fifths and octaves. Other daring innovations, such as the frequent use of diminished chords and original modes of resolving the same, are to be found, while his favorite device of giving full chords to the brass is already manifest. The overture effectively typifies the ghostly storm-driven ship and the desolate mood of her heaven-cursed commander. It was played by the orchestra with tremendous vigor and sonority, and received a hearty round of applause.

The soloist of the evening, Miss Lena Little, next appeared and sang the familiar and beautiful aria, "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orpheus." Those who remember the wonderful manner in which the greatest contraltos of this generation, Annie Louise Cary, used to sing this, one of her favorite concert numbers, will never be satisfied with anybody else's rendering. Miss Little possesses a contralto voice of considerable power and an agreeable quality, although unevenly developed, the lower and medium registers being much the best part. She phrases well and sings with much intelligence. Her rendering of the aria was, on the whole, a praiseworthy one, and she was honored with a double recall.

Gounod's "Hymn to Saint Cecelia" was the next number on the programme. It is not at all in Gounod's best style, and contains little of interest save a long and somewhat melodious solo for the first violin and a prominent part for the harp. These, however, were so well played by Messrs. Kneisel and Schnecker that a repeat was demanded and acceded to. This was followed by a "valse leute" from Volkmann's Serenade (No. 1) for string orchestra. The string department is the foundation of the whole orchestra, and it is right here that the Boston Symphony—more conspicuously than at any other point—excel all similar organizations. The body of tone they produce is organ-like in its solid and sonorous smoothness, while they move together with such remarkable unanimity that each part sounds like a single instrument. Their attack, shading, and accuracy of intonation are beyond all praise. The simple, but pretty slow waltz was a treat to listen to, as they played it.

Miss Little sang again, this time to Mr. Nikisch's accompaniment on the piano, three songs, "Nur wer die Sehn sucht Kennt," by Tschaikowsky, "Charmante Marguerite," an old French song, and "Meine Leib ist gruen," by Brahms. These were all sung in an artistic manner, and especially with such admirable enunciation that one was tempted to wish that among all this array of foreign tongues something of our native speech had been permitted. This, however, is too much to hope for so long as the present fad of singing in all possible languages but English endures. In France and Germany they do not sing in English to French and German audiences, and why American singers should warble to American audiences in every language under the sun except their own, is one of those things that—to quote the eminent Lord Dundreary—"no fellow can find out." It is a serious tax upon the singers to acquire a smattering, at least, of the four or five chief Continental tongues, and no one can tell how soon Turkish or Sanscrit may be necessary to round out an artist's equipment. Linguistic acquirements are very admirable, but the exploiting of them upon a concert platform is not at all what audiences wish to hear, in spite of the rapid growth of this freak of fashion. The English language is the most powerful, varied and expressive on the face of the globe, and lends itself more easily to musical phrase and accent than any other, though less liquid than Spanish or Italian. It would be well for our singers to give it at least as much consideration as any other, and for our audiences to express their true sentiments instead of pretending to admire what they do not understand.

Raff's symphony "Im Walde" closed the concert. The forest has always been a fruitful source of inspiration to composers, and a strong family likeness exists between most works bearing that or other titles. Leaving out the subjective view, and regarding Raff's symphony as pure music, it is one of the best of its kind. Its second movement, a largo in A flat, is a beautiful bit of orchestral coloring and full of charming melody, while the "Dance of Dryads" which follows, is in strong contrast, but full of interest with its fairy-like harmonies and quaint rhythms. The opening and closing movements are more pretentious and are richly scored in the traditional symphony form. It is hardly necessary to say that it was admirably played.

The next concert, the fifth in the series, takes place on the evening of Wednesday, March 1.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, January 25, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Single tickets, $1.25 each, now on sale at 170 Westminster St.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1893.

Marteau carried all before him Friday and Saturday at the Symphony rehearsal and concert. Applause that was furious and long continued, flowers and tender glances from the more impressionable of Friday frequenters, the warm congratulations of the conductor—the young man had all of these, and he deserved them all.

He played the first concerto of Bruch and Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc." His tone was large and beautiful; his technic was sure; his bowing was a model for older violinists, and his intonation was delightfully pure. No one who has appeared at these concerts as soloist during the past three years has provoked such enthusiasm.

The orchestra played exceedingly well these selections: Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, Raff's "Im Walde" symphony and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, a dirty musical representation of a dirty scene

The Kneisel Quartet gave a concert the evening of the 17th. Mr. Busoni, pianist, and Mr. Goldschmidt, clarinetist, assisted. The program included Volkman's trio, op. 5; Schumann's A minor quartet, op. 41, No. 1, and Brahms' quintet for clarinet and strings. I am told on good authority that the concert was one of unusual excellence, and that the quintet is a thoroughly charming work, full of melody and color.

* * *

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1893.

INFANTRY HALL.

Fourth Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There were few empty seats in Infantry Hall last night, and the large audience bestowed an unmistakably hearty welcome on Mr. Arthur Nikisch as he stepped to the conductor's desk. The evident expectation of a feast of musical good things was destined to be realized, for the programme presented was full of interest and variety, and played as only this finest of orchestras could have played it. It is safe to say that our musical public would gladly extend their patronage to a larger number of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra each season. Meanwhile, a gratifying indication of the growth of musical culture here is to be noted in the fact that they now play in Providence oftener than in any other New England city, outside, of course, of Boston.

Last night's concert began with the overture to Wagner's "Der Fliegende Hollander." The romantic and tragical legend of the "Flying Dutchman" easily appealed to Wagner's vivid imagination, and he took it for the subject of one of his earliest operas, it being preceded only by "Rienzi" and a still earlier work, which was never produced during his lifetime. Although at this time Wagner was as yet content to work after existing models, and had not begun to formulate the original theories which were destined at a later period to throw the musical world into convulsions, there are to be found in the bold and powerful instrumentation of this overture plenty of hints of what was to come. The tendency already impelling him to disregard pedagogic rules for the sake of producing strange effects is clearly shown in the weird and ghostly opening tremolo, given fortissimo upon bare fifths and octaves. Other daring innovations, such as the frequent use of diminished chords and original modes of resolving the same, are to be found, while his favorite device of giving full chords to the brass is already manifest. The overture effectively typifies the ghostly storm-driven ship and the desolate mood of her heaven-cursed commander. It was played by the orchestra with tremendous vigor and sonority, and received a hearty round of applause.

The soloist of the evening, Miss Lena Little, next appeared and sang the familiar and beautiful aria, "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orpheus." Those who remember the wonderful manner in which the greatest contraltos of this generation, Annie Louise Cary, used to sing this, one of her favorite concert numbers, will never be satisfied with anybody else's rendering. Miss Little possesses a contralto voice of considerable power and an agreeable quality, although unevenly developed, the lower and medium registers being much the best part. She phrases well and sings with much intelligence. Her rendering of the aria was, on the whole, a praiseworthy one, and she was honored with a double recall.

Gounod's "Hymn to Saint Cecelia" was the next number on the programme. It is not at all in Gounod's best style, and contains little of interest save a long and somewhat melodious solo for the first violin and a prominent part for the harp. These, however, were so well played by Messrs. Kneisel and Schnecker that a repeat was demanded and acceded to. This was followed by a "valse lente" from Volkmann's Serenade (No. 1) for string orchestra. The string department is the foundation of the whole orchestra, and it is right here that the Boston Symphony—more conspicuously than at any other point—excel all similar organizations. The body of tone they produce is organ-like in its solid and sonorous smoothness, while they move together with such remarkable unanimity that each part sounds like a single instrument. Their attack, shading, and accuracy of intonation are beyond all praise. The simple, but pretty slow waltz was a treat to listen to, as they played it.

Miss Little sang again, this time to Mr. Nikisch's accompaniment on the piano, three songs, "Nur wer die Sehn sucht Kennt," by Tschaikowsky, "Charmante Marguerite," an old French song, and "Meine Leib ist gruen," by Brahms. These were all sung in an artistic manner, and especially with such admirable enunciation that one was tempted to wish that among all this array of foreign tongues something of our native speech had been permitted. This, however, is too much to hope for so long as the present fad of singing in all possible languages but English endures. In France and Germany they do not sing in English to French and German audiences, and why American singers should warble to American audiences in every language under the sun except their own, is one of those things that—to quote the eminent Lord Dundreary—"no fellow can find out." It is a serious tax upon the singers to acquire a smattering, at least, of the four or five chief Continental tongues, and no one can tell how soon Turkish or Sanscrit may be necessary to round out an artist's equipment. Linguistic acquirements are very admirable, but the exploiting of them upon a concert platform is not at all what audiences wish to hear, in spite of the rapid growth of this freak of fashion. The English language is the most powerful, varied and expressive on the face of the globe, and lends itself more easily to musical phrase and accent than any other, though less liquid than Spanish or Italian. It would be well for our singers to give it at least as much consideration as any other, and for our audiences to express their true sentiments instead of pretending to admire what they do not understand.

Raff's symphony "Im Walde" closed the concert. The forest has always been a fruitful source of inspiration to composers, and a strong family likeness exists between most works bearing that or other titles. Leaving out the subjective view, and regarding Raff's symphony as pure music, it is one of the best of its kind. Its second movement, a largo in A flat, is a beautiful bit of orchestral coloring and full of charming melody, while the "Dance of Dryads" which follows, is in strong contrast, but full of interest with its fairy-like harmonies and quaint rhythms. The opening and closing movements are more pretentious and are richly scored in the traditional symphony form. It is hardly necessary to say that it was admirably played.

The next concert, the fifth in the series, takes place on the evening of Wednesday, March 1.

THE EVENING BULLETIN.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1893.

INFANTRY HALL.

Fourth Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There were few empty seats in Infantry Hall last night, and the large audience bestowed an unmistakably hearty welcome on Mr. Arthur Nikisch as he stepped to the conductor's desk. The evident expectation of a feast of musical good things was destined to be realized, for the programme presented was full of interest and variety, and played as only this finest of orchestras could have played it. It is safe to say that our musical public would gladly extend their patronage to a larger number of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra each season. Meanwhile, a gratifying indication of the growth of musical culture here is to be noted in the fact that they now play in Providence oftener than in any other New England city, outside, of course, of Boston.

Last night's concert began with the overture to Wagner's "Der Fliegende Hollander." The romantic and tragical legend of the "Flying Dutchman" easily appealed to Wagner's vivid imagination, and he took it for the subject of one of his earliest operas, it being preceded only by "Rienzi" and a still earlier work, which was never produced during his lifetime. Although at this time Wagner was as yet content to work after existing models, and had not begun to formulate the original theories which were destined at a later period to throw the musical world into convulsions, there are to be found in the bold and powerful instrumentation of this overture plenty of hints of what was to come. The tendency already impelling him to disregard pedagogic rules for the sake of producing strange effects is clearly shown in the weird and ghostly opening tremolo, given fortissimo upon bare fifths and octaves. Other daring innovations, such as the frequent use of diminished chords and original modes of resolving the same, are to be found, while his favorite device of giving full chords to the brass is already manifest. The overture effectively typifies the ghostly storm-driven ship and the desolate mood of her heaven-cursed commander. It was played by the orchestra with tremendous vigor and sonority, and received a hearty round of applause.

The soloist of the evening, Miss Lena Little, next appeared and sang the familiar and beautiful aria, "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orpheus." Those who remember the wonderful manner in which the greatest contraltos of this generation, Annie Louise Cary, used to sing this, one of her favorite concert numbers, will never be satisfied with anybody else's rendering. Miss Little possesses a contralto voice of considerable power and an agreeable quality, although unevenly developed, the lower and medium registers being much the best part. She phrases well and sings with much intelligence. Her rendering of the aria was, on the whole, a praiseworthy one, and she was honored with a double recall.

Gounod's "Hymn to Saint Cecelia" was the next number on the programme. It is not at all in Gounod's best style, and contains little of interest save a long and somewhat melodious solo for the first violin and a prominent part for the harp. These, however, were so well played by Messrs. Kneisel and Schnecker that a repeat was demanded and acceded to. This was followed by a "valse lente" from Volkmann's Serenade (No. 1) for string orchestra. The string department is the foundation of the whole orchestra, and it is right here that the Boston Symphony—more conspicuously than at any other point—excel all similar organizations. The body of tone they produce is organ-like in its solid and sonorous smoothness, while they move together with such remarkable unanimity that each part sounds like a single instrument. Their attack, shading, and accuracy of intonation are beyond all praise. The simple, but pretty slow waltz was a treat to listen to, as they played it.

Miss Little sang again, this time to Mr. Nikisch's accompaniment on the piano, three songs, "Nur wer die Sehn sucht Kennt," by Tschaikowsky, "Charmante Marguerite," an old French song, and "Meine Leib ist gruen," by Brahms. These were all sung in an artistic manner, and especially with such admirable enunciation that one was tempted to wish that among all this array of foreign tongues something of our native speech had been permitted. This, however, is too much to hope for so long as the present fad of singing in all possible languages but English endures. In France and Germany they do not sing in English to French and German audiences, and why American singers should warble to American audiences in every language under the sun except their own, is one of those things that—to quote the eminent Lord Dundreary—"no fellow can find out." It is a serious tax upon the singers to acquire a smattering, at least, of the four or five chief Continental tongues, and no one can tell how soon Turkish or Sanscrit may be necessary to round out an artist's equipment. Linguistic acquirements are very admirable, but the exploiting of them upon a concert platform is not at all what audiences wish to hear, in spite of the rapid growth of this freak of fashion. The English language is the most powerful, varied and expressive on the face of the globe, and lends itself more easily to musical phrase and accent than any other, though less liquid than Spanish or Italian. It would be well for our singers to give it at least as much consideration as any other, and for our audiences to express their true sentiments instead of pretending to admire what they do not understand.

Raff's symphony "Im Walde" closed the concert. The forest has always been a fruitful source of inspiration to composers, and a strong family likeness exists between most works bearing that or other titles. Leaving out the subjective view, and regarding Raff's symphony as pure music, it is one of the best of its kind. Its second movement, a largo in A flat, is a beautiful bit of orchestral coloring and full of charming melody, while the "Dance of Dryads" which follows, is in strong contrast, but full of interest with its fairy-like harmonies and quaint rhythms. The opening and closing movements are more pretentious and are richly scored in the traditional symphony form. It is hardly necessary to say that it was admirably played.

The next concert, the fifth in the series, takes place on the evening of Wednesday, March 1.

THE PROVIDENCE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
BUSINESS OFFICE, 7 Weybosset St.
Telephone 1877-2.
EDITORIAL ROOMS, 25 South Water St.
Telephone 1877-3.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1893.

SYMPHONY.

The Fourth of the Boston Orchestra Series Presented Last Night.

The fourth of the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was given in Infantry hall last night.

The program afforded an excellent opportunity for a display of the ability, both of the individual players and of the orchestra as a whole. The first violinists are masters of their art. Providence has seldom listened to a more perfect harmony of theme and execution. The harp was given a prominent place in Gluck's "Orpheus." The young performer displayed a lightness of touch and effectiveness in shading the chords that called forth the warm approval of the audience.

The "Flying Dutchman" embodies some of Wagner's most mature talent. The overture affords an opportunity for scenic display and realism rarely met in the works of the greatest composers. Mr. Nikisch has the orchestral parts excellently disposed for an effective representation of the opening scene of the marine drama. The crash of the storm and the whistling of the wind through the rigging were represented with almost startling fidelity.

The symphony, "Im Walde," is probably the greatest of Raff's compositions. The three scenes in the forest are vividly portrayed, daytime, twilight and the solemn stillness of the night. The real spirit of the orchestra and the acute comprehension of each performer of the exact importance of his part, is best displayed in this connection. No undue stress is laid on any part, but all passages are arranged with an intelligent effectiveness that both pleases and suggests new conceptions of the scope of the the work.

The soloist, Miss Lena Little, is a contralto of no inconsiderable powers, nor did she undertake anything beyond the range of her voice. Her delivery is excellent and her power of sustaining difficult tones is worthy of more than passing mention.

The pre-eminent charm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the excellent distribution of the parts. No undue prominence is accorded any instrument. The soloists are never drowned by the orchestra, nor are the obligato parts subordinated to an undue partiality for the solo. Each part is given its place, nothing more. The bowing is in some respects susceptible of cultivation, but the quality of tone is above reproach. The harp solos won especial praise for the artistic manner in which they were rendered.

The Telegram.
EVENING AND SUNDAY.
THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN.

A Delightful Performance in Infantry Hall Last Evening.

Last evening, for the fourth time this season, the Boston Symphony orchestra spread itself over the broad platform of Infantry hall. As delightfut a program, considering it altogether, as Conductor Nikisch has placed before his Providence friends this winter was presented.

The capital number, if the enthusiasm shown by the critical portion of the audience is a safe criterion, was the "Hymn to St. Cecilia," Gounod's lovely poem. Franz Kneisel, accompanied by Mr. Schnecker, the harpist, played the solo air with entrancing effect, and in the graceful, expressive style of which he is so good an exponent. Seldom has a violin part been performed here which so worked upon the susceptibilities of 2,000 auditors as did Magician Kneisel's instrumental song. As the place was reached where all the violins pick up the melody and proceed with it into variations, the instruments spoke the general note with wonderful simultaneousness. It was a most charming selection, and Mr. Kneisel was obliged to rise several times and bow. Mr. Schnecker was included in the demonstration of pleasure, but he somehow did not divine that the applause was for him also.

The string piece, "Valse Lente," by Volkmann, was vivaciously played; and almost unassailable was the performance of Wagner's overture, "Flying Dutchman," with its stupendous fury, its diversity of treatment and its beauty and gorgeousness of protrayal.

Raff's symphony, "In the Wood," teeming with fantasies and fairy-like pictures, was given in a manner which embodied the most advanced intelligence in musical interpretation.

Miss Lena Little appeared as the singer of the evening. Her most acceptable work was effected in an aria from "Orpheus," in which the qualities of strength, sweetness and a sympathetic utterances were present.

The fifth concert will take place March 1.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 28, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Albeit something too long, the twelfth Symphony concert was altogether fine in execution, reaching for the orchestra the highest attainment in accuracy and in expression of the season. The programme had been extended beyond what was promised, in order that Mr. Henri Marteau, the new violinist, might be heard twice. The orchestral number interpolated between his solos was Liszt's music for the tavern-scene in Lenau's "Faust"—a scene which has about the same propriety and reserve which characterize the height of the evening in a dance hall, and is not at all ill-matched in the hot, rough tumbling pages which Liszt wrote for it. The programme began and ended with pastoral music—Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, which is dreamy, beautiful and fascinating, although less fascinating and rich than his Oriental writings, and Raff's "In the Woods" symphony, opulent in dainty conceits, in poetic power and in exquisite coloring. The performance of these two compositions might well be accepted as perfect. The appearance of the young French violinist may be fairly set down as marking an epoch in Boston experience of his instrument, for, although he has not reached his twentieth year, he demonstrated his right to be placed as a peer in almost all respects beside the best players we have. That he has not reached the full estate of man and artist, is to be conceded at once; but if he fails to attain this now, he atones by the promise which he gives for the future. He is not a precocious youth, with a facility for handling the violin successfully and with aplomb, whom one hears with astonishment and admiration once or twice and will never care to hear again. His is a nature born to express itself through the vibrant strings and resounding shell of the violin, and his complete mastery of its technique—his perfect intonation, large phrasing, apposite emphasis and significant expression—is evidently but the means to a lofty and dominant future. His selections were Bruch's first concerto, in which the artist-spirit was constantly felt, and the "Vision of Joan Darc," which Gounod wrote for him and in which a tranquil rhapsody was the chief element. He was recalled again and again—even to the fifth time—by the audience; but one could not help noticing that some national or professional feeling withheld almost all the violinists of the orchestra from joining in the applause. Tonight Paderewski will play his own A-minor concerto; two new orchestra poems, written by Mr. MacDowell, and entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," will be introduced, and the standard selections will be Schumann's first Symphony and the prelude to "The Master-Singers."

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give a concert at Chickering's on February 28. The Four Hundred cannot all get in and somebody will be saddened.

Mr. Nikisch accompanied the Kneisel Quartette to Manchester, N. H., on Thursday evening and took the piano part delightfully in the programme which they gave for a subscription concert.

The Adamowski Quartette ended its short series on Tuesday afternoon with a very pleasant concert, in which Mr. Nikisch assisted, taking the piano part in Saint-Saëns's B-flat major quartette and Goldmark's suite for piano and violin, acquitting himself admirably for nicety and grace, and with harmonious spirit.

The Symphony programme of tonight names Goldmark's "Spring" overture and Raff's "Wood" symphony. Between them a young French violinist, only fifteen years old, named Henri Marteau, who has just arrived in this country, will play. He brings the best of credentials as to his original talent, his education and his proficiency, and his appearance will be one of the events of the season. He has appeared to entire acceptance in the musical capitals of Europe, and is now just beginning a tour of this country.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 30, 1893.

Music Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity last Saturday evening at the thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski was the soloist, and was most enthusiastically received. He played one of his own compositions, a concerto in A minor, which was heard for the first time here last season, but it was well worthy of repetition. In it the orchestra has the most prominent part, the pianoforte throughout being largely ornamental. Mr. Paderewski played in his best style, which was appreciated by the large audience, and after his second selection he answered repeated calls. The symphony No. 1 in B flat, by Robert Schumann, was executed in a most praiseworthy manner by the orchestra. The work is long and elaborate, but nothing could be brighter than its first theme. The second movement is one of Schumann's richest instrumentation, and ends with a finale of wonderful effectiveness. Two poems for orchestra, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," by Edward A. MacDowell, were heard for the first time. As the names suggest they were of a gloomy tendency. Unlike most symphonic poems, the composer has not given to the public any descriptive thoughts concerning them, but leaves it to his listeners to decide the story. Mr. MacDowell's skill as a musician is shown in his use of the orchestra, but the music is indefinite, though picturesque. The programme concluded with Wagner's prelude to "Die Miestersinger," of all his works one of the most elaborate, and was played superbly. The concert for next Saturday evening, Feb. 4, will be important as introducing for the first time Mr. Autun Fort's "Skeleton in Armor," with Boston Symphony chorus; also "The Columbus March and Hymn" with chorus and orchestra by John K. Paine.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 29.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, was attended by an audience that completely packed Music Hall. Every available bit of standing room was filled. The concert opened with Schumann's Symphony, No. 1 for which, by the way, the conductor seems to have a special predilection. The work was given very effectively, though with much exaggeration of style, and untuneful ness on the part of the wind instruments. The novelty of the concert was a work by Mr. E. A. McDowell; two poems for orchestra, op. 22, and entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," respectively. We must confess that we failed to understand them on a first hearing. The music is well put together, is beautifully instrumented, and is delightful in tone color generally; but beyond this we do not feel competent to speak of it. Why Hamlet, and why Ophelia, we cannot understand. If the first be to describe the moods of Hamlet, the listener is left to discover what moods. What the wildness, the incoherency and the raving of the greater part of the first movement indicate, baffles us. If this music typifies Hamlet at all, it is a Hamlet who would have run his sword through the King, his uncle, the first time he saw him after having heard the story of the Ghost. The Ophelia movement is more lucid, and has a leading theme of great beauty. The work is musicianly from beginning to end, but it is a pity that it does not tell what it has to tell more clearly. It was well played, though again the wind instruments indulged in false intonation. There was much applause, and an evident desire to call the composer forward, but he did not appear. The soloist was Paderewski, who was welcomed with immense enthusiasm. He played his concerto in A-minor, op. 17, the same work that he performed last year at these concerts. That he gave it with splendid brilliancy and impressiveness need not be said. In fact, it is no longer necessary to dwell on the perfections of this artist's playing. He was wildly applauded and recalled four times. Later in the evening he played the great Chopin Nocturne in G and the Valse Brillante by the same composer. We have heard him perform these works much better than he did on this occasion. He was evidently not in his best mood, and there were moments in the waltz when he was not equal to himself Still it was Paderewski, and the audience rewarded him with thunders of plaudits after the nocturne, the orchestra giving also their stamp of approval; and after the waltz the applause was furious in its fervor, again encouraged by the orchestra. The artist was recalled three times, manifestly with the view of exacting an encore; but the piano lid was closed incontinently, and the recalls ceased. A fine appreciation of Wagner was shown by the exit of the larger part of the audience before the performance of the "Meistersinger" overture which ended the concert. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; "The Skeleton in Armor," by Arthur Foote; Brahms's "Song of Destiny," and the "Columbus March and Hymn," by John K. Paine. Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith, Miss Lillian Carlismith, Mr. G J. Parker, Mr. Clarence E. Hay and the Boston Symphony Chorus will assist.

Music Notes.

On Tuesday afternoon the Adamowski Quartet gave the third and last concert in their this season's series, at Chickering Hall. They were assisted by Mr. A. Nikisch at the piano. The programme, which presented no novelties, was as follows:—Quartet, G-major, Haydn; Sonata for violin and piano, op. 11, Goldmark; Quartet piano and stringe, B-flat, op. 41, Saint-Saens. The Haydn Quartet was somewhat coarsely and unsympathetically played and the first violin and the 'cello wandered now and then into imperfect intonation. In fact the organization has done much better work than it vouchsafed on this occasion. The Goldmark suite was given with much fire but with little finish by either the violinist or the pianist, the latter playing steadily with a heaviness and a thickness that were painfully obtrusive, to say nothing of the spasmodic and unmeaning thumping to which he subjected the instrument. This same fault came prominently to the front in the closing quartet. Mr. Nikisch accompanies songs charmingly and with a taste and delicacy that cannot be too warmly praised; but in chamber music he is less felicitous and agreeable. If we might advise, we would suggest that he confine himself to that field of piano playing in which he excels,—at least, until he has fitted himself properly for those higher phases of the art to which he now aspires.

—Friday afternoon was a gala occasion for the "rehearsal" girls. Music Hall was crowded and hundreds were refused admission. The beauties of Boston wore their smartest frocks and largest hats, so that a few rows back it was impossible even to catch a glimpse of the golden aureole of the idol of the hour. Among the pretty girls present were the Misses Dabney, Cochrane, Schlesinger, Boardman, Stackpole, Shattuck, Frothingham, Beal, Grew, Fairchild and Palfrey. Others noticed in the crowd were Mrs. R. M. Sears, Mrs. Higginson, Mrs. J. Iasigi, Mrs G. B. Blake, Mr. Edward Gray, Mr. Edward Perkins, Mr Gardner, Mr. Carlo Perkins, Mr. Harry Wainwright, Mr. Arthur Pickering, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mrs. Henry Howe, Miss Wheelwright, Miss Hale, Miss Faulkner, Mrs. S. H. Bertram, Miss Iasigi, Miss Ida Beal, Miss Aldridge, Mr. Jackson and Mrs. White.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 29.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 29, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Paderewski.

"The Lion Tamer" a Hit—Return of the Nordica Company—The Heinrich Song Concerts—Romantic Recitals by Scharwenka—Grossmith Again—Another Wagner Event—Notes.

The 13th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall, last evening, made an ideal musical entertainment, and the immense audience present, limited in numbers only by the entire capacity of the auditorium, left no doubt of the impression given by the programme performed under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

The Schumann symphony No. 1 made the first attraction of the evening, and the reading given its several movements realized all their beauties in the most artistic fashion, the men of the orchestra seeming to enter into the spirit of the work with unusual interest.

Following the symphony came the concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 17, by Mr. Paderewski, with the composer as solo player. The repetition of this work, which had a hearing here last season, made a memorable event of the evening, for the playing of Paderewski was superb, and left nothing to be desired by the most captious critic. The orchestra, which is made so prominent throughout the concerto, was heard at all times with equal satisfaction, and the remarkable scene of enthusiasm which followed the conclusion of the work was but natural. Repeated recalls were responded to by the well nigh exhausted artist, whose powers of endurance seem to equal his genuis as a pianist and composer.

Mr. Nikisch then gave a first hearing of the two "poems or orchestra," named by Mr. E. A. MacDowell, the composer, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia." No descriptions of the thoughts attending the composition of these "poems" have been made public by Mr. MacDowell, and the difficulty of deciding upon their realistic value is thereby greatly increased. Music is indefinite in its suggestions even to the most imaginative nature, and it appears only fair to assume that Mr. MacDowell has correctly reproduced the thoughts which he may be supposed to have had in mind while preparing these "poems." Apart from any definite significance, the two works are compositions well worthy the name they bear. They are excellent specimens of Mr. MacDowell's melodious tendencies, the leading themes being clear and definite, as well as full of character, and in the working out of the principal subjects Mr. MacDowell again shows his skill as a musician and his masterly ability in the use of the modern orchestra. The merits of the two "poems" were fully appreciated by the audience and the reading given them by Mr. Nikisch was most satisfactory.

The programme was further enriched by Mr. Paderewski's contribution of some solo selections in his best mood, and ended with a splendid performance of the great prelude to the "Meistersingers."

Next Saturday evening the programme will be as follows: Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus"; Arthur Foote's "Skeleton in Armor," op. 28, for chorus, orchestra and quartet, with Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlismith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay as soloists; Brahms' "Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, and J. K. Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn," for chorus and orchestra.

The Symphony, with Miss Little as vocal soloist, gave a delightful concert in Providence on Wednesday evening, which society appreciated by attending in such large numbers that Mr. Comee had his energies taxed to the utmost to seat the audience. The concert, which was over at 10, was followed by two small musicales, in which members of the orchestra participated.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch gives his first real piano recital on Tuesday evening, and it occurs in Providence. Mrs. Nikisch will assist, and society generally will attend and entertain them.

The third and last concert by the Adamowski quartet, at Chickering Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, was the source of much enjoyment to a large and fashionable audience, whose only regret seemed to be that the pleasure of hearing these concerts was to be denied is until another season. The quartet was assisted by Mr. Nikisch, whose magnificent playing elicited great applause. A few among those present were Mr. and Mrs. William F. Apthorp, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Hecht, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Ethelbert Nevin, Mrs. Jack Gardner, Mrs. Boardman, Miss Boardman, Miss Winthrop, Mr. George Chase, Mrs. Frank Fowler, Miss Fowler and Mr. Elliot W. Pratt.

[96]

THE PROVIDENCE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
BUSINESS OFFICE, 7 Weybosset St.
Telephone 1877-2.
EDITORIAL ROOMS, 25 South Water St.
Telephone 1877-3.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1893.

SYMPHONY.

The Fourth of the Boston Orchestra Series Presented Last Night.

The fourth of the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was given in Infantry hall last night.

The program afforded an excellent opportunity for a display of the ability, both of the individual players and of the orchestra as a whole. The first violinists are masters of their art. Providence has seldom listened to a more perfect harmony of theme and execution. The harp was given a prominent place in Gluck's "Orpheus." The young performer displayed a lightness of touch and effect veness in shading the chords that called forth the warm approval of the audience.

The "Flying Dutchman" embod es some of Wagner's most mature talent. The overture affords an opportunity for scenic display and realism rarely met in the works of the greatest composers. Mr. Nikisch has the orchestral parts excellently disposed for an effective representation of the opening scene of the marine drama. The crash of the storm and the whistling of the wind through the rigging were represented with almost startling fidelity.

The symphony, "Im Walde," is probably the greatest of Raff's compositions. The three scenes in the forest are vividly portrayed, daytime, twilight and the solemn stillness of the night. The real spirit of the orchestra and the acute comprehension of each performer of the exact importance of his part, is best displayed in this connection. No undue stress is laid on any part, but all passages are arranged with an intelligent effectiveness that both pleases and suggests new conceptions of the scope of the the work.

The soloist, Miss Lena Little, is a contralto of no inconsiderable powers, nor did she undertake anything beyond the range of her voice. Her delivery is excellent and her power of sustaining difficult tones is worthy of more than passing mention.

The pre-eminent charm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the excellent distribution of the parts. No undue prominence is accorded any instrument. The soloists are never drowned by the orchestra, nor are the obligato parts subordinated to an undue partiality for the solo. Each part is given its place, nothing more. The bowing is in some respects susceptible of cultivation, but the quality of tone is above reproach. The harp solos won especial praise for the artistic manner in which they were rendered.

The Telegram.
EVENING AND SUNDAY.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN.

A Delightful Performance in Infantry Hall Last Evening.

Last evening, for the fourth time this season, the Boston Symphony orchestra spread itself over the broad platform of Infantry hall. As delightful a program, considering it altogether, as Conductor Nikisch has placed before his Providence friends this winter was presented.

The capital number, if the enthusiasm shown by the critical portion of the audience is a safe criterion, was the "Hymn to St. Cecilia," Gounod's lovely poem. Franz Kneisel, accompanied by Mr. Schnecker, the harpist, played the solo air with entrancing effect, and in the graceful, expressive style of which he is so good an exponent. Seldom has a violin part been performed here which so worked upon the susceptibilities of 2,000 auditors as did Magician Kneisel's instrumental song. As the place was reached where all the violins pick up the melody and proceed with it into variations, the instruments spoke the general note with wonderful simultaneousness. It was a most charming selection, and Mr. Kneisel was obliged to rise several times and bow. Mr. Schnecker was included in the demonstration of pleasure, but he somehow did not divine that the applause was for him also.

The string piece, "Valse Lente," by Volkmann, was vivaciously played; and almost unassailable was the performance of Wagner's overture, "Flying Dutchman," with its stupendous fury, its diversity of treatment and its beauty and gorgeousness of protrayal.

Raff's symphony, "In the Wood," teeming with fantasies and fairy-like pictures, was given in a manner which embodied the most advanced intelligence in musical interpretation.

Miss Lena Little appeared as the singer of the evening. Her most acceptable work was effected in an aria from "Orpheus," in which the qualities of strength, sweetness and a sympathetic utterances were present.

The fifth concert will take place March 1.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 28, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Albeit something too long, the twelfth Symphony concert was altogether fine in execution, reaching for the orchestra the highest attainment in accuracy and in expression of the season. The programme had been extended beyond what was promised, in order that Mr. Henri Marteau, the new violinist, might be heard twice. The orchestral number interpolated between his solos was Liszt's music for the tavern-scene in Lenau's "Faust"—a scene which has about the same propriety and reserve which characterize the height of the evening in a dance hall, and is not at all ill-matched in the hot, rough tumbling pages which Liszt wrote for it. The programme began and ended with pastoral music—Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, which is dreamy, beautiful and fascinating, although less fascinating and rich than his Oriental writings, and Raff's "In the Woods" symphony, opulent in dainty conceits, in poetic power and in exquisite coloring. The performance of these two compositions might well be accepted as perfect. The appearance of the young French violinist may be fairly set down as marking an epoch in Boston experience of his instrument, for, although he has not reached his twentieth year, he demonstrated his right to be placed as a peer in almost all respects beside the best players we have. That he has not reached the full estate of man and artist, is to be conceded at once; but if he fails to attain this now, he atones by the promise which he gives for the future. He is not a precocious youth, with a facility for handling the violin successfully and with aplomb, whom one hears with astonishment and admiration once or twice and will never care to hear again. His is a nature born to express itself through the vibrant strings and resounding shell of the violin, and his complete mastery of its technique—his perfect intonation, large phrasing, apposite emphasis and significant expression—is evidently but the means to a lofty and dominant future. His selections were Bruch's first concerto, in which the artist-spirit was constantly felt, and the "Vision of Joan Darc," which Gounod wrote for him and in which a tranquil rhapsody was the chief element. He was recalled again and again—even to the fifth time—by the audience; but one could not help noticing that some national or professional feeling withheld almost all the violinists of the orchestra from joining in the applause. Tonight Paderewski will play his own A-minor concerto; two new orchestra poems, written by Mr. MacDowell, and entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," will be introduced, and the standard selections will be Schumann's first Symphony and the prelude to "The Master-Singers."

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch will give a concert at Chickering's on February 28. The Four Hundred cannot all get in and somebody will be saddened.

Mr. Nikisch accompanied the Kneisel Quartette to Manchester, N. H., on Thursday evening and took the piano part delightfully in the programme which they gave for a subscription concert.

The Adamowski Quartette ended its short series on Tuesday afternoon with a very pleasant concert, in which Mr. Nikisch assisted, taking the piano part in Saint-Saëns's B-flat major quartette and Goldmark's suite for piano and violin, acquitting himself admirably for nicety and grace, and with harmonious spirit.

The Symphony programme of tonight names Goldmark's "Spring" overture and Raff's "Wood" symphony. Between them a young French violinist, only fifteen years old, named Henri Marteau, who has just arrived in this country, will play. He brings the best of credentials as to his original talent, his education and his proficiency, and his appearance will be one of the events of the season. He has appeared to entire acceptance in the musical capitals of Europe, and is now just beginning a tour of this country.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 30, 1893.

Music Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity last Saturday evening at the thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski was the soloist, and was most enthusiastically received. He played one of his own compositions, a concerto in A minor, which which was heard for the first time here last season, but it was well worthy of repetition. In it the orchestra has the most prominent part, the pianoforte throughout being largely ornamental. Mr. Paderewski played in his best style, which was appreciated by the large audience, and after his second selection he answered repeated calls. The symphony No. 1 in B flat, by Robert Schumann, was executed in a most praiseworthy manner by the orchestra. The work is long and elaborate, but nothing could be brighter than its first theme. The second movement is one of Schumann's richest instrumentation, and ends with a finale of wonderful effectiveness. Two poems for orchestra, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," by Edward A. MacDowell, were heard for the first time. As the names suggest they were of a gloomy tendency. Unlike most symphonic poems, the composer has not given to the public any descriptive thoughts concerning them, but leaves it to his listeners to decide the story. Mr. MacDowell's skill as a musician is shown in his use of the orchestra, but the music is indefinite, though picturesque. The programme concluded with Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," of all his works one of the most elaborate, and was played superbly. The concert for next Saturday evening, Feb. 4, will be important as introducing for the first time Mr. Autun Fort's "Skeleton in Armor," with Boston Symphony chorus; also "The Columbus March and Hymn" with chorus and orchestra by John K. Paine.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 29.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, was attended by an audience that completely packed Music Hall. Every available bit of standing room was filled. The concert opened with Schumann's Symphony, No. 1 for which, by the way, the conductor seems to have a special predilection. The work was given very effectively, though with much exaggeration of style, and untuneful ness on the part of the wind instruments. The novelty of the concert was a work by Mr. E. A. McDowell; two poems for orchestra, op. 22, and entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," respectively. We must confess that we failed to understand them on a first hearing. The music is well put together, is beautifully instrumented, and is delightful in tone color generally; but beyond this we do not feel competent to speak of it. Why Hamlet, and why Ophelia, we cannot understand. If the first be to describe the moods of Hamlet, the listener is left to discover what moods. What the wildness, the incoherency and the raving of the greater part of the first movement indicate, baffles us. If this music typifies Hamlet at all, it is a Hamlet who would have run his sword through the King, his uncle, the first time he saw him after having heard the story of the Ghost. The Ophelia movement is more lucid, and has a leading theme of great beauty. The work is musicianly from beginning to end, but it is a pity that it does not tell what it has to tell more clearly. It was well played, though again the wind instruments indulged in false intonation. There was much applause, and an evident desire to call the composer forward, but he did not appear. The soloist was Paderewski, who was welcomed with immense enthusiasm. He played his concerto in A-minor, op. 17, the same work that he performed last year at these concerts. That he gave it with splendid brilliancy and impressiveness need not be said. In fact, it is no longer necessary to dwell on the perfections of this artist's playing. He was wildly applauded and recalled four times. Later in the evening he played the great Chopin Nocturne in G and the Valse Brillante by the same composer. We have heard him perform these works much better than he did on this occasion. He was evidently not in his best mood, and there were moments in the waltz when he was not equal to himself Still it was Paderewski, and the audience rewarded him with thunders of plaudits after the nocturne, the orchestra giving also their stamp of approval; and after the waltz the applause was furious in its fervor, again encouraged by the orchestra. The artist was recalled three times, manifestly with the view of exacting an encore; but the piano lid was closed incontinently, and the recalls ceased. A fine appreciation of Wagner was shown by the exit of the larger part of the audience before the performance of the "Meistersinger" overture which ended the concert. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; "The Skeleton in Armor," by Arthur Foote; Brahms's "Song of Destiny," and the "Columbus March and Hymn," by John K. Paine. Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith, Miss Lillian Carlismith, Mr. G J. Parker, Mr. Clarence E. Hay and the Boston Symphony Chorus will assist.

Music Notes.

On Tuesday afternoon the Adamowski Quartet gave the third and last concert in their this season's series, at Chickering Hall. They were assisted by Mr. A. Nikisch at the piano. The programme, which presented no novelties, was as follows:—Quartet, G-major, Haydn; Sonata for violin and piano, op. 11, Goldmark; Quartet piano and stringe, B-flat, op. 41, Saint-Saens. The Haydn Quartet was somewhat coarsely and unsympathetically played and the first violin and the 'cello wandered now and then into imperfect intonation. In fact the organization has done much better work than it vouchsafed on this occasion. The Goldmark suite was given with much fire but with little finish by either the violinist or the pianist, the latter playing steadily with a heaviness and a thickness that were painfully obtrusive, to say nothing of the spasmodic and unmeaning thumping to which he subjected the instrument. This same fault came prominently to the front in the closing quartet. Mr. Nikisch accompanies songs charmingly and with a taste and delicacy that cannot be too warmly praised; but in chamber music he is less felicitous and agreeable. If we might advise, we would suggest that he confine himself to that field of piano playing in which he excels,—at least, until he has fitted himself properly for those higher phases of the art to which he now aspires.

—Friday afternoon was a gala occasion for the "rehearsal" girls. Music Hall was crowded and hundreds were refused admission. The beauties of Boston wore their smartest frocks and largest hats, so that a few rows back it was impossible even to catch a glimpse of the golden aureole of the idol of the hour. Among the pretty girls present were the Misses Dabney, Cochrane, Schlesinger, Boardman, Stackpole, Shattuck, Frothingham, Beal, Grew, Fairchild and Palfrey. Others noticed in the crowd were Mrs. R. M. Sears, Mrs. Higginson, Mrs. J. Iasigi, Mrs G. B. Blake, Mr. Edward Gray, Mr. Edward Perkins, Mr Gardner, Mr. Carlo Perkins, Mr. Harry Wainwright, Mr. Arthur Pickering. Mr. B. J. Lang, Mrs. Henry Howe, Miss Wheelwright, Miss Hale, Miss Faulkner, Mrs. S. H. Bertram, Miss Iasigi, Miss Ida Beal, Miss Aldridge, Mr. Jackson and Mrs. White.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 29.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 29, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Paderewski.

"The Lion Tamer" a Hit—Return of the Nordica Company—The Heinrich Song Concerts—Romantic Recitals by Scharwenka—Grossmith Again—Another Wagner Event—Notes.

The 13th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall, last evening, made an ideal musical entertainment, and the immense audience present, limited in numbers only by the entire capacity of the auditorium, left no doubt of the impression given by the programme performed under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

The Schumann symphony No. 1 made the first attraction of the evening, and the reading given its several movements realized all their beauties in the most artistic fashion, the men of the orchestra seeming to enter into the spirit of the work with unusual interest.

Following the symphony came the concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 17, by Mr. Paderewski, with the composer as solo player. The repetition of this work, which had a hearing here last season, made a memorable event of the evening, for the playing of Paderewski was superb, and left nothing to be desired by the most captious critic. The orchestra, which is made so prominent throughout the concerto, was heard at all times with equal satisfaction, and the remarkable scene of enthusiasm which followed the conclusion of the work was but natural. Repeated recalls were responded to by the well nigh exhausted artist, whose powers of endurance seem to equal his genuis as a pianist and composer.

Mr. Nikisch then gave a first hearing of the two "poems or orchestra," named by Mr. E. A. MacDowell, the composer, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia." No descriptions of the thoughts attending the composition of these "poems" have been made public by Mr. MacDowell, and the difficulty of deciding upon their realistic value is thereby greatly increased. Music is indefinite in its suggestions even to the most imaginative nature, and it appears only fair to assume that Mr. MacDowell has correctly reproduced the thoughts which he may be supposed to have had in mind while preparing these "poems." Apart from any definite significance, the two works are compositions well worthy the name they bear. They are excellent specimens of Mr. MacDowell's melodious tendencies, the leading themes being clear and definite, as well as full of character, and in the working out of the principal subjects Mr. MacDowell again shows his skill as a musician and his masterly ability in the use of the modern orchestra. The merits of the two "poems" were fully appreciated by the audience and the reading given them by Mr. Nikisch was most satisfactory.

The programme was further enriched by Mr. Paderewski's contribution of some solo selections in his best mood, and ended with a splendid performance of the great prelude to the "Meistersingers."

Next Saturday evening the programme will be as follows: Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus"; Arthur Foote's "Skeleton in Armor," op. 28, for chorus, orchestra and quartet, with Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlismith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay as soloists; Brahms' "Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, and J. K. Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn," for chorus and orchestra.

The Symphony, with Miss Little as vocal soloist, gave a delightful concert in Providence on Wednesday evening, which society appreciated by attending in such large numbers that Mr. Comee had his energies taxed to the utmost to seat the audience. The concert, which was over at 10, was followed by two small musicales, in which members of the orchestra participated.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch gives his first real piano recital on Tuesday evening, and it occurs in Providence. Mrs. Nikisch will assist, and society generally will attend and entertain them.

The third and last concert by the Adamowski quartet, at Chickering Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, was the source of much enjoyment to a large and fashionable audience, whose only regret seemed to be that the pleasure of hearing these concerts was to be denied it until another season. The quartet was assisted by Mr. Nikisch, whose magnificent playing elicited great applause. A few among those present were Mr. and Mrs. William F. Apthorp, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Hecht, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Ethelbert Nevin, Mrs. Jack Gardner, Mrs. Boardman, Miss Boardman, Miss Winthrop, Mr. George Chase, Mrs. Frank Fowler, Miss Fowler and Mr. Elliot W. Pratt.

[96]

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JANUARY 30, 1893.

The Thirteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

Hamlet and Ophelia According to Mr. MacDowell.

The Enthusiastic Tribute Paid to Ignace Paderewski.

The programme of the thirteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, B flat major, Op. 38.....Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte, A minor, Op. 17.....Paderewski
Two poems for orchestra, op. 22.....MacDowell
Nocturne, Op. 37, No. 2 } .....Chopin
Waltz, Op. 34, No. 1 }
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg"...Wagner

Mr. Paderewski was the pianist.

***

Mr. Paderewski was greeted warmly when he appeared on the stage, and at the end of the concerto he was applauded with unbridled enthusiasm. Recall followed recall. There was a similar scene after the numbers by Chopin. There was again seen the amazing triumph of temperament. And yet Mr. Paderewski never appeared to less advantage in Music Hall than at the concert of Saturday evening.

***

His concerto does not wear well. When it was played by him last season, there was much of its material that seemed effective. Saturday evening the former favorable impression was not renewed. The pianoforte part appeared to be often meaningless, or merely a means of exhibiting bravura. The instrumentation seemed at times unnecessarily noisy and raw. The romanza seemed rambling and inconsequential, and the finale not without the pomp and the tinsel of a spectacular theatre-piece. Mr. Paderewski played with fire and brilliancy; but he frequently forced the tone, or, to speak plainly, he pounded, and without necessity.

***

When the concerto was first played here by Mrs. King in March, 1891, the impression then made was this: "The concerto makes severer demands upon the player's technique than mind. The bravura work is dazzling, and it would be more effective were it not almost incessant. There is little or no depth of feeling, there is but very little feigned or genuine passion. Everything lies upon the surface, to be looked at, to be praised, to be forgotten. The concerto is like a long-continued setting-off of fireworks: rockets soar airward and die in fiery agony; pinwheels revolve and throw out dazzling sparks; colored lights and Roman candles, flower pots and mines amuse and hold the attention; set pieces compel one to admire the art of the maker; the last spark is extinct, and the darkness which follows is the more intense." This impression was strengthened by the hearing of Saturday evening.

***

Mr. Paderewski was not in his happiest vein. His performance of the nocturne was mannered and artificial: it was without poetic feeling: it was almost wholly devoid of the marvelous pedal coloring which seems peculiar to him. Nor was his playing of the waltz as frank as on former occasions.

***

The virtuoso dies with his generation. His fame is a bubble. When garrulous old men shake their heads and prate of the eloquence of the jury lawyer of their youth, or of the beauty of the actress whose eyes are now dust, or of the virtuoso who thrilled them, the young sit in the seat of the scornful. "The leaf falls, but the forest remains." That which is printed has a chance of survival, and the respect of the Chinese for paper and type is not without foundation. Mozart, the virtuoso, is a myth; Mozart, the composer, dwells among us; we know his plain and lovable face; we listen eagerly to his words of humor and consolation. But who can foretell the life of a contemporaneous composition?

***

Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poems are called "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," and they are without a textual programme. The hearer, when he knows that the music is about the Prince of Denmark, can imagine what he pleases. He may find the wicked King therein, or Polonius; the ghost may walk the wind-swept platform; or Rosencrantz and Guildenstern may enter arm-in-arm. It has been said that everyone is convinced of his ability to play the part of Hamlet, and no two hearers would probably agree concerning Mr. MacDowell's musical delineation of the hero. Let us rather rejoice in the musical beauty of the pieces without entering into vain discussions concerning the meaning of this or that passage. These symphonic poems are not by any means the strongest of the works of MacDowell, but how full they are of romantic beauty, of charming effects, of passion under artistic restraint, of haunting melody. With what skill are the colors prepared! This man is a born musician. Music was not to him an acquired taste, like tomatoes or olives. He best expresses his thoughts in music. It is his natural means of communication with his fellows.

These poems are "sleep-chasings," to borrow the phrase of Walt Whitman. Hamlet is seen as in a dream, from which the sleeper wakes, moved, excited, but not disquieted: and he would fain dream the dream again. Personally, I prefer the "Ophelia;" and yet the "Hamlet" is in height of imagination the nobler work. When I hear such programme music as this, I do not hanker after conventional and rigid molds, into which music is poured that answers the definition of Leibnitz, viz.: "Music is an occult exercise of the mind, unconsciously performing arithmetical calculations."

***

Hearty and honest applause followed these symphonic poems, and yet the seeming triumph of the evening was the temperament of Paderewski. The individual is nearer to the public than is a work. It is the actor in "Hamlet" that provokes discussion and rivets or repels the attention. And yet the musical feature of the concert of Saturday evening was the introduction of the symphonic poems of Mr. MacDowell.

***

The orchestra gave a robust performance of the Schumann symphony. The effect was marred at times by the untunefulness of the wind instruments. The concert was protracted to a late hour, and many left the hall before the opening measure of the "Meistersinger" overture.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 29, 1893.

Symphony Orchestra and Pianist Paderewski.

If there had been any doubts about the continuation of the Paderewski craze, the unbeliever who attempted to purchase tickets for the 13th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony would have found his or her incredulity sadly at fault last week. The simple announcement made by Manager Ellis, "All tickets for both performances are sold," was verified; for Music Hall was crowded at each entertainment with an audience of admiring (perhaps worshipping would be a more fitting term,) spectators, who insisted on recalling the wonderful pianist several times after each number.

It was given out that M. Paderewski had injured his hand before the rehearsal, but if he had no bad result was shown.

With the orchestra he played his A minor concerto for pianoforte, a work, although written by a pianist, which treats the piano as a single instrument without seeking to wander into the realms of orchestral effects.

Wonderfully was the piece played. The confidence of the composer, reinforced by the ability of the player, was a combination as near perfection as one could imagine.

The graceful romanza of the andante, the second movement, was perhaps the most delightful portion of the composition, for here the dainty melodic form is alternated between the piano and orchestra, and if ever harmony possessed soul this charming morceau must rank in that category of expression.

At the matinee his Chopin introductions awakened great applause. But whether it be Chopin, Liszt, Beethoven, Schubert, or any other composer, the great performer almost disarms criticism, and it is useless to further laud his phenomenal performances.

Two new poems, entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," written by the well-known Boston composer, Mr. E. A. MacDowell, were given by the orchestra with fine effect. They evidently are companion pieces, although the talented writer gives no further clue to the tone pictures than that conveyed in their titles.

Underlying the "Hamlet" number is the suggestion of the depressing moods of the young prince, illustrated by the onerous measures allotted to the string basses and the brasses, broken at intervals by discordant notes, typifying, doubtless, the phantasia of the mind which conjures up shadowy visions from the spirit world.

The sad and gentle nature of the unfortunate maiden is shown in the "Ophelia" composition, by the plaintive and tender orchestration in which the strings have the principal work. Dissonants mark her madness, and a pathetic theme, pianissimo, shows her untimely "taking off."

A single hearing of the piece is insufficient for a proper analysis of its fine orchestration and originality of treatment. It was most favorably received, but it is of so delicate an order of composition that it appeals more successfully to the cultivated musician than to the average auditor.

Schmann's stately symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, and the prelude from "Meistersinger" were the other orchestral selections.

This week the programme will be as follows:

Overture, Coriolanus.....Beethoven
Skeleton in Armor, op. 28.....Arthur Foote
For chorus, orchestra and quartet.
Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carllsmith, Mr. George J. Parker, Mr. Clavence E. Hay.
(First time.)
Song of Destiny.....Brahms
For chorus and orchestra.
Columbus March and Hymn.....Paine
For chorus and orchestra.
(First time in Boston.)

In appreciation of the assistance of the Boston Symphony chorus at the concerts and rehearsals, Mr. Nikisch proposes to give very soon an evening of music for the pleasure of the members and their friends. The Symphony orchestra will take part.

The last of the three Adamowski quartet concerts at Chickering Hall, Tuesday afternoon, was made specially enjoyable by the appearance of Mr. Nikisch at the piano. His playing was a revelation to those who only know him as the Symphony orchestra conductor. In the audience were the usual large number of subscribers, Mrs. G. B. Shattuck, Mrs. Gardner, Mrs. B. R. Curtis, Mr. Theodore Chase, Mrs. Henry Winsor, Mr. Josiah Bradlee and Miss Bradlee, Miss Francisca Lunt, Mrs. Apthorp, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Miss Hecht, Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. E. A. Taft, Mrs. Robert Herrick, Mr. B. J. Lang, Miss Gertrude Going, Mr. W. P. Blake, and many more.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 30, 1893.

PADEREWSKI'S ART.

IT JUSTIFIES THE FERVOR OF ADMIRERS.

Music Hall Filled to Overflowing at Saturday's Symphony Concert, in Which the Great Pianist Was the Central Figure—A Unique Brilliancy of Harmonic Production.

The Symphony on Saturday was but the frame of the picture, for it was Paderewski, and Paderewski almost alone, who caused the aisles of Music Hall to overflow with a standing population, and the best orchestral numbers did not evoke a quarter of the enthusiasm that greeted a well-worn Chopin nocturne and waltz. In a certain sense the frenzy had its justification, for the pianist was at this concert heard with his appropriate surroundings, and in his own concerto he attained a greater height than in the groups of piano solos, more fit for chamber recitals, which have made up his preceding programmes.

One can only rhapsodize about his work in this concerto. Such brilliancy, such fervor, such bravura without an attempt to put virtuosity in the foreground, deserve paeans of praise. Naturally the composition is Klavier-maessig, but Paderewski has not committed the fault of Rubinstein and kept the piano unduly prominent; on the contrary, almost all the real development is given to the orchestra while the piano repeats, embellishes, or emphasizes the orchestral thoughts. Nor has the composer shown the Achilles' heel of Chopin, and betrayed weakness in dealing with tone-colors, made prominent by contrast with strength in the piano passages.

The cadenza of the first movement led in an unstrained manner from thematic material to the most brilliant display of virtuosity, and the final octave work was simply phenomenal in its power, rapidity and clearness. Originality is in every part of the work, although the burst of festivity in carillon-like clangor and the solemn organ-like second theme, in the finale, cause this movement to recall the spirit, if not the substance, of Schumann's "Cologne Symphony." The refined and melancholy character of some of the orchestral touches in the first movement, the ineffable sweetness of the romance, the exciting hurly-burly of the finale, and the powerful climax of the work, go to make up a composition that is likely to be more appreciated at each successive hearing.

The solos were less effective. Any piano pieces must lose in effect when brought in direct contrast with orchestral works, and it was probably this intermingling which caused the two Chopin numbers to seem less entrancing than usual. The works given were the nocturne in G and the waltz, op. 34, No. 1. The audience, however, went frantic over the playing and recalled the artist time after time, until it became evident that he did not propose to play an encore. The orchestral support in the concerto was especially good, the ensemble being without flaw, the conductor and musicians entering heartily into the spirit of the work.

Less commendation, however, must be given to the performance of the first movement of Schumann's B flat symphony, the introduction being made blatant to the verge of untunefulness, and like anything but the composer who was reserved even in his happiness, and who always avoided bombast. One may acknowledge the spirit of triumph which is in the first movement of this work, for Schumann, who often wrote his autobiography into his music, here celebrates the winning of his wife, or at least the happiness consequent upon it, but one can easily parody this outburst of joy, this combination of love and spring, and by exaggerated performance, metamorphose rejoicing into boisterousness.

There are passages in the first and last movements which call for the full power of the orchestra, but it may be questioned if this full power means forcing the strings to stridency, and causing the brass players to blow until their cheeks crack! The trombones especially can readily take the step from the sublime to the ridiculous; there was a time when they were too restrained in our orchestra, but the pendulum has now swung too far on the other side.

The larghetto, however, was finely played, and horns and 'cellos vied with each other in good shading and expression here. The scherzo, also, was taken up in good style, with just the right changes from earnestness to airiness. Schumann here gives a mood that is not easy either to define or musically interpret: He sweeps from lively to severe, if not from grave to gay, leaning just a little toward the darker side, and portraying Pleasure as Hawthorne has personified him in the wanderings of Daffydowndilly. Neither the mirth of Mozart nor the grotesqueness of Beethoven are in this scherzo, but the picture is not less true or artistic than these. Oboes, horns and especially to the solo flute (in the cadenza) deserve especial mention in connection with the last movement.

To the American auditor the most interesting part of the programme should have been the two poems (Poemes Symphoniques in the true sense of the word) by MacDowell, entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia." They are rather too deep to capture the multitude at once, but they are rich both in ideas and scoring. The composer has made of these two characters a sort of Faust and Marguerite, and the military tone of the first poem, and the tender and pathetic, yet simple character of the second, remind strongly of the contrast of the two first movements of Liszt's "Faust Symphony," especially as Ophelia, as Gretchen appears on the muted violins. In the portrayal of Hamlet the warlike element is well contrasted with moments of reverie and sorrow, and in the Ophelia movement there is something of foreboding and premonition. There is fluency of writing apparent in every measure, and though one may not find the ordinary conception of Shakespeare's pair present in the work, yet judged per se, the composition is one of the most worthy of the recent additions to the native repertoire. It does not belong to the average "programme music" school either, for the composer has here given a subjective rather than an objective work, and it is a presentation of emotions rather than of events.

With a fiery performance of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" the exciting programme ended in an exciting manner. There was much to commend in the performance of this. The broad theme of the Guild of Mastersingers was given with splendid power. It is not generally known that this is taken (at least its first score of notes) from an actual theme written by a mastersinger. The quick march on the woodwind was also very clearly and accurately played. There was, however, an occasional lack of perfect balance of parts, and a few of the sub-themes, which might have been seen by the eye in the score, were not audible to the ear in the performance. As a whole the concert was a successful one, but one cannot help regretting the swaggering Schumann who marched at the head of the procession.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 30, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the thirteenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Opus 38.
Paderewski: Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor. Opus 17.
MacDowell: Two Poems for Orchestra; "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," Opus 22.
Pianoforte solos—
Chopin: Nocturne in G major, Opus 37, No. 2.
Valse Brillante in A-flat major, Opus 34, No. 1.
Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski was the pianist.

A glorious concert, if two hours long! The magnificent opening of the Schumann symphony was given as it deserved, and the passage where the same theme returns in the same slow tempo in the middle of the first movement, instead of seeming like something of a falling off, as it usually does, sounded even stronger and more heroic. Equally brilliantly done was the horn and trumpet fanfare near the end of the movement. These are effects after Mr. Nikisch's own heart, and he makes them stand out in almost unexampled splendor. The whole symphony was admirably read and played, albeit we have heard the slow movement done with greater delicacy, and with something more of smoothness of tone.

Mr. MacDowell's "Hamlet" and "Ophelia" do not throw much more light upon what this immensely talented, but enigmatic, young musician strives after in his compositions—unless his aim be to combine beauty of tone-color with emotional expressiveness, and nothing else. In the "Ophelia" there are some moments of approach to recognizable musical form and coherence; but for the most part these two poems sound very like mere rambling preluding, like the first tentative stage in the growth of a musical purpose. Or shall we say that they sound like the musical accompaniment to some unexpressed poetic thought, or to an unseen dramatic action? There is no little beauty in them, much vigor, with perhaps a leaning toward the fantastic; but of musical meaning we can find next to none in them, and of definite poetic meaning there can be none at all. They are like the incoherent happenings in a dream, which, to be sure, do not seem incoherent for the time being to the dreamer. Perhaps this music ought to be listened to when one is in a state of half somnolence, and the mind is not occupied with the outline of things.

The great "Meistersinger" prelude was grandly given, perhaps with a little blurring of musical outline in some of the more delicate passages, but with superb force and sustained power in the stronger places, and with positively enormous effectiveness in the final climax. The peroration was simply overwhelming.

Paderewski's A-minor concerto more than holds its own with repeated hearings. To us the slow romanza and the finale are the strongest movements in it; there is doubtless much that is admirable in the first Allegro, but, compared with the movements that follow it, it seems to show the difference between good and vigorous work and inspiration of genius. The poetic sensibility of the romanza, the musical beauty of its theme and development, have that poignancy of appeal that only a genuine afflatus can give; no amount of sincerity of feeling or musical constructive skill can give it when unkindled by the divine spark. The spirited dash of the last Allegro molto vivace, and the noble emotional impressiveness of its second theme show the same inspired power, if in another phase. That the construction and workmanship are strong and skilful throughout only adds to the efficacy of this power. And how Paderewski played it! and how the orchestra accompanied it! There was a moment in the romanza where one held one's breath and the heart thumped double-quick. Never has the great pianist shown himself more unconditionally great! The two Chopin pieces almost reconciled one to their appearance on a symphony concert programme—so exquisitely were they played. But of Paderewski's playing of these things we have spoken before. The enthusiasm of the vast audience was unbounded.

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Coriolan," opus 62; Arthur Foote, "The Skeleton in Armour," for chorus, quartet and orchestra, opus 28; Brahms, "Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, opus 54; Paine, "Columbus March and Hymn," for chorus and orchestra. Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay will sing the solo parts.

---

[97]

BOSTON COURIER, S
JANUARY 29, 1893.

PADEREWSKI AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concerts continue their successful course and while varying as regards interest, invariably attract large audiences. The concert last evening had its unusual attraction in the appearance of Ignace Paderewski, the pianist whose rendering of his own concerto in A minor was a treat of the highest order.

By itself considered also the programme was of strong interest, containing as it did the "Spring Symphony" by Schumann and the two new poems by MacDowell; but there are few amateurs indeed who could not be drawn to a concert by such a reputation as Paderewski's and to use a commonplace phrase, limiting it, of course, to the musical elite in this city, "everybody was there" last evening and the greatest interest and enthusiasm prevailed. One does not care to rob the alphabet from A to Z in order to do justice to an artist like Paderewski. Looking in the glare of his qualities as a genius and searching for some point of defect, and then only finding to a limited extent such deficiencies as have been admitted in connection with his pianoforte recitals in this city, such an analysis will afford the pessimist the satisfaction of knowing that the most enthusiastic things a critic can say of Paderewski's performances will scarcely equal the enthusiasm of such as place the spiritual nobility of an artist's effort upon a higher plane than its scholastic or theoretical excellence. As we listened to Paderewski's performance of his concerto in A Minor last evening we were impressed that, possessing the truest, rarest and most charming tokens of his art, Paderewski is in the best sense one of the most interesting and masterly tone-poets that the musical world has known. In his piano-forte concert one finds an epitome of his characteristics as a genius. The whole work displays abundant spirit and concentrates attention between piano-forte and orchestra in about as perfect an ensemble as one would care to hear. That the work of any composer who has not been dead for a score of years or more is the offspring of genius is the last thing in the world that a contemporaneous wise-acres will feel disposed to admit; but it is difficult to understand how there can be a dissentant to the verdict that this A Minor concerto is one of the genuine creations in music. As equally true of the Chopin and Saint Saens concertos, with which works it may not improperly be compared, but very rare traces of borrowed thought can be found in it. It is also a work overflowing with rich musical conceptions, the merit of which was recognized when it was performed here before. Its workmanship alone proclaims that study and learning, combined with a spontaneous regard for the interests of the virtuoso, have guided the pen of its author.

The performance of the work by Paderewski was eminently beautiful and satisfying. In it there was freedom within strictness and, paradoxical though it may seem, strictness within freedom, while throughout both composer and pianist, the two in one, had their say in a perfectly natural and candid manner, and with all the vigor, skill and mastery also of the whole-souled and superbly educated musician.

The symphony given last evening seems to have been the logical outcome of the happiest period of Schumann's life. The obstacles to the composer's marriage with Clara Nieck had been overcome, and he had won high position as a musician and critical authority. Writing to Dorn in 1839, Schumann complains of the pianoforte as "too narrow a field for his thoughts," and he announces his intentions of applying himself to orchestral writing in order to make up for his want of practice. The B flat is the first published creation in his new and large field. Years before when a student at Heidelberg and when he was undecided between the professions of law and music, he wrote to Wieck, his former pianoforte teacher, and future father-in-law: "I detest theory pure and simple as you know, and I have been living very quietly, improvising a good deal, but not playing much from notes. I have begun many a symphony, but finished nothing and every now and then have managed to edge in a Schubert waltz between Roman law and the pandects, etc." Of these juvenile attempts in the symphonic form one at least in G minor was played in public at Schneeberg in 1833. Schumann's love for Clara Wieck was the incentive which led him to persistent work in mastering the science of music and in overcoming his youthful detestation of theory. This earliest of the four symphonies was first performed at Leipzig, Mendelsshon conducting, on March 31, 1841, having been composed but shortly before. A few weeks before he wrote to a friend: "I have now a household of my own and my circumstances are different from what they were. The time since you last heard from me has passed in happiness and work. I wished for you to hear my symphony. How happy I was at the performance! I and others also, for it had such a favorable reception as I think no symphony has had since Beethoven." The title, "Spring Symphony," is Schumann's own. In the volume of letters ("Robert Schumann's Briefe neue Folge," new series, Brestkoff and Haertel, Leipzig) the first mention of it occurs. "Fancy," he says, "a whole symphony and a 'Spring' symphony, too!" Schumann has also put on record the fact that its connection with the bursting season of spring was his original idea; for an inscription on a portrait of himself which follows the first two bars of the symphony reads: "Beginning of a symphony occasioned by a poem of Adolf Bottger's. To the poet, in remembrance, from Robert Schumann, Leipzig, 1842."

"Schumann," writes Wasielanski, "conceived and treated the symphonic form in a peculiar spirit based on the study of masterpieces especially those of Beethoven. The ideas are thoroughly Schumannic; and higher artistic value is placed upon them from the fact that these ideas are expressed in the old established form. They seldom reveal the arbitrary enormities expressed so often in his earlier works."

The symphony for the most part was roughly and carelessly played. The remaining events of the concert included Paderewski's charming performances of the nocturne in G major and waltz in A flat major by Chopin; the two poems for orchestra referred to; op. 22, by MacDowell, and the overture to Wagner's "Meistersinger." The poems by MacDowell will rank with the most interesting specimens of the composer's genius that have yet been heard here. The concert was by far too long, lasting until after ten o'clock.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
MONDAY, JANUARY 30, 1893.

DAILY TRAVELLER, 2 CENTS

The Symphony Concert.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. Mr. Paderewski was the soloist. The programme was as follows: Symphony No. 1, in B flat, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in A minor, Paderewski; Two Poems for Orchestra, No. 1, "Hamlet," No. 2, "Ophelia;" MacDowell; solos for pianoforte, Nocturne and Valse Brilliante, Chopin; Prelude to "The Meistersinger," Wagner.

Of course the great attraction of the evening to most everyone was the appearance of Mr. Paderewski; and it was the announcement that this eminent pianist would play, that long before the day of the concert caused every ticket for sitting or standing room to be disposed of. There is nothing new to be said of the playing of this wonderful artist.

Whatever he does is sure to charm the audience. This occasion was no exception, and he was recalled again and again after the performance of each of his numbers. His concerto, played for the third time in Boston (twice by himself and once by Mrs. Rive-King), is a work that improves upon repeated hearings. The effect of this composition depends upon a happy performance of the orchestral part, which is a dominant feature of the work. On this occasion it was coarsely and noisily played, more particularly the first movement, the impression thereby being given that the work is coarse and crude in its construction, which really is not the case. Its beauties were subjected to the pafois that afflicts our band, hence the unfortunate results.

The novelty of the evening, and to the real musician the most important feature of the programme, was the presentation of Mr. MacDowell's "Two Poems" for orchestra. These compositions are spontaneous and finely orchestrated, showing in every respect the hand of the inspired and competent musician. If the effect produced was disappointing to the listener, it must not be laid at the door of the composer, but to the manner in which the music was performed, a manner at once rough and boisterous, regardless of the indicated expression, and lacking in the necessary contrasts of dynamics. As delineated by the orchesta "Hamlet" seemed armed with a club, and roaring like a lion, strode about thirsting for gore. "Ophelia," however, was more considerately treated, perhaps through some possessed gallantry upon the part of the candnctor. It is to be hoped that we may yet hear these compositions played under better auspices.

The Schumann symphony, the beauties of which are familiar to our audiences through the delightful playing of the orchestra under the baton of Mr. Gericke, was not creditably performed. The wood-wind was untuneful and the brass overblown and rank in quality; even the string band did an amount of undue rasping. At no time has the inability of the tympani player to accurately tune has drums been more distressingly apparent than in the first movement of the Paderewski concerto. A loud rough and hurried performance of the Wagner prelude finished this overlong and unpraiseworthy performance, as far as the orchestra was concerned.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Symphony Concert.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert given in Sanders theatre on Thursday evening, was as follows: Mendelssohn Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Weber Concertstück for piano and orchestra in F minor. Mendelssohn, (a) Scherzo; (b) Notturno, from "Midsummer Night's Dream." Soli for piano. (a) Chopin, Nocturne; (b) Chopin, Scherzo in B flat minor. Schumann, Symphony No. 2 in C major. Miss Minnie Wetzler was the soloist.

These works were all familiar to the public, but abundant in interest and variety. The ever welcome overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" was most effectively given, the "fairy" music being played with great delicacy and finish by the violins. Much interest was centered in the début of Miss Minnie Wetzler, a young pianist not yet out of her teens, who has been a favorite pupil of Madame Clara Schumann for the last seven years. The modest, winning manner of the young artist immediately prepossessed the audience in her favor, and her fine performance of Weber's brilliant concertstück aroused much enthusiasm. In addition to an already large technique, there is a peculiar charm and individuality in her playing, which seems to be the result of a quick intelligence, combined with a rare degree of magnetism. She was especially satisfying in the "Presto," which was given with a youthful exuberance and freshness which completely captured her listeners. Her solos were no less successful. The beautiful Chopin nocturne, too infrequently heard, was played with genuine feeling and sentiment, while the interpretation of the B flat minor Scherzo was a positive surprise. Her beautiful sympathetic tone and devoted absorption in her work bring to light a poetic beauty which many an older and more famous performer has failed to reveal. It would seem as if Madame Schumann's predictions of a brilliant future for her pupil were bound to be verified. Mr. Nikisch again charmed the audience by his beautiful rendering of the remaining Mendelssohn numbers, including the tricksy little Scherzo with its rare opportunities for flute and oboe, and the Notturno, with the horn solo was beautifully played.

The grand triumph and success of the evening, however, was Schumann's C major symphony which is heroic and noble from beginning to end, and in some respects the greatest of Schumann's works. Mr. Nikisch's conception of Schumann is always inspired with the romantic spirit of the composer, and leaves nothing to be desired. The trumpet call in the slow Introduction, with the answering strings, was beautifully done, and the wild, passionate character of the themes in the succeeding allegro were given with an intensity which was worked up to a red-hot frenzy of excitement in the fiery coda, with its crashing chords at the end. The Scherzo is a tumultuous rush for the first violins. The first trio alternates in triplets with the wind and strings. The theme in the second trio is more sedate, and the return to the Scherzo follows almost immediately. The beautiful theme in the Adagio espressivo is started by the first violins, taken up by the flute, oboe and bassoon, and afterwards by the whole orchestra. Soft chords follow by the horns, which are answered still more softly by the wind. Then come fragments of the first theme which is taken up by the violins, and when the summit is reached the violins make a long series of ascending and diminishing trills, against the melody by the oboe, clarinet and horn. The effect is unspeakably beautiful, and it was exquisitely played. The last movement is one of the finest finales ever written. The force of its energy is tremendous throughout, and it closes in a truly martial spirit, amid the "thunder of drums."

The audience recognized the masterly effort of Mr. Nikisch, and warmly applauded him at the conclusion. The next concert will take place on Thursday evening, February 2d.

Cambridge Tribune C. R.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1893.

Paderewski again triumphed gloriously at the Symphony concert last evening, so far as the public was concerned. He was heard in his own concerto, and in Chopin's nocturne op. 37, No. 2, and valse op. 34, No. 1. He was recalled again and again; yet he has been heard in Music Hall to greater advantage. In the concerto he was occasionally guilty of unnecessary pounding, and his performance of the nocturne was artificial in the extreme. The orchestra gave a robust, and, at times untuneful version of Schumann's B flat Symphony.

The other orchestral numbers were MacDowell's orchestral poems "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," and the "Meistersinger" overture. "Hamlet" was played in New York, I believe, in 1887 at a Van der Stucken concert. "Ophelia" has been heard in American towns, and the two pieces were played in Breslau and Weimar. These tone poems are fortunately without a program. There are the names "Hamlet" and "Ophelia": weave your own fancies when you hear the music.

Each hearer must decide whether the "Prince of Denmark" of MacDowell is the same as the creation of his own imagination; but all can agree in this: In MacDowell we have the born musician who finds the best and the fullest expression of thought in music. In his music there is poetry. In these poems are seen passion, grace, melancholy, tenderness, imagination and a rare gift of expressing in exquisite language, pure and noble thought that is at the same time intensely human.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 4, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Among the young American composers, Mr. E. A. MacDowell appears to have the most ideality and the strongest natural apprehension of rich and vital tone-color. He has always something real to say and he wastes no time in preambles. That he is sometimes Emersonian in his forms of expression, as one might say, is not to be denied. He is sometimes too curt, too compact and too concentrated for his purpose to be clearly caught, and when he writes for the voice he is apt to put down passages which would be wonderfully significant if they could be sung—which they cannot be by any but exceptional singers. It is not that his form is unsymmetrical or his language obscure; it is that the basal thought lies so deep as to require delving, and not many listeners are able or willing to delve. There was a time when even bright and well-educated people flew from Emerson and vaguely called his short, detached, nervous sentences "Orphic." Now, in comparison with the complexities of Browning's erratic style, in which parentheses lie within parentheses like the boxes in a Chinese "nest,"—Emerson seems almost rail car reading. So Mr. MacDowell's concentrated diction, wherein a sturdy hint often takes the place of a suave exposition, will be found remunerative reading as people come to hear it oftener and know it better, and his original and positive talent will be encouraged to expand into greater ease and eloquence. His two brief poems, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," were in a certain sense the most important matter upon the thirteenth Symphony programme. Schumann and Wagner were there, we know; but they were represented by works so familiar as the former's first symphony and the latter's "Master Singers" prelude. These compositions were short, put forward with no explanation of their author's purposes in them, and were unconnected except that a principal theme of each appeared as a secondary one in the other. That most of the critics of the press have expressed themselves unable to define anything in the "Hamlet," seems to us as high a compliment as could be paid to the composer—unless we quite mistake his intention. What is the chief characteristic of Hamlet, if not his vacillation? He received great impulses; love, ambition, revenge, scorn, the glory of conquest and the power of sovereignty, all in turn were offered him, and each failed to arouse him to well-considered, well-sustained action. The tardy punishment of guilt to which his hand lent some urgency, was not conceived by him, and his participation in it came only from the chance which dealt him an envenomed wound and made his mother drain a poisoned cup before his eyes. Great prizes were within his reach, and he grasped none. His life was a sequence of beginnings without conclusions, motives without goals, inspirations without expressions. Is not such a nature fitly represented by a slow-moving progression of unfinished phases, in which each has scarcely time enough to outline a promise before it must yield place to another, inconsequent, irrelevant and also early pushed aside? Nor was the other poem less satisfactory to us as illustrative of Shakespeare. Ophelia was a gentle, simple, affectionate, undeveloped creature, without the strength to bear up against the woes of love's despite, a lover's madness and a father's violent death. She fainted and faded into the pensive melancholy of a mind distraught and melted away from the existence whose beauty had exhaled. That sweet, lingering strains, delicate in color and not rigidly fixed in shape, untainted with insanity and not exalted into rhapsody, should typify her, is certainly appropriate, and we found Mr. MacDowell's pages sympathetically suggestive of her character, not in detail, but in essence. The orchestra played these poems well, but it was not at its best in the other numbers which we have mentioned. The symphony was often loud and uneven and the brass instruments were vociferous and vulgar. The prelude had some admirably vital and dramatic episodes, but some of the minor figures were lost in a noisy rush. The soloist was Mr. Paderewski, on whose account the full number of extra tickets was early bought up and who received an immense amount of applause, although his playing was not up to his average in symmetry and abandon. There were splendid passages, particularly in the bravura embroidering which encircles and adorns the orchestral parts of his concerto, which was his principal choice. The concerto, by the way, holds its own well in its class, for it not only offers a virtuoso every opportunity for display, but also treats the orchestra with intelligence and consideration. His solos were from Chopin, of course—a nocturne, opus 37, number 2, and a waltz, opus 34, number 1. These he played rather as if he felt that they were so familiar to his auditors that he need not try to make them bring any new message or take on any new color.

The concert for tonight will be almost entirely a choral one, presenting as novelties Professor Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn," and Mr. Foote's setting of Longfellow's ballad, "The Skeleton in Armor," to which will be added Brahms's "Song of Destiny." A solo quartette is required for Mr. Foote's composition and he accordingly will send his choir, Mrs. Barnard-Smith, Miss Carllsmith, Mr. Parker and Mr. Hay. The only purely instrumental number will be Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, which is put at the head of the programme.

[98]

BOSTON COURIER, S
JANUARY 29, 1893.

PADEREWSKI AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concerts continue their successful course and while varying as regards interest, invariably attract large audiences. The concert last evening had its unusual attraction in the appearance of Ignace Paderewski, the pianist whose rendering of his own concerto in A minor was a treat of the highest order.

By itself considered also the programme was of strong interest, containing as it did the "Spring Symphony" by Schumann and the two new poems by MacDowell; but there are few amateurs indeed who could not be drawn to a concert by such a reputation as Paderewski's and to use a commonplace phrase, limiting it, of course, to the musical elite in this city, "everybody was there" last evening and the greatest interest and enthusiasm prevailed. One does not care to rob the alphabet from A to Z in order to do justice to an artist like Paderewski. Looking in the glare of his qualities as a genius and searching for some point of defect, and then only finding to a limited extent such deficiencies as have been admitted in connection with his pianoforte recitals in this city, such an analysis will afford the pessimist the satisfaction of knowing that the most enthusiastic things a critic can say of Paderewski's performances will scarcely equal the enthusiasm of such as place the spiritual nobility of an artist's effort upon a higher plane than its scholastic or theoretical excellence. As we listened to Paderewski's performance of his concerto in A Minor last evening we were impressed that, possessing the truest, rarest and most charming tokens of his art, Paderewski is in the best sense one of the most interesting and masterly tone-poets that the musical world has known. In his piano-forte concert one finds an epitome of his characteristics as a genius. The whole work displays abundant spirit and concentrates attention between piano-forte and orchestra in about as perfect an ensemble as one would care to hear. That the work of any composer who has not been dead for a score of years or more is the offspring of genius is the last thing in the world that a contemporaneous wise-acre will feel disposed to admit; but it is difficult to understand how there can be a dissentant to the verdict that this A Minor concerto is one of the genuine creations in music. As equally true of the Chopin and Saint Saens concertos, with which works it may not improperly be compared, but very rare traces of borrowed thought can be found in it. It is also a work overflowing with rich musical conceptions, the merit of which was recognized when it was performed here before. Its workmanship alone proclaims that study and learning, combined with a spontaneous regard for the interests of the virtuoso, have guided the pen of its author.

The performance of the work by Paderewski was eminently beautiful and satisfying. In it there was freedom within strictness and, paradoxical though it may seem, strictness within freedom, while throughout both composer and pianist, the two in one, had their say in a perfectly natural and candid manner, and with all the vigor, skill and mastery also of the whole-souled and superbly educated musician.

The symphony given last evening seems to have been the logical outcome of the happiest period of Schumann's life. The obstacles to the composer's marriage with Clara Nieck had been overcome, and he had won high position as a musician and critical authority. Writing to Dorn in 1839, Schumann complains of the pianoforte as "too narrow a field for his thoughts," and he announces his intentions of applying himself to orchestral writing in order to make up for his want of practice. The B flat is the first published creation in his new and large field. Years before when a student at Heidelberg and when he was undecided between the professions of law and music, he wrote to Wieck, his former pianoforte teacher, and future father-in-law: "I detest theory pure and simple as you know, and I have been living very quietly, improvising a good deal, but not playing much from notes. I have begun many a symphony, but finished nothing and every now and then have managed to edge in a Schubert waltz between Roman law and the pandects, etc." Of these juvenile attempts in the symphonic form one at least in G minor was played in public at Schneeberg in 1833. Schumann's love for Clara Wieck was the incentive which led him to persistent work in mastering the science of music and in overcoming his youthful detestation of theory. This earliest of the four symphonies was first performed at Leipzig, Mendelsshon conducting, on March 31, 1841, having been composed but shortly before. A few weeks before he wrote to a friend: "I have now a household of my own and my circumstances are different from what they were. The time since you last heard from me has passed in happiness and work. I wished for you to hear my symphony. How happy I was at the performance! I and others also, for it had such a favorable reception as I think no symphony has had since Beethoven." The title, "Spring Symphony," is Schumann's own. In the volume of letters ("Robert Schumann's Briefe neue Folge," new series, Brestkoff and Haertel, Leipzig) the first mention of it occurs. "Fancy," he says, "a whole symphony and a 'Spring' symphony, too!" Schumann has also put on record the fact that its connection with the bursting season of spring was his original idea; for an inscription on a portrait of himself which follows the first two bars of the symphony reads: "Beginning of a symphony occasioned by a poem of Adolf Bottger's. To the poet, in remembrance, from Robert Schumann, Leipzig, 1842."

"Schumann," writes Wasielanski, "conceived and treated the symphonic form in a peculiar spirit based on the study of masterpieces especially those of Beethoven. The ideas are thoroughly Schumannic; and higher artistic value is placed upon them from the fact that these ideas are expressed in the old established form. They seldom reveal the arbitrary enormities expressed so often in his earlier works."

The symphony for the most part was roughly and carelessly played. The remaining events of the concert included Paderewski's charming performances of the nocturne in G major and waltz in A flat major by Chopin; the two poems for orchestra referred to; op. 22, by MacDowell, and the overture to Wagner's "Meistersinger." The poems by MacDowell will rank with the most interesting specimens of the composer's genius that have yet been heard here. The concert was by far too long, lasting until after ten o'clock.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
MONDAY, JANUARY 30, 1893.

DAILY TRAVELLER, 2 CENTS

The Symphony Concert.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. Mr. Paderewski was the soloist. The programme was as follows: Symphony No. 1, in B flat, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in A minor, Paderewski; Two Poems for Orchestra, No. 1, "Hamlet," No. 2, "Ophelia;" MacDowell; solos for pianoforte, Nocturne and Valse Brilliante, Chopin; Prelude to "The Meistersinger," Wagner.

Of course the great attraction of the evening to most everyone was the appearance of Mr. Paderewski; and it was the announcement that this eminent pianist would play, that long before the day of the concert caused every ticket for sitting or standing room to be disposed of. There is nothing new to be said of the playing of this wonderful artist.

Whatever he does is sure to charm the audience. This occasion was no exception, and he was recalled again and again after the performance of each of his numbers. His concerto, played for the third time in Boston (twice by himself and once by Mrs. Rive-King), is a work that improves upon repeated hearings. The effect of this composition depends upon a happy performance of the orchestral part, which is a dominant feature of the work. On this occasion it was coarsely and noisily played, more particularly the first movement, the impression thereby being given that the work is coarse and crude in its construction, which really is not the case. Its beauties were subjected to the pa'ois that afflicts our band, hence the unfortunate results.

The novelty of the evening, and to the real musician the most important feature of the programme, was the presentation of Mr. MacDowell's "Two Poems" for orchestra. These compositions are spontaneous and finely orchestrated, showing in every respect the hand of the inspired and competent musician. If the effect produced was disappointing to the listener, it must not be laid at the door of the composer, but to the manner in which the music was performed, a manner at once rough and boisterous, regardless of the indicated expression, and lacking in the necessary contrasts of dynamics. As delineated by the orchesta "Hamlet" seemed armed with a club, and roaring like a lion, strode about thirsting for gore. "Ophelia," however, was more considerately treated, perhaps through some possessed gallantry upon the part of the canductor. It is to be hoped that we may yet hear these compositions played under better auspices.

The Schumann symphony, the beauties of which are familiar to our audiences through the delightful playing of the orchestra under the baton of Mr. Gericke, was not creditably performed. The wood-wind was untuneful and the brass overblown and rank in quality; even the string band did an amount of undue rasping. At no time has the inability of the tympani player to accurately tune has drums been more distressingly apparent than in the first movement of the Paderewski concerto. A loud rough and hurried performance of the Wagner prelude finished this overlong and unpraiseworthy performance, as far as the orchestra was concerned.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Symphony Concert.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert given in Sanders theatre on Thursday evening, was as follows: Mendelssohn Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Weber Concertstück for piano and orchestra in F minor. Mendelssohn, (a) Scherzo; (b) Notturno, from "Midsummer Night's Dream." Soli for piano. (a) Chopin, Nocturne; (b) Chopin, Scherzo in B flat minor. Schumann, Symphony No. 2 in C major. Miss Minnie Wetzler was the soloist.

These works were all familiar to the public, but abundant in interest and variety. The ever welcome overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" was most effectively given, the "fairy" music being played with great delicacy and finish by the violins. Much interest was centered in the début of Miss Minnie Wetzler, a young pianist not yet out of her teens, who has been a favorite pupil of Madame Clara Schumann for the last seven years. The modest, winning manner of the young artist immediately prepossessed the audience in her favor, and her fine performance of Weber's brilliant concertstück aroused much enthusiasm. In addition to an already large technique, there is a peculiar charm and individuality in her playing, which seems to be the result of a quick intelligence, combined with a rare degree of magnetism. She was especially satisfying in the "Presto," which was given with a youthful exuberance and freshness which completely captured her listeners. Her solos were no less successful. The beautiful Chopin nocturne, too infrequently heard, was played with genuine feeling and sentiment, while the interpretation of the B flat minor Scherzo was a positive surprise. Her beautiful sympathetic tone and devoted absorption in her work bring to light a poetic beauty which many an older and more famous performer has failed to reveal. It would seem as if Madame Schumann's predictions of a brilliant future for her pupil were bound to be verified. Mr. Nikisch again charmed the audience by his beautiful rendering of the remaining Mendelssohn numbers, including the tricksy little Scherzo with its rare opportunities for flute and oboe, and the Notturno, with the horn solo was beautifully played.

The grand triumph and success of the evening, however, was Schumann's C major symphony which is heroic and noble from beginning to end, and in some respects the greatest of Schumann's works. Mr. Nikisch's conception of Schumann is always inspired with the romantic spirit of the composer, and leaves nothing to be desired. The trumpet call in the slow Introduction, with the answering strings, was beautifully done, and the wild, passionate character of the themes in the succeeding allegro were given with an intensity which was worked up to a red-hot frenzy of excitement in the fiery coda, with its crashing chords at the end. The Scherzo is a tumultuous rush for the first violins. The first trio alternates in triplets with the wind and strings. The theme in the second trio is more sedate, and the return to the Scherzo follows almost immediately. The beautiful theme in the Adagio espressivo is started by the first violins, taken up by the flute, oboe and bassoon, and afterwards by the whole orchestra. Soft chords follow by the horns, which are answered still more softly by the wind. Then come fragments of the first theme which is taken up by the violins, and when the summit is reached the violins make a long series of ascending and diminishing trills, against the melody by the oboe, clarinet and horn. The effect is unspeakably beautiful, and it was exquisitely played. The last movement is one of the finest finales ever written. The force of its energy is tremendous throughout, and it closes in a truly martial spirit, amid the "thunder of drums."

The audience recognized the masterly effort of Mr. Nikisch, and warmly applauded him at the conclusion. The next concert will take place on Thursday evening, February 2d.

Cambridge Tribune C. R.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1893.

Paderewski again triumphed gloriously at the Symphony concert last evening, so far as the public was concerned. He was heard in his own concerto, and in Chopin's nocturne op. 37, No. 2, and valse op. 34, No. 1. He was recalled again and again; yet he has been heard in Music Hall to greater advantage. In the concerto he was occasionally guilty of unnecessary pounding, and his performance of the nocturne was artificial in the extreme. The orchestra gave a robust, and, at times untuneful version of Schumann's B flat Symphony.

The other orchestral numbers were MacDowell's orchestral poems "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," and the "Meistersinger" overture. "Hamlet" was played in New York, I believe, in 1887 at a Van der Stucken concert. "Ophelia" has been heard in American towns, and the two pieces were played in Breslau and Weimar. These tone poems are fortunately without a program. There are the names "Hamlet" and "Ophelia": weave your own fancies when you hear the music.

Each hearer must decide whether the "Prince of Denmark" of MacDowell is the same as the creation of his own imagination; but all can agree in this: In MacDowell we have the born musician who finds the best and the fullest expression of thought in music. In his music there is poetry. In these poems are seen passion, grace, melancholy, tenderness, imagination and a rare gift of expressing in exquisite language, pure and noble thought that is at the same time intensely human.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 4, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Among the young American composers, Mr. E. A. MacDowell appears to have the most ideality and the strongest natural apprehension of rich and vital tone-color. He has always something real to say and he wastes no time in preambles. That he is sometimes Emersonian in his forms of expression, as one might say, is not to be denied. He is sometimes too curt, too compact and too concentrated for his purpose to be clearly caught, and when he writes for the voice he is apt to put down passages which would be wonderfully significant if they could be sung—which they cannot be by any but exceptional singers. It is not that his form is unsymmetrical or his language obscure; it is that the basal thought lies so deep as to require delving, and not many listeners are able or willing to delve. There was a time when even bright and well-educated people flew from Emerson and vaguely called his short, detached, nervous sentences "Orphic." Now, in comparison with the complexities of Browning's erratic style, in which parentheses lie within parentheses like the boxes in a Chinese "nest,"—Emerson seems almost rail car reading. So Mr. MacDowell's concentrated diction, wherein a sturdy hint often takes the place of a suave exposition, will be found remunerative reading as people come to hear it oftener and know it better, and his original and positive talent will be encouraged to expand into greater ease and eloquence. His two brief poems, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," were in a certain sense the most important matter upon the thirteenth Symphony programme. Schumann and Wagner were there, we know; but they were represented by works so familiar as the former's first symphony and the latter's "Master Singers" prelude. These compositions were short, put forward with no explanation of their author's purposes in them, and were unconnected except that a principal theme of each appeared as a secondary one in the other. That most of the critics of the press have expressed themselves unable to define anything in the "Hamlet," seems to us as high a compliment as could be paid to the composer—unless we quite mistake his intention. What is the chief characteristic of Hamlet, if not his vacillation? He received great impulses; love, ambition, revenge, scorn, the glory of conquest and the power of sovereignty, all in turn were offered him, and each failed to arouse him to well-considered, well-sustained action. The tardy punishment of guilt to which his hand lent some urgency, was not conceived by him, and his participation in it came only from the chance which dealt him an envenomed wound and made his mother drain a poisoned cup before his eyes. Great prizes were within his reach, and he grasped none. His life was a sequence of beginnings without conclusions, motives without goals, inspirations without expressions. Is not such a nature fitly represented by a slow-moving progression of unfinished phases, in which each has scarcely time enough to outline a promise before it must yield place to another, inconsequent, irrelevant and also early pushed aside? Nor was the other poem less satisfactory to us as illustrative of Shakespeare. Ophelia was a gentle, simple, affectionate, undeveloped creature, without the strength to bear up against the woes of love's despite, a lover's madness and a father's violent death. She fainted and faded into the pensive melancholy of a mind distraught and melted away from the existence whose beauty had exhaled. That sweet, lingering strains, delicate in color and not rigidly fixed in shape, untainted with insanity and not exalted into rhapsody, should typify her, is certainly appropriate, and we found Mr. MacDowell's pages sympathetically suggestive of her character, not in detail, but in essence. The orchestra played these poems well, but it was not at its best in the other numbers which we have mentioned. The symphony was often loud and uneven and the brass instruments were vociferous and vulgar. The prelude had some admirably vital and dramatic episodes, but some of the minor figures were lost in a noisy rush. The soloist was Mr. Paderewski, on whose account the full number of extra tickets was early bought up and who received an immense amount of applause, although his playing was not up to his average in symmetry and abandon. There were splendid passages, particularly in the bravura embroidering which encircles and adorns the orchestral parts of his concerto, which was his principal choice. The concerto, by the way, holds its own well in its class, for it not only offers a virtuoso every opportunity for display, but also treats the orchestra with intelligence and consideration. His solos were from Chopin, of course—a nocturne, opus 37, number 2, and a waltz, opus 34, number 1. These he played rather as if he felt that they were so familiar to his auditors that he need not try to make them bring any new message or take on any new color.

The concert for tonight will be almost entirely a choral one, presenting as novelties Professor Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn," and Mr. Foote's setting of Longfellow's ballad, "The Skeleton in Armor," to which will be added Brahms's "Song of Destiny." A solo quartette is required for Mr. Foote's composition and he accordingly will send his choir, Mrs. Barnard-Smith, Miss Carllsmith, Mr. Parker and Mr. Hay. The only purely instrumental number will be Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, which is put at the head of the programme.

[98]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93.
I. Allegro vivace e con brio. F major.
II. Allegretto scherzando. B-flat major.
III. Tempo di menuetto. F major.
Trio: same tempo. F major.
IV. Allegro vivace. F major.

NICODÉ. "FATA MORGANA," for SOPRANO and ORCHESTRA, from Symphonic Poem, "The Sea."

BIZET. SUITE. L'Arlesienne." No. 1.
I. Prelude: Allegro deciso (tempo di Marcia). C minor.
II. Menuetto: Allegro giocoso. C minor.
III. Adagietto: Adagio. F major.
IV. Carillon: Allegretto moderato. C major.

SONGS with PIANO.
a) BUSONI. SPRING SONG.
b) RICHARD STRAUSS. SERENADE.
c) BRAHMS. MÄDCHENLIED.

HANDEL. LARGO.

WAGNER. OVERTURE. "Flying Dutchman."

SOLOIST:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Chickering Hall - - - - New York

The Kneisel Quartet

of Boston

Franz Kneisel, 1st Violin — L. Svecenski, Viola
Otto Roth, 2d Violin — Alwin Schroeder, Violoncello

Third Concert - -
Saturday Afternoon, February 11
at 3 o'clock - - -

Programme.

DVORAK . . . . Quartet in E major, Op. 80
Allegro.
Andante con moto.
Allegro scherzando.
Finale (Allegro con brio).

BEETHOVEN . . . Quartet in G major, Op. 18
Allegro.
Adagio cantabile.
Allegro.
Allegro molto quasi presto.

BRAHMS . . . . Quintet for Clarinet, 2 Violins, Viola, and 'Cello, B minor, Op. 115
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio.
III. Andantino — Presto ma non troppo e con sentimento.
IV. Con moto.

(Clarinet: Mr. GOLDSCHMIDT.)

Tickets at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, and at . . . Chickering Hall . . .

Geo. H. Ellis, Printer.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

12th SEASON, 1892-93.

February Itinerary.

Leave Boston Monday, February 6, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Baltimore, Union Depot Pennsylvania R. R. Tuesday, February 7, at 9.37 A.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 8.50 A.M. Wednesday, February 8.
Arrive Philadelphia, 11.10 A.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, February 9, 8.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 10.55 A.M.
—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, February 10, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, February 11, at 8.15 P.M.
Leave New York Saturday, February 11, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, February 12, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, February 4, 1893.

[99]

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,
Tuesday Evening, February 7, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music St

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93.
I. Allegro vivace e con brio. F major.
II. Allegretto scherzando. B flat major.
III. Tempo di menuetto. F major.
Trio: same tempo. F major.
IV. Allegro vivace. F major.

NICODÉ. "FATA MORGANA," for SOPRANO and ORCHESTRA, from Symphonic Poem, "The Sea."

BIZET. SUITE. L'Arlesienne." No. 1.
I. Prelude: Allegro deciso (tempo di Marcia) C minor.
II. Menuetto: Allegro giocoso. C minor.
III. Adagietto: Adagio. F major.
IV. Carillon: Allegretto moderato. C major

SONGS with PIANO.
a) BUSONI. SPRING SONG.
b) RICHARD STRAUSS. SERENADE.
c) BRAHMS. MÄDCHENLIED.

HANDEL. LARGO.

WAGNER. OVERTURE. "Flying Dutchman."

SOLOIST:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

12th SEASON, 1892-93.

February Itinerary.

Leave Boston Monday, February 6, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Baltimore, Union Depot Pennsylvania R. R. Tuesday, February 7, at 9.37 A.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 8.50 A.M. Wednesday, February 8.
Arrive Philadelphia, 11.10 A.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, February 9, 8.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 10.55 A.M.
—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, February 10, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, February 11, at 8.15 P.M.
Leave New York Saturday, February 11, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, February 12, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, February 4, 1893.

[99]

Chickering Hall - - - - New York

The Kneisel Quartet

of Boston

Franz Kneisel, 1st Violin — L. Svecenski, Viola
Otto Roth, 2d Violin — Alwin Schroeder, Violoncello

Third Concert - -
Saturday Afternoon, February 11
at 3 o'clock - - -

Programme.

DVORAK . . . . Quartet in E major, Op. 80
Allegro.
Andante con moto.
Allegro scherzando.
Finale (Allegro con brio).

BEETHOVEN . . . Quartet in G major, Op. 18
Allegro.
Adagio cantabile.
Allegro.
Allegro molto quasi presto.

BRAHMS . . . . Quintet for Clarinet, 2 Violins, Viola, and 'Cello, B minor, Op. 115
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio.
III. Andantino — Presto ma non troppo e con sentimento.
IV. Con moto.

(Clarinet: Mr. GOLDSCHMIDT.)

Tickets at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, and at . . . Chickering Hall . . .

Geo. H. Ellis, Printer.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,
Tuesday Evening, February 7, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music St

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA,

Wednesday Evening, February 8, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut St.

CHICKERING HALL, ... NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, February 9, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

4

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Feb. 10, at 3. Saturday Evening, Feb. 11, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

PROGRAMME

FRIDAY EVENING, FEB. 10, 1893 6

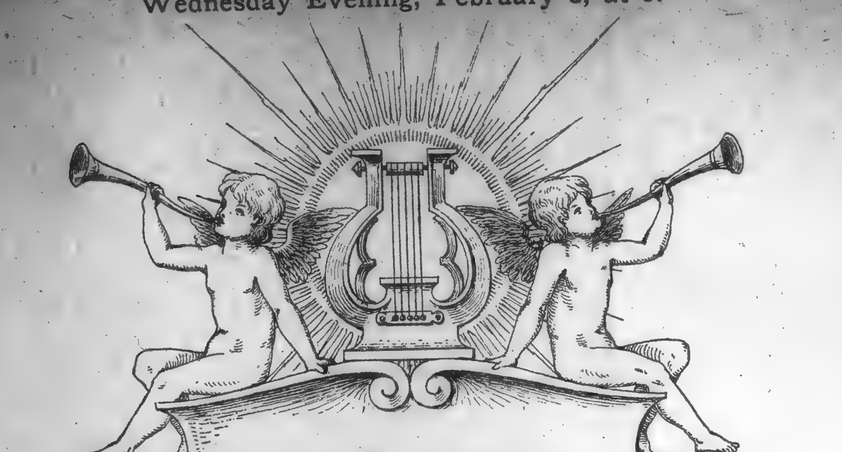
229 MADISON AVENUE

[100]

-COVER ONLY-
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA,

Wednesday Evening, February 8, at 8.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

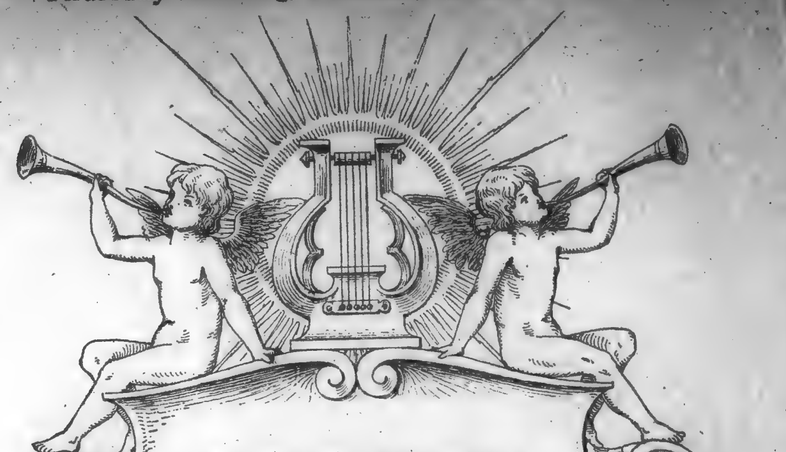
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut St.

CHICKERING HALL, ... NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, February 9, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

4

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Feb. 10, at 3. Saturday Evening, Feb. 11, at 8.15

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street. . .

PROGRAMME

FRIDAY EVENING, DEC. 19, 1893

220 MADISON AVENUE

[100]

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA,
Wednesday Evening, February 8, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut St.

CHICKERING HALL, ... NEW YORK,
Thursday Evening, February 9, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

4

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,
Friday Afternoon, Feb. 10, at 3. Saturday Evening, Feb. 11, at 8.15

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH

AND

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

: : PROGRAMME : :

I. Meyerbeer . CORONATION MARCH, from "Le Prophète"

II. Nicolai . . . OVERTURE, "Merry Wives of Windsor"

III. Haendel . . . . . LARGO
Solo Violin, Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

IV. Saint-Saëns . SYMPHONIC POEM, "Le Rouet d'Omphale"

V. SOLI FOR VIOLONCELLO.
a. Chopin . . . . . NOCTURNE
b. Schubert . . . . MOMENT MUSICAL
c. Cossman . . . . . TARANTELLE
Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

VI. Wagner, INTRODUCTION TO ACT III., Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Mastersingers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger"

VII. Délibes . . . . . BALLET SUITE, "Sylvia"
PRELUDE. "LES CHASSERESSES"
INTERMEZZO AND VALSE LENTE
PIZZICATO POLKA
CORTEGE DE BACCHUS

[100]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 5, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

The concert in Music Hall, last evening, was for the most part given by the Boston Symphony Chorus, the only orchestral performance, strictly speaking, being that of the overture to "Coriolan," in C minor, opus 62, Ludwig van Beethoven. As Beethoven was well acquainted with the master works of Plutarch and Shakespeare, it may at first thought seem strange that he should have gone out of his way to make his overture serve as a prelude to the five-act tragedy by Collin on the subject of the famous Roman. Collin and Beethoven, however, were personal friends, and the overture was written at a time (1807) when the former was secretary to the war department of the Austrian Government. In this same year Beethoven also wrote the Ramoumoffsky quartettes, the pianoforte concerto in G; and the C minor symphony was also near at hand. Richard Wagner identifies the overture with the scene between Coriolanus, his mother and his wife on the battle-field before the gates of his native city, when the chieftain yielding to feminine entreaties, refused to assault the place and thereupon suffered death at the hands of Volcian Attius, his associate in the enterprise. Reichardt, however, has said that it is a better representation of Beethoven himself than of the Roman, whose name it bears, and it is also the opinion of the same authority that both in the overture and the "Heroic" symphony, Beethoven was unconsciously painting his own portrait. The heroic elements of the work with all the intense energy and fever-heat in attendance upon them were oddly enough sterilized and rendered ineffective in the interpretation by Mr. Nikisch.

Following the overture was Mr. Arthur Foote's ballad for chorus, quartet and orchestra, opus 28. The composer himself conducted, and the select quartet for the performance consisted of Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay. Making due allowances for a single hearing of Mr. Foote's work its psychical relation to the words of Longfellow is not wholly clear, and it would appear to have been more scholastically throughout than deeply felt. That the work is the production of a highly cultivated musician is as apparent as need be, but a certain monotony is engendered possibly by the composer's over anxiety to do justice to the spirit of the words at a consequent sacrifice of an adequate amount of spontaneity. The ballad, it is true, was somewhat inanimately sung by the chorus, but the select quartet for the performance was all that could have been wished. The Song of Destiny by Brahms, and the admirable Columbus March and Hymn, by John Knowles Paine were delightfully given. At the next concert Mr. George M. Nowell will appear as soloist with the pianoforte concerto in G minor, by Saint-Saens.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Samstag, 4. Februar 1893.

Das Vierte Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch findet unter Mitwirkung der Pianistin Miß Minnie Wetzler am Mittwoch Abend in der Academy of Music statt.

Außer Schumanns zweiter Symphonie bietet das Programm Webers Konzertstück für Piano, den Mephisto - Walzer von Liszt, Hymne an die heilige Cecilie von Gounod, eine weitere Piano-Nummer und Vorspiel zu "Die Meistersinger".

Tickets sind in No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

Philadelphia Abend-Post

Freitag, 3. Februar 1893.

Das Kneisel Quartett wird am nächsten Montag Nachmittag in dem New Century Drawing Room sein erstes Konzert geben. Diese Organisation hat bereits während mehrerer Saisons in Boston eine wichtige Rolle gespielt. Herr Kneisel ist als Violinist ersten Ranges bekannt und sein Name genügt, um dem Quartett im Voraus auch hier Freunde zu sichern. Die andern Mitglieder sind nicht minder bedeutend.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1893.

THE SYNPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Coriolan." Opus 62.
Foote: "The Skeleton in Armor." Ballad for chorus, quartet and orchestra. Opus 28.
Brahms: "A Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra. Opus 54.
Paine: "Columbus." March and hymn, for chorus and orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Chorus assisted, and Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay sang the solo parts.

These concerts in which a chorus sits round the orchestra are not the ones in which the orchestra sounds best. After three or four experiments, one is even in doubt whether they pay musically. The idea of having a chorus regularly associated with a symphony orchestra is by no means new; in certain conditions it is an excellent one. Take, for instance, the Conservatoire concerts in Paris; at these concerts a chorus always takes part. But the chorus is a small one, of professional trained singers, who are paid for their work, and who can consequently be employed without any regard for their own pleasure, but simply for the good of the concerts. Thus the chorus can be called into play whenever, and as often as, it is wanted. As a rule, there are one or two choral number at a concert; not more; and it should be remembered that the programmes are considerably longer than ours. The chorus is not grouped round the orchestra, as with us, but is massed together just in front of the orchestra; the singers invariably sing sitting. The orchestra is drawn up behind them on a permanent raised platform, the general form of which is that of an amphitheatre; it has the wall of the hall, or what other sound-reflecting surface there may be, immediately behind it. As the orchestra is thus raised above the singer, it plays over their heads, straight at the audience; the chorus being numerically small, it absorbs exceedingly little, if any, of the orchestral tone. The purely orchestral pieces make their full effect while, in the choral numbers, the chorus, singing directly into the audience from the front of the platform, tells "for all it is worth." These are perhaps ideal conditions for symphony concerts interspersed with choral selections.

But it is difficult to see how these conditions can be made to exist here in Boston. Our chorus singers are almost without exception amateurs; their voices, as a rule, are neither so strong nor so telling as those of trained professionals, and to get an effective chorus you must have more of them. This encumbers the platform. As amateurs, they all regular avocations, which they must give up to attend rehearsals and performances; they sing mainly for their own enjoyment or from good will toward the concerts, and cannot be worked as paid professionals can. To get them together is no slight task, and it is no mean effort on their part to go through the work of rehearsals and concert. Thus it is not rationally worth while to form and rehearse a chorus unless you get a good deal of singing out of it. To take all these pains for the sake of one choral number on a programme is out of all due proportion between effort and result. It is especially unwise, as the mere presence of the chorus on the platform injures the effect of all the orchestral numbers; and to ask volunteer singers to sing in one number, and wait in the green-room until their turn comes, thus preventing their hearing the rest of the concert, is not the part of common courtesy. The chorus can be made musically worth while only by giving it the lion's share of the programme; and this turns the whole thing from a symphony concert into a choral concert.

Now it is hard to see what sufficient reason there is for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's giving choral concerts; this field has been amply worked in Boston for the last ever so many years; we have already all the choral concerts we know what to do with. In this respect we are better off than they are in Paris, where, with the exception of the Société des Grandes Auditions Chorales (which gives fewer concerts a year than our Handel and Haydn does), the Conservatoire is about the only regular organization that gives choral performances. And Paris has three independent symphony orchestras that give their concerts invariably on the same afternoon! To have a choral an nex, to add variety to what are mainly orchestral concerts—just as solo singers or players do—is a very different matter from giving essentially choral concerts. And we have shown why it is not easily practicable to have a chorus to do nothing more than add the desirable variety to symphony concerts in his city. The game is not worth the candle. And, in so far as choral concerts, properly so called, are concerned, that sort of thing is so done, and so well done, by other societies that there is no need of the Symphony Orchestra's putting its finger into the pie.

Last Saturday evening the "Coriolan" overture, evidently well played, made next to no effect at all: the tone of the orchestra was so damped and muffled by the surrounding ranks of chorus singers.

Mr. Foote's "Skeleton in Armor" (conducted by himself) is a work to be spoken of both with respect and admiration. Mr. Foote's affection for Longfellow's ballads is apparently unquenchable; so, in spite of our conviction that they are not the best material in the world for extended musical setting, we will say no more on this head. Let us say at once, however, that in this last work of his Mr. Foote seems to us to have been far more successful in catching and holding fast by the true ballad tone than in any of his previous attempts. That he has completely solved the problem—as Carl Lowe did in his ballads for a single voice—can hardly be said; in this "Skeleton in Armor" the absence of distinctly dramatic style results in certain instances in a corresponding loss of dramatic effect, notably in places where the suggestions of the text are essentially dramatic. He has not quite caught the art of dramatic coloring without doing violence to the even, lyrical flow of the ballad style. But he has come much nearer to it than ever before, and has at the same time preserved the ballad style in far greater purity. Instances of the musical rhythm running disturbingly counter to the poetic metre are quite exceptional here, whereas in his "Hiawatha" and "Wreck of the Hesperus" they were far more frequent, and also far more striking. The whole "Skeleton in Armor," in spite of its rhythmic variety and frequent shifting of keys, impresses one as springing from one inspiration, and being cast in a single [illegible] performance was capital, the quartet of solo voices doing extremely good work. It was very enthusiastically received, the composer being repeatedly called out after it. Mr. Foote has scored one more success.

Brahm's "Song of Destiny" is a work of infinite beauty, but somehow it seemed singularly ineffective last Saturday evening. The orchestra sounded dull and muffled as it did in the "Coriolan" overture, and the chorus, although apparently singing well enough, was not impressive.

Columbus does not seem to have brought great luck to American composers. Dudley Buck once wrote an overture on him that proved to be one of his weakest works, and we mistake much if the "Columbus" march and hymn keeps a very high place in the list of Mr. Paine's compositions. It is a gorgeously instrumentep, pompous march, terminating in broad three-two time sung by the chorus. But the work does not strike one at the first hearing as of finer quality than occasional compositions in general are. Mr. Paine has done far better things.

The next programme (for Friday afternoon, Feb. 17, and Saturday evening, Feb. 18) is: Thériot; sinfonietta in E major, opus 55; Saint-Caëns, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 22; Beethoven, symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92. Mr. George M. Norwell will be the pianist. There will be no rehearsal nor concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 5.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was largely attended. The programme was, with the exception of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture, devoted wholly to vocal works, Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carolsmith, Mr. George J. Parker, Mr. Clarence Hay, and the Boston Symphony Chorus, assisting. The works presented were Mr. Arthur Foote's setting of "The Skeleton in Armor," for quartet, chorus, and orchestra, which was given for the first time; Brahms's "Song of Destiny," and Mr. Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn" for chorus and orchestra. The choral body did not prove large enough to produce the desired effect; it, in fact, is too small for the purpose for which it was formed and is lopsided in respect to balance of voices. There are not enough tenors and basses, and the volume of tone is lacking in necessary fulness. The chorus singing was none of the best. We have become so accustomed to the almost perfect work of our prominent singing societies that we are scarcely prepared to derive pleasure, enjoyment or satisfaction from such unsteady, colorless and unfinished singing as that which the Boston Symphony chorus vouchsafed last night. It was not worthy the orchestra whose name it shares. If the body cannot be enlarged to the proper size, and if better results than were achieved on this occasion cannot be obtained, it would be wise to omit the performance of important choral works from the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thus far the chorus has not acquitted itself in a manner to justify the expectations that were aroused when its formation was first announced. Mr. Foote's cantata, which was conducted by the composer, was very disappointing. It shows but little invention, is without any marked contrasts, and is dull and monotonous generally. The orchestration is frequently tasteful, but on the whole sounds thin and ineffective. The work is strangely barren of climaxes. There is a constant reaching but for them but they are never achieved. The music is well made but it has the fatality to be uninteresting. Its melodies are labored and dry, and have no distinguishing individuality. In other words, it is deliberate, almost perfunctory, music, suggesting neither spontaneity nor inspiration. Though in nowise plagiaristic, yet it nowhere gives the impression of originality. Often it recalls the conventional church anthem, and often it is cloudy in both the orchestral and vocal writing. Its best moments are to be found in the two quartets, but even here there is nothing that rises above the purely conventional. Throughout there is an apparent struggle for something that the composer constantly fails to attain. In fact, its effect is that of industriously and carefully manufactured music. Mr. Foote has proved himself capable of far better work. Of the performance there is not much to be said. It was uneven and steadily barren of light and shade. Sometimes the chorus obliterated the orchestra, and often the orchestra blotted out the chorus, while a lack of emphasis and rhythmical swing generally, characterized the rendering as a whole. It was listened to with great attention, and at its end Mr. Foote was recalled three times with great enthusiasm. The Brahms chorus is not the most inspiriting of works, but its clearness and its positiveness caused it to seem like a burst of musical sunshine after what had preceded it. The singing was not of the most tuneful and was monotonously dry, but the graceful orchestral prelude was beautifully played. We regret that Mr. Paine's march an hymn were not heard under more favorable circumstances. Here the richness and the fullness of the orchestration overwhelmed the small chorus. The work was written for an immense hall and the massive scoring was intended to be offset by five thousand voices. The small body of singers that sang on this occasion was therefore scarcely calculated to produce the effect intended by the composer. The introduction is impressively stirring, with its brilliant trumpet fanfares. The march is broad and flowing in its melodious themes and it moves with fine and imposing stateliness to a stirring climax as it breaks into the large and simple hymn. The composer's thorough knowledge of instrumental effect and of the full resources of the modern orchestra are displayed in a masterly manner throughout. At its conclusion the work was applauded with great enthusiasm. Still, as it was impossible to do it justice under prevailing conditions, it was a mistake to perform it. The programme for the next concert is: Symphonietta, by Thieriot (first time); Concerto for pianoforte, in G minor, Saint-Saëns; Symphony, No. 7, Beethoven. The soloist is to be Mr. Busoni? No! Mr. Perabo? No! Mr. Baermann? No! Mr. George M. Nowell!

— On Wednesday evening, there was a private rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra and chorus at Music Hall before a select and musical audience. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Chadwick, Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mrs. Fiske-Warren, Mrs. Richard Warren, Miss Hecht, the Misses May-Winsor, Miss Elise Richards, Miss Macnamara, Mr. Otis, Mr. Arthur Pickering, Mr. E. L. Clark and Mr. Albin Reed.

— Mr. Henry Higginson gave a small musical party on Wednesday night.

FEBRUARY 5, 18[illegible]

There was no little pother at Mr. Harry Le Grand Cannon's last musicale over the alleged unkindly and discourteous treatment of Mr. Nikisch and his men, and so much secresy was observed and the plaints of the band were so loud and continuous that people fancied that something very dreadful had occurred, says Town Topics. I am now advised that the whole trouble arose out of the musicians being asked to proceed to their quarters by a special stairway, and out of their overcoats being kept apart from the integuments of the guests. I am at a loss to see why these arrangements should have been viewed as insulting to the dignity of the performers. Mr. Nikisch and his men were on the occasion under notice, mere hirelings; and while any act that might have rubbed the fact, publicly, into their minds, would have been reprehensible, I cannot see why they should have been treated as guests any more than were the caterer or the decorator. The truth of the matter is that Mr. Nikisch and his associates are being spoiled by success and eulogy, and if this sort of thing goes on, there is danger that would-be purchasers of seats at future concerts will be asked for references. The sooner a stop is put to nonsense of this kind the better. When Mr. Nikisch accepts Mr. Cannon's money in exchange for his music, he places himself exactly on the same plane as Mr. Lander and Mr. Bernstein, who, I am sure, have never bothered their heads as to the resting place of their outer garments, so long as they found them after the evening's work was done. I hope Mr. Cannon will not recede from his position, one fully warranted by circumstances and, spite of what may be hinted at, by European precedent, if we must look abroad for rules that common sense should frame the world over.

SATURDAY EVENING

SPECTATOR

An Independent Social, Literary and Family Newspaper.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

FEBRUARY 4.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra open the concert season at the World's Fair with performances on May 15 and 16. There is a possibility of this famous organization appearing here in concert before the summer.

A strong effort is being made to secure the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert in this city before the close of the present season. The present arrangement is for the orchestra to close its season at the World's Fair, Chicago, about the middle of May.

[101]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 5, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

The concert in Music Hall, last evening, was for the most part given by the Boston Symphony Chorus, the only orchestral performance, strictly speaking, being that of the overture to "Coriolan," in C minor, opus 62, Ludwig van Beethoven. As Beethoven was well acquainted with the master works of Plutarch and Shakespeare, it may at first thought seem strange that he should have gone out of his way to make his overture serve as a prelude to the five-act tragedy by Collin on the subject of the famous Roman. Collin and Beethoven, however, were personal friends, and the overture was written at a time (1807) when the former was secretary to the war department of the Austrian Government. In this same year Beethoven also wrote the Ramoumoffsky quartettes, the pianoforte concerto in G; and the C minor symphony was also near at hand. Richard Wagner identifies the overture with the scene between Coriolanus, his mother and his wife on the battle-field before the gates of his native city, when the chieftain yielding to feminine entreaties, refused to assault the place and thereupon suffered death at the hands of Volcian Attius, his associate in the enterprise. Reichardt, however, has said that it is a better representation of Beethoven himself than of the Roman, whose name it bears, and it is also the opinion of the same authority that both in the overture and the "Heroic" symphony, Beethoven was unconsciously painting his own portrait. The heroic elements of the work with all the intense energy and fever-heat in attendance upon them were oddly enough sterilized and rendered ineffective in the interpretation by Mr. Nikisch.

Following the overture was Mr. Arthur Foote's ballad for chorus, quartet and orchestra, opus 28. The composer himself conducted, and the select quartet for the performance consisted of Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay. Making due allowances for a single hearing of Mr. Foote's work its psychical relation to the words of Longfellow is not wholly clear, and it would appear to have been more scholastically throughout than deeply felt. That the work is the production of a highly cultivated musician is as apparent as need be, but a certain monotony is engendered possibly by the composer's over anxiety to do justice to the spirit of the words at a consequent sacrifice of an adequate amount of spontaneity. The ballad, it is true, was somewhat inanimately sung by the chorus, but the select quartet for the performance was all that could have been wished. The Song of Destiny by Brahms, and the admirable Columbus March and Hymn, by John Knowles Paine were delightfully given. At the next concert Mr. George M. Nowell will appear as soloist with the pianoforte concerto in G minor, by Saint-Saens.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Samstag, 4. Februar 1893.

Das Vierte Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch findet unter Mitwirkung der Pianistin Miß Minnie Wegler am Mittwoch Abend in der Academy of Music statt.

Außer Schumanns zweiter Symphonie bietet das Programm Webers Konzertstück für Piano, den Mephisto - Walzer von Liszt, Hymne an die heilige Cecilie von Gounod, eine weitere Piano-Nummer und Vorspiel zu „Die Meistersinger".

Tickets sind in No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

Philadelphia Abend-Post

Freitag, 3. Februar 1893.

Das Kneisel Quartett wird am nächsten Montag Nachmittag in dem New Century Drawing Room sein erstes Konzert geben. Diese Organisation hat bereits während mehrerer Saisons in Boston eine wichtige Rolle gespielt. Herr Kneisel ist als Violinist ersten Ranges bekannt und sein Name genügt, um dem Quartett im Voraus auch hier Freunde zu sichern. Die andern Mitglieder sind nicht minder bedeutend.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1893.

THE SYNPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Coriolan." Opus 62.
Foote: "The Skeleton in Armor." Ballad for chorus, quartet and orchestra. Opus 28.
Brahms: "A Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra. Opus 54.
Paine: "Columbus." March and hymn, for chorus and orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Chorus assisted, and Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay sang the sole parts.

These concerts in which a chorus sits round the orchestra are not the ones in which the orchestra sounds best. After three or four experiments, one is even in doubt whether they pay musically. The idea of having a chorus regularly associated with a symphony orchestra is by no means new; in certain conditions it is an excellent one. Take, for instance, the Conservatoire concerts in Paris; at these concerts a chorus always takes part. But the chorus is a small one, of professional trained singers, who are paid for their work, and who can consequently be employed without any regard for their own pleasure, but simply for the good of the concerts. Thus the chorus can be called into play whenever, and as often as, it is wanted. As a rule, there are one or two choral number at a concert; not more; and it should be remembered that the programmes are considerably longer than ours. The chorus is not grouped round the orchestra, as with us, but is massed together just in front of the orchestra; the singers invariably sing sitting. The orchestra is drawn up behind them on a permanent raised platform, the general form of which is that of an amphitheatre; it has the wall of the hall, or what other sound-reflecting surface there may be, immediately behind it. As the orchestra is thus raised above the singer, it plays over their heads, straight at the audience; the chorus being numerically small, it absorbs exceedingly little, if any, of the orchestral tone. The purely orchestral pieces make their full effect while, in the choral numbers, the chorus, singing directly into the audience from the front of the platform, tells "for all it is worth." These are perhaps ideal conditions for symphony concerts interspersed with choral selections.

But it is difficult to see how these conditions can be made to exist here in Boston. Our chorus singers are almost without exception amateurs; their voices, as a rule, are neither so strong nor so telling as those of trained professionals, and to get an effective chorus you must have more of them. This encumbers the platform. As amateurs, they all regular avocations, which they must give up to attend rehearsals and performances; they sing mainly for their own enjoyment or from good will toward the concerts, and cannot be worked as paid professionals can. To get them together is no slight task, and it is no mean effort on their part to go through the work of rehearsals and concert. Thus it is not rationally worth while to form and rehearse a chorus unless you get a good deal of singing out of it. To take all these pains for the sake of one choral number on a programme is out of all due proportion between effort and result. It is especially unwise, as the mere presence of the chorus on the platform injures the effect of all the orchestral numbers; and to ask volunteer singers to sing in one number, and wait in the green-room until their turn comes, thus preventing their hearing the rest of the concert, is not the part of common courtesy. The chorus can be made musically worth while only by giving it the lion's share of the programme; and this turns the whole thing from a symphony concert into a choral concert.

Now it is hard to see what sufficient reason there is for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's giving choral concerts; this field has been amply worked in Boston for the last ever so many years; we have already all the choral concerts we know what to do with. In this respect we are better off than they are in Paris, where, with the exception of the Société des Grandes Auditions Chorales (which gives fewer concerts a year than our Handel and Haydn does), the Conservatoire is about the only regular organization that gives choral performances. And Paris has three independent symphony orchestras that give their concerts invariably on the same afternoon! To have a choral annex, to add variety to what are mainly orchestral concerts—just as solo singers or players do—is a very different matter from giving essentially choral concerts. And we have shown why it is not easily practicable to have a chorus to do nothing more than add the desirable variety to symphony concerts in his city. The game is not worth the candle. And, in so far as choral concerts, properly so called, are concerned, that sort of thing is so done, and so well done, by other societies that there is no need of the Symphony Orchestra's putting its finger into the pie.

Last Saturday evening the "Coriolan" overture, evidently well played, made next to no effect at all: the tone of the orchestra was so damped and muffled by the surrounding ranks of chorus singers.

Mr. Foote's "Skeleton in Armor" (conducted by himself) is a work to be spoken of both with respect and admiration. Mr. Foote's affection for Longfellow's ballads is apparently unquenchable; so, in spite of our conviction that they are not the best material in the world for extended musical setting, we will say no more on this head. Let us say at once, however, that in this last work of his Mr. Foote seems to us to have been far more successful in catching and holding fast by the true ballad tone than in any of his previous attempts. That he has completely solved the problem—as Carl Lowe did in his ballads for a single voice—can hardly be said; in this "Skeleton in Armor" the absence of distinctly dramatic style results in certain instances in a corresponding loss of dramatic effect, notably in places where the suggestions of the text are essentially dramatic. He has not quite caught the art of dramatic coloring without doing violence to the even, lyrical flow of the ballad style. But he has come much nearer to it than ever before, and has at the same time preserved the ballad style in far greater purity. Instances of the musical rhythm running disturbingly counter to the poetic metre are quite exceptional here, whereas in his "Hiawatha" and "Wreck of the Hesperus" they were far more frequent, and also far more striking. The whole "Skeleton in Armor," in spite of its rhythmic variety and frequent shifting of keys, impresses one as springing from one inspiration, and being cast in a single mould. In short, it is throughly excellent; it is poetic in conception and admirably strong in execution. Its absolute clearness is something uncommon today. The performance was capital, the quartet of solo voices doing extremely good work. It was very enthusiastically received, the composer being repeatedly called out after it. Mr. Foote has scored one more success.

Brahm's "Song of Destiny" is a work of infinite beauty, but somehow it seemed singularly ineffective last Saturday evening. The orchestra sounded dull and muffled as it did in the "Coriolan" overture, and the chorus, although apparently singing well enough, was not impressive.

Columbus does not seem to have brought great luck to American composers. Dudley Buck once wrote an overture on him that proved to be one of his weakest works, and we mistake much if the "Columbus" march and hymn keeps a very high place in the list of Mr. Paine's compositions. It is a gorgeously instrumentep, pompous march, terminating in broad three-two time sung by the chorus. But the work does not strike one at the first hearing as of finer quality than occasional compositions in general are. Mr. Paine has done far better things.

The next programme (for Friday afternoon, Feb. 17, and Saturday evening, Feb. 18) is: Thiériot; sinfonietta in E major, opus 55; Saint-Caëns, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 22; Beethoven, symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92. Mr. George M. Norwell will be the pianist. There will be no rehearsal nor concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 5.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was largely attended. The programme was, with the exception of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture, devoted wholly to vocal works, Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carollsmith, Mr, George J. Parker, Mr. Clarence Hay, and the Boston Symphony Chorus, assisting. The works presented were Mr. Arthur Foote's setting of "The Skeleton in Armor," for quartet, chorus, and orchestra, which was given for the first time; Brahms's "Song of Destiny," and Mr. Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn" for chorus and orchestra. The choral body did not prove large enough to produce the desired effect; it, in fact, is too small for the purpose for which it was formed and is lopsided in respect to balance of voices. There are not enough tenors and basses, and the volume of tone is lacking in necessary fulness. The chorus singing was none of the best. We have become so accustomed to the almost perfect work of our prominent singing societies that we are scarcely prepared to derive pleasure, enjoyment or satisfaction from such unsteady, colorless and unfinished singing as that which the Boston Symphony chorus vouchsafed last night. It was not worthy the orchestra whose name it shares. If the body cannot be enlarged to the proper size, and if better results than were achieved on this occasion cannot be obtained, it would be wise to omit the performance of important choral works from the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thus far the chorus has not acquitted itself in a manner to justify the expectations that were aroused when its formation was first announced. Mr. Foote's cantata, which was conducted by the composer, was very disappointing. It shows but little invention, is without any marked contrasts, and is dull and monotonous generally. The orchestration is frequently tasteful, but on the whole sounds thin and ineffective. The work is strangely barren of climaxes. There is a constant reaching out for them but they are never achieved. The music is well made but it has the fatality to be uninteresting. Its melodies are labored and dry, and have no distinguishing individuality. In other words, it is deliberate, almost perfunctory, music, suggesting neither spontaneity nor inspiration. Though in nowise plagiaristic, yet it nowhere gives the impression of originality. Often it recalls the conventional church anthem, and often it is cloudy in both the orchestral and vocal writing. Its best moments are to be found in the two quartets, but even here there is nothing that rises above the purely conventional. Throughout there is an apparent struggle for something that the composer constantly fails to attain. In fact, its effect is that of industriously and carefully manufactured music. Mr. Foote has proved himself capable of far better work. Of the performance there is not much to be said. It was uneven and steadily barren of light and shade. Sometimes the chorus obliterated the orchestra, and often the orchestra blotted out the chorus, while a lack of emphasis and rhythmical swing generally, characterized the rendering as a whole. It was listened to with great attention, and at its end Mr. Foote was recalled three times with great enthusiasm. The Brahms chorus is not the most inspiriting of works, but its clearness and its positiveness caused it to seem like a burst of musical sunshine after what had preceded it. The singing was not of the most tuneful and was monotonously dry, but the graceful orchestral prelude was beautifully played. We regret that Mr. Paine's march an hymn were not heard under more favorable circumstances. Here the richness and the fullness of the orchestration overwhelmed the small chorus. The work was written for an immense hall and the massive scoring was intended to be offset by five thousand voices. The small body of singers that sang on this occasion was therefore scarcely calculated to produce the effect intended by the composer. The introduction is impressively stirring, with its brilliant trumpet fanfares. The march is broad and flowing in its melodious themes and it moves with fine and imposing stateliness to a stirring climax as it breaks into the large and simple hymn. The composer's thorough knowledge of instrumental effect and of the full resources of the modern orchestra are displayed in a masterly manner throughout. At its conclusion the work was applauded with great enthusiasm Still, as it was impossible to do it justice under prevailing conditions, it was a mistake to perform it. The programme for the next concert is: Symphonietta, by Thieriot (first time); Concerto for pianoforte, in G minor, Saint-Saëns; Symphony, No. 7, Beethoven. The soloist is to be Mr. Busoni? No! Mr. Perabo? No! Mr. Baermann? No! Mr. George M. Nowell!

—— On Wednesday evening, there was a private rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra and chorus at Music Hall before a select and musical audience. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Chadwick, Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mrs. Fiske Warren, Mrs. Richard Warren, Miss Hecht, the Misses May-Winsor, Miss Elise Richards, Miss Macnamara, Mr. Olis, Mr. Arthur Pickering, Mr. E. L. Clark and Mr. Albin Reed.

—— Mr. Henry Higginson gave a small musical party on Wednesday night.

THE BOSTON TIMES, FEBRUARY 5, 1893.

There was no little pother at Mr. Harry Le Grand Cannon's last musicale over the alleged unkindly and discourteous treatment of Mr. Nikisch and his men, and so much secresy was observed and the plaints of the band were so loud and continuous that people fancied that something very dreadful had occurred, says Town Topics. I am now advised that the whole trouble arose out of the musicians being asked to proceed to their quarters by a special stairway, and out of their overcoats being kept apart from the integumenta of the guests. I am at a loss to see why these arrangements should have been viewed as insulting to the dignity of the performers. Mr. Nikisch and his men were on the occasion under notice, mere hirelings; and while any act that might have rubbed the fact, publicly, into their minds, would have been reprehensible, I cannot see why they should have been treated as guests any more than were the caterer or the decorator. The truth of the matter is that Mr. Nikisch and his associates are being spoiled by success and eulogy, and if this sort of thing goes on, there is danger that would-be purchasers of seats at future concerts will be asked for references. The sooner a stop is put to nonsense of this kind the better. When Mr. Nikisch accepts Mr. Cannon's money in exchange for his music, he places himself exactly on the same plane as Mr. Lander and Mr. Bernstein, who, I am sure, have never bothered their heads as to the resting place of their outer garments, so long as they found them after the evening's work was done. I hope Mr. Cannon will not recede from his position, one fully warranted by circumstances and, spite of what may be hinted at, by European precedent, if we must look abroad for rules that common sense should frame the world over.

SATURDAY EVENING

SPECTATOR

An Independent Social, Literary and Family Newspaper.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

FEBRUARY 4,

The Boston Symphony Orchestra open the concert season at the World's Fair with performances on May 15 and 16. There is a possibility of this famous organization appearing here in concert before the summer.

A strong effort is being made to secure the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a concert in this city before the close of the present season. The present arrangement is for the orchestra to close its season at the World's Fair, Chicago, about the middle of May.

[101]

...RY, FEBRUARY 8, 1893.

...dresses at Symphony Rehearsals.

...devoted lover of music and a constant ...ce for many years at the symphony re...sals, I feel that I must say a word to the ...ston public. This year my seat is on the ...or, and I have realized for the first time what music lovers must suffer from the lack of consideration of the fashionable public. I know that the managers endeavor to preserve quiet during a performance by prohibiting anyone from entering the hall. This, in other years, has been enough to insure peace for those who attend the concerts for the love of music. But of late years the character of the audience has largely changed. It has become a fad with the fashionable world to attend them, and it is no longer the poor but devoted musicians who can attend them, but the people who can pay the largest price for the seats. Boston is so flooded with good music that one concert more or less appears to amount to very little, and so people merely rush in for one or two pieces just to say they have been, and then rush off to another entertainment, entirely unconscious of the disturbance which their late entrance and early leaving have caused many others. At a recent rehearsal, people did not cease to come until the concert was half over and before silence had barely been felt in the hall; while others at that time began to go, and kept on until the concert was over. I have sat at different times in either balcony and on the floor, and I can truly say that if it were possible to buy a seat in the second gallery I should do so, for there at least are peace and quiet. There the real music lovers are found, people who will sit waiting for an hour gladly for the privilege of hearing such music as our Symphony Orchestra gives us. I wish that this feeling were shared by ticket holders on the floor and that they showed more thoughtfulness for others.

A TICKET-HOLDER.

A MUSIC HALL FOR COPLEY SQUARE.

To the Editor of the Transcript: The Saturday Transcript for Jan. 28 contained a plan for the alteration of Copley square, proposing a change of its ill-shaped grass plots into a form that would admit of a fine large circle in the middle, where perhaps a fountain might be placed, with sufficient room around it to carry out the intention of the square in an artistic and dignified manner. An appropriate place would thus be afforded for the proposed statue to Phillips Brooks—which of course must be the finest—of which modern art is capable. There will be difficulties in the way; but let us hope that they may be surmounted. The Huntington avenue cars must be diverted to Boylston street or to St. James avenue. Why not to the latter? If too narrow for two tracks one might suffice.

While we are all planning to make Copley Square just what it ought to be, let me record the words of a stranger within our gates, "What your square needs is the taking down of every building on the north-west side, and the erection there of a fine music hall. Your present structure with that name is a disgrace to the city; undesirable in every way. Badly situated, very difficult of access, dangerous of egress, and the most ill-ventilated hall that I ever saw. Nearly all the people who go to the present Music Hall live on the Back Bay, or reach it easily from the suburbs. If only some of your rich men could see the importance of this project, I feel as if steps would soon be taken towards carrying it out."

No finer plan for the north-west side of the square could de devised. Its four sides would then represent, religion, literature, music and art.

H. M. K.

Philadelphia Abend-Post

...Herausgegeben von der

Mittwoch, 8. Februar 1893.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Für das heute Abend in der Academy of Music stattfindende vierte große Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters hat Herr Dirigent Arthur Nikisch ein interessantes Programm aufgestellt. Die zweite Symphonie von Schumann, der Mephisto-Walzer von Liszt, die Hymne an die heilige Cäcilia von Gounod und das Vorspiel zu Wagners „Meistersinger" werden vom Orchester zum Vortrag gebracht werden. Als Solistin wird eine junge Pianistin, Miß Minnie Wetzler, welcher ein trefflicher Ruf vorausgeht, mitwirken. Dieselbe wird das Concertstück von Weber und mehrere andere Soli vortragen. Tickets sind in No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The next concert takes place to-morrow evening at Chickering Hall. The program will be as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the third concerto of Davidoff for the 'cello, Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and the verspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

Third Kneisel Quartet Concert.—The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet, of Boston, will be given at Chickering Hall on Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The program will consist of Dvorák's E major quartet, op. 80; Beethoven's G major quartet, op. 18, and Brahms' clarinet quartet, op. 115.

The program of the fourteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Coriolan" ..... Beethoven
Ballad, "The Skeleton in Armor" ..... Foote
(First time in Boston.)
"A Song of Destiny" ..... Brahms
"Columbus March and Hymn" ..... Paine
(First time in Boston.)

The Boston Symphony Chorus and Mrs Barnard-Smith, Miss Carlsmith, Messrs. Geo. J. Parker and Clarence E. Hay assisted.

Mr. Foote's ballad is for chorus, quartet and orchestra. It is a musical setting of the familiar poem by Longfellow. The choice of a poem was unfortunate, perhaps, in that the lines do not readily suggest variety of rhythm. In Mr. Foote's composition there is a superabundance of the ternary.

This ballad is thirty-six octavo pages in length. To elaborate the detail of the poem might be a frittering away of any grand result. The detail is not elaborated in this case. On the other hand, there are no contrasting moods suggested clearly, there is no definite creation of a stimmung. There are subdivisions, as allegro deciso and andantino, and so on, but there are no sharply drawn scenes of dramatic contrast. The chorus is questioner, narrator and answerer. The quartet is used for the story of the wooing and the death of the wife—for the scenes of comparative tenderness—but these scenes are without particular distinction.

The ballad is, first of all, undramatic. There is little evidence of imagination; there is little evidence of a sense of dramatic fitness. The very start is a disappointment. Why should the appeal to the skeleton be so hurriedly delivered? Why should this appeal be given to the chorus? Is there any horror expressed in the description of the awakening of the dead?

It would be an idle task to go through the ballad sentence by sentence and point out the inappropriateness of the music, for the music cannot be reproduced in this article, and verbal statements would seem purely dogmatic. But here is a striking instance of a failure to grasp the possibilities of the situation. The skeleton says:

> Take heed, that in thy verse
> Thou dost the tale rehearse,
> Else dread a dead man's curse.

Surely "the dead man's curse" should be brought strongly to the attention of the hearer. It would not be necessary, perhaps, to stop the rush of musical thought and prepare "the curse" with the deliberation of a barn stormer in the scene in "Richelieu;" but without such interruption harmonies could be used; instrumental color could be so applied that the necessary shiver would strike the hearer. Mr. Foote, on the contrary, arranges the voices in such a manner and employs such notation that the sentence does not come even clearly to the hearer; but the sentence, without dread import, is like an inarticulate gargling in a commonplace throat.

Neither is the rhythm always above reproach (see, for instance, page 15, where a false construction is given to the meaning of the words "Chanting his glory Bright," nor are the voices used skillfully to gain effects by simple means.

The instrumentation is, as a rule, dry and uninteresting. The voices are followed too often by instruments, and support becomes a distraction. There is little variety; there is little color.

Mr. Foote conducted the performance of his work. It is therefore fair to presume that it was given in accordance with his own wishes, particularly as he prepares the Symphony chorus for its work in public. On this occasion there was a marked disregard of the printed indications of the composer. There was hardly a pianissimo that was observed; there was a monotone of forte in passages that called for delicate treatment; forte was often fortissimo, and the climax was generally anticipated.

The chorus sang weakly and without discretion. In full passages there was not the sonority that comes from a well balanced chorus, competent, sure that the cause in which they engage is just. The enunciation was so defective that the hearer, even with the help of the program book, was often unable to detect the whereabouts of the singers.

Praise for Minnie Wetzler.—Speaking of the recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge, Mass., the "Tribune" of that city has the following to say of Miss Minnie Wetzler, who was the soloist:

Much interest was centered in the début of Miss Minnie Wetzler, a young pianist not yet out of her teens, who has been a favorite pupil of Clara Schumann for the last seven years. The modest, winning manner of the young artist immediately prepossessed the audience in her favor, and her fine performance of Weber's brilliant Concertstück aroused much enthusiasm. In addition to an already large technic, there is a peculiar charm and individuality in her playing which seems to be the result of a quick intelligence, combined with a rare degree of magnetism. She was especially satisfying in the "presto," which was given with a youthful exuberance and freshness which completely captured her listeners. Her solos were no less successful. The beautiful Chopin nocturne, too infrequently heard, was played with genuine feeling and sentiment, while the interpretation of the B flat minor Scherzo was a positive surprise. Her beautiful sympathetic tone and devoted absorption in her work bring to light a poetic beauty which many an older and more famous performer has failed to reveal. It would seem as if Mrs. Schumann's predictions of a brilliant future for her pupil were bound to be verified.

Miss Wetzel plays with the orchestra this evening at Philadelphia and at the Brooklyn concerts Friday and Saturday.

The Musical Herald of the United States

FEBRUARY, 1893.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert of December 31 played Berlioz's brilliant overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and Volkmann's pleasing and interesting but not strikingly original symphony in B flat. Between these came Vieuxtemps' fourth violin concerto, the solo part of which was played by Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the violin family of the orchestra. Mr. Schnitzler came to this country some years ago, at the same time as Mr. Fritz Giese, the accomplished violoncellist, and for a while was a member of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. He was next in the west for a space, and returned this season and joined the orchestra. His work on the occasion under notice was admirable for its finish and taste, and the charm of it all was perceptibly heightened by the warm tone of his violin. There cannot be many orchestras in the world that can show a finer array of real artists among their violin players than our orchestra can boast, with Kneisel, Adamowski, Loeffler and Schnitzler in evidence. At the concert of January 7, the symphony was Haydn's in B flat (No. 12 in the Breitkopf & Haertel edition), and other orchestral works were the first suite arranged from Bizet's melodramatic music to Daudet's "L'Arlesienne" and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. Mrs. Basta-Tavary sang in good style and with marked intelligence, but not always with fullness of effect, Donna Anna's scene, with the "letter aria," from "Don Juan" and Elizabeth's greeting to the Hall of Song from "Tannhaeuser."

The Kneisel Quartet at the concert on January 16 played Volkmann's trio (for pianoforte, violin and violoncello) in B flat minor, Schumann's quartette, Op. 41, No. 1, and Brahms' quintette for clarinet and strings, Op. 115. The trio, in the performance of which Mr. Busoni took part at the pianoforte, is generally recognized as one of its author's most delightful creations, though it has much of real pathos in it. At the close, for instance, there is a dialogue of short, broken phrases between the pianoforte and the violin that is strongly suggestive of a long farewell between dear friends. Brahms' quintette is a strong, earnest, and what is more, an easily intelligible work. It is so free from bewildering moments that one is almost led to question if Brahms be its composer. The use of the clarinet as a warming agent is splendidly managed, and the entire quintette is a model of repose and dignity.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert had a troublesome drawback to contend against, in the form of unfortunate atmospheric conditions. The band has never before sounded so crude comparatively, and at no concert so far as we can recall were there so many technical mishaps. Several passages in Beethoven's eighth symphony, which opened the concert, were marred by bad intonation and want of precision, and at no time in the course of the evening were the instruments perfectly in tune with each other. Under the circumstances the faults were venial, but they prevent the recording of another such success as was put to the credit of the orchestra on the occasion of its last visit. Concerning the symphony, however, it must be said that it commended itself with especial forcefulness to the admirers of the composition and the believers in Beethoven's knowledge touching his own intentions, in being free from the most flagrant of the innovations which have crept into the readings of the work since Wagner wrote his condemnation of the careless and perfunctory style in which the conductors of Germany were in the habit of playing it. Mr. Nikisch is not overburdened with devotion to tradition, but it is a pleasure to record the fact that neither does he seem to care to pose as a revolutionist simply for the sake of revolution. He permitted the dainty allegretto-scherzando to occupy the place of the slow movement of the symphony instead of transforming the characteristics of such a movement to the tempo di menuetto, as has been done by Dr. Von Buelow and others. The orchestral numbers in the scheme, besides the symphony were two movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" (the minuet of the will-o'-the-wisps, and the dance of sylphs, which latter bit of fairy tracery in music was demanded and given a second time), and the third "Leonore" overture by Beethoven.

The solo performers were Miss Eugenia Castellano, pianoforte, and Mr. Timothee Adamowski, violin. Miss Castellano is a young woman of sixteen years, who hails from Italy, and who has been generously exploited since her arrival in New York a few weeks ago. She played at one of the Boston concerts two weeks ago and succeeded in impressing the New England capital with the idea that she was made of rare artistic metal. It is possible that the quantity and quality of the praise that has been lavished upon her, and has been trumpeted forth into the world, led us to expect too much; at any rate, from a musical point of view, her performance of the G minor concerto of Mendelssohn was distinctly disappointing. It was notable, if at all, simply as a mechanical achievement. In color it was monotonous, in the matter of expression sterile. The reason why the composition was chosen remained an unanswerable enigma until the finale was reached, when it became evident that the young lady's fingers and wrists had been kept in training for the purpose of exhibiting a degree of bravura which would please the average audience. In this finale, but more especially in a concert study by her teacher, Martucci, a bit of showy but empty music, she caused something like a sensation, and persuaded the judicious of her possession of a sufficient technical equipment to justify hopes of her future. But she did not persuade the judicious that she is now a ripe artist, and she is too old to be listened to as a prodigy.

Mr. Adamowski played the first two movements of Bruch's first violin concerto tastefully and intelligently, but, probably on account of the weather, his tone sounded strangely muffled and unsympathetic in the lower strings.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Two hours of unalloyed pleasure were enjoyed by those who attended the second concert of the Kneisel Quartette. Mr. Kneisel and his associates were in excellent mood, two of the compositions on the list were among the most perfect examples of chamber music in existence and the third was a new piece of music by an American composer which maintained itself so well in the afternoon's entertainment as to bring credit not only to the composer and the performers, but also to the artistic form which it is the purpose of the club to promote. The quartette, which consists of Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, L. Svecenski and Alwin Schroeder, played Schumann's quartette in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, and Schubert's quartette in D minor (the one with the ineffably lovely variations on the melody first used by the composer in his setting of the song by Claudius called "Der Tod und das Maedchen").

Between these numbers a quartette in C major by Arthur Foote, of Boston, for pianoforte and strings, was performed, the composer playing the pianoforte part. Concerning this work, by one of the most conscientious and dignified of American composers, the Tribune spoke some words of praise when the score was published by Mr. Arthur P. Schmidt, of Boston. The good opinion formed from the reading was not only confirmed but strengthened by the performance under notice. The work is fluent and melodious, and its ingenuousness has a most refreshing effect upon the ear of a professional hearer in these days of excessive reflection and constrained effort. The performance was marked by genuine sympathy on the part of Mr. Foote's associates, and it was very gratifying to observe that the audience was keenly appreciative of the beauties of both music and performance.

The charm of the quartette's playing is quite beyond conventional words of praise. It is the product, not only of a most admirable techical equipment in the case of each individual composing the club, but of a harmony of feeling and understanding between the four men, and an ambition to achieve a common success that are seldom met with among organizations devoted to chamber music.

[102]

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1893.

Rudeness at Symphony Rehearsals.

As a devoted lover of music and a constant attendant for many years at the symphony rehearsals, I feel that I must say a word to the Boston public. This year my seat is on the floor, and I have realized for the first time what music lovers must suffer from the lack of consideration of the fashionable public. I know that the managers endeavor to preserve quiet during a performance by prohibiting anyone from entering the hall. This, in other years, has been enough to insure peace for those who attend the concerts for the love of music. But of late years the character of the audience has largely changed. It has become a fad with the fashionable world to attend them, and it is no longer the poor but devoted musicians who can attend them, but the people who can pay the largest price for the seats. Boston is so flooded with good music that one concert more or less appears to amount to very little, and so people merely rush in for one or two pieces just to say they have been, and then rush off to another entertainment, entirely unconscious of the disturbance which their late entrance and early leaving have caused many others. At a recent rehearsal, people did not cease to come until the concert was half over and before silence had barely been felt in the hall; while others at that time began to go, and kept on until the concert was over. I have sat at different times in either balcony and on the floor, and I can truly say that if it were possible to buy a seat in the second gallery I should do so, for there at least are peace and quiet. There the real music lovers are found, people who will sit waiting for an hour gladly for the privilege of hearing such music as our Symphony Orchestra gives us. I wish that this feeling were shared by ticket holders on the floor and that they showed more thoughtfulness for others.

A TICKET-HOLDER.

A MUSIC HALL FOR COPLEY SQUARE.

To the Editor of the Transcript: The Saturday Transcript for Jan. 28 contained a plan for the alteration of Copley square, proposing a change of its ill-shaped grass plots into a form that would admit of a fine large circle in the middle, where perhaps a fountain might be placed, with sufficient room around it to carry out the intention of the square in an artistic and dignified manner. An appropriate place would thus be afforded for the proposed statue to Phillips Brooks—which of course must be the finest—of which modern art is capable. There will be difficulties in the way; but let us hope that they may be surmounted. The Huntington avenue cars must be diverted to Boylston street or to St. James avenue. Why not to the latter? If too narrow for two tracks one might suffice.

While we are all planning to make Copley Square just what it ought to be, let me record the words of a stranger within our gates, "What your square needs is the taking down of every building on the north-west side, and the erection there of a fine music hall. Your present structure with that name is a disgrace to the city; undesirable in every way. Badly situated, very difficult of access, dangerous of egress, and the most ill-ventilated hall that I ever saw. Nearly all the people who go to the present Music Hall live on the Back Bay, or reach it easily from the suburbs. If only some of your rich men could see the importance of this project, I feel as if steps would soon be taken towards carrying it out."

No finer plan for the north-west side of the square could de devised. Its four sides would then represent, religion, literature, music and art.

H. M. K.

Philadelphia Abend-Post

Herausgegeben von der

Mittwoch, 8. Februar 1893.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Für das heute Abend in der Academy of Music stattfindende vierte große Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters hat Herr Dirigent Arthur Nikisch ein interessantes Programm aufgestellt. Die zweite Symphonie von Schumann, der Mephisto-Walzer von Liszt, die Hymne an die heilige Cäcilia von Gounod und das Vorspiel zu Wagners „Meistersinger" werden vom Orchester zum Vortrag gebracht werden. Als Solistin wird eine junge Pianistin, Miß Minnie Wetzler, welcher ein trefflicher Ruf vorausgeht, mitwirken. Dieselbe wird das Concertstück von Weber und mehrere andere Soli vortragen. Tickets sind in No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The next concert takes place to-morrow evening at Chickering Hall. The program will be as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the third concerto of Davidoff for the 'cello, Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and the vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

Third Kneisel Quartet Concert.—The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet, of Boston, will be given at Chickering Hall on Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The program will consist of Dvorák's E major quartet, op. 80; Beethoven's G major quartet, op. 18, and Brahms' clarinet quartet, op. 115.

The program of the fourteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Coriolan" ..... Beethoven
Ballad, "The Skeleton in Armor" ..... Foote
(First time in Boston.)
"A Song of Destiny" ..... Brahms
"Columbus March and Hymn" ..... Paine
(First time in Boston.)

The Boston Symphony Chorus and Mrs Barnard-Smith, Miss Carlsmith, Messrs. Geo. J. Parker and Clarence E. Hay assisted.

Mr. Foote's ballad is for chorus, quartet and orchestra. It is a musical setting of the familiar poem by Longfellow. The choice of a poem was unfortunate, perhaps, in that the lines do not readily suggest variety of rhythm. In Mr. Foote's composition there is a superabundance of the ternary.

This ballad is thirty-six octavo pages in length. To elaborate the detail of the poem might be a frittering away of any grand result. The detail is not elaborated in this case. On the other hand, there are no contrasting moods suggested clearly, there is no definite creation of a stimmung. There are subdivisions, as allegro deciso and andantino, and so on, but there are no sharply drawn scenes of dramatic contrast. The chorus is questioner, narrator and answerer. The quartet is used for the story of the wooing and the death of the wife—for the scenes of comparative tenderness—but these scenes are without particular distinction.

The ballad is, first of all, undramatic. There is little evidence of imagination; there is little evidence of a sense of dramatic fitness. The very start is a disappointment. Why should the appeal to the skeleton be so hurriedly delivered? Why should this appeal be given to the chorus? Is there any horror expressed in the description of the awakening of the dead?

It would be an idle task to go through the ballad sentence by sentence and point out the inappropriateness of the music, for the music cannot be reproduced in this article, and verbal statements would seem purely dogmatic. But here is a striking instance of a failure to grasp the possibilities of the situation. The skeleton says:

> Take heed, that in thy verse
> Thou dost the tale rehearse,
> Else dread a dead man's curse.

Surely "the dead man's curse" should be brought strongly to the attention of the hearer. It would not be necessary, perhaps, to stop the rush of musical thought and prepare "the curse" with the deliberation of a barn stormer in the scene in "Richelieu;" but without such interruption harmonies could be used; instrumental color could be so applied that the necessary shiver would strike the hearer. Mr. Foote, on the contrary, arranges the voices in such a manner and employs such notation that the sentence does not come even clearly to the hearer; but the sentence, without dread import, is like an inarticulate gargling in a commonplace throat.

Neither is the rhythm always above reproach (see, for instance, page 15, where a false construction is given to the meaning of the words "Chanting his glory Bright," nor are the voices used skillfully to gain effects by simple means.

The instrumentation is, as a rule, dry and uninteresting. The voices are followed too often by instruments, and support becomes a distraction. There is little variety; there is little color.

Mr. Foote conducted the performance of his work. It is therefore fair to presume that it was given in accordance with his own wishes, particularly as he prepares the Symphony chorus for its work in public. On this occasion there was a marked disregard of the printed indications of the composer. There was hardly a pianissimo that was observed; there was a monotone of forte in passages that called for delicate treatment; forte was often fortissimo, and the climax was generally anticipated.

The chorus sang weakly and without discretion. In full passages there was not the sonority that comes from a well balanced chorus, competent, sure that the cause in which they engage is just. The enunciation was so defective that the hearer, even with the help of the program book, was often unable to detect the whereabouts of the singers.

Praise for Minnie Wetzler.—Speaking of the recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge, Mass., the "Tribune" of that city has the following to say of Miss Minnie Wetzler, who was the soloist:

> Much interest was centered in the début of Miss Minnie Wetzler, a young pianist not yet out of her teens, who has been a favorite pupil of Clara Schumann for the last seven years. The modest, winning manner of the young artist immediately prepossessed the audience in her favor, and her fine performance of Weber's brilliant Concertstück aroused much enthusiasm. In addition to an already large technic, there is a peculiar charm and individuality in her playing which seems to be the result of a quick intelligence, combined with a rare degree of magnetism. She was especially satisfying in the "presto," which was given with a youthful exuberance and freshness which completely captured her listeners. Her solos were no less successful. The beautiful Chopin nocturne, too infrequently heard, was played with genuine feeling and sentiment, while the interpretation of the B flat minor Scherzo was a positive surprise. Her beautiful sympathetic tone and devoted absorption in her work bring to light a poetic beauty which many an older and more famous performer has failed to reveal. It would seem as if Mrs. Schumann's predictions of a brilliant future for her pupil were bound to be verified.

Miss Wetzel plays with the orchestra this evening at Philadelphia and at the Brooklyn concerts Friday and Saturday.

The Musical Herald of the United States

FEBRUARY, 1893.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert of December 31 played Berlioz's brilliant overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and Volkmann's pleasing and interesting but not strikingly original symphony in B flat. Between these came Vieuxtemps' fourth violin concerto, the solo part of which was played by Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the violin family of the orchestra. Mr. Schnitzler came to this country some years ago, at the same time as Mr. Fritz Giese, the accomplished violoncellist, and for a while was a member of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. He was next in the west for a space, and returned this season and joined the orchestra. His work on the occasion under notice was admirable for its finish and taste, and the charm of it all was perceptibly heightened by the warm tone of his violin. There cannot be many orchestras in the world that can show a finer array of real artists among their violin players than our orchestra can boast, with Kneisel, Adamowski, Loeffler and Schnitzler in evidence. At the concert of January 7, the symphony was Haydn's in B flat (No. 12 in the Breitkopf & Haertel edition), and other orchestral works were the first suite arranged from Bizet's melodramatic music to Daudet's "L'Arlesienne" and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. Mrs. Basta-Tavary sang in good style and with marked intelligence, but not always with fullness of effect, Donna Anna's scene, with the "letter aria," from "Don Juan" and Elizabeth's greeting to the Hall of Song from "Tannhaeuser."

The Kneisel Quartet at the concert on January 16 played Volkmann's trio (for pianoforte, violin and violoncello) in B flat minor, Schumann's quartette, Op. 41, No. 1, and Brahms' quintette for clarinet and strings, Op. 115. The trio, in the performance of which Mr. Busoni took part at the pianoforte, is generally recognized as one of its author's most delightful creations, though it has much of real pathos in it. At the close, for instance, there is a dialogue of short, broken phrases between the pianoforte and the violin that is strongly suggestive of a long farewell between dear friends. Brahms' quintette is a strong, earnest, and what is more, an easily intelligible work. It is so free from bewildering moments that one is almost led to question if Brahms be its composer. The use of the clarinet as a warming agent is splendidly managed, and the entire quintette is a model of repose and dignity.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert had a troublesome drawback to contend against, in the form of unfortunate atmospheric conditions. The band has never before sounded so crude comparatively, and at no concert so far as we can recall were there so many technical mishaps. Several passages in Beethoven's eighth symphony, which opened the concert, were marred by bad intonation and want of precision, and at no time in the course of the evening were the instruments perfectly in tune with each other. Under the circumstances the faults were venial, but they prevent the recording of another such success as was put to the credit of the orchestra on the occasion of its last visit. Concerning the symphony, however, it must be said that it commended itself with especial forcefulness to the admirers of the composition and the believers in Beethoven's knowledge touching his own intentions, in being free from the most flagrant of the innovations which have crept into the readings of the work since Wagner wrote his condemnation of the careless and perfunctory style in which the conductors of Germany were in the habit of playing it. Mr. Nikisch is not overburdened with devotion to tradition, but it is a pleasure to record the fact that neither does he seem to care to pose as a revolutionist simply for the sake of revolution. He permitted the dainty allegretto-scherzando to occupy the place of the slow movement of the symphony instead of transforming the characteristics of such a movement to the tempo di menuetto, as has been done by Dr. Von Buelow and others. The orchestral numbers in the scheme, besides the symphony were two movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" (the minuet of the will-o'-the-wisps, and the dance of sylphs, which latter bit of fairy tracery in music was demanded and given a second time), and the third "Leonore" overture by Beethoven.

The solo performers were Miss Eugenia Castellano, pianoforte, and Mr. Timothee Adamowski, violin. Miss Castellano is a young woman of sixteen years, who hails from Italy, and who has been generously exploited since her arrival in New York a few weeks ago. She played at one of the Boston concerts two weeks ago and succeeded in impressing the New England capital with the idea that she was made of rare artistic metal. It is possible that the quantity and quality of the praise that has been lavished upon her, and has been trumpeted forth into the world, led us to expect too much; at any rate, from a musical point of view, her performance of the G minor concerto of Mendelssohn was distinctly disappointing. It was notable, if at all, simply as a mechanical achievement. In color it was monotonous, in the matter of expression sterile. The reason why the composition was chosen remained an unanswerable enigma until the finale was reached, when it became evident that the young lady's fingers and wrists had been kept in training for the purpose of exhibiting a degree of bravura which would please the average audience. In this finale, but more especially in a concert study by her teacher, Martucci, a bit of showy but empty music, she caused something like a sensation, and persuaded the judicious of her possession of a sufficient technical equipment to justify hopes of her future. But she did not persuade the judicious that she is now a ripe artist, and she is too old to be listened to as a prodigy.

Mr. Adamowski played the first two movements of Bruch's first violin concerto tastefully and intelligently, but, probably on account of the weather, his tone sounded strangely muffled and unsympathetic in the lower strings.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Two hours of unalloyed pleasure were enjoyed by those who attended the second concert of the Kneisel Quartette. Mr. Kneisel and his associates were in excellent mood, two of the compositions on the list were among the most perfect examples of chamber music in existence and the third was a new piece of music by an American composer which maintained itself so well in the afternoon's entertainment as to bring credit not only to the composer and the performers, but also to the artistic form which it is the purpose of the club to promote. The quartette, which consists of Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, L. Svecenski and Alwin Schroeder, played Schumann's quartette in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, and Schubert's quartette in D minor (the one with the ineffably lovely variations on the melody first used by the composer in his setting of the song by Claudius called "Der Tod und das Maedchen").

Between these numbers a quartette in C major by Arthur Foote, of Boston, for pianoforte and strings, was performed, the composer playing the pianoforte part. Concerning this work, by one of the most conscientious and dignified of American composers, the Tribune spoke some words of praise when the score was published by Mr. Arthur P. Schmidt, of Boston. The good opinion formed from the reading was not only confirmed but strengthened by the performance under notice. The work is fluent and melodious, and its ingenuousness has a most refreshing effect upon the ear of a professional hearer in these days of excessive reflection and constrained effort. The performance was marked by genuine sympathy on the part of Mr. Foote's associates, and it was very gratifying to observe that the audience was keenly appreciative of the beauties of both music and performance.

The charm of the quartette's playing is quite beyond conventional words of praise. It is the product, not only of a most admirable techical equipment in the case of each individual composing the club, but of a harmony of feeling and understanding between the four men, and an ambition to achieve a common success that are seldom met with among organizations devoted to chamber music.

[102]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 36.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, American Composers Honored.

The American composers resident in this vicinity were duly recognized in last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony series, and the action of Conductor Nikisch in giving this prominence to native talent was productive of much satisfaction.

In commenting upon the evening's events first mention is due to Prof. John K. Payne's "Columbus March and Hymn," composed for orchestra and chorus, by request, for the dedicatory exercises of the Columbian Exposition at Chicago last October. It was very gratifying to have an opportunity to hear this composition under such favorable circumstances, for, with the chorus organized for these concerts and the Symphony orchestra, a combination of musical forces was had, which gave the grand composition a most complete interpretation.

The introduction of the orchestral movement is inspiring in its breadth and dignity, and at once stamps the work as that of a master in the use of all of the resources of the modern orchestra. In the march movement two themes of striking merit are used with rare skill and discretion, and the repetition of the introduction leads the hymn with excellent effect.

Prof. Paine's verses make an excellent subject for his genius as a compos r, and in the choral movement he has used the voices of the choir in a way that brings the composition to a telling climax. The performance of the march and hymn created a marked impression, and the composer was duly honored by the applause which followed its termination.

Mr. Arthur Foote's ballad for chorus, quartet and orchestra, being a musical setting of Longfellow's poem "The Skeleton Armor," was also included in the evening's programme, its production, for the first time here, being made under the composer's batyn.

The selection of this ballad for such elaborate treatment does not appear to be quite wise, and the composer has not been altogether happy in his assignment of the verses. The work is in cantata form, and despite the sterling ability shown in the orchestral and voice parts there is a lack of strength and contrast in the ballad, as a whole, which is hardly in keeping with the earlier works by Mr. Foote. The ballad is well suited for a single voice, but hardly affords the opportunities demanded to use such a combination of vocal forces as have been employed by Mr. Foote. The orchestral score is rich in tone color, and much success has attended the treatment of this portion of the composition.

The chorus did commendable work in their numbers, and were well aided by Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay in the quartets.

A grandly effective performance of Brahm's "Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, already heard in the Cecilia programmes, with the ever welcome "Coriolan" overture, completed the programme.

The reseating of the stage, by which the chorus and orchestra were both accommodated, has been very successfully accomplished, and the singers were well placed for effective results.

The orchestra is on one of its occasional tours the coming week, and on the evening of the 18th inst. the programme will be the E major symphonietta by Thieriot, Saint-Saens' G minor piano concerto and Beethoven's seventh symphony, the soloist being Mr. George M. Nowell.

Paderwski entertains just as delightfully as he plays. He recently gave a dinner to Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and their children, Mr. Adamososki, Mr. Goellitz, Mr. Mayer and other prominent members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and after the dinner he had a magician entertain his guests in the Venitian room of the Brunswick.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch astonished the audience present at his first piano recital in Providence, on Tuesday, by the length and work which his programme entailed. How he found time, with his manifold duties as conductor, to memorize the numbers from Chopin, Liszt and Beethoven was a source of wonder all evening.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 6, 1893.

The symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening was made up of a most interesting and entertaining programme. Two features were especially noteworthy, the "Columbus March and Hymn" by Professor John K. Payne and Arthur Foote's musical setting to Longfellow's "Skeleton in Armor." The orchestra was assisted by a quartet composed of Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Lillian Carlsmith, George J. Parker, Clarence E. Hay and the Symphony chorus.

In the Columbus march Professor Payne has given a movement and theme most appropriate for the subject, full of inspiring strains and broad and dignified musical ideas. The introduction widens and develops into the main body of the work and the original air is used to lead up to the choral portions of the composition. Then there are some striking effects which are admirably handled and were finely rendered by both orchestra and chorus.

Mr. Foote's music is in cantata form rather elaborate in its treatment and is remarkably strong in orchestral coloring, more so in fact than in the vocal numbers. The various emotions depicted in the poem were marked out in the score, and the wide range of sentiment was at times artistically represented, yet there were moments of disappointment that the composer had not fully reached his usual standard. Brahm's "Song of Destiny" and the overture "Coriolan" completed the programme. The next concert will be on Feb. 18, and the programme will be the E major symphonietta by Thieriot, Saint-Saens' G minor piano concerto and Beethoven's seventh symphony, the soloist being Mr. George M. Nowell.

DAILY ADVERTISER,
FEBRUARY 6, 1893.

The Symphony.

It was chorus night at the Symphony concert on Saturday, and by no means so artistic an occasion (as far as performance goes) as when the orchestra is heard unaided. The body of vocalists gathered as an auxiliary to the instrumental forces is by no means on a par with them. In a city which possesses an Apollo Club, a Cecilia, or a Handel and Haydn Society, this is a great shortcoming, and one that must become speedily palpable to the general public, no matter how omnivorous that many-headed monster may be. This criticism may be tempered at once with the statement that the chorus sang much better on this occasion than when it appeared in the ninth symphony. But it may sing much better still, and not be the peer of the organizations mentioned above, or of the orchestra which is its yoke fellow. The American composer has become epidemic this week, and in two days Paine, Chadwick and Foote have been heard in new works. Foote's "Skeleton in Armor" was the longest work on the programme on Saturday. It was a cruel thing to place this cantata between a warlike Beethoven overture and a most dignified Brahms cantata. Under these circumstances the Viking became a very respectable, even pious, individual, rather addicted to religious tones, a much better party than most of the old Norsemen, but scarcely the one depicted by Longfellow. Mr. Foote with all his great ability (and he is one of the most skilful of American composers) seems utterly deficient in dramatic power, and therefore one finds him habitually choosing the most dramatic subjects for his musical setting. He has never succeeded in grasping the direct power and strong contrasts of Longfellow's poetry, often as he has had recourse to this fount of inspiration. To give the sentiments of the Viking (which at once suggest a solo for baritone or tenor robusto) to a chorus and quartette for interpretation, avoiding solos altogether, was inartistic. Let the composer study Bruch's "Frithjof" with its sombre baritone work if he desires to see how a Norse subject can be graphically presented, or let him refer to George E Whiting's "Tale of the Viking" if he desires to see a stronger presentation of this very subject. Yet one must praise the fluency of writing amid all the disappointment entailed by the mistakes alluded to, and the repetitions (caused by contrapuntal imitations) which marred the setting of "The Wreck of the Hesperus" are but seldom apparent here. The orchestral prelude was striking, but the setting of the stanza beginning

"But when I older grew, joining a corsair's crew" was as suggestive of a "Y.M.C.A." as of a "Corsair's crew." The love episode, on the other hand, was beautiful in a high degree, although perhaps a little too pastoral. In this part the tender harmonies, the tasteful orchestration, and the melodic themes, combine to make a number that will live. Entirely ineffective was the succeeding scene of Hildebrand's banquet hall. Here one might well have expected a flavor of bardic music, a burst of harps, something akin to the rhapsodical character which Bruch has given in the banquet in "Odysseus"; there was nothing of this, nor was there anything of northern revelry, there was only a degree of trumpet-blowing, and after these fanfares some use of the battery of percussive instruments that was conventional amidst all its noise.

It would be mere repetition to follow the rest of the work in detail: the well-written and meaningless music is continued to the very end. One may except the Andantino Grazioso at the words "Three weeks we westward bore," which is certainly graceful; but at the very close, as if to emphasize the undramatic character of it all, there is not an iota of difference between the lines "Skoal! to the Northland! Skoal!" and "Thus the tale ended." The performance may not have done full justice to the work, for the balance between chorus and orchestra was poor, and there was many a blur to condone. The solo quartette, consisting of Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Carlsmith, Mr. Geo. J. Parker, and Mr. Hay, was the redeeming feature of the execution of the work.

Brahms' "Song of Destiny" began well. The dignified prelude was well played. But from the entrance of the vocal parts there was much inequality, and much seemed spasmodic in a work where this was the unpardonable sin. It may be doubted whether the chorus ought, in its present state, to undertake such ambitious work. The postlude was not so well given by the orchestra as the prelude had been. Before speaking of the final number of the programme, tribute must be paid to the excellent orchestral execution in the "Coriolanus" overture; the Beethoven work has seldom has a better performance. The reading was broad and massive, yet quite free from exaggeration.

Prof. Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn," an artistic outcome of the Chicago fair, closed the concert. It was not well performed, but here at least one may acquit the chorus of all blame; they sang with heroic effort, but they were numerically too weak to cope with a work that was intended for a vast festival occasion. As well examine the head of Bartholdi's Statue of Liberty in the rooms of the Boston Art Club with a hope of getting its true effect, as expect to judge of such a work in the surroundings and with the forces of a symphony concert. One cannot help thinking of the march which our last international exhibition brought forth, and drawing a parallel between the two. Paine's composition is a worthier one than Wagner's; it is clearer, and works to a better climax. The element of bombast may be detected in both, but that is permissible, almost to be demanded, in such music of national self-glorification. Peace and prosperity are rarely the parents of a national anthem, and those who hoped for a better successor to that English drinking-song, "The Star Spangled Banner," were disappointed. The beginning of the march was military enough, and presented trumpet fanfares galore, and as much "Turkish Music" (bass-drum, cymbals, and other percussion) as would fill the vast Chicago auditorium, and it more than filled Music Hall. The two themes of the work are well contrasted and broadly treated, always with a view to heavy effects, for the Western occasion would not permit of delicate touches. Artificial groupings occur frequently and prevent any trace of monotony. The climax is a most worthy one, and is, in the opinion of the writer, decidedly higher than if the composer had culminated with one of our national tunes. The lofty theme of the chorus reminds of that subject with which the composer culminated his second symphony, and like that majestic theme it is in 3-2 rhythm. Words and music form just the right keystone to the arch, and while such a work can never make its due impression in the calm atmosphere of Music Hall, it has formed a worthy prelude to one of the most important of American events.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1893.

The Fourteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Coriolan".....Beethoven
"The Skeleton in Armor," Ballad for chorus, quartette and orchestra. (First time in Boston).....Foote
"A Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra....Brahms
"Columbus March and Hymn." (First time in Boston.) Paine

Mrs. Barnard-Smith, Miss Carlsmith, Messrs. Geo. J. Parker and Clarence E. Hay sang the quartettes in Mr. Foote's ballad. The chorus was the Boston Symphony Chorus.

***

It may be said that Mr. Foote was unfortunate in his choice of a text, for Longfellow's poem does not appear to allow of rhythmic diversity in music, at least as far as Mr. Foote is concerned. The question is not whether the choice was judicious. The composer might have told of "Sir Patrick Spens," he might have dreamed over James Clarence Mangan's "Vision of Connaught," the superb and mystical poem of the time and the years of Cahal Mor of the Winered Hand; he might have taken from Percy's Reliques, "John Barleycorn" with its stirring lines,

"John Barleycorn has got a beard,
Like any other man."

Mr. Foote preferred "The Skeleton in Armor." The question is this, What did he do with it?

***

He that proposes to put music to a ballad full of panoramic incidents must, if he wishes to gain dramatic effect, treat the detail dramatically or choose two or three salient scenes and create as many moods, sharply defined and contrasting. If he consider carefully every point he is apt to lose sight of one great climax; or the effect is frittered away by italicizing so many sentences; or the work is prolonged unduly. The ballad then becomes as jejune and foolish as Dr. Johnson's celebrated burlesque:

"The tender infant, meek and mild,
Fell down upon the stone;
The nurse took up the squealing child,
But still the child squeal'd on."

Mr. Foote avoided these dangers, it is true. He also avoided, alas, dramatic intensity in his treatment of a few contrasting scenes. He employed a quartette for the expression of the wooing and the peaceful married life. He used the allegro in different degrees and with various modifications. In spite of these efforts the ballad is undramatic. The music seldom suits or intensifies the words.

A reader of imagination and well-trained voice could make a more vivid impression by reciting this poem of Longfellow. In Mr. Foote's setting the music often obscures the words and at times wars against the palpable meaning of them,

***

The questioner, the narrator and the skeleton that answers are all one and the same musical person. This one musical person is not a ventriloquist. The skeleton that once skated, led a wild life, asked the consent of Hildebrand, bore away the maid, and then, after years of quiet enjoyment, allowed his soul to go skyward by falling upon a spear, has the same voice in the episodes of his existence.

***

Is there horror in the first inquiry? No. Is awe inspired by the narration of the coming to life? No. Is the "dead man's curse" effective? No; for tempo, notation and leading of voices deny the possible existence of effect. And so throughout the catalogue of incidents. Once, it is true, Mr. Foote succeeded in giving comparative pleasure—in the pretty and conventional treatment of the few lines beginning, "Once, as I told in glee," the quartette, pp. 10-14.

***

The music is undramatic. The voices are at times treated so that their walk is stiff; at other times they are so led that the resulting harmony is dry, noisy and without effect. There is occasionally a sense of awkwardness in the reading, as in the eleventh and twelfth measures of the fifteenth page.

***

Nor can the instrumentation be praised. It is either thin or thick. The voice parts are too frequently doubled by instruments. The different choirs of instruments are not effectively used against each other. There seems to be little attention paid to the peculiar characteristics of the instruments.

***

Throughout the work there is a certain fever, but it is a slow fever. There are hints of dramatic effects that are postponed indefinitely. There are false prophecies concerning the arrival of a climax.

***

It is true that the ballad was not well sung. The chorus no doubt contains excellent material, but the parts are not well balanced; the intonation is not above reproach; the attack is not decisive. The ballad was conducted Saturday evening by its composer; it is therefore fair to say that it was read in accordance with the wishes of the composer. And yet his indications in the voice and pianoforte edition were not followed. The ballad is peppered hotly with these indications. But Saturday evening there was not one pianissimo observed, and p p p seemed as unintelligible as an hieroglyphic. There was a monotone of forte that was of close kin to fortissimo. There was little rhythmic sense. The musical sentences were not read as sentences, and there was always undue importance given to the first beat. Even the experienced singers of the quartette sang without full appreciation of the character of 9-8 movement.

***

Mr. Foote's work was applauded heartily, and he was recalled two or three times.

***

Prof. Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn" was "written by official invitation for the opening ceremonies of the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago and performed there for the first time in October of last year." It was written with a view to performance in an immense hall, with an orchestra of 200 and a chorus of 5000. To judge of its merits when it is given under different conditions might be regarded properly as unfair. These general statements may, however, be made. First, nearly all of the compositions known to the French as "official machines" may have served their purpose on the occasion for which they were written; they have seldom been of permanent worth; they have seldom preserved alone the name of the composer. Again, Prof. Paine had contributed to the musical reputation of his country by his music to "Œ dipus" and by orchestral works before the Columbian Exposition was a fact. The invitation extended to him by the managers of the exposition was a deserved tribute of respect and admiration. The acceptance of the invitation was the graceful act of a composer who knew full well the difficulties of the undertaking. To write a march that should be worthy of his reputation and of the occasion and at the same time be not devoid of the elements of popularity, that was indeed a task.

It would seem from the performance of Saturday evening that if Prof. Paine erred in the fulfillment of his task, it was in the desire to gain instantaneous popularity. Whatever may have been the effect produced at Chicago, this march cannot be classed among the most dignified, original and thoroughly musical works of the eminent composer.

***

The "Song of Destiny" has been heard in Music Hall under more favorable conditions. The Boston Symphony Chorus in its present state is not able to give such a work with proper effect.

***

There will be no public rehearsal and concert this week. The programme of the rehearsal and concert of Feb. 17-18 will be as follows: Symphonietta, E major, op. 55, Thieriot; concerto, G minor, for pianoforte, Saint-Saens; Symphony, A major, No. 7, Beethoven. The pianist will be Mr. George M. Nowell.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 5, 1893.

SYMPHONY AND SONG.

New Works by Arthur Foote and Prof. Paine.

The programme for the rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra was made particularly attractive by Mr. Nikisch, who introduced two numbers, new to this city, both of which were written by prominent resident musicians. The concert consisted of Beethoven's overture, "Coriolan," Arthur Foote's "Skeleton in Armor," for the first time, Brahms' "Song of Destiny," and John K. Paine's Columbus march and hymn for the first time here.

The Beethoven overture is one of this master's grandest works, being full of dramatic effects and furious orchestration. Short and melodic phrases are repeated by the different instruments to be suddenly interrupted by a storm of brasses. It has been called "an overture in a new form," because of Beethoven's departure from the accepted canons of overture compositions.

The orchestra, especially the strings, played the number grandly. The phrase variations illustrated the homogeneity of team work of the different instruments, the passages being given with precision and unity.

Mr. Arthur Foote's musical setting of Longfellow's "Skeleton in Armor" was given by the orchestra, Boston Symphony chorus, and the soloists, Mrs. Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Foote conducting. After a short and sombre orchestral introduction the chorus takes up the line, "Speak, Speak! Thou Fearful Guest," which is the keynote as it were, to Mr. Foote's introductory music. The spirit then changes to the heroic style, and in this allegro the chorus sang with splendid results.

MR. ARTHUR FOOTE.

In gentler strain the quartet then follows; after which the story of the Viking's flight is told, closing with song of the sea. The passing away of the Viking's lady love and his violent death close the cantata.

Mr. Foote has written a work which may be classed as artistic and musical; musical in the sense of continued harmonious forms which are not over-elaborated or intricate.

The text of the poem is beautifully illustrated by the orchestral as well as the vocal setting, and the instruments are used as a background and seldom appearing prominently excepting in the dramatic portions of the work.

The allegro, "Scarce had I put to Sea," is a charmingly breezy bit of writing, and the descriptive, "Death Without Quarter," is broadly scored for both contingents of the performers.

In the closing quartet there is a dainty theme for strings and flutes, and the vocal part is also a fine example of sympathetic writing.

The composition must inevitably take high rank as a chorus composition, for to that body is given the principal work. The orchestra did very well as a whole, although the brass contingent showed unfamiliarity with the author's style of leading.

The solo roles were well sung by Mrs. Smith, Miss Carlsmith and Messrs. Parker and Hay. Mr. Foote was cordially received, and that his fine composition gave great pleasure to the large audience was shown by the liberal applause at the close of its rendition.

Brahm's "Song of Destiny" was given a satisfactory performance. The running accompaniments by the orchestra, with the chorus singing in unison, was very smoothly played.

The last number upon the programme was Prof. John Knowles Paine's Columbus march and hymn, written for the Columbian exhibition, and played for the first time in this city. The text is also by Prof. Paine, and the work is scored for the full modern orchestra.

PROF. JOHN K. PAINE.

The style of composition is, of course, martial, and it admits of heavy and sustained effects by the brasses and instruments of percussion.

Two themes are given to the orchestra in the march, which are worked out with stentorian modulations, these joining at the close and leading up to the hymn.

The chances for lights and shades in a work of this nature are so few that one is forced to view the piece from a patriotic rather than from an artistic standpoint.

Prof. Paine has scored the march grandly and with but little of the blatant element, when the style of the production is considered. The heroics are not tawdry or commonplace; the themes are developed harmoniously and clearly, and there are many passages which thrill the auditor, especially when that auditor is an American.

It was given without the organ, hardly a noticeable omission in this case, and with the quartet and chorus.

The vocal work was spirited and generally acceptable; although the volume of the instruments was sufficient to drown the efforts of the singers in many instances.

The next programme, to be given Feb. 17 and 18, is as follows: Thieriot, symphonietta in E major, op. 55, first time; Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte in G minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 7, in A major. Soloist, Mr. George M. Nowell.

[103]

[illegible]

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8,

UNDER THE SPELL OF MR. NIKISCH.

Metzerott Hall's Audience Captivated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A typical Boston orchestra audience filled Metzerott Music Hall last evening to enjoy the pleasing programme offered by Mr. Nikisch and his band. The "standing room only" sign was displayed soon after the doors were open, and at the close of the concert the lines of carriages spread out in both directions on F street. The programme could almost be called "popular," the selections all falling pleasantly on the ear. Even those who attend the concerts because it is the "correct thing" could not fail to be aroused by such music and such playing.

Mr. Nikisch was in most gracious mood, and repeated the two most pleasing numbers, something that has never happened before in the seven years that the orchestra has been coming to the city.

The Mozart Symphony in E flat came first on the programme. It is one of Mozart's latest works, numbered forty-seven of the forty-nine, and is the one most frequently played, with the exception of the "Jupiter," No. 49. "A veritable triumph of euphony," the work is pronounced. Throughout it presents a picture of perfect happiness, the shadows here and there serving only as a background—the better to bring out the brighter parts. The gayety of the closing movement is especially pronounced, the different instruments vying with each other in their sport and play.

It is becoming a difficult thing to find adjectives to apply to the work of the orchestra. Each number seems to surpass the previous one, and the symphony was played with finish and, at the same time, with that air of abandon peculiar to Nikisch. Handel's "Largo" has been heard here before, when the violins of the orchestra stood at the front of the stage and played the solo in unison. Mr. Kneisel played the solo in a broad, artistic manner, and when the thirty violins repeated it in unison the effect was little short of the marvelous. The audience felt it, and at the close burst out in applause. Mr. Nikisch bowed, Mr. Kneisel did the same, but there was no falling off in the hand-clapping until Mr. Nikisch raised his baton to repeat the number. It is a misfortune that the composer could not have heard his famous slow movement as played last night. That he would have recognized it may be questioned, as he wrote it for one of the voices in the opening scene of the opera, "Xerxes," now long forgotten, save for this excerpt. The two dance movements from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, were of special interest to many in the audience as giving a foretaste of the work which is soon to be presented in its entirety by the Choral Society. The "Dance of the Will-o'-the-Wisps" is a delicious bit of descriptive painting, the notes of the piccolo and flutes flashing out amid the general darkness depicted by the other instruments.

The "Waltz of the Sylphs," in the words of Mr. Aptherp, "is one of the most delicate, fairy-like bits of orchestration in all music." It is simply entrancing. No wonder that Faust in his sleep dreamed of love and Marguerite. It set the blood pulsing in the veins. Mr. Nikisch was fairly forced to repeat it, and seemed to take pleasure in so doing.

The concert closed with the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, rich in coloring and full of effective passages.

The opera was given several years ago at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, but it is seldom heard anywhere. Mr. Constantin Sternberg, of Philadelphia, played Schumann's piano concerto in a scholarly and effective style.

Mr. Nikisch comes once more this season, March 14, when Paderewski will be the soloist.

NORTH AMERICAN.

PHILADELPHIA,

FEBRUARY 9, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

There was the usual crowd, the usual big crowd of society people and lovers of music, at the Academy last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave the fourth in its current series of concerts. The leading feature of a varied and liberally arranged programme was Schumann's symphony in C major, No. 2, an inspired and deeply imaginative work, which received an interpretation of such excellence and eloquence and absolute sufficiency that nothing finer is imaginable. Mr. Nikisch, who seems to be in close sympathy with Schumann, read the score with an always intelligent appreciation, and the orchestra played it not only with the utmost accuracy and brilliancy, but with a degree of power and passion, with a sensitive responsiveness to the often changing and strongly contrasted moods of the composer, which left none of the beauties of the music and nothing of its meaning unrevealed. The reading of the superb finale was especially fine, but the whole performance was a triumph of every kind of musical ability. The other orchestral numbers were Liszt's wild and whirling Mephisto waltz, Wagner's prelude to "The Meistersingers" and Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia," in which Mr. Kneisel played the violin obligato so beautifully that the audience insisted upon an encore. The soloist of the evening was Miss Minnie Wetzler, who played the Weber concerto for piano in F minor, one of Mendelssohn's "Lieder Ohne Worte" and Chopin's B-flat minor scherzo all in a very ladylike manner. The Adamowski Quartet will give its fourth concert at the New Century Club Drawing-Room this afternoon at 2.15.

[104]

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT

Philadelphia, Thursday, Feb. 9, 1893.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

One of those great audiences, of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now sure upon its appearances in this city, crowded the Academy of Music last night, at the fourth concert of the season, and the appreciativeness of the house was in proportion to its size. The symphony was the second (op. 61) of Schumann, written in 1845-46, and properly the third, which has had to fight its way as the most incomprehensible of Schumann's symphonies, since it was, on its first hearings, rejected by most of the European—probably all London—critics as obscure, unintelligible, unjustifiable and all that. Those critics can not have had it presented with the clearness, precision and warmth of expression that characterized its interpretation last night. To be sure, Schumann had to meet the opposition all innovators have to face. Even at this day one can sympathize with the taste and judgment that pronounced the opening movement somewhat morbid. It suggests something of the mood that drove the poor master—pursued by a single tone from which others fell like a shower of meteorites in his imagination—to throw himself into the Rhine. The persistency with which he adheres to the key of C major throughout—except in part of the Adagio and a portion of the first trio—might carry this thought farther into the work as a whole, but there is little that is either mystic or morbid in the beautifully bright and fiery energy of the second and fourth movements or in the lovely adagio, which was played with marked delicacy and tenderness. As to whether Mr. Nikisch divines the whole meaning of this great work it would be neither pertinent nor profitable to inquire at this juncture. His reading of it gave great satisfaction to the critical audience which made the fact entirely clear.

The remaining orchestral numbers were Liszt's graphic Tavern scene from Lenau's "Faust," Gounod's Hymn to St. Cecilia, which had to be repeated in response to demands that were made imperative, a fact due in large measure to Mr. Kneisel's beautiful performance of the violin solo, the prelude to the "Meistersinger." The part the orchestra bore in Weber's concerto for piano and orchestra, it should be added, was among the most enjoyable of its contributions.

The soloist in the concertstueck was Miss Minnie Wetzler, who had the technical power, understanding and feeling to make a very good impression upon the audience, which extended a triple recall to her at its conclusion. She was afterward heard in a couple of unaccompanied pieces. The final concert of the season takes place next month.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fourth Concert at the Academy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played at the Academy of Music last evening a programme well selected to show the power of the organization in expressing fine shades of emotion. The pieces were all emotional, but emotional within bounds. In the interpretation of refined music this orchestra is well nigh perfect. It played the Adajio in Schumann's curious symphony No. 2 with abundant feeling. Its significant work in performing Liszt's music to Lennau's "Faust" was admirable. Its rendering of the longing in Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia" was delightfully appropriate. It was especially successful in the final climax of the "Meistersinger." Mr. Kneisel played the violin solo in the Hymn with fine understanding and beautiful tone.

Miss Minnie Wetzler, who performed Weber's "concert piece for piano and orchestra," a song without words, and part of a Chopin Sonata, is a fairly good pianist. She has a singing touch and good discrimination is manifest in her expression, but she seems to lack physical strength.

The audience was large and persistent in applause. An encore of the "Hymn to St. Cecilia" was granted.

Musical Notes.

The Adamowski Quartette will give its fourth concert in this city this season this afternoon in the New Century Drawing Room. Constantin Sternberg, the pianist, will be the soloist.

This will be "English Composers Day" in the series of Thursday afternoon concerts by the Germania Orchestra at the Academy of the Fine Arts.

The names of Lillian Nordica, Sofi Scalchi, Marie Engel, Italo Campanini, Giuseppe Del Puente and Emil Fischer compose the strong array offered in the announcement by Mr. Ellis of the Nordica operatic concert to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening of next week.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 11, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Before proceeding to consider the quality of the fourteenth Symphony concert, it must be said that the programme, consisting chiefly of three choral works, had no good right to intrude upon such a series. It is quite proper enough to make a place among orchestral concerts for Schumann's "Manfred" or Beethoven's "Egmont" music, because some of the most important portions of each were designed for an orchestra. But when the orchestra is purely subsidiary to vocal effects, the composition should be excluded, even though a conductor, ambitious to try his hand at a little of everything, should have at his disposition a first-rate chorus. The Symphony chorus is a great way from that. It appears to be made up chiefly of the stray singers, left stranded from the wrecks of other organizations, and the best that can be said of its second appearance is that it was not so bad as the first. It is imperfectly balanced, hesitating in attack and uncertain in difficulties, quite unobservant of light and shade and dynamics, and not to be named in comparison with the Cecilia. And even if it were of better material and undertook its duties more clearly, it could hardly accomplish much more for good, with so strong a band interposed between its sections. It is merely an inefficient body doing inadequately music which should be left to the societies formed for it, while the orchestra should stick to its legitimate field, of which so much is left untouched. Two works by Boston composers were performed—Mr. Arthur Foote's setting for chorus, solo quartette and orchestra of Longfellow's "Skeleton in Armor," and Professor John K. Paine's march and chorus, written for the inauguration of the Columbian Exposition last autumn. Mr. Foote's cantata is a mistake, in spite of some good kapellmeister writing in it, and in spite of his talent, indisputably worthy of much respect and his unquestionable earnestness and sincerity. A descriptive or narrative ballad may be taken properly enough as the basis for a cantata—but a monologue ballad never. Longfellow's stanzas are but the utterance of a single person who repeats what he has seen and heard of a strange visitant, and to distribute them round between a chorus and a quartette is simply illogical, musically and rhetorically, and not even a splendid setting could justify it. Mr. Foote's music is generally well put together and it has some graceful sentimental passages; but it is not for one instant dramatic, whether in the vocal or the instrumental score. If he feels impelled to do something with the poem, let him try his hand at some purely incidental and illustrative pages and couple them with such a powerful presentment of the story as a fine dramatic reader might give. Professor Paine's music was of course made to order and must be judged by the requirements of a vast space, a big mass of performers and the mightier demands of the proud and exuberant West. It is grandiose, pompous, loud, dsmonstrative and almost bombastic; yet it has dignity too, has musicianly wisdom, strength and reserve. The composer has done successfully a thing which is a good deal harder than it might seem at first—he has written a march which has "go" and vigor to it, without being tawdry or commonplace, and he has contrasted and combined themes in it without scholasticism or confusion. Heard as it was meant to be heard, it would probably be much more approved, as, per contra, the scene-painter's most delicate landscape would seem coarse in any gallery. Between these was put Brahms's "Song of Destiny," which was rather ineffectively given, and at the head of the programme stood Beethoven's "Coriolanas" overture, which was well read, but the effect of which was muffled by the encompassing bodies of the choristers.

There will be no concert tonight, the orchestra having been absent during the week on their monthly tours.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 7. Februar 1893.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Für das morgen Abend in der Academy of Music stattfindende vierte große Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters hat Herr Dirigent Arthur Nikisch ein interessantes Programm aufgestellt. Die zweite Symphonie von Schumann, der Mephisto-Walzer von Liszt, die Hymne an die heilige Cäcilia von Gounod und das Vorspiel zu Wagners „Meistersinger" werden vom Orchester zum Vortrag gebracht werden. Als Solistin wird eine junge Pianistin, Miß Minnie Wetzler, welcher ein trefflicher Ruf vorausgeht, mitwirken. Dieselbe wird das Concertstück von Weber und mehrere andere Soli vortragen. Tickets sind in No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

Das Kneisel Quartett, bestehend aus den Herrn Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, Otto Svecenski und Alwin Schröder, sämmtlich Mitglieder des Boston Symphonie Orchesters, trat gestern hier zum ersten Male im New Century Drawing Room in einem Konzert auf, welches den Musikfreunden große Kunstgenüsse bereitete. Es wurde Kammer-Musik geboten und zwar in so meisterhafter Weise, wie man sie eben selten zu hören bekommt. Beethoven G. Dur Konzert, Grieges Quartett in G Moll und Schuberts D Moll Quartett wurden in gleich vorzüglicher Weise zum Vortrag gebracht. Hoffentlich wird die Kneisel'sche Organisation sehr bald wieder einmal hierher zum Besuch kommen.

Das Vierte Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch findet unter Mitwirkung der Pianistin Miß Minnie Wetzler am Mittwoch Abend in der Academy of Music statt.

Außer Schumanns zweiter Symphonie bietet das Programm Webers Konzertstück für Piano, den Mephisto-Walzer von Liszt, Hymne an die heilige Cecilie von Gounod, eine weitere Piano-Nummer und Vorspiel zu „Die Meistersinger".

[illegible]

Donnerstag, 9. Februar [illegible].

Das vierte große Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters fand gestern Abend unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch in der Academy of Music vor einem sehr zahlreichen und kunstsinnigen Publikum statt. Es bot ein reichhaltiges und interessantes Programm. Schuhmanns C Dur Symphonie No. 2, wurde in echt künstlerischer Weise zum Vortrag gebracht, so daß die anwesenden Musiker und Musikfreunde in enthusiastischen Beifall ausbrachen. Die andern Orchesternummern waren Liszt wilder Mephistowalzer, das Vorspiel zu Wagners „Meistersinger" und „Gounods Hymne an St. Cäcilia, in welcher der Konzertmeister des Orchesters Herr Kneisel das Violin-Solo so herrlich zum Vortrag brachte, daß das Publikum nicht ruhte, bis er es wiederholte. Miß Minnie Wetzler, eine sehr tüchtige im Westen und in Frankfurt a. M. ausgebildete Pianistin spielte mit Orchesterbegleitung Webers „Konzertstück", in welchem ihr besonders das „Presto" gelang, sowie ein „Lied ohne Worte" von Mendelssohn und ein Chopinsches Scherzo und entfaltete dabei sehr bedeutende Technik, sowie poetische Auffassung. Das Konzert wird den Musikfreunden noch lange in angenehmer Erinnerung bleiben.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 12, 1893.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, gave its fourth concert, the last but one of the series, at Chickering hall, New York, last Thursday evening. The programme was: Overture, "Flying Dutchman," Wagner; concerto for violoncello No. 3, Davidoff; symphony in A major (Italian), Mendelssohn; Mephisto waltz, Liszt; prelude "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist.

The Kneisel quartette gave a concert at Chickering hall, New York, yesterday afternoon. They played the Quartette E major, op. 80, Dvorak; quartette, G major, op. 18, Beethoven; quintette for clarinet, two violins, viola, and cello, B minor, op. 115, Brahms.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, FEB. 12, 1893.

—The audience at the last Symphony concert was uncommonly "smart." Mrs. Arthur Rotch was looking exceedingly well, and Mrs. Charles Inches more lovely than ever in black. Mrs. Montgomery Sears bore her recent honors with becoming gravity, and looked very well. Perhaps the most conspicuous person in the large audience, where almost every one looks gloomy in the dim light, was the fair maiden who graced the upper balcony with her large and picturesque white hat and starry white bow. The chorus added to the gloom of the scene by wearing dark gowns, instead of enlivening the stage by their pretty costumes, as do the ladies of the Cecilia chorus.

BOSTON COURIER,

, FEBRUARY 12, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartet tomorrow evening in Chickering Hall promises one of the best concerts in the series. Mr. Jules Jordan and Mr. Arthur Whiting will assist the quartet in the following interesting programme: Trio in B major, op. 8, Brahms; songs with piano; quartet in E major, op. 80, Dvorak. There is said to be a good demand for the tickets, which are on sale at Music Hall.

THE WASHINGTON POST

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 8,

UNDER THE SPELL OF MR. NIKISCH.

Metzerott Hall's Audience Captivated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A typical Boston orchestra audience filled Metzerott Music Hall last evening to enjoy the pleasing programme offered by Mr. Nikisch and his band. The "standing room only" sign was displayed soon after the doors were open, and at the close of the concert the lines of carriages spread out in both directions on F street. The programme could almost be called "popular," the selections all falling pleasantly on the ear. Even those who attend the concerts because it is the "correct thing" could not fail to be aroused by such music and such playing.

Mr. Nikisch was in most gracious mood, and repeated the two most pleasing numbers, something that has never happened before in the seven years that the orchestra has been coming to the city.

The Mozart Symphony in E flat came first on the programme. It is one of Mozart's latest works, numbered forty-seven of the forty-nine, and is the one most frequently played, with the exception of the "Jupiter," No. 49. "A veritable triumph of euphony," the work is pronounced. Throughout it presents a picture of perfect happiness, the shadows here and there serving only as a background—the better to bring out the brighter parts. The gayety of the closing movement is especially pronounced, the different instruments vying with each other in their sport and play.

It is becoming a difficult thing to find adjectives to apply to the work of the orchestra. Each number seems to surpass the previous one, and the symphony was played with finish and, at the same time, with that air of abandon peculiar to Nikisch. Handel's "Largo" has been heard here before, when the violins of the orchestra stood at the front of the stage and played the solo in unison. Mr. Kneisel played the solo in a broad, artistic manner, and when the thirty violins repeated it in unison the effect was little short of the marvelous. The audience felt it, and at the close burst out in applause. Mr. Nikisch bowed, Mr. Kneisel did the same, but there was no falling off in the hand-clapping until Mr. Nikisch raised his baton to repeat the number. It is a misfortune that the composer could not have heard his famous slow movement as played last night. That he would have recognized it may be questioned, as he wrote it for one of the voices in the opening scene of the opera, "Xerxes," now long forgotten, save for this excerpt. The two dance movements from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, were of special interest to many in the audience as giving a foretaste of the work which is soon to be presented in its entirety by the Choral Society. The "Dance of the Will-o'-the-Wisps" is a delicious bit of descriptive painting, the notes of the piccolo and flutes flashing out amid the general darkness depicted by the other instruments.

The "Waltz of the Sylphs," in the words of Mr. Apthorp, "is one of the most delicate, fairy-like bits of orchestration in all music." It is simply entrancing. No wonder that Faust in his sleep dreamed of love and Marguerite. It set the blood pulsing in the veins. Mr. Nikisch was fairly forced to repeat it, and seemed to take pleasure in so doing.

The concert closed with the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, rich in coloring and full of effective passages.

The opera was given several years ago at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, but it is seldom heard anywhere. Mr. Constantin Sternberg, of Philadelphia, played Schumann's piano concerto in a scholarly and effective style.

Mr. Nikisch comes once more this season, March 14, when Paderewski will be the soloist.

NORTH AMERICAN.

PHILADELPHIA,

FEBRUARY 9, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

There was the usual crowd, the usual big crowd of society people and lovers of music, at the Academy last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave the fourth in its current series of concerts. The leading feature of a varied and liberally arranged programme was Schumann's symphony in C major, No. 2, an inspired and deeply imaginative work, which received an interpretation of such excellence and eloquence and absolute sufficiency that nothing finer is imaginable. Mr. Nikisch, who seems to be in close sympathy with Schumann, read the score with an always intelligent appreciation, and the orchestra played it not only with the utmost accuracy and brilliancy, but with a degree of power and passion, with a sensitive responsiveness to the often changing and strongly contrasted moods of the composer, which left none of the beauties of the music and nothing of its meaning unrevealed. The reading of the superb finale was especially fine, but the whole performance was a triumph of every kind of musical ability. The other orchestral numbers were Liszt's wild and whirling Mephisto waltz, Wagner's prelude to "The Meistersingers" and Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia," in which Mr. Kneisel played the violin obligato so beautifully that the audience insisted upon an encore. The soloist of the evening was Miss Minnie Wetzler, who played the Weber concerto for piano in F minor, one of Mendelssohn's "Lieder Ohne Worte" and Chopin's B-flat minor scherzo all in a very ladylike manner. The Adamowski Quartet will give its fourth concert at the New Century Club Drawing-Room this afternoon at 2.15.

[104]

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT

Philadelphia, Thursday, Feb. 9, 1893.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

One of those great audiences, of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now sure upon its appearances in this city, crowded the Academy of Music last night, at the fourth concert of the season, and the appreciativeness of the house was in proportion to its size. The symphony was the second (op. 61) of Schumann, written in 1845-46, and properly the third, which has had to fight its way as the most incomprehensible of Schumann's symphonies, since it was, on its first hearings, rejected by most of the European—probably all London—critics as obscure, unintelligible, unjustifiable and all that. Those critics can not have had it presented with the clearness, precision and warmth of expression that characterized its interpretation last night. To be sure, Schumann had to meet the opposition all innovators have to face. Even at this day one can sympathize with the taste and judgment that pronounced the opening movement somewhat morbid. It suggests something of the mood that drove the poor master—pursued by a single tone from which others fell like a shower of meteorites in his imagination—to throw himself into the Rhine. The persistency with which he adheres to the key of C major throughout—except in part of the Adagio and a portion of the first trio—might carry this thought farther into the work as a whole, but there is little that is either mystic or morbid in the beautifully bright and fiery energy of the second and fourth movements or in the lovely adagio, which was played with marked delicacy and tenderness. As to whether Mr. Nikisch divines the whole meaning of this great work it would be neither pertinent nor profitable to inquire at this juncture. His reading of it gave great satisfaction to the critical audience which made the fact entirely clear.

The remaining orchestral numbers were Liszt's graphic Tavern scene from Lenau's "Faust," Gounod's Hymn to St. Cecilia, which had to be repeated in response to demands that were made imperative, a fact due in large measure to Mr. Kneisel's beautiful performance of the violin solo, the prelude to the "Meistersinger." The part the orchestra bore in Weber's concerto for piano and orchestra, it should be added, was among the most enjoyable of its contributions.

The soloist in the concertstueck was Miss Minnie Wetzler, who had the technical power, understanding and feeling to make a very good impression upon the audience, which extended a triple recall to her at its conclusion. She was afterward heard in a couple of unaccompanied pieces. The final concert of the season takes place next month.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fourth Concert at the Academy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played at the Academy of Music last evening a programme well selected to show the power of the organization in expressing fine shades of emotion. The pieces were all emotional, but emotional within bounds. In the interpretation of refined music this orchestra is well nigh perfect. It played the Adajio in Schumann's curious symphony No. 2 with abundant feeling. Its significant work in performing Liszt's music to Lennau's "Faust" was admirable. Its rendering of the longing in Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia" was delightfully appropriate. It was especially successful in the final climax of the "Meistersinger." Mr. Kheisel played the violin solo in the Hymn with fine understanding and beautiful tone.

Miss Minnie Wetzler, who performed Weber's "concert piece for piano and orchestra," a song without words, and part of a Chopin Sonata, is a fairly good pianist. She has a singing touch and good discrimination is manifest in her expression, but she seems to lack physical strength.

The audience was large and persistent in applause. An encore of the "Hymn to St. Cecilia" was granted.

Musical Notes.

The Adamowski Quartette will give its fourth concert in this city this season this afternoon in the New Century Drawing Room. Constantin Sternberg, the pianist, will be the soloist.

This will be "English Composers Day" in the series of Thursday afternoon concerts by the Germania Orchestra at the Academy of the Fine Arts.

The names of Lillian Nordica, Sofi Scalchi, Marie Engel, Italo Campanini, Giuseppe Del Puente and Emil Fischer compose the strong array offered in the announcement by Mr. Ellis of the Nordica operatic concert to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening of next week.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 11, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Before proceeding to consider the quality of the fourteenth Symphony concert, it must be said that the programme, consisting chiefly of three choral works, had no good right to intrude upon such a series. It is quite proper enough to make a place among orchestral concerts for Schumann's "Manfred" or Beethoven's "Egmont" music, because some of the most important portions of each were designed for an orchestra. But when the orchestra is purely subsidiary to vocal effects, the composition should be excluded, even though a conductor, ambitious to try his hand at a little of everything, should have at his disposition a first-rate chorus. The Symphony chorus is a great way from that. It appears to be made up chiefly of the stray singers, left stranded from the wrecks of other organizations, and the best that can be said of its second appearance is that it was not so bad as the first. It is imperfectly balanced, hesitating in attack and uncertain in difficulties, quite unobservant of light and shade and dynamics, and not to be named in comparison with the Cecilia. And even if it were of better material and undertook its duties more clearly, it could hardly accomplish much more for good, with so strong a band interposed between its sections. It is merely an inefficient body doing inadequately music which should be left to the societies formed for it, while the orchestra should stick to its legitimate field, of which so much is left untouched. Two works by Boston composers were performed—Mr. Arthur Foote's setting for chorus, solo quartette and orchestra of Longfellow's "Skeleton in Armor," and Professor John K. Paine's march and chorus, written for the inauguration of the Columbian Exposition last autumn. Mr. Foote's cantata is a mistake, in spite of some good kapellmeister writing in it, and in spite of his talent, indisputably worthy of much respect and his unquestionable earnestness and sincerity. A descriptive or narrative ballad may be taken properly enough as the basis for a cantata—but a monologue ballad never. Longfellow's stanzas are but the utterance of a single person who repeats what he has seen and heard of a strange visitant, and to distribute them round between a chorus and a quartette is simply illogical, musically and rhetorically, and not even a splendid setting could justify it. Mr. Foote's music is generally well put together and it has some graceful sentimental passages; but it is not for one instant dramatic, whether in the vocal or the instrumental score. If he feels impelled to do something with the poem, let him try his hand at some purely incidental and illustrative pages and couple them with such a powerful presentment of the story as a fine dramatic reader might give. Professor Paine's music was of course made to order and must be judged by the requirements of a vast space, a big mass of performers and the mightier demands of the proud and exuberant West. It is grandiose, pompous, loud, dsmonstrative and almost bombastic; yet it has dignity too, has musicianly wisdom, strength and reserve. The composer has done successfully a thing which is a good deal harder than it might seem at first—he has written a march which has "go" and vigor to it, without being tawdry or commonplace, and he has contrasted and combined themes in it without scholasticism or confusion. Heard as it was meant to be heard, it would probably be much more approved, as, per contra, the scene-painter's most delicate landscape would seem coarse in any gallery. Between these was put Brahms's "Song of Destiny," which was rather ineffectively given, and at the head of the programme stood Beethoven's "Coriolanas" overture, which was well read, but the effect of which was muffled by the encompassing bodies of the choristers.

There will be no concert tonight, the orchestra having been absent during the week on their monthly tours.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 7. Februar 1893.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Für das morgen Abend in der Academy of Music stattfindende vierte große Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters hat Herr Dirigent Arthur Nikisch ein interessantes Programm aufgestellt. Die zweite Symphonie von Schumann, der Mephisto-Walzer von Liszt, die Hymne an die heilige Cäcilia von Gounod und das Vorspiel zu Wagners „Meistersinger" werden vom Orchester zum Vortrag gebracht werden. Als Solistin wird eine junge Pianistin, Miß Minnie Wetzler, welcher ein trefflicher Ruf vorausgeht, mitwirken. Dieselbe wird das Concertstück von Weber und mehrere andere Soli vortragen. Tickets sind in No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

Das Kneisel Quartett, bestehend aus den Herrn Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, Otto Svecenski und Alwin Schröder, sämmtlich Mitglieder des Boston Symphonie Orchesters, trat gestern hier zum ersten Male im New Century Drawing Room in einem Konzert auf, welches den Musikfreunden große Kunstgenüsse bereitete. Es wurde Kammer-Musik geboten und zwar in so meisterhafter Weise, wie man sie eben selten zu hören bekommt. Beethoven G. Dur Konzert, Griegs Quartett in G Moll und Schuberts D Moll Quartett wurden in gleich vorzüglicher Weise zum Vortrag gebracht. Hoffentlich wird die Kneisel'sche Organisation sehr bald wieder einmal hierher zum Besuch kommen.

Das Vierte Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch findet unter Mitwirkung der Pianistin Miß Minnie Wetzler am Mittwoch Abend in der Academy of Music statt.

Außer Schumanns zweiter Symphonie bietet das Programm Webers Konzertstück für Piano, den Mephisto-Walzer von Liszt, Hymne an die heilige Cecilie von Gounod, eine weitere Piano-Nummer und Vorspiel zu „Die Meistersinger".

Tickets sind in No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Donnerstag, 9. Februar 1893.

Das vierte große Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters fand gestern Abend unter Leitung des Herrn Arthur Nikisch in der Academy of Music vor einem sehr zahlreichen und kunstsinnigen Publikum statt. Es bot ein reichhaltiges und interessantes Programm. Schuhmanns C Dur Symphonie No. 2, wurde in echt künstlerischer Weise zum Vortrag gebracht, so daß die anwesenden Musiker und Musikfreunde in enthusiastischen Beifall ausbrachen. Die andern Orchesternummern waren Liszt wilder Mephistowalzer, das Vorspiel zu Wagners „Meistersinger" und „Gounods Hymne an St. Cäcilia, in welcher der Konzertmeister des Orchesters Herr Kneisel das Violin-Solo so herrlich zum Vortrag brachte, daß das Publikum nicht ruhte, bis er es wiederholte. Miß Minnie Wetzler, eine sehr tüchtige im Westen und in Frankfurt a. M. ausgebildete Pianistin spielte mit Orchesterbegleitung Webers „Konzertstück", in welchem ihr besonders das „Presto" gelang, sowie ein „Lied ohne Worte" von Mendelssohn und ein Chopiniches Scherzo und entfaltete dabei sehr bedeutende Technik, sowie poetische Auffassung. Das Konzert wird den Musikfreunden noch lange in angenehmer Erinnerung bleiben.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 12, 1893.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, gave its fourth concert, the last but one of the series, at Chickering hall, New York, last Thursday evening. The programme was: Overture, "Flying Dutchman," Wagner; concerto for violoncello No. 3, Davidoff; symphony in A major (Italian), Mendelssohn; Mephisto waltz, Liszt; prelude "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist.

The Kneisel quartette gave a concert at Chickering hall, New York, yesterday afternoon. They played the Quartette E major, op. 80, Dvorak; quartette, G major, op. 18, Beethoven; quintette for clarinet, two violins, viola, and 'cello, B minor, op. 115, Brahms.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, FEB. 12, 1893.

— The audience at the last Symphony concert was uncommonly "smart." Mrs. Arthur Rotch was looking exceedingly well, and Mrs. Charles Inches more lovely than ever in black. Mrs. Montgomery Sears bore her recent honors with becoming gravity, and looked very well. Perhaps the most conspicuous person in the large audience, where almost every one looks gloomy in the dim light, was the fair maiden who graced the upper balcony with her large and picturesque white hat and starry white bow. The chorus added to the gloom of the scene by wearing dark gowns, instead of enlivening the stage by their pretty costumes, as do the ladies of the Cecilia chorus.

BOSTON COURIER.

, FEBRUARY 12, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartet tomorrow evening in Chickering Hall promises one of the best concerts in the series. Mr. Jules Jordan and Mr. Arthur Whiting will assist the quartet in the following interesting programme: Trio in B major, op. 8, Brahms; songs with piano; quartet in E major, op. 80, Dvorak. There is said to be a good demand for the tickets, which are on sale at Music Hall.

THE WASHINGTON POST,
FEBRUARY 8, 1893.

UNDER THE SPELL OF MR. NIKISCH.

Metzerott Hall's Audience Captivated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A typical Boston orchestra audience filled Metzerott Music Hall last evening to enjoy the pleasing programme offered by Mr. Nikisch and his band. The "standing room only" sign was displayed soon after the doors were open, and at the close of the concert the lines of carriages spread out in both directions on F street. The programme could almost be called "popular," the selections all falling pleasantly on the ear. Even those who attend the concerts because it is the "correct thing" could not fail to be aroused by such music and such playing.

Mr. Nikisch was in most gracious mood, and repeated the two most pleasing numbers, something that has never happened before in the seven years that the orchestra has been coming to the city.

The Mozart Symphony in E flat came first on the programme. It is one of Mozart's latest works, numbered forty-seven of the forty-nine, and is the one most frequently played, with the exception of the "Jupiter." No. 49. "A veritable triumph of euphony," the work is pronounced. Throughout it presents a picture of perfect happiness, the shadows here and there serving only as a background—the better to bring out the brighter parts. The gayety of the closing movement is especially pronounced, the different instruments vying with each other in their sport and play.

It is becoming a difficult thing to find adjectives to apply to the work of the orchestra. Each number seems to surpass the previous one, and the symphony was played with finish and, at the same time, with that air of abandon peculiar to Nikisch. Handel's "Largo" has been heard here before, when the violins of the orchestra stood at the front of the stage and played the solo in unison. Mr. Kneisel played the solo in a broad, artistic manner, and when the thirty violins repeated it in unison the effect was little short of the marvelous. The audience felt it, and at the close burst out in applause. Mr. Nikisch bowed, Mr. Kneisel did the same, but there was no falling off in the hand-clapping until Mr. Nikisch raised his baton to repeat the number. It is a misfortune that the composer could not have heard his famous slow movement as played last night. That he would have recognized it may be questioned, as he wrote it for one of the voices in the opening scene of the opera, "Xerxes," now long forgotten, save for this excerpt. The two dance movements from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, were of special interest to many in the audience as giving a foretaste of the work which is soon to be presented in its entirety by the Choral Society. The "Dance of the Will-o'-the-Wisps" is a delicious bit of descriptive painting, the notes of the piccolo and flutes flashing out amid the general darkness depicted by the other instruments.

The "Waltz of the Sylphs," in the words of Mr. Apthorp, "is one of the most delicate, fairy-like bits of orchestration in all music." It is simply entrancing. No wonder that Faust in his sleep dreamed of love and Marguerite. It set the blood pulsing in the veins. Mr. Nikisch was fairly forced to repeat it, and seemed to take pleasure in so doing.

The concert closed with the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, rich in coloring and full of effective passages.

The opera was given several years ago at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, but it is seldom heard anywhere. Mr. Constantin Sternberg, of Philadelphia, played Schumann's piano concerto in a scholarly and effective style.

Mr. Nikisch comes once more this season, March 14, when Paderewski will be the soloist.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1893.

Boston Symphony Concert.

A large and brilliant audience which occupied every seat in the Academy of Music was present at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, listening with attention which was broken only by applause. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61, Schumann
Concertstueck for piano and orchestra in F minor..... Weber
Episode from Lenau's "Faust"..... Liszt
Hymn to St Cecilia..... Gounod
Solo, Violin, Mr. Kneisel,
Solo for piano.
(a) Song Without Words.....Mendelssohn
(b) Scherzo, in B flat minor.....Chopin
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner

The Schumann symphony, with its characteristic trumpet call, a short phrase of four notes, which reappears at intervals in all but one of the four movements, was performed by Mr. Nikisch's orchestra in truly noble style, all the delicacy of Schumann's work being cleverly brought out until the whole formed a perfect tone-picture. The "Faust" episode is a lively waltz movement, and its vivaciousness was well exemplified in the interpretation. The Weber and Gounod selections were given with fervor, force and effect. The grandest effort of the evening was undoubtedly the Wagner selection, which was given magnificently. Miss Minnie Wetzler was the soloist and was particularly successful in her rendition of the Chopin scherzo.

The fourth concert of the Adamowski Quartet will take place this afternoon at 2.15 o'clock at the New Century Drawing Room. Mr. Sternberg will be the soloist and a fine program has been selected.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, Feb. 9, 1893.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

One of those great audiences, of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now sure upon its appearances in this city, crowded the Academy of Music last night, at the fourth concert of the season, and the appreciativeness of the house was in proportion to its size. The symphony was the second (op. 61) of Schumann, written in 1845-46, and properly the third, which has had to fight its way as the most incomprehensible of Schumann's symphonies, since it was, on its first hearings, rejected by most of the European—probably all London—critics as obscure, unintelligible, unjustifiable and all that. Those critics can not have had it presented with the clearness, precision and warmth of expression that characterized its interpretation last night. To be sure, Schumann had to meet the opposition all innovators have to face. Even at this day one can sympathize with the taste and judgment that pronounced the opening movement somewhat morbid. It suggests something of the mood that drove the poor master—pursued by a single tone from which others fell like a shower of meteorites in his imagination—to throw himself into the Rhine. The persistency with which he adheres to the key of C major throughout—except in part of the Adagio and a portion of the first trio—might carry this thought farther into the work as a whole, but there is little that is either mystic or morbid in the beautifully bright and fiery energy of the second and fourth movements or in the lovely adagio, which was played with marked delicacy and tenderness. As to whether Mr. Nikisch divines the whole meaning of this great work it would be neither pertinent nor profitable to inquire at this juncture. His reading of it gave great satisfaction to the critical audience which made the fact entirely clear.

The remaining orchestral numbers were Liszt's graphic Tavern scene from Lenau's "Faust," Gounod's Hymn to St. Cecilia, which had to be repeated in response to demands that were made imperative, a fact due in large measure to Mr. Kneisel's beautiful performance of the violin solo, the prelude to the "Meistersinger." The part the orchestra bore in Weber's concerto for piano and orchestra, it should be added, was among the most enjoyable of its contributions.

The soloist in the concertstueck was Miss Minnie Wetzler, who had the technical power, understanding and feeling to make a very good impression upon the audience, which extended a triple recall to her at its conclusion. She was afterward heard in a couple of unaccompanied pieces. The final concert of the season takes place next month.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, FEB. 10, 1893.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

It is not often that so enjoyable a programme as that given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night is arranged without the introduction of a novelty or of some one of the greater symphonic works. It only goes to show that with a little judicious forethought a good deal can be done in the way of providing highly-edible musical pabulum without attempting to make the feast too solid. To be sure, the concert began with a work of sufficient seriousness of mood, though not one of magnitude in extent. It is long past the time when any interesting comment can be made on Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, but it may be said here that it belong to a class of emotionally rich compositions, for which Mr. Nikisch's fine perceptions and sensitive sympathy peculiarly fit him to be an interpreter.

He is sometimes charged with overelaborating Wagner and thereby losing some of the sweeping majesty of the avalanches of instrumentation which the mightiest master of score lets loose. But it may be questioned whether any one noted this in his reading of "The Flying Dutchman" overture. The second number on the list was the third violoncello concerto of that excellent player and prolific composer, Davidoff, which was performed with great beauty of tone, finish, and intelligence by the first 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwyn Schroeder.

Then followed a bright and happy work not heard here often in recent years—Mendelssohn's A major symphony, known as the "Italian" symphony. It is hardly necessary to remind music lovers that this work is full of its composer's suave, fluent melody, his gracefulness and elegance of development, and his unfailing charm of instrumentation. The work was beautifully read and beautifully played.

Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which followed, is liked very much by admirers of Liszt. To those whose taste has not yet been educated up to an enjoyment of the Abbé's dissected melodies it is not a succulent bit. The orchestra played it better than it deserved to be played. The concert concluded with a broad and eloquent performance of the noble prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." This afternoon the orchestra will play at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 9, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening Mr. Nikisch had made up a varied programme. It opened with the C major symphony of Schumann, a complex work which Mr. Nikisch interprets with extraordinary analytical intelligence and skill and in a poetical spirit that gives the utmost value to its beauties of detail and to its romantic inventiveness. It is not necessary here to discuss the character of the symphony; in refinement of execution the performance has been excelled by nothing that this fine orchestra has done. The soloists were Miss Wetzler, who played the favorite Weber concertstueck, and Mr. Kneisel in the violin solo of Gounod's St. Cecilia hymn, and the programme included also the Mephisto waltz of Liszt and the prelude to the "Meistersinger."

NORTH AMERICAN,
PHILADELPHIA,
FEBRUARY 9, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

There was the usual crowd, the usual big crowd of society people and lovers of music, at the Academy last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave the fourth in its current series of concerts. The leading feature of a varied and liberally arranged programme was Schumann's symphony in C major, No. 2, an inspired and deeply imaginative work, which received an interpretation of such excellence and eloquence and absolute sufficiency that nothing finer is imaginable. Mr. Nikisch, who seems to be in close sympathy with Schumann, read the score with an always intelligent appreciation, and the orchestra played it not only with the utmost accuracy and brilliancy, but with a degree of power and passion, with a sensitive responsiveness to the often changing and strongly contrasted moods of the composer, which left none of the beauties of the music and nothing of its meaning unrevealed. The reading of the superb finale was especially fine, but the whole performance was a triumph of every kind of musical ability. The other orchestral numbers were Liszt's wild and whirling Mephisto waltz, Wagner's prelude to "The Meistersingers" and Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia," in which Mr. Kneisel played the violin obligato so beautifully that the audience insisted upon an encore. The soloist of the evening was Miss Minnie Wetzler, who played the Weber concerto for piano in F minor, one of Mendelssohn's "Lieder Ohne Worte" and Chopin's B-flat minor scherzo all in a very ladylike manner. The Adamowski Quartet will give its fourth concert at the New Century Club Drawing-Room this afternoon at 2.15.

NEW YORK,
THE SUN.
FEBRUARY 10, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Nikisch concert in Chickering Hall last evening was a brilliant one, both as regards audience and programme. There were two overtures by Wagner. "Der Fliegende Holländer" and the "Meistersinger;" Mendelssohn's Symphony in A major ("Italian"). Liszt's "Episode from Lenau's Faust," and one movement of Davidoff's Concerto No. 3 for violoncello.

The "Flying Dutchman" was played with a vigor and incisive strenuousness that gave to the imagination a tremendously vivid picture of the sea, and made the winds seem to howl and whistle over the desert of waters as distinctly as though the listeners were in mid-ocean during a raging storm. Nikisch brought out all the picturesqueness of this wonderfully descriptive overture, which was on the whole better interpreted than the "Meistersinger." This was too squarely cut, too rigid in tempo, too little elastic in phrasing, and lacking in impulse and spontaneity. There have been ideal renderings of this unique work in New York, in which the set and pedantic phrases of the Meistersingers were overlaid, surrounded, and intertwined by the passionate themes that represent spring and love, so that the whole mass of music surged and beat with restless motion as free and untrammelled as any growth or force of nature. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" was exceedingly interesting, artificial in character, but intellectual and refined to the highest degree, and almost as descriptive as any of Berlioz's own work. Its interpretation was a masterpiece of orchestral playing.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist, whose efforts were received most heartily and graciously by the audience. His execution was certainly remarkable, but his tone is not rich, soft, or sympathetic. It is dry and almost repellent in its stringy quality.

NEW YORK HERALD,
Y, FEBRUARY 10, 1893.—1

FOURTH NIKISCH CONCERT.

The fourth concert of the Boston Orchestra last night in Chickering Hall was attended by the usual great throng packing the house to the doors, and the work of Mr. Nikisch and his men was followed with intense interest and rewarded with much hearty applause. During the evening the leader was presented with a laurel wreath upon behalf of a number of the subscribers to these concerts.

The programme consisted of Wagner's overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Die Meistersinger," Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz. The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, who played one movement of Davidoff's third concerto for violoncello. Mr. Schroeder's tone is small but pure, and he phrases with great taste. He had the advantage of an incomparable accompaniment by the orchestra, and was rewarded with several recalls.

Of the orchestral programme the two Wagner overtures were, of course, the strongest feature, and both—particularly that of the "Dutchman"—were admirably played, Mr. Nikisch proving once more that the extreme finish of the Boston Orchestra's work is not attained at the expense of breadth and spirit. As an example of orchestral delicacy and brilliancy the "Mephisto" waltz was a tour de force. The harp passages were thrilling and the various little solos for 'cello, violin, horn and oboe were given with superb smoothness and effect. The Mendelssohn symphony was, of course, admirably played, but it is a question whether some stronger or less old fashioned work would not have been more welcome. There is a Russian composer named Rubinstein who has written some symphonies compared to which Mendelssohn's "Italian" is very wishy washy music, indeed. Mr. Nikisch ought to make their acquaintance.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 11, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

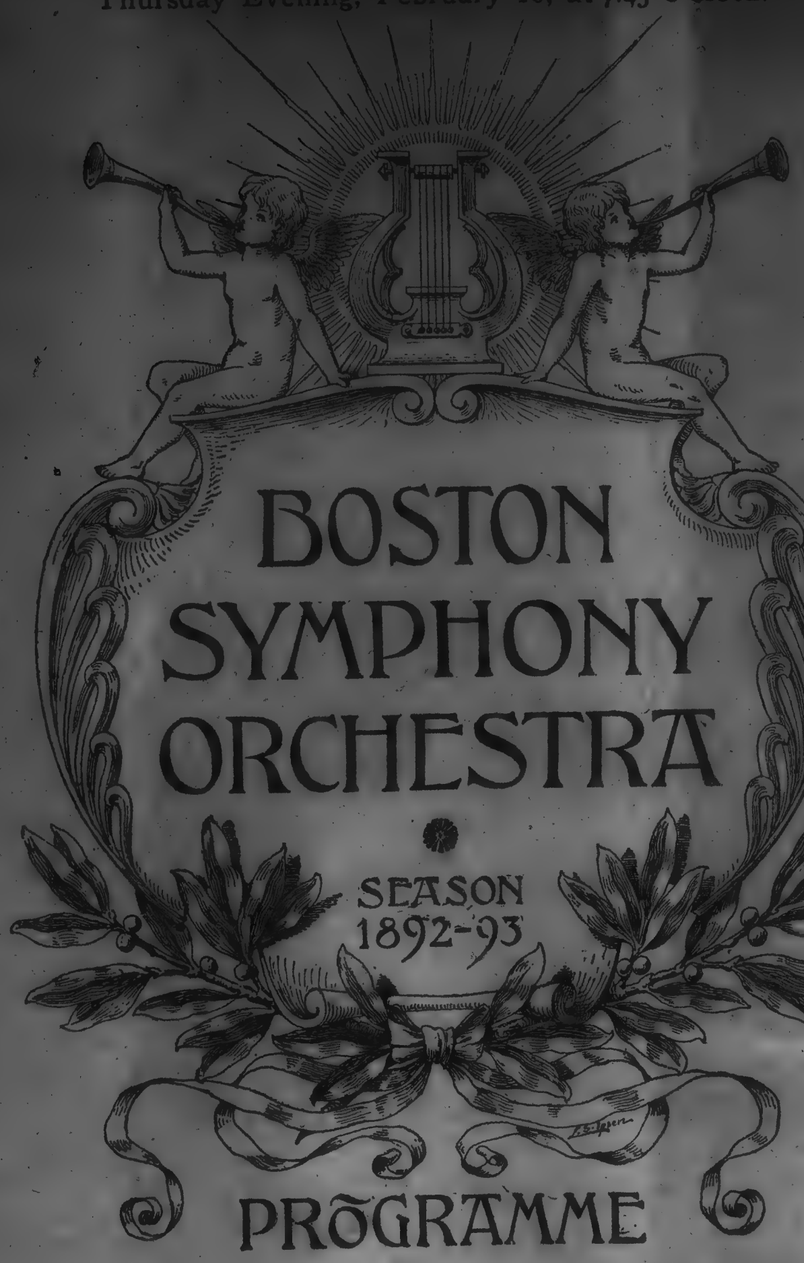
Johannes Brahms paints unbeautiful things in a beautiful manner. The Boston orchestra played his Third symphony at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon, and the beauty of the manner was therefore emphasized, but it could not make the matter lovely. This composer is just now a subject of controversy, and those who do not love him show a spirit of hatred like that of the anti Wagner element when "the Master's" wonder music began to be played in public. The cases are not quite parallel, however. There is a force of style and individuality about Wagner that Brahms does not yet possess—indeed, he affects one as a man whose style has not yet ripened. There is not the fervor in his music that will make him the chief of a new Brahminical religion, as it were, though it is hard to understand as some of the Brahminical wisdom that the theosophists tell about. It is the fault of some religions that they are deadly dull—at least, their Bibles and sermons are—so it may be that as they have prospered in spite of their drowsiness Brahms may yet be accepted as one of the great ones. He is a strong man, but he does not preach as one having authority nor a mission. There is a lack of purpose in what he does. He rambles. He cannot keep himself to any one thing. He is wanting in continuity and repose. We are so used to having things made easy for us in the arts that we accuse him of lack of form. It is as well to confess that, as yet, we frankly do not understand him, but at the same time it is pretty certain that we shall never like him extremely well. He is somewhat interesting, but not altogether engaging. It is one of his pleasures to do what he is not expected to do and to constantly disappoint the ear, thinking, maybe, that he is pleasantly surprising it. If only in his youth he had studied the Italians, or Mozart, who in his forms was Italian, he might have had something different to say to us, but he gives us only melody enough to enable us to put up with what is not melodious in the rest of his work. In the beginning of the andante in this symphony, for instance, he is as sweet and simple, for a few minutes, as Gluck—admirable and neglected man!—but the divine message that he is trying to enunciate becomes too much for him, the vapors of the Delphic pit overcome his senses, and instead of speaking reason to us he only raves. In one thing in this work he is entirely admirable: he ends it quietly. It is almost the only symphony of familiar use except Schubert's Unfinished, that closes that way. The other authors cry: "We are through playing now; watch and see us shoot the lights out." And calling in the brass and the bull fiddles and putting the wood wind on the top of its compass it screams and roars for two or three bars and the lights go out. It is a survival of that same self conscious tendency, that magnifying of self importance, that leads the Indian to smear his chaps with red and green paint when he goes into society, and that causes the circus rider after his turn, to extend his hands to the audience and wait for applause, as who would say, "Am I not a hero? Cheer me." There is one good thing about the so called naturalism that is creeping into the arts and, some think, injuring them, and that is that it is foreign to bombast and self assumption. The lesson that Brahms has taught, of foregoing the sort of declamatory conclusion that everybody is familiar with, is one that ought to sink several fathoms into the consciousness of trespassers on common sense. Praiseworthy is that speaker who knows how to sit down when he is through talking. In contrast with the erratic Brahms comes Weber with his concert piece, recently heard in Brooklyn and not worth going many miles to hear. It is played this time by Minnie Wetzler, a conscientious, young, not ill looking lass with limber fingers. But why—why—why is it necessary to have solos when there is such an orchestra as that from Boston sitting on the stage? What would be thought of a play where a scene should be interrupted by an actor coming forward and giving a quarter of an hour of recitations, suspending all the interest that comes of united action, shifting scene and heightening story? It would not be endured. Why is it that a noisy minority will have things over again when one person of no great achievement plays alone by his or her little self? Is it the same childlike interest that takes people to variety shows to see how many more flip flaps a certain acrobat can turn than the one who was there last week; that disregards a palace built with many hands and goes into ecstacies over a Chinese carving on a cherry pit? How if Mr. Nikisch were to give us a programme of just pure music some time, without any personal show? Not that Miss Wetzler made much of a show; she was modest enough; she should have been. The managers say that it is the solo that draws money into the house. Did it draw any yesterday? However, that is far from the point, which was that Weber is different from Brahms. He is. He knows what he wants and does it; not that it is always worth the doing, and the world would have gone pegging away in the same old rut and enjoying itself in a number of ways if the Concertstueck had never been written. George Bizet died too soon. Hear his Arlesian suite and testify to that fact. In the death of the composer of "Carmen" there was a distinct, great loss to the musical world. He was a creator, in a way, and he was a man whose art had so much sweetness that it is a joy to hear it. The public knows this suite, but it has not often heard it played as it was yesterday. It is full of beauties. The Handel Largo that gave Mr. Kneisel, the Roumanian kappelmeister, a legitimate opportunity to play a few bars of solo, which is right enough here, because the single passages are integral to the piece, was also delightfully rendered—smooth, stately, calm and healthful. The contrast between that and the succeeding and closing number—Wagner's "Emperor March"—affords a comprehensible measure of what the world has come to be in the century and more since the Largo was written. It has become noisier, more assertive, less concerned with forms, more with the things that forms used to be clothed upon, stronger, more restless, more intellectual, more ambitious. It has lost its fine old leisure, but it is getting a fine new habit of work, and these are a few of the things that this contrast means. It is a majestic, inspiring summing up of the glories in musical art, more than an exhibition of style. It moves resistless as Germanic power against the feeble nations that pitted have themselves against it: the same power that makes the Saxon in his continental, insular and Cisatlantic habitat the conquering race of the world. Mightily effective are the phrases of Luther's choral, "A Strong Castle is our God," that are wrought into the march, stern, rebellious phrases, declaring self reliance before all peoples. To-night at the concert the same performance will be given, plus flowers, palms and dress suits.

[105]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER

Thursday Evening, February 16, at 7.45 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.

Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MESSRS. JULES JORDAN AND ARTHUR WHITING.

VI. CONCERT.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS. TRIO, in B major, op. 8.
(Revised edition.)
Allegro con brio.—Scherzo (Allegro molto).—Adagio.—Allegro.
PIANO, Mr. Arthur Whiting.

SONGS with PIANO.

SCHUMANN. a) SPRING NIGHT.

SCHUBERT. b) WHITHER.
c) THE POST.
d) THE CARRIER DOVE.

DVOŘÁK. QUARTET, in E major, op. 80.
Allegro.—Andante con moto.—Allegro scherzando.—Finale (Allegro con brio).

The date of the Seventh Concert is February 27.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 14.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening in Chickering Hall. Mr. Arthur Whiting was the pianist. Mr. Jules Jordan was the singer. The programme was as follows:

Trio, B major, op. 8.....Brahms
Songs with piano:
a. Spring Night.....Schumann
b. Whither,
c. The Post,
d. The Carrier Dove,
.....Schubert
Quartette, E major, op. 80.....Dvorak

If the indexes of Mr. Wilson's "Musical Year Books" are trustworthy, the trio of Brahms, i. e., the original version, has not been heard in public concert in Boston since it was played during the season of '83-'84 by Miss O'Brion and Messrs. Loeffler and Mueller. When the trio was first played in Vienna (1870) the musical authorities found much to censure, although they admitted gladly the evidences of genius. There were barren wastes, harmonic and rythmic crudities, as well as indisputable proofs of "musikweist." Brahms did not revile his judges. He did not sulk. He put his trio on the anvil of correction and hammered lustily and long, until he had formed a noble thing of beauty. The incongruous fugato of the first movement was omitted, and he introduced a new subsidiary theme carefully elaborated. The scherzo, which is perhaps the finest of the movements, was slightly changed, but the finale of it was made new. Only the first measures of the adagio were allowed to remain; the second theme was dropped and another introduced; no allegro now interrupts the solemn strains. So, too, the finale was strengthened, and made more passionate. In its new form it was first played in Vienna in 1890, twenty years after the decision of the court. Here is, indeed, a lesson for modern composers who seem loath to obey the Horatian maxim.

If Brahms had always written in this clear and noble style, if he had been always willing to acknowledge the force of Euphony, his gospel would have drawn men to him at an earlier day. It is a pleasure to admit the great beauty and strength of the work in its present clarified condition, and it is also a pleasure to add that the performance of it last evening was in the main excellent. At times Mr. Whiting's touch seemed hard and dry, and his reading smacked of austerity; there was an occasional superabundance of pedal, but on the other hand he played, as a rule, fluently and intelligently. The performance of Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder was worthy of their reputation as chamber players, and there is no higher praise than this.

The quartette by Dvorak was first given in Boston at a Kneisel concert in February, '89. In comparison with the trio by Brahms it seems a pleasant and unimportant work. It gives momentary pleasure, but it appears to be superficially thought out, and, at times, carelessly put together. The third movement contains an unmistakable echo of Schumann. The quartette was finely played.

Mr. Jules Jordan is well known as a composer and as an experienced musical conductor. He sings as though he were a composer, or conductor, or a man of musical feeling, and not as a singer. He displayed last evening, intelligence, appreciation and certain musical qualities. Nature was not extravagant in her gift of a voice, and art has not yet made good the natural deficiency. The tones last evening were not sustained. There was a constant tremolo that often suggested, though without reason, a falling from the true pitch. However honorable the musical intentions of the singer may be, the instrument of expression is now rebellious and inadequate.

The seventh concert will be given the 27th.

PHILIP HALE.

Kneisel Quartet.

The sixth concert in the present series was given at Chickering Hall last evening by the Kneisel quartet, Mr. Jules Jordan, tenor, and Mr. Arthur Whiting, pianist, assisting.

Brahm's trio in B major was played by Mr. Kneisel, violin; Mr. Schroeder, cello, and Mr. Whiting, piano. Whatever differences of opinion there is about this composer's abilities as a writer of symphonies, his high rank as a contributor to chamber music is generally conceded, and this piece is a fine example of this class of work.

It was beautifully given by the artists the ensemble placing it above the other numbers on the programme. Mr. Whiting is evidently a great admirer of Brahms, and his piano part was played with great delicacy and expression.

In the scherzo the blending of the strings was exquisite, and the whole work was probably never better interpreted in this city than by this trio.

Mr. Jules Jordan sang one number from Schumann and three from Schubert. His voice, though rather heavy for this style of work, was pleasing. His best number was "The Carrier Dove," by Schubert, which was very well suited to his vocal methods.

The concert closed with Dvorak's quartet in E major. The well-known characteristics of this composer are plainly shown in this work by his peculiar treatment of pleasing themes and phrases, broken by dissonants at intervals. The work is pleasing by reason of its somewhat strange orchestration, and the quartet evidently realized the true spirit of the various movements.

The next concert by this admirable quartet will be given Monday evening, Feb. 27.

The Symphony orchestra was stopping at the hotel, and when the strains of music reached their ears they came downstairs and surrounded the players, whispering to each other in German what the writer thought, and which proved to be words of approval. At the conclusion of the first piece every one of the Symphony men contributed liberally when the hat was passed around. They told the writer that they had never heard such good music before from street players. It was said that one of the leading lights of the orchestra tried to engage the young Italian, but without the slightest degree of success.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 14, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

Even Jupiter Pluvius has no power to stay the successful career of the Kneisel Quartette concerts, and a good sized audience attended the concert in Chickering Hall last night in spite of the dreary weather. The regular forces of the quartette were assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting as pianist, and Mr. Jules Jordan as vocalist. Mr. Jordan's voice is not a tenor robusto, but he has such grace and expression in singing that he may rank high among lyrical tenors. He is more than a mere singer, he is a musician, and few appreciate the rarity of musical intelligence combined with a good voice. Mr. Jordan sang Schumann's "Spring Night," and "Whither," "The Post" and "The Carrier Dove" of Schubert.

The Brahms trio in B major falls in the early Leipsic period, when Breitkhof and Haertel were timidly bringing forth the works of the new composer whom Schumann had so cordially recommended. It is for piano, violin and 'cello. It has been a perfect Cinderella among the composer's more famous works, and Deiters justly says that it has been shamefully underrated. It is thoroughly melodious, in spite of the fact that the adversaries of the composer would have us believe that melody is not in any of his works. Its scherzo (for the typical Brahms' intermezzo had not yet been invented by the composer) is in the vein of Schubert, and shows the influence that the Viennese composer exerted on the north German. The adagio is most beautiful and was played with the greatest expression. Indeed, the performance throughout was thoroughly artistic, Mr. Whiting doing excellent work at the piano.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Jules Jordan and Mr. Arthur Whiting, gave the sixth concert in this, their eighth, season in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Brahms: Trio for pianoforte and strings, in B major (revised ed.), Opus 8.
Songs with pianoforte:
Schumann: Spring Night.
Schubert: Whither? The Post. The Carrier Pigeon.
Dvorák: Quartet for strings, in E major, Opus 80.

Eduard Hanslick of Vienna said of Brahms not long ago that all that was obscure in his earlier works—his first symphony and his pianoforte sonatas—was fast being cured of its obscurity, and that the man's genius would soon be patent to all listeners. This is much like what Schumann once said to a friend about Mendelssohn, "The man, as he grows older, grows ever clearer and more refulgent (immer klarer und verklärter), whereas I—!" That a clarifying process of some sort has been going on in Brahms for some years is indubitable; his later chamber music in particular gives all-sufficient evidence of it. But in the revised version of his opus 8 we have a work such as it would be hard to match in the composer's list. It has at once all Brahms's youthful fire and fertility of invention, and that finer clearness of form and expression that belongs to his riper years. It has all his old "Verkünstlichkeit" and all his new "Klarheit." One hardly can speak of the first three movements of this wonderful trio in terms of ordinary criticism; the music is so full of genius, beauty, inspiration and charm, and is at the same time so firmly knit, so stout in construction and classic in sentiment. Of the fourth movement (allegro) we feel less sure; but it has beauties that can not escape the ear even at a first hearing. It was no light work making Brahms's musical acquaintance; many of us can remember what a dose his C minor symphony was when the old Harvard Musical Association first brought it out at their concerts; and, although the Viennese (to believe Hanslick) found the second symphony "pure gold" at the outset, we doubt if many of us did until we had studied the work pretty hard. But, the man's musical acquaintance once thoroughly made, one finds him the most satisfying composer now going; he seems inexhaustible. He has been compared to Johann Nepomuk Hummel, as one who wrote for his own day only, who had little melodic invention, and was upon the whole a man not to live long in the world's memory. Well! it is no shame to anyone to be compared with the composer of the D minor septet; but of all the great composers of the present century — with the exception of Verdi and Wagner — Brahms is the very last man that we should have thought of mentioning in the same breath with him; we can see nothing that the two men have in common, except that both unquestionably knew how to write. There was a good deal of the pedant about Hummel, he seldom rose to the height of his septet; but in Brahms there is no touch of the pedant, his inspiration flows from as deep a spring as that of any but two or three composers in all history; and he knows how to put his ideas into a plastic shape as no other man living does. This B major trio of his is sufficient earnest of that. If any music for pianoforte and strings is great, it is this. It was most superbly played by Mr. Whiting, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder; Mr. Whiting in especial added a new wreath to his collection of laurels last evening; he rose to the full height of his task, one cannot see how the pianoforte part could have been better played.

The Dvorák quartet was given with a perfection that makes all criticism ridiculous; never have the Kneisels done a finer piece of artistic work. The composition itself is full of beauty, but it is not quite a work to hold the attention very fast after the Brahms trio. Mr. Jordan sang the Schumann and Schubert songs in his well-known artistic fashion—a little dry, perhaps, but in excellent vocal style and with true sincerity of feeling.

[106]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER

Thursday Evening, February 16, at 7.45 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.

Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MESSRS. JULES JORDAN AND ARTHUR WHITING.

VI. CONCERT.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS. TRIO, in B major, op. 8.
(Revised edition.)
Allegro con brio.—Scherzo (Allegro molto).—Adagio.—Allegro.
PIANO, Mr. Arthur Whiting.

SCHUMANN. SONGS with PIANO.
a) SPRING NIGHT.

SCHUBERT.
b) WHITHER.
c) THE POST.
d) THE CARRIER DOVE.

DVOŘÁK. QUARTET, in E major, op. 80.
Allegro.—Andante con moto.—Allegro scherzando.—Finale (Allegro con brio).

The date of the Seventh Concert is February 27.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Boston [illegible]

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1893.

The sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening in Chickering Hall. Mr. Arthur Whiting was the pianist. Mr. Jules Jordan was the singer. The programme was as follows:

Trio, B major, op. 8 ..... Brahms
Songs with piano:
a. Spring Night ..... Schumann
b. Whither, c. The Post, d. The Carrier Dove, } ..... Schubert
Quartette, E major, op. 80 ..... Dvorak

If the indexes of Mr. Wilson's "Musical Year Books" are trustworthy, the trio of Brahms, i. e., the original version, has not been heard in public concert in Boston since it was played during the season of '83-'84 by Miss O'Brion and Messrs. Loeffler and Mueller. When the trio was first played in Vienna (1870) the musical authorities found much to censure, although they admitted gladly the evidences of genius. There were barren wastes, harmonic and rythmic crudities, as well as indisputable proofs of "musikgeist." Brahms did not revile his judges. He did not sulk. He put his trio on the anvil of correction and hammered lustily and long, until he had formed a noble thing of beauty. The incongruous fugato of the first movement was omitted, and he introduced a new subsidiary theme carefully elaborated. The scherzo, which is perhaps the finest of the movements, was slightly changed, but the finale of it was made new. Only the first measures of the adagio were allowed to remain; the second theme was dropped and another introduced; no allegro now interrupts the solemn strains. So, too, the finale was strengthened, and made more passionate. In its new form it was first played in Vienna in 1890, twenty years after the decision of the court. Here is, indeed, a lesson for modern composers who seem loath to obey the Horatian maxim.

If Brahms had always written in this clear and noble style, if he had been always willing to acknowledge the force of Euphony, his gospel would have drawn men to him at an earlier day. It is a pleasure to admit the great beauty and strength of the work in its present clarified condition, and it is also a pleasure to add that the performance of it last evening was in the main excellent. At times Mr. Whiting's touch seemed hard and dry, and his reading smacked of austerity; there was an occasional superabundance of pedal, but on the other hand he played, as a rule, fluently and intelligently. The performance of Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder was worthy of their reputation as chamber players, and there is no higher praise than this.

The quartette by Dvorak was first given in Boston at a Kneisel concert in February, '89. In comparison with the trio by Brahms it seems a pleasant and unimportant work. It gives momentary pleasure, but it appears to be superficially thought out, and, at times, carelessly put together. The third movement contains an unmistakable echo of Schumann. The quartette was finely played.

Mr. Jules Jordan is well known as a composer and as an experienced musical conductor. He sings as though he were a composer, or conductor, or a man of musical feeling, and not as a singer. He displayed last evening, intelligence, appreciation and certain musical qualities. Nature was not extravagant in her gift of a voice, and art has not yet made good the natural deficiency. The tones last evening were not sustained. There was a constant tremolo that often suggested, though without reason, a falling from the true pitch. However honorable the musical intentions of the singer may be, the instrument of expression is now rebellious and inadequate.

The seventh concert will be given the 27th.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 14, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

Even Jupiter Pluvius has no power to stay the successful career of the Kneisel Quartette concerts, and a good sized audience attended the concert in Chickering Hall last night in spite of the dreary weather. The regular forces of the quartette were assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting as pianist, and Mr. Jules Jordan as vocalist. Mr. Jordan's voice is not a tenor robusto, but he has such grace and expression in singing that he may rank high among lyrical tenors. He is more than a mere singer, he is a musician, and few appreciate the rarity of musical intelligence combined with a good voice. Mr. Jordan sang Schumann's "Spring Night," and "Whither," "The Post" and "The Carrier Dove" of Schubert.

The Brahms trio in B major falls in the early Leipsic period, when Breitkhof and Haertel were timidly bringing forth the works of the new composer whom Schumann had so cordially recommended. It is for piano, violin and 'cello. It has been a perfect Cinderella among the composer's more famous works, and Deiters justly says that it has been shamefully underrated. It is thoroughly melodious, in spite of the fact that the adversaries of the composer would have us believe that melody is not in any of his works. Its scherzo (for the typical Brahms' intermezzo had not yet been invented by the composer) is in the vein of Schubert, and shows the influence that the Viennese composer exerted on the north German. The adagio is most beautiful and was played with the greatest expression. Indeed, the performance throughout was thoroughly artistic, Mr. Whiting doing excellent work at the piano.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, FEB. 14, 1893.

Kneisel Quartet.

The sixth concert in the present series was given at Chickering Hall last evening by the Kneisel quartet, Mr. Jules Jordan tenor, and Mr. Arthur Whiting pianist, assisting.

Brahm's trio in B major was played by Mr. Kneisel, violin; Mr. Schroeder, cello, and Mr. Whiting, piano. Whatever differences of opinion there is about this composer's abilities as a writer of symphonies, his high rank as a contributor to chamber music is generally conceded, and this piece is a fine example of this class of work.

It was beautifully given by the artists, the ensemble placing it above the other numbers on the programme. Mr. Whiting is evidently a great admirer of Brahms, and his piano part was played with great delicacy and expression.

In the scherzo the blending of the strings was exquisite, and the whole work was probably never better interpreted in this city than by this trio.

Mr. Jules Jordan sang one number from Schumann and three from Schubert. His voice, though rather heavy for this style of work, was pleasing. His best number was "The Carrier Dove," by Schubert, which was very well suited to his vocal methods.

The concert closed with Dvorak's quartet in E major. The well-known characteristics of this composer are plainly shown in this work by his peculiar treatment of pleasing themes and phrases, broken by dissonants at intervals. The work is pleasing by reason of its somewhat strange orchestration, and the quartet evidently realized the true spirit of the various movements.

The next concert by this admirable quartet will be given Monday evening, Feb. 27.

The Symphony orchestra was stopping at the hotel, and when the strains of music reached their ears they came downstairs and surrounded the players, whispering to each other in German what the writer thought, and which proved to be words of approval. At the conclusion of the first piece every one of the Symphony men contributed liberally when the hat was passed around. They told the writer that they had never heard such good music before from street players. It was said that one of the leading lights of the orchestra tried to engage the young Italian, but without the slightest degree of success.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Jules Jordan and Mr. Arthur Whiting, gave the sixth concert in this, their eighth, season in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Brahms: Trio for pianoforte and strings, in B major (revised ed.), Opus 8.
Songs with pianoforte:
Schumann: Spring Night.
Schubert: { Whither? The Post. The Carrier Pigeon.
Dvorák: Quartet for strings, in E major, Opus 80.

Eduard Hanslick of Vienna said of Brahms not long ago that all that was obscure in his earlier works—his first symphony and his pianoforte sonatas—was fast being cured of its obscurity, and that the man's genius would soon be patent to all listeners. This is much like what Schumann once said to a friend about Mendelssohn, "The man, as he grows older, grows ever clearer and more refulgent (immer klarer und verklärter), whereas I—!" That a clarifying process of some sort has been going on in Brahms for some years is indubitable; his later chamber music in particular gives all-sufficient evidence of it. But in the revised version of his opus 8 we have a work such as it would be hard to match in the composer's list. It has at once all Brahms's youthful fire and fertility of invention, and that finer clearness of form and expression that belongs to his riper years. It has all his old "Verklärtheit" and all his new "Klarheit." One hardly can speak of the first three movements of this wonderful trio in terms of ordinary criticism; the music is so full of genius, beauty, inspiration and charm, and is at the same time so firmly knit, so stout in construction and classic in sentiment. Of the fourth movement (allegro) we feel less sure; but it has beauties that can not escape the ear even at a first hearing. It was no light work making Brahms's musical acquaintance; many of us can remember what a dose his C minor symphony was when the old Harvard Musical Association first brought it out at their concerts; and, although the Viennese (to believe Hanslick) found the second symphony "pure gold" at the outset, we doubt if many of us did until we had studied the work pretty hard. But, the man's musical acquaintance once thoroughly made, one finds him the most satisfying composer now going; he seems inexhaustible. He has been compared to Johann Nepomuk Hummel, as one who wrote for his own day only, who had little melodic invention, and was upon the whole a man not to live long in the world's memory. Well! it is no shame to anyone to be compared with the composer of the D minor septet; but of all the great composers of the present century — with the exception of Verdi and Wagner — Brahms is the very last man that we should have thought of mentioning in the same breath with him; we can see nothing that the two men have in common, except that both unquestionably knew how to write. There was a good deal of the pedant about Hummel, he seldom rose to the height of his septet; but in Brahms there is no touch of the pedant, his inspiration flows from as deep a spring as that of any but two or three composers in all history; and he knows how to put his ideas into a plastic shape as no other man living does. This B major trio of his is sufficient earnest of that. If any music for pianoforte and strings is great, it is this. It was most superbly played by Mr. Whiting, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder; Mr. Whiting in especial added a new wreath to his collection of laurels last evening; he rose to the full height of his task, one cannot see how the pianoforte part could have been better played.

The Dvorák quartet was given with a perfection that makes all criticism ridiculous; never have the Kneisels done a finer piece of artistic work. The composition itself is full of beauty; but it is not quite a work to hold the attention very fast after the Brahms trio. Mr. Jordan sang the Schumann and Schubert songs in his well-known artistic fashion—a little dryly, perhaps, but in excellent vocal style and with great sincerity of feeling.

[106]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1893.

Nikisch Subscription Concert.—The third of the subscription concerts by the Nikisch Orchestra, of Boston, was given last night at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes, No. 229 Madison avenue. It was expected that this concert would take place at the house of Mrs. W. C. Whitney, but when her illness became so serious Mrs. Stokes consented to give the use of her house. About 300 people were present. The orchestra, numbering nearly sixty performers, was stationed in the library. The guests were all seated during the concert. After the music light refreshments were served. The program was as follows:

"Coronation March," from "Le Prophète".....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Largo.....Händel

Solo violin, Franz Kneisel.

Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-Saëns
Soli for violoncello—
Nocturne.....Chopin
Moment Musical.....Schubert
Tarantelle.....Cossman

Alwin Schroeder.

Introduction to Act III. Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Ballet suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Prelude, "Les Chasseresses," intermezzo and valse lente. Pizzicato Polka, Cortege de Bacchus.

Among the subscribers and others present were Mr. and Mrs. Henry Clews, Mr. and Mrs. Elisha Dyer, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. William E. Strong, Miss Strong, Mrs. George Kidd, Miss Kidd, Mr. and Mrs. William D. Sloane, Miss Sloane, Mr. and Mrs. J. Abercrombie Burden, Miss Ethel Irvin, Mr. and Mrs. John Alexandre, Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Fish, Miss Carola Livingston, Mr. and Mrs. Buchanan Winthrop, Mr. and Mrs. James M. Waterbury, Mrs. Burke Roche, Mr. and Mrs. Cooper Hewitt, Mr. and Mrs. E. N. Tailer, Miss Fannie Tailer, Mr. and Mrs. H. I. Barbey, Miss Callender, Mr. and Mrs. John I. Kane, Miss Marie Winthrop, Miss Amy Townsend, Mr. and Mrs. Townsend Burden, Miss Evelyn Burden, Miss Lilian Stokes, Mr. and Mrs. George L. Rives, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Turnure, Jr., the Misses Turnure, Sir Tatton and Lady Sykes, Miss Leary, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Sloane, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Willing, Miss Willing, Mr. and Mrs. H. McK. Twombly, Mrs. A. S. Hewitt, the Misses Hewitt, Mrs. S. V. R. Cruger, Miss Flora Davis, Augustus Gurnee, Mrs. Charles Whittier, Miss Whittier, Mrs. Elliott F. Shepard, Miss Edith Shepard, Mr. and Mrs. John Hobart Warren, Mr. and Mrs. Brayton Ives and Miss Eunice Ives.—"Tribune."

The Kneisel Quartet Concert.—It was a representative musical audience that assembled in Chickering Hall last Saturday afternoon to listen to the beautiful quartet playing of Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder, the artists who comprise the Chamber Music Organization. The program consisted of Dvorák's quartet op. 80, Beethoven's quartet op. 18, and the new quintet by Johannes Brahms for two violins, viola, cello and clarinet. This latter work is numbered 115 in the list of its composer's compositions, and was given for the first time in this city, though it has been played in all the principal cities of Europe, and acclaimed as one of the most important contributions to chamber music literature of late years.

Whatever else Brahms' enemies say he is, they concur at least on one point—that is, he is one of the great masters in the exposition of that most difficult and recondite of art forms—chamber music. He is among living writers the profoundest writer for the string quartet. His work must therefore be approached from a view point that is entirely antagonistic to the sensational, color-overladen and theatric music of the day. The chastest ideals are pursued, the most austere habit of thought is coupled with a genial imagination, in which the play of feeling is unobscured because of the absolute mastery of the material. This new quintet is in B minor, and on a first hearing strikes one as being unforced, spontaneous, learned and fresh. The first allegro has for a leading motive a theme that is decidedly Slavic, a melancholy broods over the movement, which is powerfully imagined, worked out with that splendid skill peculiar to Brahms, and ends in a most powerful manner.

The adagio smacks of the gypsy, the roulades for clarinet, the tremolo of the strings—indeed, the whole character and coloring of the movement are utterly opposed to the canons of chamber music, which aim first at structure, and not at mere effect. The third movement, the andantino, is most happily planned and the most characteristic part of the quintet. The last movement is the variation form, and in it Brahms has lavished that wondrous ingenuity and variety that place this composer in the ranks of the great variationists of his art.

The work as a whole impresses one most favorably, for it is fluent, clear, even, luminous style and freedom from affectation.

The playing of the Kneisel organization in this and the other numbers was alike admirable for musical feeling and finesse.

Mr. Goldschmidt, clarinetist, ably aided his colleagues in the quintet.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

A PROGRAM that began and ended with Wagner and contained besides a Mendelssohn symphony, a Liszt orchestral episode and incidently a Davidoff violoncello concerto, can hardly be said to lack in variety, and variety is a spice in music quite as much as it is in the more conventional rôles of life.

Mr. Nikisch's concert program was all this at Chickering Hall last Thursday night, and something more—it was capitally played, for the Boston conductor and his band were in excellent spirits, and the large audience was sent home in a thoroughly music saturated mood.

The musical perspective of Chickering Hall crowds the tone of the orchestra at times, and in the "Flying Dutchman" overture the brass was too much in the foreground, but this is purely the fault of the environment and not of Mr. Nikisch. The Mendelssohn symphony, finer, brighter, sunnier than his "Scotch," was presented with a buoyant good humor and a sparkling attack which suited its winsome measures, particularly the gay little saltarello. Graceful in form, shallow in musical content, this symphony mirrors Mendelssohn most truthfully. The trite sentimentalism, the delicacy of the scoring, the formal cut of each neat little movement reminded one that Chopin could have better retorted, after Mendelssohn had playfully dubbed him "Chopinetto," with "Felix the jewsharp composer." This last really emanated from the Polish composer, who was often vulgar when sarcastic.

Alwin Schroeder, the solo 'cellist of the orchestra, played with considerable artistic fervor and technical skill a concerto by Karl Davidoff. The work is not violently interesting, not so interesting for example as the Lalo or Saint-Saëns concerti, but it served as an excellent vehicle to display Mr. Schroeder's attainments on his instrument. He received three or four recalls, but would not play again.

Liszt's characteristically clever dance in the village tavern, otherwise the "Mephisto Waltz," was played in brilliant fashion, its jolly, rude, leading theme, followed by the halting, syncopated, almost breathless second waltz subject, being delightfully given. Sensational music it is, but enjoyable always on account of its changeful coloring, startling effects and broad musical humor. When Liszt is not boring you with his musical mysticism he can say the most witty things imaginable. The evening closed with an impressive performance of the "Meistersinger" overture.

Paderewski Will Play Chamber Music—The only opportunity to hear Paderewski in chamber music this season will be at the concert to be given on Wednesday afternoon, in the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, by the Adamowski Quartet. The program is a most interesting one. The regular recital by Mr. Paderewski will be at the Music Hall on Saturday afternoon.

. . . New Century Drawing-Room . . .

First Appearance in Philadelphia of the - - -

Kneisel Quartet
of Boston

Franz Kneisel, 1st Violin — L. Svecenski, Viola
Otto Roth, 2d Violin — Alwin Schroeder, Violoncello

Monday Afternoon, February 6
at 3 o'clock - - -

Programme.

BEETHOVEN . . . Quartet in G major, Op. 18
Allegro—
Adagio cantabile—
Scherzo (Allegro)—
Allegro molto quasi presto.

GRIEG . . . . . Andante from Quartet in G minor

SCHUBERT . . . Quartet in D minor (Op. posth.)
Allegro—Andante
con moto—Allegro molto—Presto.

Tickets at 1221 Chestnut Street — C. A. ELLIS, Manager

Geo. H. Ellis, Printer.

[107]

PROGRAMME

FRIDAY EVENING, FEB. 10, 1893

229 MADISON AVENUE

WORCESTER THE TELEGRAM.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Franz Kneisel and Mrs. Nikisch Soloists Before an Appreciative Audience.

There were a number of reasons why last night's concert in Mechanics hall by the Boston symphony orchestra was probably the most successful and certainly the most enjoyable that has hitherto been given in the series. It was the third concert of the series, and the building contained the usual large and appreciative audience. It also contained two freaks, who sat near the rear of the hall, and occasioned a good deal of merriment to people in their vicinity by their odd antics. The one was a Clark-professor looking individual with long, black, unkempt hair and whiskers to match. His companion was a woman. They kept up a running conversation all the evening, and they applauded at the end of every selection as vociferously as if they had been hired to do it—the woman as if she had Chicago feet on her hands.

The feature of the evening was the playing of Franz Kneisel. The greatest violinists of two continents have fiddled in Mechanics hall, but among them all there has probably been found nobody who has received such kindly attention or has provoked such enthusiasm among Worcester musical folks than the talented, though modest and unassuming, leader of the Boston symphony orchestra. And yet, singularly enough, Mr. Kneisel bears about him none of the indications or his profession. He does not wear long hair or fierce whiskers or trousers that bag at the knees. He is simply an ordinary looking young man, always modest and retiring, who is able to handle his violin with the most pretentious virtuoso in America.

It was the same old story, last night. He played Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia" to an accompaniment dominated by the sweet, trembling notes of the harp, and people scarcely breathed while he made his instrument yield out such eloquent music. The applause was as hearty as it was sustained, and everybody was ready to admit that Mr. Kneisel's playing was the triumph of the hour.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch's singing was also an agreeable feature of the concert. The accomplished and beautiful wife of the conductor of the orchestra is not a Patti. Nor is she even a Nordica—but she has a mezzo voice of good round quality, a capital method and a most attractive personality. Her first contribution, last night, was Busoni's "Spring song," for soprano and orchestra. This she followed later in the evening by a group of songs by Ferrari, Brahms and DeKoven. Everything she did was encored, but Mrs. Nikisch contented herself with bowing her acknowledgements.

Of the playing of the orchestra very little need be said, for criticism was almost entirely disarmed before the admirable execution of the following selections, which made up the orchestra's share of the evening's entertainment:—

Ludwig van Beethoven, Symphony No. 2
1 Adagio molto. D major—Allegro con brio. D major.
2 Larghetto. A major.
3 Scherzo, Allegro. D major.
Trio, The same tempo. D major.
4 Allegro molto. D major.
Georges Bizet, Suite No. 1, from "L'Arlesienne"
1 Prelude, Allegro deciso (tempo di marcia.) C minor.
2 Minuetto, Allegro giocoso. C minor.
3 Adagietto, Adagio. F major.
4 Carillon, Allegretto moderato. E major.
Richard Wagner, Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."
In very moderate movement, broad and weighty, throughout, C major.

The fourth concert will be given in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, the 28th of March.

MORNING Worcester Spy

THE SPY SHOULD HAVE THE EYE OF ARGUS: HE IS DISHONORABLE IF HE DO BUT LOOK TO THE WELFARE OF THE COMMONWEALTH

WORCESTER.

FRIDAY, FEB. 17, 1893.

KNEISEL AND NIKISCH.

THIRD CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Among Other Good Music Was a Song Specially Arranged for the Worcester Performance.

The third concert given in Mechanics Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was no less gratifying than its predecessors in the course. The audience was large and reasonably demonstrative. The program was:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 2.

Busoni—"Spring Song," soprano and orchestra.

Bizet—Suite No. 1, "L'Arlesienne."

Songs with piano: "A une Fiancee," Ferrari; "Lullaby," Brahms; "Little Doris," DeKoven.

Gounod—"Hymn to St. Cecilia," solo violin by Franz Kneisel.

Wagner—Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

It was probably the first time that DeKoven's name appeared on a "symphony" concert program in this state, at least.

Mrs. Nikisch gave good satisfaction not only in her small group of songs, but in the piece with orchestra. The writer of the latter, Mr. Busoni, was brought from Germany to the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, somewhat more than a year ago, and promptly took rank as one of the leading pianists of the city. In this respect he has quite outshone Prof. Carl Faelten, his coadjutor and the present director of the conservatory. He is also a successful composer, as his broad, well moulded song clearly showed last night. This song was first written with only piano accompaniment, but at Mrs. Nikisch's request Mr. Busoni specially instrumented it for the Worcester concert, where it had its first hearing as a song with orchestra. The orchestral parts are an undoubted addition to the beauty of the original music. To return to the singer, it is barely justice to say that Mrs. Nikisch has grown in her art since last she was heard here, and she deserved her numerous recalls. Mr. Nikisch, as an accompanist at the piano, always gives pleasure.

Mr. Kneisel has never played the St. Cecilia hymn in Boston, but played it at the orchestra's last concert in New York. After a few bars of introduction the solo violin gives out the air, accompanied by the harp, to which the wooden wind are soon added, and finally the entire orchestra joins in the song, the violins carrying the air in unison. The music is pleasing, but not great. Mr. Kneisel has no superior in this country as to technical ability, breadth of tone, exact intonation and artistic feeling, and his performance last night did not belie his reputation. The applause that followed was hearty and long continued.

The orchestra gave the Beethoven Symphony a spirited reading, though at times, especially in the first movement, played rather carelessly, and the wooden wind was now and then too true to the key. Furthermore, Mr. Nikisch manifested his not uncommon practice of covering up certain figures in the inner parts. In such music as the Arlesian suite (heard here at the last festival, and in the "Mastersingers" prelude, the conductor is in his element. The former was finely played and the latter was given with irresistible dash and enthusiasm.

The next and final concert will be given Tuesday evening, March 28.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1893.

Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pleasant concerts took place on Thursday evening, Feb. 9, at Chickering Hall. The audience tested the capacity of the hall to the utmost, as has been the case with each of the present series. The program was a romantic one and held the interest of the audience from first to last, although it would have been better taste to have given one Wagner overture instead of two.

The overture to "Der Fliegende Hollaender," with which the concert, opened is not as frequently given as some of the others, not from any inherent lack of beauty in the work, but that it is hardly as effective as those in which a happier spirit prevails. Tragedy and gloom are the characteristics of the overture, and the lighter elements are hardly sufficient to counteract the somberness of the score. If anything could make it popular as a concert number, it would be the careful reading of Nikisch, who has a quick ear for an effect.

This was followed by a Concerto by Karl Davidoff for violoncello, with Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the excellent cellist of the band, as the soloist. Davidoff is a renowned cellist and has written much for that instrument that is highly regarded, this being his third concerto. There is always danger, however, when the virtuoso composes, that he may fall into the error of overloading the music with ornamentations designed to exhibit the technical dexterity of the player. Fully aware of the utmost capacity of the instrument, there is a too evident desire to test it. This is the case in this instance. The musical ideas are meager, but the difficulties are great.

Mr. Schroeder is an artist of no mean ability, and in spite of the disadvantages he labored under in the work he made an excellent impression, although his tone had not always that roundness and sonority that is, after all, the most desirable quality in an instrumentalist. In many of the intricate passages the tone became almost "scratchy" and thin, but the miserable weather (true Nikisch weather, as somebody remarked) may have had much to do with that.

Mendelssohn's tuneful and melodious Italian symphony was the piéce de resistance of the evening, played as it was with that extreme finish and nicety in which this orchestra is pre-eminent. It is a treat to listen to one of the Mozart, Haydn or Mendelssohn symphonies when Mr. Nikisch wields the baton, for his conceptions abound in felicitous touches. The brilliant melodic coloring of this work is an example of Mendelssohn's happiest inspiration, and his deft touches of graceful humor and sentiment keep the hearer on the qui vive lest they miss some dainty point. The second movement, with its gentle melancholy, that verges on morbidness, was exquisitely given. The cheerful little con moto moderato, which follows and forms such a fine contrast, charmed all; the harmonious treatment of the horns and bassoons is one of the best things in the symphony. The dashing Saltarello which forms the closing movement is a fitting close for an Italian work. The gay scene is vividly presented and the music brings light to the eye and quickens the pulse as it whirls madly onward in the dizzy whirl. This usually wonderfully accurate orchestra was led astray a trifle in this headlong dash, and for the first few pages failed to keep in unison. In fact, the instruments were rather at sixes and sevens for a while, but they recovered in time to give a unanimous climax.

The episode from Lenau's "Faust," by Liszt, which represents the "Dance in the Village Tavern," was the next orchestral selection. Liszt was in his element in a scene like this where he could give free play to his imagination; a touch of the weird brought out all his sarcastic humor and strong emotional power. It is not always beautiful, yet what a vivid picture is presented, and how the bold outlines seize the fancy and hold it concentrated! Liszt had a Mephistophelean touch about his own nature that enabled him to enter fully into the spirit of a subject like this. The program closed with Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg," which was superbly played.

AT the residence of Mrs. Nicholas Fish, Irving Place, the Adamowski String Quartet, assisted by Arthur Nikisch at the piano, gave their third private subscription concert. The program comprised Goldmark's suite for violin and piano; Hollander's Spinning Song; a Scherzo, by Rubinstein, and a Saint-Saens Quartet for piano and strings. Among the ladies present were Mrs. James W. Gerard, Mrs. William H. L. Lee, Miss Carola Livingston, Mrs. Edward Potter, Miss Whitney, Mrs. Gordon Norrie, Mrs. Arthur M. Dodge, Mrs. John Jacob Astor, Mrs. Ogden, Mrs. George Robbins, Mrs. Adrian Iselin, Jr.; Mrs. E. L. Baylies, Mrs. Cooper Hewitt, Mrs. Gaspar Griswold, and Mrs. H. B. Livingston.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 19.

The Symphony Concert.

There was an excellent audience in attendance at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, despite the storm. The programme was: Sinfonietta in E, op. 55, F. Theriot; Concerto for piano No. 2, G-minor, Saint-Saëns, and Symphony No. 7, Beethoven. The Sinfonietta is in three movements, the first of which, an allegro moderato, is the best. It is delightful in its freshness, its graceful orchestration and the pleasing individuality that distinguish it. The harmonies are rich without forcing, and there is no struggle for novelty, the music flowing easily and naturally, and the effect of the whole, with its warmly melodious themes, being charming. The second movement, a romanza with a spirited second part, was less interesting and more labored in style, while the finale, a tarentella, has little to commend it except the piquant brilliancy of its opening theme. The work was admirably performed. The Beethoven Symphony was finely read along conservative lines, with the exception of certain portions of the first allegro, with which unauthorized liberties were taken with infelicitous results. The break into the vivace was awkwardly made. This followed evidently from a misconception of the composer's dynamic marks, which indicate and call for a crescendo from pianissimo to piano. The conductor, instead, made the crescendo culminate in forte, and then suddenly dropped to piano, by which curious innovation the attack was without precision, and the effect was confusing. This and a neglect to begin the movement with the vivacity demanded were, however, the only blemishes on the performance. Both reading and playing otherwise resulted in the best Beethoven interpretation the orchestra has given this season. Mr. George W. Nowell was the soloist. His rendering of the Saint-Saëns concerto was very neat, brilliant and clean-cut in its finger-work, and was characterized generally by sincerity in style and fluency in execution. The reading was wanting in the fire necessary to give the concerto its just effect, and there was also a lack of contrast in light and shade that imparted to the effort something of monotony, but, on the whole, Mr. Newell acquitted himself very creditably. He was heartily applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Concerto for violin, Saint-Saëns; Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 2, Grieg; and Symphony No. 2, Dvorak. Mr. C. M. Loeffler is the soloist.

Music Notes.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet gave the sixth concert of their season in Chickering Hall. It opened with Brahms's Trio in B, op. 8, a delightful work, beautiful in its themes, and, though abundant in that learning which the composer is so fond of displaying, yet never lacking in clearness and interest. The Brahms of this trio is a more genial and attractive Brahms than is the one with whom we are better acquainted. He is noble without austerity, and dignified without affectation. Here his music has all the effect of spontaneity in inspiration, and can be listened to with pleasure from beginning to end. The performance of the work may be warmly commended. The reading of the piano part by Mr. A. Whiting was perhaps over rigid now and then, in point of style, but his playing was clean cut, discreet and musicianly. Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder left nothing to be wished for. The concert closed with Dvorak's string quartet in E, op. 80. It is not a work of the first order, but it has in it much that is charming, though, on the other hand, it is not without much that is vague and eccentric, to say nothing of certain evidences of haste or carelessness in construction. It was perfectly read and played. Mr. Jules Jordan assisted as soloist, with songs by Schumann and Schubert. His voice, always thin, weak and dry, has not improved with wear, and is not as well under control as it was. His singing was intelligent, but beyond this there is not much to be said in its favor. The next concert will be given Monday evening, February 27.

[108]

PROGRAMME

FRIDAY EVENING, FEB. 10, 1893

229 MADISON AVENUE

WORCESTER THE TELEGRAM.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Franz Kneisel and Mrs. Nikisch Soloists Before an Appreciative Audience.

There were a number of reasons why last night's concert in Mechanics hall by the Boston symphony orchestra was probably the most successful and certainly the most enjoyable that has hitherto been given in the series. It was the third concert of the series, and the building contained the usual large and appreciative audience. It also contained two freaks, who sat near the rear of the hall, and occasioned a good deal of merriment to people in their vicinity by their odd antics. The one was a Clark-professor looking individual with long, black, unkempt hair and whiskers to match. His companion was a woman. They kept up a running conversation all the evening, and they applauded at the end of every selection as vociferously as if they had been hired to do it—the woman as if she had Chicago feet on her hands.

The feature of the evening was the playing of Franz Kneisel. The greatest violinists of two continents have fiddled in Mechanics hall, but among them all there has probably been found nobody who has received such kindly attention or has provoked such enthusiasm among Worcester musical folks than the talented, though modest and unassuming, leader of the Boston symphony orchestra. And yet, singularly enough, Mr. Kneisel bears about him none of the indications of his profession. He does not wear long hair or fierce whiskers or trousers that bag at the knees. He is simply an ordinary looking young man, always modest and retiring, who is able to handle his violin with the most pretentious virtuoso in America.

It was the same old story, last night. He played Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia" to an accompaniment dominated by the sweet, trembling notes of the harp, and people scarcely breathed while he made his instrument yield out such eloquent music. The applause was as hearty as it was sustained, and everybody was ready to admit that Mr. Kneisel's playing was the triumph of the hour.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch's singing was also an agreeable feature of the concert. The accomplished and beautiful wife of the conductor of the orchestra is not a Patti. Nor is she even a Nordica—but she has a mezzo voice of good round quality, a capital method and a most attractive personality. Her first contribution, last night, was Busoni's "Spring song," for soprano and orchestra. This she followed later in the evening by a group of songs by Ferrari, Brahms and DeKoven. Everything she did was encored, but Mrs. Nikisch contented herself with bowing her acknowledgements.

Of the playing of the orchestra very little need be said, for criticism was almost entirely disarmed before the admirable execution of the following selections, which made up the orchestra's share of the evening's entertainment:—

Ludwig van Beethoven, Symphony No. 2
1 Adagio molto. D major—Allegro con brio. D major.
2 Larghetto. A major.
3 Scherzo. Allegro. D major.
Trio, The same tempo. D major.
4 Allegro molto. D major.
Georges Bizet, Suite No. 1, from "L'Arlesienne"
1 Prelude, Allegro deciso (tempo di marcia.) C minor.
2 Minuetto, Allegro giocoso. C minor.
3 Adagietto, Adagio. F major.
4 Carillon, Allegretto moderato. E. major.
Richard Wagner, Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."
In very moderate movement, broad and weighty, throughout, C major.

The fourth concert will be given in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, the 28th of March.

MORNING Worcester Spy

THE SPY SHOULD HAVE THE EYE OF ARGUS: HE IS HONORABLE IF HE DO BUT LOOK TO THE WELFARE OF THE COMMONWEALTH

WORCESTER.

FRIDAY, FEB. 17, 1893.

KNEISEL AND NIKISCH.

THIRD CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Among Other Good Music Was a Song Specially Arranged for the Worcester Performance.

The third concert given in Mechanics Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was no less gratifying than its predecessors in the course. The audience was large and reasonably demonstrative. The program was:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 2.

Busoni—"Spring Song," soprano and orchestra.

Bizet—Suite No. 1, "L'Arlesienne."

Songs with piano: "A une Fiancee," Ferrari; "Lullaby," Brahms; "Little Doris," DeKoven.

Gounod—"Hymn to St. Cecilia," solo violin by Franz Kneisel.

Wagner—Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

It was probably the first time that DeKoven's name appeared on a "symphony" concert program in this state, at least.

Mrs. Nikisch gave good satisfaction not only in her small group of songs, but in the piece with orchestra. The writer of the latter, Mr. Busoni, was brought from Germany to the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, somewhat more than a year ago, and promptly took rank as one of the leading pianists of the city. In this respect he has quite outshone Prof. Carl Faelten, his coadjutor and the present director of the conservatory. He is also a successful composer, as his broad, well moulded song clearly showed last night. This song was first written with only piano accompaniment, but at Mrs. Nikisch's request Mr. Busoni specially instrumented it for the Worcester concert, where it had its first hearing as a song with orchestra. The orchestral parts are an undoubted addition to the beauty of the original music. To return to the singer, it is barely justice to say that Mrs. Nikisch has grown in her art since last she was heard here, and she deserved her numerous recalls. Mr. Nikisch, as an accompanist at the piano, always gives pleasure.

Mr. Kneisel has never played the St. Cecilia hymn in Boston, but played it at the orchestra's last concert in New York. After a few bars of introduction the solo violin gives out the air, accompanied by the harp, to which the wooden wind are soon added, and finally the entire orchestra joins in the song, the violins carrying the air in unison. The music is pleasing, but not great. Mr. Kneisel has no superior in this country as to technical ability, breadth of tone, exact intonation and artistic feeling, and his performance last night did not belie his reputation. The applause that followed was hearty and long continued.

The orchestra gave the Beethoven Symphony a spirited reading, though at times, especially in the first movement, played rather carelessly, and the wooden wind was none too true to the key. Furthermore, Mr. Nikisch manifested his not uncommon practice of covering up certain figures in the inner parts. In such music as the Arlesian suite (heard here at the last festival, and in the "Mastersingers" prelude, the conductor is in his element. The former was finely played and the latter was given with irresistible dash and enthusiasm.

The next and final concert will be given Tuesday evening, March 28.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1893.

Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pleasant concerts took place on Thursday evening, Feb. 9, at Chickering Hall. The audience tested the capacity of the hall to the utmost, as has been the case with each of the present series. The program was a romantic one and held the interest of the audience from first to last, although it would have been better taste to have given one Wagner overture instead of two.

The overture to "Der Fliegende Hollaender," with which the concert, opened is not as frequently given as some of the others, not from any inherent lack of beauty in the work, but that it is hardly as effective as those in which a happier spirit prevails. Tragedy and gloom are the characteristics of the overture, and the lighter elements are hardly sufficient to counteract the somberness of the score. If anything could make it popular as a concert number, it would be the careful reading of Nikisch, who has a quick ear for an effect.

This was followed by a Concerto by Karl Davidoff for violoncello, with Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the excellent cellist of the band, as the soloist. Davidoff is a renowned cellist and has written much for that instrument that is highly regarded, this being his third concerto. There is always danger, however, when the virtuoso composes, that he may fall into the error of overloading the music with ornamentations designed to exhibit the technical dexterity of the player. Fully aware of the utmost capacity of the instrument, there is a too evident desire to test it. This is the case in this instance. The musical ideas are meager, but the difficulties are great.

Mr. Schroeder is an artist of no mean ability, and in spite of the disadvantages he labored under in the work he made an excellent impression, although his tone had not always that roundness and sonority that is, after all, the most desirable quality in an instrumentalist. In many of the intricate passages the tone became almost "scratchy" and thin, but the miserable weather (true Nikisch weather, as somebody remarked) may have had much to do with that.

Mendelssohn's tuneful and melodious Italian symphony was the pièce de resistance of the evening, played as it was with that extreme finish and nicety in which this orchestra is pre-eminent. It is a treat to listen to one of the Mozart, Haydn or Mendelssohn symphonies when Mr. Nikisch wields the baton, for his conceptions abound in felicitous touches. The brilliant melodic coloring of this work is an example of Mendelssohn's happiest inspiration, and his deft touches of graceful humor and sentiment keep the hearer on the qui vive lest they miss some dainty point. The second movement, with its gentle melancholy, that verges on morbidness, was exquisitely given. The cheerful little con moto moderato, which follows and forms such a fine contrast, charmed all; the harmonious treatment of the horns and bassoons is one of the best things in the symphony. The dashing Saltarello which forms the closing movement is a fitting close for an Italian work. The gay scene is vividly presented and the music brings light to the eye and quickens the pulse as it whirls madly onward in the dizzy whirl. This usually wonderfully accurate orchestra was led astray a trifle in this headlong dash, and for the first few pages failed to keep in unison. In fact, the instruments were rather at sixes and sevens for a while, but they recovered in time to give a unanimous climax.

The episode from Lenau's "Faust," by Liszt, which represents the "Dance in the Village Tavern," was the next orchestral selection. Liszt was in his element in a scene like this where he could give free play to his imagination; a touch of the weird brought out all his sarcastic humor and strong emotional power. It is not always beautiful, yet what a vivid picture is presented, and how the bold outlines seize the fancy and hold it concentrated! Liszt had a Mephistophelean touch about his own nature that enabled him to enter fully into the spirit of a subject like this. The program closed with Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg," which was superbly played.

AT the residence of Mrs. Nicholas Fish, Irving Place, the Adamowski String Quartet, assisted by Arthur Nikisch at the piano, gave their third private subscription concert. The program comprised Goldmark's suite for violin and piano; Hollander's Spinning Song; a Scherzo, by Rubinstein, and a Saint-Saens Quartet for piano and strings. Among the ladies present were Mrs. James W. Gerard, Mrs. William H. L. Lee, Miss Carola Livingston, Mrs. Edward Potter, Miss Whitney, Mrs. Gordon Norrie, Mrs. Arthur M. Dodge, Mrs. John Jacob Astor, Mrs. Ogden, Mrs. George Robbins, Mrs. Adrian Iselin, Jr.; Mrs. E. L. Baylies, Mrs. Cooper Hewitt, Mrs. Gaspar Griswold, and Mrs. H. B. Livingston.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 19.

The Symphony Concert.

There was an excellent audience in attendance at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, despite the storm. The programme was: Sinfoinetta in E, op. 55, F. Theriot; Concerto for piano No. 2, G-minor, Saint-Saëns, and Symphony No. 7, Beethover. The Sinfoinetta is in three movements, the first of which, an allegro moderato, is the best. It is delightful in its freshness, its graceful orchestration and the pleasing individuality that distinguish it. The harmonies are rich without forcing, and there is no struggle for novelty, the music flowing easily and naturally, and the effect of the whole, with its warmly melodious themes, being charming. The second movement, a romanza with a spirited second part, was less interesting and more labored in style, while the finale, a tarentella, has little to commend it except the piquant brilliancy of its opening theme. The work was admirably performed. The Beethoven Symphony was finely read along conservative lines, with the exception of certain portions of the first allegro, with which unauthorized liberties were taken with infelicitous results. The break into the vivace was awkwardly made. This followed evidently from a misconception of the composer's dynamic marks, which indicate and call for a crescendo from pianissimo to piano. The conductor, instead, made the crescendo culminate in forte, and then suddenly dropped to piano, by which curious innovation the attack was without precision, and the effect was confusing. This and a neglect to begin the movement with the vivacity demanded were, however, the only blemishes on the performance. Both reading and playing otherwise resulted in the best Beethoven interpretation the orchestra has given this season. Mr. George W. Nowell was the soloist. His rendering of the Saint-Saëns concerto was very neat, brilliant and clean-cut in its finger-work, and was characterized generally by sincerity in style and fluency in execution. The reading was wanting in the fire necessary to give the concerto its just effect, and there was also a lack of contrasts in light and shade that imparted to the effort something of monotony, but, on the whole, Mr. Newell acquitted himself very creditably. He was heartily applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Concerto for violin, Saint-Saëns; Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 2, Grieg; and Symphony No. 2, Dvorak. Mr. C. M. Loeffler is the soloist.

Music Notes.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet gave the sixth concert of their season in Chickering Hall. It opened with Brahms's Trio in B, op 8, a delightful work, beautiful in its themes, and, though abundant in that learning which the composer is so fond of displaying, yet never lacking in clearness and interest. The Brahms of this trio is a more genial and attractive Brahms than is the one with whom we are better acquainted. He is noble without austerity, and dignified without affectation. Here his music has all the effect of spontaneity in inspiration, and can be listened to with pleasure from beginning to end. The performance of the work may be warmly commended. The reading of the piano part by Mr. A. Whiting was perhaps over rigid now and then, in point of style, but his playing was clean cut, discreet and musicianly. Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder left nothing to be wished for. The concert closed with Dvorak's string quartet in E, op. 80. It is not a work of the first order, but it has in it much that is charming, though, on the other hand, it is not without much that is vague and eccentric, to say nothing of certain evidences of haste or carelessness in construction. It was perfectly read and played. Mr. Jules Jordan assisted as soloist, with songs by Schumann and Schubert. His voice, always thin, weak and dry, has not improved with wear, and is not as well under control as it was. His singing was intelligent, but beyond this there is not much to be said in its favor. The next concert will be given Monday evening, February 27.

[108]

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH

AND

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

: : PROGRAMME : :

I. Meyerbeer . . CORONATION MARCH, from "Le Prophète"

II. Nicolai . . . . OVERTURE, "Merry Wives of Windsor"

III. Haendel . . . . . LARGO

Solo Violin, Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

IV. Saint-Saëns . SYMPHONIC POEM, "Le Rouet d'Omphale"

V. SOLI FOR VIOLONCELLO.

a. Chopin . . . . . NOCTURNE
b. Schubert . . . . MOMENT MUSICAL
c. Cossman . . . . . TARANTELLE

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

VI. Wagner, INTRODUCTION TO ACT III., Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Mastersingers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger"

VII. Délibes . . . . . BALLET SUITE, "Sylvia"

PRELUDE. "LES CHASSERESSES"
INTERMEZZO AND VALSE LENTE
PIZZICATO POLKA
CORTEGE DE BACCHUS

WORCESTER THE TELEGRAM.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Franz Kneisel and Mrs. Nikisch Soloists Before an Appreciative Audience.

There were a number of reasons why last night's concert in Mechanics hall by the Boston symphony orchestra was probably the most successful and certainly the most enjoyable that has hitherto been given in the series. It was the third concert of the series, and the building contained the usual large and appreciative audience. It also contained two freaks, who sat near the rear of the hall, and occasioned a good deal of merriment to people in their vicinity by their odd antics. The one was a Clark-professor looking individual with long, black, unkempt hair and whiskers to match. His companion was a woman. They kept up a running conversation all the evening, and they applauded at the end of every selection as vociferously as if they had been hired to do it—the woman as if she had Chicago feet on her hands.

The feature of the evening was the playing of Franz Kneisel. The greatest violinists of two continents have fiddled in Mechanics hall, but among them all there has probably been found nobody who has received such kindly attention or has provoked such enthusiasm among Worcester musical folks than the talented, though modest and unassuming, leader of the Boston symphony orchestra. And yet, singularly enough, Mr. Kneisel bears about him none of the indications of his profession. He does not wear long hair or fierce whiskers or trousers that bag at the knees. He is simply an ordinary looking young man, always modest and quiet, who is able to handle his violin with the most pretentious virtuoso in America.

It was the same old story, last night. He played Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia" to an accompaniment dominated by the sweet, rambling notes of the harp, and people scarcely breathed while he made his instrument yield out such eloquent music. The applause was as hearty as it was sustained, and everybody was ready to admit that Mr. Kneisel's playing was the triumph of the

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch's singing was also an admirable feature of the concert. The accomplished and beautiful wife of the conductor of the orchestra is not a Patti. Nor is she even a Melba—but she has a mezzo voice of good natural quality, a capital method and a most attractive personality. Her first contribution, last night, was Busoni's "Spring song," for piano and orchestra. This she followed later in the evening by a group of songs by Ferrari, Brahms and DeKoven. Everything she did was encored, but Mrs. Nikisch contented herself with bowing her acknowledgments.

The playing of the orchestra very little need be said, for criticism was almost disarmed before the admirable execution of the following selections, which made up the orchestra's share of the evening's entertainment:—

Beethoven, Symphony No. 2 in D molto. D major—Allegro con brio. D major.
Allegretto. A major.
Allegro. D major.
Allegro, same tempo. D major.
Presto molto. D major.
Bizet, Suite No. 1, from "L'Arlesienne"
Adagio, Allegro deciso (tempo di marcia.) C minor.
Allegretto, Allegro giocoso. C minor.
Andante, Adagio. F major.
Menuetto, Allegretto moderato. E major.
Richard Wagner, Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."
Allegro moderate movement, broad and weighty, throughout, C major.

The fourth concert will be given in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, the 28th of

MORNING Worcester Spy

THE SPY SHOULD HAVE THE EYE OF ARGUS: HE IS HONORABLE IF HE DO BUT LOOK TO THE WELFARE OF THE COMMONWEALTH

WORCESTER.

FRIDAY, FEB. 17, 1893.

KNEISEL AND NIKISCH.

THIRD CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Among Other Good Music Was a Song Specially Arranged for the Worcester Performance.

The third concert given in Mechanics Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was no less gratifying than its predecessors in the course. The audience was large and reasonably demonstrative. The program was:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 2.

Busoni—"Spring Song," soprano and orchestra.

Bizet—Suite No. 1, "L'Arlesienne."

Songs with piano: "A une Fiancee," Ferrari; "Lullaby," Brahms; "Little Doris," DeKoven.

Gounod—"Hymn to St. Cecilia," solo violin by Franz Kneisel.

Wagner—Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

It was probably the first time that DeKoven's name appeared on a "symphony" concert program in this state, at least.

Mrs. Nikisch gave good satisfaction not only in her small group of songs, but in the piece with orchestra. The writer of the latter, Mr. Busoni, was brought from Germany to the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, somewhat more than a year ago, and promptly took rank as one of the leading pianists of the city. In this respect he has quite outshone Prof. Carl Faelten, his coadjutor and the present director of the conservatory. He is also a successful composer, as his broad, well moulded song clearly showed last night. This song was first written with only piano accompaniment, but at Mrs. Nikisch's request Mr. Busoni specially instrumented it for the Worcester concert, where it had its first hearing as a song with orchestra. The orchestral parts are an undoubted addition to the beauty of the original music. To return to the singer, it is barely justice to say that Mrs. Nikisch has grown in her art since last she was heard here, and she deserved her numerous recalls. Mr. Nikisch, as an accompanist at the piano, always gives pleasure.

Mr. Kneisel has never played the St. Cecilia hymn in Boston, but played it at the orchestra's last concert in New York. After a few bars of introduction the solo violin gives out the air, accompanied by the harp, to which the wooden wind are soon added, and finally the entire orchestra joins in the song, the violins carrying the air in unison. The music is pleasing, but not great. Mr. Kneisel has no superior in this country as to technical ability, breadth of tone, exact intonation and artistic feeling, and his performance last night did not belie his reputation. The applause that followed was hearty and long continued.

The orchestra gave the Beethoven Symphony a spirited reading, though at times, especially in the first movement, played rather carelessly, and the wooden wind was loose too true to the key. Furthermore, Mr. Nikisch manifested his not uncommon practice of covering up certain figures in the inner parts. In such music as the Arlesian suite (heard here at the last festival, and in the "Mastersingers" prelude, the conductor is in his element. The former was finely played and the latter was given with irresistible dash and enthusiasm.

The next and final concert will be given Tuesday evening, March 28.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1893.

Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pleasant concerts took place on Thursday evening, Feb. 9, at Chickering Hall. The audience tested the capacity of the hall to the utmost, as has been the case with each of the present series. The program was a romantic one and held the interest of the audience from first to last, although it would have been better taste to have given one Wagner overture instead of two.

The overture to "Der Fliegende Hollaender," with which the concert, opened is not as frequently given as some of the others, not from any inherent lack of beauty in the work, but that it is hardly as effective as those in which a happier spirit prevails. Tragedy and gloom are the characteristics of the overture, and the lighter elements are hardly sufficient to counteract the somberness of the score. If anything could make it popular as a concert number, it would be the careful reading of Nikisch, who has a quick ear for an effect.

This was followed by a Concerto by Karl Davidoff for violoncello, with Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the excellent cellist of the band, as the soloist. Davidoff is a renowned cellist and has written much for that instrument that is highly regarded, this being his third concerto. There is always danger, however, when the virtuoso composes, that he may fall into the error of overloading the music with ornamentations designed to exhibit the technical dexterity of the player. Fully aware of the utmost capacity of the instrument, there is a too evident desire to test it. This is the case in this instance. The musical ideas are meager, but the difficulties are great.

Mr. Schroeder is an artist of no mean ability, and in spite of the disadvantages he labored under in the work he made an excellent impression, although his tone had not always that roundness and sonority that is, after all, the most desirable quality in an instrumentalist. In many of the intricate passages the tone became almost "scratchy" and thin, but the miserable weather (true Nikisch weather, as somebody remarked) may have had much to do with that.

Mendelssohn's tuneful and melodious Italian symphony was the pièce de resistance of the evening, played as it was with that extreme finish and nicety in which this orchestra is pre-eminent. It is a treat to listen to one of the Mozart, Haydn or Mendelssohn symphonies when Mr. Nikisch wields the baton, for his conceptions abound in felicitous touches. The brilliant melodic coloring of this work is an example of Mendelssohn's happiest inspiration, and his deft touches of graceful humor and sentiment keep the hearer on the qui vive lest they miss some dainty point. The second movement, with its gentle melancholy, that verges on morbidness, was exquisitely given. The cheerful little con moto moderato, which follows and forms such a fine contrast, charmed all; the harmonious treatment of the horns and bassoons is one of the best things in the symphony. The dashing Saltarello which forms the closing movement is a fitting close for an Italian work. The gay scene is vividly presented and the music brings light to the eye and quickens the pulse as it whirls madly onward in the dizzy whirl. This usually wonderfully accurate orchestra was led astray a trifle in this headlong dash, and for the first few pages failed to keep in unison. In fact, the instruments were rather at sixes and sevens for a while, but they recovered in time to give a unanimous climax.

The episode from Lenau's "Faust," by Liszt, which represents the "Dance in the Village Tavern," was the next orchestral selection. Liszt was in his element in a scene like this where he could give free play to his imagination; a touch of the weird brought out all his sarcastic humor and strong emotional power. It is not always beautiful, yet what a vivid picture is presented, and how the bold outlines seize the fancy and hold it concentrated! Liszt had a Mephistophelean touch about his own nature that enabled him to enter fully into the spirit of a subject like this. The program closed with Wagner's prelude to "Die

Gilbert and Sullivan.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

LONDON, Jan. 27, 1893.

TRINCULO'S LONDON NOTES.

German resident and professor who has paid great attention to the revival of Old English music and of the instruments of the 16th and 17th centuries, gave an interesting con-

THE AMERICAN HEBREW

A Weekly Journal for the Jewish Home.

Contents, Feb. 17, 1893.

When it has to be recorded that a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in this city or Brooklyn the student of musical affairs knows at once what to expect to read, for there is very little variation in what is said after each concert. The expectations of those who attend these concerts are never doomed to disappointment and in this respect no one concert ever differs from another. All that has hitherto been said, therefore, in these columns in regard to the faultless playing of this orchestra can only be reiterated in speaking of the concert which was given on Thursday evening of last week, and there remains only to note the programme which gave absolute unalloyed pleasure from beginning to end. The symphony was Mendelssohn's "Italian," the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" being the other orchestral selections. The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder, who played one movement from a concerto for violoncello by Davidoff. Once more the wisdom of selecting the soloist from the orchestra was shown, for while the composition was not particularly interesting the performance of it was delightful It had been a question among the admirers of Wagner whether Mr. Nikisch had succeed hitherto in interpreting the greatest of all composers in a manner to fully satisfy those who realized all the possibilities of the orchestra. This question, however, no longer exists. No one who heard the two Wagnerian selections at this concert could conceive of their being given with greater musical eloquence, beauty and intensity. The last concert this season will be given on Thursday evening, March 12. It is to be hoped that next year the orchestra will play in a larger auditorium such as Music Hall, for instance. More people than Chickering Hall can accommodate now desire to attend and enjoy these concerts. The orchestra played in Brooklyn on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and gave the same pleasure there as here, though the programme was different of course, the symphony being Brahm's No. 3, and the soloist a young pianist, Miss Minnie Wetzler whose playing of Weber's "Concertstuck" aroused an enthusiastic encore.

On Saturday afternoon the Kneisel Quartet gave its third concert at Chickering Hall, playing Dvorak's Quartet in E major, Beethoven's Quartet in G major, and Brahm's Quintet in B minor, the claronet being added to the string quartet. All these works were beautifully played and created much enthusiasm from the large and select musical audience present.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 20, 1893.

Symphony Concert.

The strictly orchestral music of the Saturday symphony concert consisted of symphonietta in E major, of 55 by Ferdinand Thieriot, and Beethoven's seventh symphony. Certain portions of the syphmonietta were admirable, notably its first movement, an allegro moderato in which there is an always pure and spontaneous flow of inspiration, combined with grace, with subtility, too, and a bountiful supply of skilful treatment. The romanza conveys a somewhat vague impression as to what it really means, and this is rendered all the more ambiguous by the intrusion of a weirdly dry, a scrambling, stupid intermezzo. As for the tarantella withwhich the symphonietta closes, it would seem but a trifle too severe to characterize it as a weakly cooked-up sham, which should have found no place in one of the symphony concerts. Mr. G. M. Nowell then played Saint Saëns' G minor concerto.

The seventh symphony of Beethoven followed the sixth, or "Pastoral," after an interval of four years, and at a time, too, when the composer's hearing had already become seriously impaired. Writing to Neate in November, 1813, Beethoven says: "Among my best works, I can boldly pronounce my symphony in A." Beethoven left no record, however, of his purpose when composing it, and after its first performance in the hall of the University of Vienna, Dec. 8, 1813, diverse speculations were then as now rife respecting the meaning of the work, and ever since then commentators have been widely at variance regarding it. Berlioz and Ambros, however, would seem to agree that the first movement is intended as a true picture of some rustic wedding. Lenz regards the symphony as one result of the military enthusiasm which produced the "Battle of Vittoria" symphony. Marks discerns a Moorish knighthood, Onbibicheff, a masked ball, etc.

In the performance last evening the composer's manifest intentions were not always clearly presented, but the technique of the performance was, for the most part, admirable.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1893.

The Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Sinfonietta, E major, op. 55.....Thieriot
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G minor.....Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 7, A major.....Beethoven

Mr. George M. Nowell was the pianist.

***

It is said that the ending "etta" in the Italian language indicates diminution with the accessory idea of fondness, loveliness, compassion, tenderness. This composition by Thieriot does not call for compassion; it may be patted on the head and called "a pretty little symphony." The first movement is the most pleasing of the three. The themes are graceful and fresh, although the chief theme bears a passing resemblance to a well-known tune by Meyer-Helmund. The harmonization is agreeable, and, at times, beautiful. The instrumentation abounds in color that is discreetly applied. The second movement, a romanza, is interrupted by an intermezzo that is, perhaps, in too strong contrast, and neither the romanza nor the intermezzo is of unusual strength or beauty.

The tarantella after the exposition of the chief theme sounded like all the other pieces of music that are supposed to assuage the feelings of the victim of the spider, which grows to horrific size in Tarentum. Although the two last movements of the sinfonietta did not seem equal in value to the first, the composition as a whole gave much pleasure on account of its modesty, its melodiousness, its reasonable length. The day may come when the symphony fashioned after old and approved models will be presented only in sections; and it may be supplanted by the "symphonic-poem" or even the sinfonietta. Bruckner, however, would dispute this proposition; for his eighth symphony, played lately in Vienna, ate the whole time allotted to the concert. The adagio alone lasted 28 minutes; but as, according to the analytical programme, this same adagio represented "the all-loving Father in His boundless wealth of mercy," the time was none too long. Thieriot's sinfonietta was played in Leipzig in 1891.

***

The sinfonietta was played Saturday evening with an apparent appreciation of its pleasant qualities, and the performance of the symphony was admirable. It is true one or two liberties of interpretation were taken in the vivace of the first movement, as at the very start and also at the beginning of the long pianissimo and following crescendo that bring the exultant close; and the effect thus gained was, if not absolutely injurious to precision and rhythm, at least of doubtful value. With these exceptions the reading and the performance were of unusual excellence. The impressive and finely proportioned rendering of the allegretto was especially worthy of praise.

***

The pianoforte concerto in G minor was played for the first time at a Concert Populaire in Paris, and by the composer, Dec. 13, 1868. It afterward served as a test piece in the competition of pianoforte pupils at the Paris Conservatory. There is no need at this late day of speaking of its surpassing merit.

From the merely technical standpoint there was much to praise in the performance of Mr. Nowell.

He has good fingers.

His runs were smooth and clean; his arpeggio work was characterized by its evenness; he did not smear; he did not pound; his delivery was frank, his bearing was modest.

His performance showed the results of patience, industry and excellent instruction.

Now, accuracy, honesty of purpose and ability to overcome mechanical obstacles are characteristics that lead to success in many of the callings of life.

These characteristics mark the experienced bookbinder, the trusted surveyor, the ship pilot.

Other characteristics enter into the supreme success of the man that moves, persuades, commands by the display of his art.

Above all things in the performance of the G minor concerto is temperament imperiously demanded.

From the intellectual or the sensuous standpoint there was little to commend in the performance of Mr. Nowell.

Take the first movement, for instance: there was little or no distinction made between the delivery of the imposing prelude on the pedal-point and the impassioned theme in G minor that follows: they had alike the same defined, hewn-out hardness; the style of Bach and the style of the ultra-modern were called one.

One might pass over without objection Mr. Nowell's breaking of the aforesaid pedal-octave and the breaking of chords that might have been better attacked boldly; one might allow the liberty taken in the opening of the cadenza; but the lack of rhythmic swing in the second movement and of demoniac energy in the stormier passages cannot so easily be overlooked.

Again, the performance of Mr. Nowell was colorless, or rather it was monochromatic. The tones were soft or loud, but they were all of the same color, and that color was a cold tint.

There was no one great effect produced that startled or moved the hearer by an irresistible display of feeling, brilliancy or that mixture of sinking self in the composer and at the same time intensifying the speech of the composer by the rare individuality of the interpreter, that singular attribute of a great player that for want of a better word is vaguely called intellectuality. There was no apparent appreciation of a climax.

And so Mr. Nowell's playing of the noble, brilliant and entrancing concerto of Saint-Saens may be justly described as an exhibition of well-trained fingers that triumphed over the notation of the composer, but failed to grasp the spirit of which the notation is merely the superficial expression.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 20, 1893.

Mr. Nikisch's programme for the fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Saturday evening was one of especial interest, as the soloist of the occasion was the young Boston pianist, Mr. George M. Nowell. He is to be congratulated upon the favorable impression and success of his appearance. He selected for his number Saint-Saens's second concerto in G minor, a piece of much intricacy, but which he executed most effectively, playing with an elastic touch and showing a fine perception of musical techinque. The allegro Scherzando and presto movements were given with brilliancy, but it would have made an even deeper impression if it had not been overshadowed by the orchestra. At the finish he was greeted with enthusiastic applause The orchestra gave Ferdinand Thieriot's "Symphonietta" in E major, a work not very familiar here, but which gives important parts to the horns and wooden wind. The second movement is a slow romanza, and the finale is more animated, and with its sudden changes of time produces a pleasing effect. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was given finely and closed the performance. The next concert will be on Saturday evening, Feb. 25, and Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the soloist.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII., NO. 50.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1893.

The Symphony Concert--Soloist, George M. Nowell.

The 15th of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, at Music Hall last evening, had as its prominent feature the appearance of Mr. George M Nowell, pianist, as soloist.

Undoubtedly, the choice of the pianists of the season makes a difficult matter for Mr. Nikisch to act upon, but in giving Mr. Nowell an appearance he not only justly recognized the claims of a thoroughly competent artist, but gave encouragement to the many local aspirants for a similar recognition.

Mr. Nowell is to be congratulated upon having made a pronounced success and with completely conquering the natural tendency to undervalue the merits of a home artist, which, unfortunately, characterizes the Symphony concert patrons.

In choosing the second concerto in C minor, by Saint Saens, for his appearance, Mr. Nowell set himself a task well calculated to test the skill of an artist of a far greater experience upon the concert stage, but his success justified the choice made for he met all the demands of the composition in a manner to disarm criticism, and won the hearty approval of the most critical on both sides the stage line, the men of the orchestra joining in the applause which rewarded his efforts with enthusiasm.

The most striking merit of Mr. Nowell's playing is the delightful touch he employs in all his work; it is clear and crisp, with both the breadth demanded for the strongest passages and the delicacy of a woman's hand in the lighter and more graceful measures, this characteristic giving a charm to his interpretations which is seldom realized.

The firm, broad style in which the player began the andante movement arrested the attention of the audience instantly, and indicated that a master sat at the piano. This impression was strengthened as the movement was continued, and at its conclusion Mr. Nowell was applauded with a spontaneous outburst which was honestly won. The airy grace of the allegro was most happily caught by the player, whose dainty treatment of this portion of the concerto was delightful. The brilliant presto again displayed the pianist to fine advantage, the technical demands of its intricate passages being met with a perfection, ease and beauty that aroused the audience to a high pitch of excitement, and gained an ovation of the grandest sort for the player as he concluded his task.

Mr. Nowell is primarily a musician, and he uses the pianoforte with a degree of taste and intelligence which, with his skill as an executant, puts him in the front rank of the world's players, and fully justifies his devotion to his profession.

The orchestral noveity of the evening was the Sinfonietta in E major by Ferdinand Thieriot, a composer better known in Hamburg than in this country. The work made a good introduction for its composer, however, and its performance gave great pleasure. The opening allegro is built upon a tuneful theme, which is admirably treated, the scoring being for the classic orchestra, with two horns and trumpets, but no trombones. The second movement, in romanza form, is also admirably well written, and the final presto, a tarantella, is peculiarly pleasing in its sudden changes of time and its tuneful characteristics. Its reading by Mr. Nikisch brought out all its merits, and the audience was quick in its appreciation of the good work done by the composer.

The seventh of the Beethoven symphonies concluded the programme, and a most satisfactory interpretation of it was given by Mr. Nikisch.

At next Saturday evening's concert Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the soloist, playing the concerto for violin in A major, the other numbers of the programme being Dvorak's second symphony, Grieg's second "Peer Gynt" suite and the "Fingal's Cave" overture.

At the recital to be given by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening, the 28th inst., the programme will afford a hearing of Mrs Nikisch in songs by Brahms, Paderewski, Schubert, Franz, Chopin, Busoni, Hinrich, Grieg, Schumann and Heuberger. Miss Leonora von Stosch, the violinist, will assist, the accompaniments for both artists being played by Mr. Nikisch.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 19, 1893.

Echoes from the Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

The programme for the 15th Symphony rehearsal and concert was made up of somewhat unfamiliar selections. Ferdinand Thieriot's sinfonietta in E major, Camille Saint-Saens' concerto, No. 2, for pianoforte, and Beethoven's symphony, No. 7, in A major. The soloist was Mr. George M. Nowell.

The Saint-Saens concerto is one which greatly taxes the abilities and endurance of the pianist, for the pianoforte score continues almost uninterruptedly throughout the piece. The themes are generally first given to the piano, the orchestra developing the motif, to be followed by the elaborate embroideries, and in the andante, glissando octaves and double thirds by the pianist.

The second part is a strongly marked and brilliant will-o'-the-wisp movement, alternating between the solo instrument and the orchestra. The finale is a series of tempestuous passages, with sudden changes in tempo, in which the soloist and orchestra vie in brilliancy.

The Boston artist, Mr. George M. Nowell, played very effectively, lacking perhaps the necessary vigor and dash in the "diabolique" movements, which have proved stumbling blocks to so many performers.

The opening, unaccompanied, cadenza was cleanly given, and the long climax with its profusion of octave runs and sustained forte was most admirably played.

In the fairy-like allegro the beautiful themes were delicately interpreted, but the furious finale was overshadowed by the work of the orchestra.

The Thieriot Sinfonietta enabled the excellence of the horn and wood-winds to be made clearly apparent in the allegro. The slow romanza of the second part and the tarantello were very well played. Beethoven's magnificent seventh symphony was given a fine interpretation, the most successful of the evening.

Particularly noticeable was the manner in which the famous allegro was performed, the difficult repeated rythm being taken up by the different parts of the orchestra without a suggestion of uncertainty or blurring of the notes.

The programme of the rehearsal and concert, Feb. 24, 25, will be as follows: Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave"; Saint-Saens' concerto for violin, A major; Grieg's "Peer Gynt," No. 2; Dvorak's D minor symphony, No. 2. Mr. Loeffler will be the solo violinist.

——The third of the Adamowski quartet concerts, in New York, was given last Saturday afternoon at the house of Mrs. Nicholas Fish, No. 53 Irving pl. Mrs. Fish's house is particularly well adapted for music. Mr. Nikisch was at the piano. Both of these musicales of Mr. Adamowski's were to have been presided over by Mrs. Whitney in her own house, and the recollection of her abundant vitality and keen desire to make others enjoy with her the higher pleasures that this world has to give was not absent from many of the guests at both entertainments.

[109]

THE AMERICAN HEBREW

A Weekly Journal for the Jewish Home.

Contents, Feb. 17, 1893.

When it has to be recorded that a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in this city or Brooklyn the student of musical affairs knows at once what to expect to read, for there is very little variation in what is said after each concert. The expectations of those who attend these concerts are never doomed to disappointment and in this respect no one concert ever differs from another. All that has hitherto been said, therefore, in these columns in regard to the faultless playing of this orchestra can only be reiterated in speaking of the concert which was given on Thursday evening of last week, and there remains only to note the programme which gave absolute unalloyed pleasure from beginning to end. The symphony was Mendelssohn's "Italian," the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" being the other orchestral selections. The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder, who played one movement from a concerto for violoncello by Davidoff. Once more the wisdom of selecting the soloist from the orchestra was shown, for while the composition was not particularly interesting the performance of it was delightful It had been a question among the admirers of Wagner whether Mr. Nikisch had succeed hitherto in interpreting the greatest of all composers in a manner to fully satisfy those who realized all the possibilities of the orchestra. This question, however, no longer exists. No one who heard the two Wagnerian selections at this concert could conceive of their being given with greater musical eloquence, beauty and intensity. The last concert this season will be given on Thursday evening, March 12. It is to be hoped that next year the orchestra will play in a larger auditorium such as Music Hall, for instance. More people than Chickering Hall can accommodate now desire to attend and enjoy these concerts. The orchestra played in Brooklyn on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and gave the same pleasure there as here, though the programme was different of course, the symphony being Brahm's No. 3, and the soloist a young pianist, Miss Minnie Wetzler whose playing of Weber's "Concertstuck" aroused an enthusiastic encore.

On Saturday afternoon the Kneisel Quartet gave its third concert at Chickering Hall, playing Dvorak's Quartet in E major, Beethoven's Quartet in G major, and Brahm's Quintet in B minor, the claronet being added to the string quartet. All these works were beautifully played and created much enthusiasm from the large and select musical audience present.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 20, 1893.

Symphony Concert.

The strictly orchestral music of the Saturday symphony concert consisted of symphonietta in E major, of 55 by Ferdinand Thieriot, and Beethoven's seventh symphony. Certain portions of the syphmonietta were admirable, notably its first movement, an allegro moderato in which there, is an always pure and spontaneous flow of inspiration, combined with grace, with subtlitv, too, and a bountiful supply of skilful treatment. The romanza conveys a somewhat vague impression as to what it really means, and this is rendered all the more ambiguous by the intrusion of a weirdly dry, a scrambling, stupid intermezzo. As for the tarantella withwhich the symphonietta closes, it would seem but a trifle too severe to characterize it as a weakly cooked-up sham, which should have found no place in one of the symphony concerts. Mr. G. M. Nowell then played Saint Saëns' G minor concerto.

The seventh symphony of Beethoven followed the sixth, or "Pastoral," after an interval of four years, and at a time, too, when the composer's hearing had already become seriously impaired. Writing to Neate in November, 1813, Beethoven says: "Among my best works, I can boldly pronounce my symphony in A." Beethoven left no record, however, of his purpose when composing it, and after its first performance in the hall of the University of Vienna, Dec. 8, 1813, diverse speculations were then as now rife respecting the meaning of the work, and ever since then commentators have been widely at variance regarding it. Berlioz and Ambros, however, would seem to agree that the first movement is intended as a true picture of some rustic wedding. Lenz regards the symphony as one result of the military enthusiasm which produced the "Battle of Vittoria" symphony. Marks discerns a Moorish knighthood, Onbibicheff, a masked ball, etc.

In the performance last evening the composer's manifest intentions were not always clearly presented, but the technique of the performance was, for the most part, admirable.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1893.

The Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Sinfonietta, E major, op. 55.....Thieriot
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G minor.....Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 7, A major.....Beethoven

Mr. George M. Nowell was the pianist.

***

It is said that the ending "etta" in the Italian language indicates diminution with the accessory idea of fondness, loveliness, compassion, tenderness. This composition by Thieriot does not call for compassion; it may be patted on the head and called "a pretty little symphony." The first movement is the most pleasing of the three. The themes are graceful and fresh, although the chief theme bears a passing resemblance to a well-known tune by Meyer-Helmund. The harmonization is agreeable, and, at times, beautiful. The instrumentation abounds in color that is discreetly applied. The second movement, a romanza, is interrupted by an intermezzo that is, perhaps, in too strong contrast, and neither the romanza nor the intermezzo is of unusual strength or beauty.

The tarantella after the exposition of the chief theme sounded like all the other pieces of music that are supposed to assuage the feelings of the victim of the spider, which grows to horrific size in Tarentum. Although the two last movements of the sinfonietta did not seem equal in value to the first, the composition as a whole gave much pleasure on account of its modesty, its melodiousness, its reasonable length. The day may come when the symphony fashioned after old and approved models will be presented only in sections; and it may be supplanted by the "symphonic-poem" or even the sinfonietta. Bruckner, however, would dispute this proposition; for his eighth symphony, played lately in Vienna, ate the whole time allotted to the concert, The adagio alone lasted 28 minutes; but as, according to the analytical programme, this same adagio represented "the all-loving Father in His boundless wealth of mercy," the time was none too long. Thieriot's sinfonietta was played in Leipzig in 1891.

***

The sinfonietta was played Saturday evening with an apparent appreciation of its pleasant qualities, and the performance of the symphony was admirable. It is true one or two liberties of interpretation were taken in the vivace of the first movement, as at the very start and also at the beginning of the long pianissimo and following crescendo that bring the exultant close; and the effect thus gained was, if not absolutely injurious to precision and rhythm, at least of doubtful value. With these exceptions the reading and the performance were of unusual excellence. The impressive and finely proportioned rendering of the allegretto was especially worthy of praise.

***

The pianoforte concerto in G minor was played for the first time at a Concert Populaire in Paris, and by the composer, Dec. 13, 1868. It afterward served as a test piece in the competition of pianoforte pupils at the Paris Conservatory. There is no need at this late day of speaking of its surpassing merit.

From the merely technical standpoint there was much to praise in the performance of Mr. Nowell.

He has good fingers.

His runs were smooth and clean; his arpeggio work was characterized by its evenness; he did not smear; he did not pound; his delivery was frank, his bearing was modest.

His performance showed the results of patience, industry and excellent instruction.

Now, accuracy, honesty of purpose and ability to overcome mechanical obstacles are characteristics that lead to success in many of the callings of life.

These characteristics mark the experienced bookbinder, the trusted surveyor, the ship pilot.

Other characteristics enter into the supreme success of the man that moves, persuades, commands by the display of his art.

Above all things in the performance of the G minor concerto is temperament imperiously demanded.

From the intellectual or the sensuous standpoint there was little to commend in the performance of Mr. Nowell.

Take the first movement, for instance: there was little or no distinction made between the delivery of the imposing prelude on the pedal-point and the impassioned theme in G minor that follows: they had alike the same defined, hewn-out hardness; the style of Bach and the style of the ultra-modern were called one.

One might pass over without objection Mr. Nowell's breaking of the aforesaid pedal-octave and the breaking of chords that might have been better attacked boldly; one might allow the liberty taken in the opening of the cadenza; but the lack of rhythmic swing in the second movement and of demoniac energy in the stormier passages cannot so easily be overlooked.

Again, the performance of Mr. Nowell was colorless, or rather it was monochromatic. The tones were soft or loud, but they were all of the same color, and that color was a cold tint.

There was no one great effect produced that startled or moved the hearer by an irresistible display of feeling, brilliancy or that mixture of sinking self in the composer and at the same time intensifying the speech of the composer by the rare individuality of the interpreter, that singular attribute of a great player that for want of a better word is vaguely called intellectuality. There was no apparent appreciation of a climax.

And so Mr. Nowell's playing of the noble, brilliant and entrancing concerto of Saint-Saens may be justly described as an exhibition of well-trained fingers that triumphed over the notation of the composer, but failed to grasp the spirit of which the notation is merely the superficial expression.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 20, 1893.

Mr. Nikisch's programme for the fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Saturday evening was one of especial interest, as the soloist of the occasion was the young Boston pianist, Mr. George M. Nowell. He is to be congratulated upon the favorable impression and success of his appearance. He selected for his number Saint-Saens's second concerto in G minor, a piece of much intricacy, but which he executed most effectively, playing with an elastic touch and showing a fine perception of musical techinque. The allegro Scherzando and presto movements were given with brilliancy, but it would have made an even deeper impression if it had not been overshadowed by the orchestra. At the finish he was greeted with enthusiastic applause The orchestra gave Ferdinand Thieriot's "Symphonietta" in E major, a work not very familiar here, but which gives important parts to the horns and wooden wind. The second movement is a slow romanza, and the finale is more animated, and with its sudden changes of time produces a pleasing effect. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was given finely and closed the performance. The next concert will be on Saturday evening, Feb. 25, and Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 50.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1893.

The Symphony Concert--Soloist, George M. Nowell.

The 15th of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, at Music Hall last evening, had as its prominent feature the appearance of Mr. George M Nowell, pianist, as soloist.

Undoubtedly, the choice of the pianists of the season makes a difficult matter for Mr. Nikisch to act upon, but in giving Mr. Nowell an appearance he not only justly recognized the claims of a thoroughly competent artist, but gave encouragement to the many local aspirants for a similar recognition.

Mr. Nowell is to be congratulated upon having made a pronounced success and with completely conquering the natural tendency to undervalue the merits of a home artist, which, unfortunately, characterizes the Symphony concert patrons.

In choosing the second concerto in C minor, by Saint Saens, for his appearance, Mr. Nowell set himself a task well calculated to test the skill of an artist of a far greater experience upon the concert stage, but his success justified the choice made for he met all the demands of the composition in a manner to disarm criticism, and won the hearty approval of the most critical on both sides the stage line, the men of the orchestra joining in the applause which rewarded his efforts with enthusiasm.

The most striking merit of Mr. Nowell's playing is the delightful touch he employs in all his work; it is clear and crisp, with both the breadth demanded for the strongest passages and the delicacy of a woman's hand in the lighter and more graceful measures, this characteristic giving a charm to his interpretations which is seldom realized.

The firm, broad style in which the player began the andante movement arrested the attention of the audience instantly, and indicated that a master sat at the piano. This impression was strengthened as the movement was continued, and at its conclusion Mr. Nowell was applauded with a spontaneous outburst which was honestly won. The airy grace of the allegro was most happily caught by the player, whose dainty treatment of this portion of the concerto was delightful. The brilliant presto again displayed the pianist to fine advantage, the technical demands of its intricate passages being met with a perfection, ease and beauty that aroused the audience to a high pitch of excitement, and gained an ovation of the grandest sort for the player as he concluded his task.

Mr. Nowell is primarily a musician, and he uses the pianoforte with a degree of taste and intelligence which, with his skill as an executant, puts him in the front rank of the world's players, and fully justifies his devotion to his profession.

The orchestral novelty of the evening was the Sinfonietta in E major by Ferdinand Thieriot, a composer better known in Hamburg than in this country. The work made a good introduction for its composer, however, and its performance gave great pleasure. The opening allegro is built upon a tuneful theme, which is admirably treated, the scoring being for the classic orchestra, with two horns and trumpets, but no trombones. The second movement, in romanza form, is also admirably well written, and the final presto, a tarantella, is peculiarly pleasing in its sudden changes of time and its tuneful characteristics. Its reading by Mr. Nikisch brought out all its merits, and the audience was quick in its appreciation of the good work done by the composer.

The seventh of the Beethoven symphonies concluded the programme, and a most satisfactory interpretation of it was given by Mr. Nikisch.

At next Saturday evening's concert Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the soloist, playing the concerto for violin in A major, the other numbers of the programme being Dvorak's second symphony, Grieg's second "Peer Gynt" suite and the "Fingal's Cave" overture.

At the recital to be given by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening, the 28th inst., the programme will afford a hearing of Mrs Nikisch in songs by Brahms, Paderewski, Schubert, Franz, Chopin, Busoni, Hinrich, Grieg, Schumann and Heuberger. Miss Leonora von Stosch, the violinist, will assist, the accompaniments for both artists being played by Mr Nikisch.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 19, 1893.

Echoes from the Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

The programme for the 15th Symphony rehearsal and concert was made up of somewhat unfamiliar selections. Ferdinand Thieriot's sinfonietta in E major, Camille Saint-Saens' concerto, No. 2, for pianoforte, and Beethoven's symphony, No. 7, in A major. The soloist was Mr. George M. Nowell.

The Saint-Saens concerto is one which greatly taxes the abilities and endurance of the pianist, for the pianoforte score continues almost uninterruptedly throughout the piece. The themes are generally first given to the piano, the orchestra developing the motif, to be followed by the elaborate embroideries, and in the andante, glissando octaves and double thirds by the pianist.

The second part is a strongly marked and brilliant will-o'-the-wisp movement, alternating between the solo instrument and the orchestra. The finale is a series of tempestuous passages, with sudden changes in tempo, in which the soloist and orchestra vie in brilliancy.

The Boston artist, Mr. George M. Nowell, played very effectively, lacking perhaps the necessary vigor and dash in the "diabolique" movements, which have proved stumbling blocks to so many performers.

The opening, unaccompanied, cadenza was cleanly given, and the long climax with its profusion of octave runs and sustained forte was most admirably played.

In the fairy-like allegro the beautiful themes were delicately interpreted, but the furious finale was overshadowed by the work of the orchestra.

The Thieriot Sinfonietta enabled the excellence of the horn and wood-winds to be made clearly apparent in the allegro. The slow romanza of the second part and the tarantello were very well played. Beethoven's magnificent seventh symphony was given a fine interpretation, the most successful of the evening.

Particularly noticeable was the manner in which the famous allegro was performed, the difficult repeated rythm being taken up by the different parts of the orchestra without a suggestion of uncertainty or blurring of the notes.

The programme of the rehearsal and concert, Feb. 24, 25, will be as follows: Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave"; Saint-Saens' concerto for violin, A major; Grieg's "Peer Gynt," No. 2; Dvorak's D minor symphony, No. 2. Mr. Loeffler will be the solo violinist.

—The third of the Adamowski quartet concerts, in New York, was given last Saturday afternoon at the house of Mrs. Nicholas Fish, No. 53 Irving pl. Mrs. Fish's house is particularly well adapted for music. Mr. Nikisch was at the piano. Both of these musicales of Mr. Adamowski's were to have been presided over by Mrs. Whitney in her own house, and the recollection of her abundant vitality and keen desire to make others enjoy with her the higher pleasures that this world has to give was not absent from many of the guests at both entertainments.

[109]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 19, 1893.

THE FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme chosen for the fifteenth symphony concert last evening in Music Hall had for its most noteworthy features the concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, op. 22, Camille Saint Saens; while its least important, yet by no means mediocre, selection was a sinfonietta in E major, op. 55, by Thieriot. The allegro with which the sinfonetta begins is characterised by a transparent, yet simple, clearness of design and a harmonious development of the parts; it is quasi classical art work against which no serious objection can be urged. The themes of its first movement are unaffectedly pleasing and are also naively yet carefully developed. The pathos of the romanza, the second movement, is by no means over done; but the finale a tarantella, presto in E major is inexplicably vulgar. The soloist for the ever welcome concerto in G minor by Camille Saint Saens was Mr. George M. Nowell.

Such an ideal performance of the work from any artist's standpoint of technique has not been heard here, while a superbly cultivated and sympathetic touch, and a touch more thoroughly musical, refined and poetic it would be difficult to imagine, often enabled the artist to contribute a wonderously photographic representation of the music—a recognition of Mr. Nowell's ability that is especially applicable to his superlatively fine performance of the presto. There was no sacrifice of respect of the composer, and the entire rendition carried with it a merit of execution so delightfully unimpeachable that the enthusiastic plaudits received by the artist upon the conclusion of the work was indeed as highly merited a tribute as is seldom bestowed.

Of the concerto it can truly be said that it will always remain a master-piece. The themes of the first movement are spontaneous on the one hand, and impressively scholastic and dignified on the other. The allegro scherzando is a complete and charming contrast to the first movement, is jovial without being vulgar, and the piano and orchestra fairly seemed engaged in a friendly skirmish, yet always filling up the general structure and uniting to contribute a rich, warm tone to the general effect. The finale with all its cheerful themes and sparkling vivacity is full of just such individual traits as have so often suggested Saint-Saens as the most musical of Frenchmen.

Beethoven's seventh symphony has had two few hearings here of recent years not to make its appearance heartily welcome on the programme for last evening. Beethoven has left no record of his purpose while composing it, yet how highly he valued it may be inferred from his correspondence. In a letter to Salomon he says: "The grand symphony in it is one of my very best;" and again he writes to Neate concerning it as follows: "Among my best works, which I can hardly say of my symphony in A." Commentators, who by reason of their intimate study of Beethoven, are regarded as authorities, disagree in interpeting the seventh symphony, whose composer has given them no other aid by which their differences might be settled. Berlioz would have us believe that the first movement is a rustic wedding, and we are therefore to suppose that it is drawn from the same scene of village mirth that suggested the dance in the "Pastoral" Symphony. Lenz looks on the symphony and its comparison, the Eighth, as one result of the military enthusiasm, which produced the "Battle of Vittoria" symphony, and as Grove says, "bends and warps every passage to give its warlike intention." But where "doctors differ who shall decide?" Marx sees in the work Moorish knighthood; Oribicheff discovers a masked ball; Bischoff called it a sequel to the "Pastoral;" Ambrose sides with Berlioz, while Richard Wagner declares it is the apotheosis of the dance, the ideal embodiment in tones of the bodily movement.

The performance of the work lacked in positive clear outline, in accuracy of detail, in distinct and palpable contribution of each instrument. One also missed in the finale allegro the fine vitality of accent and free, buoyant onward movement that the music should have incited and would have done, doubtless, had it not been for the prevailing effeminacy and sterility of Mr. Nikisch's lead.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme for the fifteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Thieriot: Sinfonietta in E major, Opus 55.
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, Opus 22.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7, in A major, Opus 92.
Mr. George M. Nowell was the pianist.

Of all novelties by men of local fame that have been brought out here for several years the Thieriot sinfonietta is by far the most pleasing. In fact, looking back over the things by Grädener, Baumgärtner, Bruckner, Herbeck, Humperdink, et al., that have been given here from time to time, this sinfonietta by Thieriot is the first work by a man of this class that has seemed really worth while giving at all. The composer is a Hamburg musician, born in that city, and living there now at the age of fifty-four; he studied in Altona under Eduard Marxsen—who was also Brahms's teacher—and later in Munich under Joseph Rheinberger. He has occupied the positions of music director and conductor in several German and Austrian towns. The sinfonietta is, like the earlier symphonies of Philipp Emanuel Bach's day, in three movements: an Allegro moderato in E major; a Romanze (andante) in B major; and a Tarantella (presto) in E minor. The first of these movements is strictly according to the sonata-form in its construction. It is not to be gainsaid that the thematic material in the work is not of the highest quality; it does not show melodic invention of a high order, and often grazes the commonplace. But, for all that, it does show melodic invention, and that most decidedly: the themes are spontaneous, natural, musical and easily flowing; and, moreover, their lack of the highest distinction is in a great measure atoned for by a certain unassuming air they have. But where the composer shows his musical inventiveness most unmistakably is in his treatment of his material, in his working-out. His inspiration, such as it is, does not flag after the first eight or sixteen measures; it persists to the end. The musical sense is delighted at every turning by some happy device, by some charming way of doing things that shows more than mere routine skill. It is this that lifts the work out of the domain of mere Kapellmeistermusik, and gives it true artistic life and vitality. Every phrase proclaims its divine right of being there; the music is not only coherent, but charmingly, naturally, genially coherent. One feels that the composer is never at a loss what to say next: the presence of a genuine talent is felt throughout. The sinfonietta was admirably played and made a very vivid impression.

In the performance of Beethoven's A-major symphony there was much to praise, also something to criticise. We must say, to begin with, that of all the now current fads in musical performance, the modern slow allegro seems most out of place when applied to Beethoven. We can well remember the time when it was the fashion to take almost every allegro with a rush, as if thrashed out to the crack of the ring master's whip. That was bad enough; but now the pendulum has swung over to the other side, and it seems as if conductors and pianists were bound to take off the vivace from the fair forehead of an innocent allegro, and set a moderato there? Why should brisk, lively movements like the first Vivace of this symphony be played as if they had an insatiable yearning to become Allegrettos? Why must they be made to creep along as if hired by the hour, and not by the course? What becomes of all Beethoven's so characteristic dash and brio with this tame ambling? And then that other modern fad: expressive modifications of the tempo! One gets tremendously tired of it. That holding back the rhythm on the last two or three syncopated horn notes in the trio of the third movement, just before the trumpets take the A's out of the violins' mouth, and the whole orchestra plunges fortissimo into the theme! To us it sounds cheap and trivial, like a Laputan flapper, to wake up the audience and call their attention to the fact that something important is coming. Beginning the long crescendo in the coda of the first movement at a markedly slower tempo than what has gone before is another instance of this, and to us equally unpalatable. If there ever were a composition in which inveterate rhythmic persistency was the prime feature, Beethoven's A-major symphony is that one; it is an apotheosis of the Dance from beginning to end. But, on the other hand, there were items in the performance which call for the highest praise. The dotted triplet throughout the first movement—one of the rhythmic figures most seldom played right—was given palpably as a dotted triplet, and not as an eighth-note followed by two-sixteenths. The long crescendo in the coda, if taken too slow for our taste, was played with incomparable beauty of tone and phrasing. The principal figure in the trio of the third movement (on the clarinets, bassoons and horns) was swelled and diminished just right. Here, by the way, we would bring up the question once more of whether double and triple grace notes and turns before the first note of a measure are to be considered as belonging to the measure in which they are written, or to the one immediately preceding. Each interpretation of these ornaments has its advocates; the best conclusion probably is that neither method should be applied invariably. Mr. Nikisch has these grace-notes played as belonging to the preceding measure, that is before the beat, instead of on the beat. We should have nothing to urge against this—as it is in most cases purely a matter of taste—were it not that in one place (the fifth and sixth measures of the second section of the trio) playing the three-note turn before the beat brings the C-sharp in the oboe and second clarinet and bassoon immediately over the low G-sharp in the second horn, thus making rather questionable fourths between the middle-voice and the bass. Four measures later the turn in the flute makes open octaves between the upper voice and the bass. This may be a slight point, but it is surely quite as important as that "trilling on every note of a triad" that Mendelssohn once noticed in Italy, which resulted in "the most terrible fifths!" The finale was played with all due brilliancy and dash. This movement presents one of those problems, not uncommon in Beethoven, which are exceedingly difficult for the conductor's ingenuity to solve. It is like the famous organ-point in the scherzo of the ninth symphony, of which Wagner wrote, "I call upon a musician to assert with a good conscience that he has ever heard this melody clearly in orchestral performances, yea, whether he would ever [illegible] the pianoforte-arrangement!" Play the finale of the seventh symphony as it is written, and you cannot hear the theme in the first violins; tone down the wind instruments so as to make the theme audible, and you obliterate the whole character of the music. And here there can be no question of changing the scoring as in the passage from the ninth symphony already referred to; there a great part of the trouble arose from Beethoven's not having valvehorns and trumpets to write for; here it is nothing of the sort. To "improve" this movement there would be nothing for it but to distribute the second violin and viola parts among the violas divisi, and to double the first violins with the second—a liberty that should by no means be taken with Beethoven. There only remain the two different ways of playing it: right, with an inaudible or barely audible theme; or wrong, with an audible theme. Mr. Gericke used to do the latter; Mr. Nikisch does the former. We must say that we far prefer Mr. Nikisch's way.

Saint-Saëns's G minor concerto has not, we believe, been heard here for some time. It was good to hear it again, to find it holding its own against the hand of Time, the great Destroyer, and showing itself as fresh, strong and beautiful as when we first heard it. Surely this work is one of the finest pianoforte concertos written since Mendelssohn and Schumann; in inspiration, workmanship, form, and style it is alike admirable. And it is all such pure pianoforte playing, too; never has the instrument been more congenially written for with orchestra. Never mind how much it owes to Mendelssohn, Berlioz, or whom you please. Mendelssohn owed a good deal to Bach, and Bach not a little to those who went before him. Let it suffice that it all bears the stamp of Saint-Saëns's style and individuality. The first movement is as strong and brilliant as steel; and the second and third movements may look long before finding their match in modern writing. Mr. George M. Nowell has gained much since we last (and first) heard him in Weber's Concertstück at the symphony concerts some years ago. It must be admitted that he then made a decidedly feeble impression.

But last Saturday evening he played the Saint-Saëns concerto both with brilliancy and musicianly authority. His technique is not to be compared to that of the great finger-knights, but he shirked none of the difficulties of the concerto, and carried through the most dangerous passages with unflinching bravura. We suspect him of having studied the work with the composer, for he plays it—excepting a little over-rapid tempo in the second theme of the second movement—just as he does. There is no great opportunity for showing depth of feeling in the work; but Mr. Nowell fully satisfied all the demands it makes upon a player's emotional expressiveness. He played it with great distinction of style, clearness, and effect. He fully earned the repeated recalls he got at the end.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture to "Fingal's Cave," opus 26; Saint-Saëns, concerto for violin, in A major; Grieg, suite No. 2 from "Peer Gynt;" Dvorák, symphony No. 2, in D minor, opus 70. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

IN MEMORIAM : : : : : : :
GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

GLUCK.	OVERTURE. "Iphigenie en Aulis." (with Wagner's ending).
HANDEL.	ARIA from "Samson."
SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY, in B minor. Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.
WAGNER.	FUNERAL MARCH from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
WAGNER.	"WOTAN'S FAREWELL," and "FIRE CHARM," from "Die Walkure."

SOLOIST:

MR. HEINRICH MEYN.

[110]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 19, 1893.

THE FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme chosen for the fifteenth symphony concert last evening in Music Hall had for its most noteworthy features the concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, op. 22, Camille Saint Saens, while its least important, yet by no means mediocre, selection was a sinfonietta in E major, op. 55, by Thieriot. The allegro with which the sinfonetta begins is characterised by a transparent, yet simple, clearness of design and a harmonious development of the parts; it is quasi classical art work against which no serious objection can be urged. The themes of its first movement are unaffectedly pleasing and are also naively yet carefully developed. The pathos of the romanza, the second movement, is by no means over done; but the finale a tarantella, presto in E major is inexplicably vulgar. The soloist for the ever welcome concerto in G minor by Camille Saint Saens was Mr. George M. Nowell.

Such an ideal performance of the work from any artist's standpoint of technique has not been heard here, while a superbly cultivated and sympathetic touch, and a touch more thoroughly musical, refined and poetic it would be difficult to imagine, often enabled the artist to contribute a wonderously photographic representation of the music—a recognition of Mr. Nowell's ability that is especially applicable to his superlatively fine performance of the presto. There was no sacrifice of respect of the composer, and the entire rendition carried with it a merit of execution so delightfully unimpeachable that the enthusiastic plaudits received by the artist upon the conclusion of the work was indeed as highly merited a tribute as is seldom bestowed.

Of the concerto it can truly be said that it will always remain a master-piece. The themes of the first movement are spontaneous on the one hand, and impressively scholastic and dignified on the other. The allegro scherzando is a complete and charming contrast to the first movement, is jovial without being vulgar, and the piano and orchestra fairly seemed engaged in a friendly skirmish, yet always filling up the general structure and uniting to contribute a rich, warm tone to the general effect. The finale with all its cheerful themes and sparkling vivacity is full of just such individual traits as have so often suggested Saint-Saens as the most musical of Frenchmen.

Beethoven's seventh symphony has had two few hearings here of recent years not to make its appearance heartily welcome on the programme for last evening. Beethoven has left no record of his purpose while composing it, yet how highly he valued it may be inferred from his correspondence. In a letter to Salomon he says: "The grand symphony in it is one of my very best;" and again he writes to Neate concerning it as follows: "Among my best works, which I can hardly say of my symphony in A." Commentators, who by reason of their intimate study of Beethoven, are regarded as authorities, disagree in interpeting the seventh symphony, whose composer has given them no other aid by which their differences might be settled. Berleoz would have us believe that the first movement is a rustic wedding, and we are therefore to suppose that it is drawn from the same scene of village mirth that suggested the dance in the "Pastoral" Symphony. Lenz looks on the symphony and its comparison, the Eighth, as one result of the military enthusiasm, which produced the "Battle of Vittoria" symphony, and as Grove says, "bends and warps every passage to give its warlike intention." But where "doctors differ who shall decide?" Marx sees in the work Moorish knighthood; Oribicheff discovers a masked ball; Bischoff called it a sequel to the "Pastoral;" Ambrose sides with Berlioz, while Richard Wagner declares it is the apotheosis of the dance, the ideal embodiment in tones of the bodily movement.

The performance of the work lacked in positive clear outline, in accuracy of detail, in distinct and palpable contribution of each instrument. One also missed in the finale allegro the fine vitality of accent and free, buoyant onward movement that the music should have incited and would have done, doubtless, had it not been for the prevailing effeminacy and sterility of Mr. Nikisch's lead.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme for the fifteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Thieriot: Sinfonietta in E major, Opus 55.
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, Opus 22.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7, in A major, Opus 92.
Mr. George M. Nowell was the pianist.

Of all novelties by men of local fame that have been brought out here for several years the Thieriot sinfonietta is by far the most pleasing. In fact, looking back over the things by Grädener, Baumgärtner, Bruckner, Herbeck, Humperdink, et al., that have been given here from time to time, this sinfonietta by Thieriot is the first work by a man of this class that has seemed really worth while giving at all. The composer is a Hamburg musician, born in that city, and living there now at the age of fifty-four; he studied in Altona under Eduard Marxsen—who was also Brahms's teacher—and later in Munich under Joseph Rheinberger. He has occupied the positions of music director and conductor in several German and Austrian towns. The sinfonietta is, like the earlier symphonies of Philipp Emanuel Bach's day, in three movements: an Allegro moderato in E major; a Romanze (andante) in B major; and a Tarantella (presto) in E minor. The first of these movements is strictly according to the sonata-form in its construction. It is not to be gainsaid that the thematic material in the work is not of the highest quality; it does not show melodic invention of a high order, and often grazes the commonplace. But, for all that, it does show melodic invention, and that most decidedly: the themes are spontaneous, natural, musical and easily flowing; and, moreover, their lack of the highest distinction is in a great measure atoned for by a certain unassuming air they have. But where the composer shows his musical inventiveness most unmistakably is in his treatment of his material, in his working-out. His inspiration, such as it is, does not flag after the first eight or sixteen measures; it persists to the end. The musical sense is delighted at every turning by some happpy device, by some charming way of doing things that shows more than mere routine skill. It is this that lifts the work out of the domain of mere Kapellmeistermusik, and gives it true artistic life and vitality. Every phrase proclaims its divine right of being there; the music is not only coherent, but charmingly, naturally, genially coherent. One feels that the composer is never at a loss what to say next; the presence of a genuine talent is felt throughout. The sinfonietta was admirably played and made a very vivid impression.

In the performance of Beethoven's A-major symphony there was much to praise, also something to criticise. We must say, to begin with, that of all the now current fads in musical performance, the modern slow allegro seems most out of place when applied to Beethoven. We can well remember the time when it was the fashion to take almost every allegro with a rush, as if thrashed out to the crack of the ring master's whip. That was bad enough; but now the pendulum has swung over to the other side, and it seems as if conductors and pianists were bound to take off the vivace from the fair forehead of an innocent allegro, and set a moderato there? Why should brisk, lively movements like the first Vivace of this symphony be played as if they had an insatiable yearning to become Allegrettos? Why must they be made to creep along as if hired by the hour, and not by the course? What becomes of all Beethoven's so characteristic dash and brio with this tame ambling? And then that other modern fad: expressive modifications of the tempo! One gets tremendously tired of it. That holding back the rhythm on the last two or three syncopated horn notes in the trio of the third movement, just before the trumpets take the A's out of the violins' mouth, and the whole orchestra plunges fortissimo into the theme! To us it sounds cheap and trivial, like a Laputan flapper, to wake up the audience and call their attention to the fact that something important is coming. Beginning the long crescendo in the coda of the first movement at a markedly slower tempo than what has gone before is another instance of this, and to us equally unpalatable. If there ever were a composition in which inveterate rhythmic persistency was the prime feature, Beethoven's A-major symphony is that one; it is an apotheosis of the Dance from beginning to end. But, on the other hand, there were items in the performance which call for the highest praise. The dotted triplet throughout the first movement—one of the rhythmic figures most seldom played right—was given palpably as a dotted triplet, and not as an eighth-note followed by two-sixteenths. The long crescendo in the coda, if taken too slow for our taste, was played with incomparable beauty of tone and phrasing. The principal figure in the trio of the third movement (on the clarinets, bassoons and horns) was swelled and diminished just right. Here, by the way, we would bring up the question once more of whether double and triple grace notes and turns before the first note of a measure are to be considered as belonging to the measure in which they are written, or to the one immediately preceding. Each interpretation of these ornaments has its advocates; the best conclusion probably is that neither method should be applied invariably. Mr. Nikisch has these grace-notes played as belonging to the preceding measure, that is before the beat, instead of on the beat. We should have nothing to urge against this—as it is in most cases purely a matter of taste—were it not that in one place (the fifth and sixth measures of the second section of the trio) playing the three-note turn before the beat brings the C-sharp in the oboe and second clarinet and bassoon immediately over the low G-sharp in the second horn, thus making rather questionable fourths between the middle voice and the bass. Four measures later the turn in the flute makes open octaves between the upper voice and the bass. This may be a slight point, but it is surely quite as important as that "trilling on every note of a triad" that Mendelssohn once noticed in Italy, which resulted in "the most terrible fifths!" The finale was played with all due brilliancy and dash. This movement presents one of those problems, not uncommon in Beethoven, which are exceedingly difficult for the conductor's ingenuity to solve. It is like the famous organ-point in the scherzo of the ninth symphony, of which Wagner wrote, "I call upon a musician to assert with a good conscience that he has ever heard this melody clearly in orchestral performances, [illegible] whether he would even know it, if he had not got it from reading the score or from playing the pianoforte arrangement!" Play the finale of the seventh symphony as it is written, and you cannot hear the theme in the first violins; tone down the wind instruments so as to make the theme audible, and you obliterate the whole character of the music. And here there can be no question of changing the scoring as in the passage from the ninth symphony already referred to; there a great part of the trouble arose from Beethoven's not having valvehorns and trumpets to write for; here it is nothing of the sort. To "improve" this movement there would be nothing for it but to distribute the second violin and viola parts among the violas divisi, and to double the first violins with the second—a liberty that should by no means be taken with Beethoven. There only remain the two different ways of playing it: right, with an inaudible or barely audible theme; or wrong, with an audible theme. Mr. Gericke used to do the latter; Mr. Nikisch does the former. We must say that we far prefer Mr. Nikisch's way.

Saint-Saëns's G minor concerto has not, we believe, been heard here for some time. It was good to hear it again, to find it holding its own against the hand of Time, the great Destroyer, and showing itself as fresh, strong and beautiful as when we first heard it. Surely this work is one of the finest pianoforte concertos written since Mendelssohn and Schumann; in inspiration, workmanship, form and style it is alike admirable. And it is all such pure pianoforte playing, too; never has the instrument been more congenially written for with orchestra. Never mind how much it owes to Mendelssohn, Berlioz, or whom you please. Mendelssohn owed a good deal to Bach, and Bach not a little to those who went before him. Let it suffice that it all bears the stamp of Saint-Saëns's style and individuality. The first movement is as strong and brilliant as steel; and the second and third movements may look long before finding their match in modern writing. Mr. George M. Nowell has gained much since we last (and first) heard him in Weber's Conzertstück at the symphony concerts some years ago. It must be admitted that he then made a decidedly feeble impression. But last Saturday evening he played the Saint-Saëns concerto both with brilliancy and musicianly authority. His technique is not to be compared to that of the great finger-knights, but he shirked none of the difficulties of the concerto, and carried through the most dangerous passages with unflinching bravura. We suspect him of having studied the work with the composer, for he plays it—excepting a little over-rapid tempo in the second theme of the second movement—just as he does. There is no great opportunity for showing depth of feeling in the work; but Mr. Nowell fully satisfied all the demands it makes upon a player's emotional expressiveness. He played it with great distinction of style, clearness, and effect. He fully earned the repeated recalls he got at the end.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture to "Fingal's Cave," opus 26; Saint-Saëns, concerto for violin, in A major; Grieg, suite No. 2 from "Peer Gynt;" Dvorák, symphony No. 2, in D minor, opus 70. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

IN MEMORIAM : : : : : : :
GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

GLUCK.	OVERTURE. "Iphigenie en Aulis." (with Wagner's ending).
HANDEL.	ARIA from "Samson."
SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY, in B minor. Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.
WAGNER.	FUNERAL MARCH from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
WAGNER.	"WOTAN'S FAREWELL" and "FIRE CHARM," from "Die Walkure."

SOLOIST:

MR. HEINRICH MEYN.

[110]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, March 1, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

5

Single tickets, $1.25 each, now on sale at 170 Westminster St.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 25, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme for the fifteenth Symphony concert was altogether instrumental, and in the greater part of it the orchestra did its best work, the only real exceptions to be taken being in regard to points of interpretation when the conductor deliberately stepped aside for a moment or two from both long-confirmed customs and from the plain prescriptions of his author. The symphony was Beethoven's seventh, in the reading of which these innovations appeared; but they were not such as to do any real harm or to deserve any serious censure, while, on the other hand, the rest of the reading was excellent in temper and in treatment. The evening began with the first performance at these concerts of Thierrot's sinfonietta in E-major, opus 55, originally played in Boston for the Harvard Musical Association. Its name expresses it fairly, for in the character of its themes and in their development it is less in force, fulness, dignity and concentration than a symphony should be. It is melodious, sweet, flowing and pleasant to the ear. Its scoring shows learning and skill, but it is rather light and sensuous than solid and impressive. Its moods are changeable, but they avoid the deep or serious, and its spirit never becomes strength or earnestness. It was delightfully played. Between these works the second pianoforte concerto of Saint-Saens was performed, Mr. George M. Nowell being the soloist. His playing was sensible, sincere, solid and accurate; but it seemed less the playing of a pianist by temperament than by determination. Music is distinctly a mathematical art, and anybody who can learn to keep time, has reasonably obedient hands, patience and six hours a day, may master any instrument sufficiently to become an acceptable concert player. Mr. Nowell's reading had all the solid qualities which come from a good, clear head, careful and judicious instruction, assiduous practice, conscientiousness and a persistent disposition, but it did not show individuality, sensitiveness or elasticity of nature. It was excellent so far as it went; but it did not get far beyond the distinct and balanced delivery of the composition from the standpoint of its technical construction.

The programme for this evening includes Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave," Saint-Saens's concerto for violin, in A-major, Grieg's suite No. 2 from "Peer Gynt," Dvorak's symphony No. 2, in D-minor. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

103 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25,

The performance of Mr. George Nowell of the Saint-Saëns Concerto in G minor at the fifteenth Symphony Concert last Saturday evening was of extraordinary merit as a specimen of artistic execution, the precise equivalent of which is rarely experienced. Possibly the performance suffered from the effects of over-study; and there were not such sympathetically musical qualities in attendance upon it as the pianist at his best would have displayed, but it was a masterly performance for all that. It constantly won the admiring attention of the refined and critical audience, and was as unimpeachable an illustration of refined and artistic technique as one would care to hear.

The Kneisel Quartette has received an invitation likely to be accepted; namely, to give a series of concerts at the World's Fair late in May. This will add an important feature to the excellent program prepared by the committee of music.

The Musical Courier.

ESTABLISHED JANUARY, 1880.

No. 677.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1893.

The program of the fifteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Sinfonietta, E major, op. 55.....Thierot
Concerto for piano, G minor.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven

Mr. George M. Nowell was the pianist.

The first mention I remember of Ferdinand Thierot's Sinfonietta was at the time that it was played at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipsic (October 29, 1891) under the direction of the composer. The work was first heard in Boston last week. As a whole it is a pleasing composition, although the three movements are of uneven worth. The first, an allegro moderato, is graceful, flowing music, with agreeable themes, fine and discreet harmonization and ingenious and effective instrumentation. The second, a romanze with a too strongly contrasting and interrupting intermezzo, is less interesting; and the finale, a tarantella, is dangerously near vulgarity in its frank appeal to the hearer. The Sinfonietta and the symphony were finely played, although in the vivace of the first movement of the latter there were liberties taken with the pace that only led to effects of doubtful value.

Mr. George M. Nowell gave a performance of Saint-Saëns' brilliant concerto that was marked rather by incongruous scholasticism and professional coolness and dignity than by the warmth, light and color demanded by the work. Mr. Nowell has good fingers and from the technical standpoint there was much to praise. The concerto, however, should be played by a man of temperament.

*

The Adamowski Quartet and Paderewski.—A program that might have been transposed in some manner, or at least curtailed, was presented last Wednesday afternoon at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall by the Adamowski String Quartet, of Boston. This organization consists of T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; M. Zach, viola, and J. Adamowski, 'cello. All these artists are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and have played in this city, chiefly in private. As an organization the Adamowski Quartet lacks the supreme polish that characterizes the Kneisel Quartet, though the members of the Quartet are Polish. But they play musically and with spirit, and if they had omitted one quartet the program would have gained in interest.

Mozart's G major quartet was given first, then three movements from Tschaikowski's lovely op. 2, the slow muted movement being especially well played. Mr. Paderewski, who was suffering from a sore finger, played a group of soli Schubert's B flat impromptu with its charming variations, all most musically played, Chopin's A flat prelude and C sharp minor valse. Mr. Paderewski, though apparently not in the best of spirits, was as usual poetical and interesting, but he wisely refused to play any encores.

The afternoon closed with a performance of Beethoven's great trio, for piano, violin and 'cello in B flat, op. 97. This truly noble work should have been given precedence on the program, for, coming as it did at the end, it proved a trifle trying. It was very well played indeed, the andante being given in a noble manner.

Mr. Paderewski proved himself to be a fine ensemble player, entering devotedly into the spirit of the work and subordinating himself when occasion required. His accompaniments were a model of delicacy and musicianly skill. The Messrs. Adamowski again proved their capabilities as excellent artists. The audience was very large, very fashionable, and of course very enthusiastic.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 26.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was very well attended, notwithstanding the miserable weather. The programme was: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in A, op. 20, Saint-Saëns; Orchestral Suite, No. 2, from the music to "Peer Gynt," op. 55, Grieg; Symphony in D-minor, No. 2, op. 70, Dvorak. The Grieg Suite, which, if we are not mistaken, had not been heard at these concerts before, is not especially interesting. As music, pure and simple, it says very little that was worth the saying, and though by no means lacking in clearness, is somewhat unmeaning without the text that it was intended to illustrate and emphasize. It is a curious medley of commonplace and pretentiousness; of spasms of tunefulness and throes of melodrama; the whole seasoned with spicy and frequently novel orchestral effects which are now and then more vulgar than edifying. The suite was remarkably well played, but it made no very strong effect, despite its eccentricities and its bid for popular favor. The fiery Dvorak symphony was also very well played, and with great spirit. Mr. Loeffler played the fine violin concerto with exquisite taste, perfect finish of style, purity and brilliancy of technique, and nobility of sentiment. The warm and graceful artistic feeling, and the conscientious devotion to the composer that always give a characteristic distinction to his playing, were manifested at their fullest, and proved a potent element in the pleasure that his performance afforded. He was applauded with exceptional enthusiasm, and was three times recalled with tremendous fervor. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Der Freyschutz," Weber; Symphony, No. 4, E-minor, Brahms; "Todentanz," Riemenschneider (first time); Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai. There will be no soloist.

[111]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, March 1, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

5

Single tickets, $1.25 each, now on sale at 170 Westminster St.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 25, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme for the fifteenth Symphony concert was altogether instrumental, and in the greater part of it the orchestra did its best work, the only real exceptions to be taken being in regard to points of interpretation when the conductor deliberately stepped aside for a moment or two from both long-confirmed customs and from the plain prescriptions of his author. The symphony was Beethoven's seventh, in the reading of which these innovations appeared; but they were not such as to do any real harm or to deserve any serious censure, while, on the other hand, the rest of the reading was excellent in temper and in treatment. The evening began with the first performance at these concerts of Thierrot's sinfonietta in E-major, opus 55, originally played in Boston for the Harvard Musical Association. Its name expresses it fairly, for in the character of its themes and in their development it is less in force, fulness, dignity and concentration than a symphony should be. It is melodious, sweet, flowing and pleasant to the ear. Its scoring shows learning and skill, but it is rather light and sensuous than solid and impressive. Its moods are changeable, but they avoid the deep or serious, and its spirit never becomes strength or earnestness. It was delightfully played. Between these works the second pianoforte concerto of Saint-Saens was performed, Mr. George M. Nowell being the soloist. His playing was sensible, sincere, solid and accurate; but it seemed less the playing of a pianist by temperament than by determination. Music is distinctly a mathematical art, and anybody who can learn to keep time, has reasonably obedient hands, patience and six hours a day, may master any instrument sufficiently to become an acceptable concert player. Mr. Nowell's reading had all the solid qualities which come from a good, clear head, careful and judicious instruction, assiduous practice, conscientiousness and a persistent disposition, but it did not show individuality, sensitiveness or elasticity of nature. It was excellent so far as it went; but it did not get far beyond the distinct and balanced delivery of the composition from the standpoint of its technical construction.

The programme for this evening includes Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave," Saint-Saens's concerto for violin, in A-major, Grieg's suite No. 2 from "Peer Gynt," Dvorak's symphony No. 2, in D-minor. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

403 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25,

The performance of Mr. George Nowell of the Saint-Saëns Concerto in G minor at the fifteenth Symphony Concert last Saturday evening was of extraordinary merit as a specimen of artistic execution, the precise equivalent of which is rarely experienced. Possibly the performance suffered from the effects of over-study; and there were not such sympathetically musical qualities in attendance upon it as the pianist at his best would have displayed, but it was a masterly performance for all that. It constantly won the admiring attention of the refined and critical audience, and was as unimpeachable an illustration of refined and artistic technique as one would care to hear.

The Kneisel Quartette has received an invitation likely to be accepted; namely, to give a series of concerts at the World's Fair late in May. This will add an important feature to the excellent program prepared by the committee of music.

The Musical Courier.

ESTABLISHED JANUARY, 1880.

No. 677.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1893.

The program of the fifteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Sinfonietta, E major, op. 55.....Thierot
Concerto for piano, G minor.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven

Mr. George M. Nowell was the pianist.

The first mention I remember of Ferdinand Thierot's Sinfonietta was at the time that it was played at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipsic (October 29, 1891) under the direction of the composer. The work was first heard in Boston last week. As a whole it is a pleasing composition, although the three movements are of uneven worth. The first, an allegro moderato, is graceful, flowing music, with agreeable themes, fine and discreet harmonization and ingenious and effective instrumentation. The second, a romanze with a too strongly contrasting and interrupting intermezzo, is less interesting; and the finale, a tarantella, is dangerously near vulgarity in its frank appeal to the hearer. The Sinfonietta and the symphony were finely played, although in the vivace of the first movement of the latter there were liberties taken with the pace that only led to effects of doubtful value.

Mr. George M. Nowell gave a performance of Saint-Saëns' brilliant concerto that was marked rather by incongruous scholasticism and professional coolness and dignity than by the warmth, light and color demanded by the work. Mr. Nowell has good fingers and from the technical standpoint there was much to praise. The concerto, however, should be played by a man of temperament.

*

The Adamowski Quartet and Paderewski.—A program that might have been transposed in some manner, or at least curtailed, was presented last Wednesday afternoon at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall by the Adamowski String Quartet, of Boston. This organization consists of T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; M. Zach, viola, and J. Adamowski, 'cello. All these artists are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and have played in this city, chiefly in private. As an organization the Adamowski Quartet lacks the supreme polish that characterizes the Kneisel Quartet, though the members of the Quartet are Polish. But they play musically and with spirit, and if they had omitted one quartet the program would have gained in interest.

Mozart's G major quartet was given first, then three movements from Tschaikowski's lovely op. 2, the slow muted movement being especially well played. Mr. Paderewski, who was suffering from a sore finger, played a group of soli Schubert's B flat impromptu with its charming variations, all most musically played, Chopin's A flat prelude and C sharp minor valse. Mr. Paderewski, though apparently not in the best of spirits, was as usual poetical and interesting, but he wisely refused to play any encores.

The afternoon closed with a performance of Beethoven's great trio, for piano, violin and 'cello in B flat, op. 97. This truly noble work should have been given precedence on the program, for, coming as it did at the end, it proved a trifle trying. It was very well played indeed, the andante being given in a noble manner.

Mr. Paderewski proved himself to be a fine ensemble player, entering devotedly into the spirit of the work and subordinating himself when occasion required. His accompaniments were a model of delicacy and musicianly skill. The Messrs. Adamowski again proved their capabilities as excellent artists. The audience was very large, very fashionable, and of course very enthusiastic.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 26.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was very well attended, notwithstanding the miserable weather. The programme was: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in A, op. 20, Saint-Saëns; Orchestral Suite, No. 2, from the music to "Peer Gynt," op. 55, Grieg; Symphony in D-minor, No. 2, op. 70, Dvorak. The Grieg Suite, which, if we are not mistaken, had not been heard at these concerts before, is not especially interesting. As music, pure and simple, it says very little that was worth the saying, and though by no means lacking in clearness, is somewhat unmeaning without the text that it was intended to illustrate and emphasize. It is a curious medley of commonplace and pretentiousness; of spasms of tunefulness and throes of melodrama; the whole seasoned with spicy and frequently novel orchestral effects which are now and then more vulgar than edifying. The suite was remarkably well played, but it made no very strong effect, despite its eccentricities and its bid for popular favor. The fiery Dvorak symphony was also very well played, and with great spirit. Mr. Loeffler played the fine violin concerto with exquisite taste, perfect finish of style, purity and brilliancy of technique, and nobility of sentiment. The warm and graceful artistic feeling, and the conscientious devotion to the composer that always give a characteristic distinction to his playing, were manifested at their fullest, and proved a potent element in the pleasure that his performance afforded. He was applauded with exceptional enthusiasm, and was three times recalled with tremendous fervor. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Der Freyschutz," Weber; Symphony, No. 4, E-minor, Brahms; "Todentanz," Riemenschneider (first time); Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai. There will be no soloist.

[111]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 26, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Certain traditions regarding the "Fingal's Cave" overture, by Mendelssohn, with which the sixteenth symphony concert opened last evening, are of peculiar interest. After having enjoyed to his hearts content the social season in London in 1829, Mendelssohn being then but twenty years old, visited with his friend Klingemann the Scotch Highlands, where he made a six weeks' tour. The wonders of Fingal's Cave deeply impressed the composer and according to Ferdinand Hiller, "the first few bars containing the principal subject, actually occurred to him on the spot;" yet according to Moscheles the overture was not complete until the composer arrived in Rome Dec. 16, 1830. Moscheles' account of it is generally accepted by later authorities.

One writer tells how Mendelssohn, after having conceived the principal theme as above described, left the cave with his friend and in all possible haste rushed to the residence of a well known Scotch family who refused him the privilege of playing it on; their excellent pianoforte, because by so doing he would violate their rigorous Sabbath rule; and the two friends, Mendelssohn and Klingeman, actually sat up until midnight in order to play the theme. Mendelssohn's vascillation as to the title of the overture is somewhat singular. Before the work was completed he frequently referred it as "The Hebrides"; yet the first score is entitled "The Lonely Island." Strangely enough another change of title was made at the first performance of the overture at the Crystal Palace concert, Oct. 14, 1871, when it was announced in the programme as "The Isles of Fingal." Regarding the title under which it was performed last evening, it would be interesting to know wherein it has the authority of Mendelssohn. The work for the most part was exquisitely played, and the rich combination of instruments assigned in connection with its second theme with the poetic cantabile in attendance upon it, was uncommonly well reproduced. The fiery passage, however, that brings back the chief subject in its original key was by no means given the prodigious power that rendered it so effective when the work was performed here under Mr. Gericke, Nov. 17, 1888.

The concerto for violin by Saint-Saens which Mr. Loeffler played last evening, is a thoroughly characteristic and charming work, throughout which a rare consistency is shown in maintaining the prominent as well as the subordinate relations respectively of the solo instrument and orchestra. It is a remarkably effective composition especially in the hands of an artist so eminently well qualified for its interpretation as Mr. C. M. Loeffler. The poetic spirit of the work and its wide variety of arch and piquant strains were one and all presented by Mr. Loeffler with a pervading sense of deep feeling, sympathetic delivery and a masterly execution tempered by the very best of taste, so that the performance as a whole, was remarkable beyond cavil in the justice it reflected upon one of the most refined and beautiful of concerti that any composer of the present generation has produced. The cadenza to the work, which is Mr. Loeffler's own, is a master-piece, every note of which has a spontaneous origin,—no less inspired than exceptionally appropriate. At its close the artist received one of the heartiest and best merited ovations that has greeted any artist who has appeared here this season.

After the concerto came the familiar "Peer Gynt" suite No. 2, by Grieg. The work, which is a quasi epitome of the voluminous music Grieg wrote to Ibsen's drama of "Peer Gynt," had its initial version played for the first time in Boston at one of the popular concerts in 1889, it has had several hearings, notably at the fourteenth symphony concert Jan. 25, 1890.

The symphony No. 2 in D minor, op. 20, Dvorak, had its first performance in London under Dvorak April 22, 1885; and it has also had at least one previous hearing in our own city. Its chief characteristics are with its unmistakably Slavonic themes. Although the work was designated on last evening's programme as Dvorak's second symphony, yet such designation is only accurate in its relation to the composer's published works. Dr. Josef Zubatz, a biographer of Dvorak, says that as long ago as 1864 Dvorak had two already composed two symphonies. This was years before he had obtained the "artist's stipend" from the Austrian government, which enabled him to devote himself exclusively to composition and through Brahms and Hanslick, who were committee on awards, opened for him his road to fame. Dr. Hanslick, when he introduced Dvorak to the Vienna public, related that among the compositions which accompanied the young Bohemian artist's application for a stipend was "a symphony, pretty wild and untrammeled, but at the same time so full of talent that Herbeck, then a member of our committee, interested himself warmly in it." The key of this work was not mentioned in Hanslick's report, but it was probably the symphony in E flat composed in 1874. If this inference is of value, then the so-called second symphony may be Dvorak's fifth,

His first two published symphonies are respectively in D major op. 60, produced in Boston by Mr. Henschel and D minor, the one performed last evening. It is also worthy of note that Dvorak composed a scherzo for a symphony in D minor in 1874 and it is quite probable that the London Philharmonic's work was constructed around the movement composed eleven years before." If so the fact is a suggestive commentary on the extent to which success stimulates appreciation and might also serve as an indication that the unknown Dvorak of eleven years ago was even a worthier composer than the musical lion of today, for the opinion that the Scherzo is by far the best movement of the D minor symphony will be generally indorsed by critics and musicians. Both the suite and the symphony were worthly played.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 27, 1893.

The 16th Symphony Concert.

The programme for the 16th Symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday, could but have proven comprehensive and eclectic enough to have satisfied the not over-exacting demands of the many amateurs who are in the habit of attending the symphony concerts simply because it is the proper thing to do. To local musicians, too, the programme was not without interest, although the Peer Gynt suite, No. 2, might wisely have been spared, and some other symphony than Dvorak's in D minor would doubtless have proven more acceptable.

Mendelssohn's overture, now known as "Fingal's Cave," a title which its composer probably never intended for it, is always welcome. It is one of the few orchestral compositions by Mendelssohn that, in its organic whole, shows genius and mastery of the very highest order. Mendelssohn always had his say with a rare charm, naturalness, like one who utters his own thoughts in his own way, and with a cloying grace, sweetness and beauty with which even a child might sympathize. Now the "Fingal's Cave" overture, so called, not only delights, and it is not simply Mendelssohnian in form and spirit, but it also impels intellectual admiration.

Before Mendelssohn had finished the work at the early age of 20, he named it "The Hebrides"; but the score first appeared under the title of "The Lonely Island," while at its first performance at one of the Crystal Palace concerts in 1871, it was announced as "The Isle of Finland" overture.

It is known, however, that the initial thoughts of the overture came to the composer when, during his tarry in the Scotch Highlands in 1829, he visited Fingal's Cave; "the first two bars," according to Ferdinand Hiller, actually occurring to him on the spot.

Mendelssohn's constant companion at that time was Klingemann, a fairly well-known poet and musician. It is said that when the chief theme of the overture suggested itself to Mendelssohn he hurriedly left Fingal's cave, and, with his friend, sought in vain for a pianoforte upon which to improvise; but it was the Sabbath day, and, furthermore, it was the Scotchman's Sabbath day. So scrupulous were Mendelssohn's Scotch friends in their observance of it that the composer was admonished that he must wait until after midnight in order to musicalize the inspiration that had come to him in the wondrous "Fingal's Cave." And he waited.

The overture was not completed until a year later, and then upon Mendelssohn's visit to Rome, Dec. 16, 1830. It received a fairly effective performance under conductor Nikisch, and the rich combination of instruments assigned for its second theme, notwithstanding slight deviations from a true pitch, were finely reproduced. The fiery passage that was superbly brought out when Herr Gericke performed it here in 1888, fell far short of the ideal effect that conductors other than Herr Nikisch have felt to be its due.

For the concerto by Saint Saens, No. 1, in A major, op. 20, the soloist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

About the concerto itself, the disposition is willing, but the time and space at command are insufficient to treat with justice its merits and defects. Certainly but few modern concerti demand such exceptional talent for execution; but few great masterworks for violin require so constantly as does this concerto in A major the high faculty of poetical expression. Mr. Loeffler's response to such demands were more than adequate. The masterly cadenza of his own composition that he charmingly introduced at the finale was, to say the least for it, one of the most interesting features of his performance.

Negatively considered his playing was free from the slightest virtuosal obtrusiveness or sentimental self-display. On the contrary while all personal and material virtuosity was subordinated by the artist with an objective regard for the interest of the art work itself, the conception and execution of the concerto could not have failed to satisfy the most exacting admirer of the Saint-Saens. Not only did the tone flow naturally from the artist's singing instrument, and not only did he realize the full extent of his ability as a master au fond, but his interpretation, in all its psychological beardings, while his lithe and pliant right arm contributed a characteristic and brilliant share to the success of his performance. In brief, critic and optimist alike seemed enamored both of the concerto and of Mr. Loeffler's playing. The performance acted as a powerful magnet or charm in holding the attention of the audience, and its close was immediately followed by some of the heartiest plaudits that any artist has received at the symphony concerts this season.

It need not be told that the second orchestral suite from the Grieg-Ibsen music drama interested the audience immensely; and it was effectually played, but the voluptuous, and ear-tickling effects of its livelier movements on the one hand are so permeated with musical vulgarity, and on the other, its andante is imbued with such mawkish sentimentality that it seems inexplicable how Mr. Nikisch could have tolerated a performance of the work at a symphony concert.

Dvorak's symphony No. 2 (sic) gains no material advantage as the result of repeated hearings. The symphonic architecture of the work is superbly constructed, but its psychical effects are more or less fettered by the crude and doleful character of the weird folk-mode to which its composer too constantly adheres, and with results in which no musical person can be expected to take more than a transient degree of interest, howsoever reverently he may rate Dvorak as one of the foremost masters of his time.

The final impressions of the concert came with as sterling and a substantial performance of the symphony as one would care to hear. The contrasting fortès and pianos of the first movement, the pizzicato accompaniment of the strings in the adagio, and the buoyant dance rhythms of the scherzo were notably given out with exquisit effect.

C. L. CAPEN.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1893.

The Sixteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin, No. 1, A major.....Saint-Saens
Suite No. 2, "Peer Gynt," Op. 55.....Grieg
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony, D minor, No. 2, Op. 70.....Dvorak

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the solo violinist.

Saint-Saens's violin concerto, Op. 20, was dedicated to Sarasate, and it was played by the great Spaniard at a concert at the Chatelet. It is my impression that it was brought out in Boston by Mr. Adamowski in March, 1885, at a Symphony concert, and the work was then called a "concertstueck."

This concerto is a work of eminent distinction, pure and refined, graceful in melody, always interesting in harmonic structure, and elegant in the discreet simplicity of instrumental color. It was played most sympathetically by Mr. Loeffler. His performance, faultless from the technical standpoint, was marked by purity of style, warmth of expression, and a largeness, a liberality of conception. In whole and in detail it was a noteworthy performance. It was a lesson to the student, a pleasure to the professional as well as the amateur, an honor to the orchestra of which Mr. Loeffler is a member. Not the least agreeable feature was the modesty of the player, the modesty that is characteristic of the true artist.

Mr. Loeffler, it is said, wrote the cadenza that he introduced. The cadenza is a relict of the past. In a work of to-day it seems a mere survival, like unto the organ of unknown use in the human body that endangers the life, and might perhaps be extirpated.

Who was the first that invented the habit of flourishing with breath, or bow or fingers while accompanists and audience were silent spectators of ingenuity employed chiefly for self-glorification? Alas, the habit is apparently as old as the vanity of mankind. To be sure there are wiseacres who say boldly the cadenza was invented in such a year and by a certain person. They are not unlike the well-known lecturer in a Western law school. Although, as Judge, he was a worthy follower of Cyriac Skinner's "grandsire on the Royal Bench of British Themis," he was nervous when he addressed the students, and so he had recourse to alcoholic preparation. Thus fortified, he laid everything to the Corsican, and he would blandly begin as follows: "Bills of exchange, young gentlemen, and promissory notes were invented by the First Napoleon."

Mr. Loeffler's interpolation was in good taste, and it displayed his virtuosoship; but the concerto would have pleased as much without the addition.

***

Grieg wrote incidental music (op. 23) for Ibsen's long-winded dramatic poem, "Peer Gynt." The music contains numbers for solo voices, chorus and orchestra. The first suite (op. 46) is well known. The second suite (op. 55) was played here last week for the first time.

This second suite is not equal to the first. With the exception of the beautiful arrangement of "Solveig's Song" the music is cheap stuff. It may serve in the theatre to enhance strange scenic effects or grotesque situations, but in the concert room it is without value. The "Return of Peer Gynt" has echoes of "The Flying Dutchman," but each echo seems a burlesque. The "Arabian Dance" suggests the invasion of Arabia by the Salvation Army, personally conducted by one of the numerous relatives of General Booth; and there was a time during the dance when all necks in the audience were stretched in joyful expectation of the apparition of Miss Lottie Collins. However, the number was written long before the ingenious arrangement of music to "Ta-ra-ra, Boom-de-ay."

This "Arabian Dance" is local color with a vengeance; that is, it is Grieg's idea of Arabian music. He that wishes to know the real character of Arabian music, with a description of instruments, melodies, tonality and the "danse du ventre," may consult with pleasure Tiersot's "Musiques pittoresques."

The last number, "Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter," is a wretched replica of the last movement, a wretched original of the first suite. Throughout the movements, with the above-named delightful exception, the "doubling drum is beat with furious heat;" not only kettle-drums, but other pulsatile instruments strive laboriously for effect. The xylophone puts an end to the charivari. Now, the xylephone is an instrument of antiquity. Holbein introduced it in his "Dance of Death," and the skeleton beats upon it there with ghastly glee. Saint-Saens used it with prodigious effect in the "Danse Macabre." As used by Grieg, it brings to mind the variety show.

"Solveig's Song" was applauded. The other numbers met with a cold reception, although there was a desire to laugh after the finale.

***

The symphony and the overture were played with marked effect, and the performance of the latter was, indeed, brilliant.

***

The programme of the next rehearsal and concert is as follows: Overture "Der Freischuetz:" Brahm's Fourth Symphony; Riemenschneider's "Dance of Death;" Nicolai's overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor."

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 27, 1893.

The programme of the sixteenth Symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, was artistically satisfactory in every detail. Mr. C. M. Loeffler, who is a member of the orchestra, was the soloist, and gave some finished playing on the violin, at the conclusion of which he was enthusiastically encored. His selection was the concerto in A major, by Saint-Saens, which he executed most admirably, with that breadth of style that characterizes all his playing and gained him the prominence of an artist. Just before the close Mr. Loeffler introduced a cadenza of his own, which continues with more and more brilliancy, and so brings the concerto to the end. The full orchestra under Mr. Nikisch did some finished playing in the support. Particularly enjoyable was the orchestral suite No. 2 by Grieg, "Peer Gynt," a composition of novel orchestral effects, and which is likely to become as popular as the suite No. 1. Mendelssohn's familiar "Fingals Cave" was the opening number, a work full of wild sounds and realism in music, which was ably given by the orchestra. The symphony in D minor, Dvorak, closed the evening's programme. The next concert will take place Saturday evening, March 4.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 26, 1893.

Echoes from the Sixteenth Symphony.

Piano Recital by Mr. Nikisch—Grossmith's Merry Entertainment.

Mr. Nikisch introduced as the soloist at the Symphony rehearsal and concert last week the well-known artist and composer, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, the fourth member of the violin contingent of the orchestra that has appeared as soloist under Mr. Nikisch's baton during the season. Saint-Saens' concerto No. 1, for violin, although in three parts, is linked by cadenza-like passages, making it practically one movement, a slow episode being inserted in the middle.

Mr. Loeffler's playing was, in the main, commendable. He has an excellent command of his bow, and his broad tones were sweetly resonant and devoid of harshness. The repeated trills in the andante were clearly given and well sustained, and his leading themes were clean cut and firm, though lacking somewhat in strength.

The slides running through the composition were unpleasantly frequent, although that was probably not the fault of the performer.

Without being particularly brilliant, Mr. Loeffler played with facility and commendable dash. Just before the close of the piece he introduced a cadenza of his own, which was in keeping with the general tone of the composition and very well performed.

The artist was enthusiastically received, being recalled several times at the close of his performance.

Mendelssohn's fantastic overture, "Fingal's Cave," was played with great effect. Each part of the orchestra did its work splendidly. The fragments of themes which the great composer introduces throughout the work are impartially distributed among the instruments, and the fine contrasts and changes in tempo and harmony were given in such a manner as to realize a tone picture of great beauty.

Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt," was a novelty, Norwegian in treatment and at times startling in its grotesque orchestration, the 'cellos being added to the instruments of percussion by the performers striking the strings with the back of the bow.

It was played with great spirit and the proper abandon, the dance, "The Mountain King's Daughter," with its glissando terminal by the xylophone, being the sensational feature of the number.

Dvorak's symphony in D minor, No. 2, closed the concert. The beautiful orchestral coloring of the first two movements were effectively presented, and the Sla ic characteristics of the composer in the last numbers were given with admirable contrasting energy and boldness.

The programme for the next rehearsal and concert will consist of the overture from "Der Freischuetz," Weber; symphony No. 4 in E minor, Brahms; "Todtentanz," for orchestra, first time, Riemenschneider, and overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai.

The Nikisch Recital.

The well-known artists, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, will give their first recital this season in Chickering Hall, next Tuesday evening. They will be assisted by the young violinist, Miss Leonora von Stosch.

Mrs. Nikisch will sing these songs: "Im Lenze," "Schifffarth," "Sommerabend," "Der Kranz," "In der Beeren," "Vergebliches Staendchen," by Brahms; Schubert's "Freublingslaube," "StilleSicherheit" and "Auf der Wanderschaft," by Franz; "Unter den Linden," Busoni; "Rosentage" and "Treuss Roesslein," by Paderewski; "Princessin," Heinrichs; "Wandwalderung," Greig; "Auftraege," Schumann; "Ein Bettlerpaerchen," Henberger.

Miss von Stosch will play Vieuxtemps' "Reverie" and Scharwenka's rondo.

The Kneisel quartet has received an invitation likely to be accepted, namely, to give a series of concerts at the World's fair late in May. This will add an important feature to the excellent programme prepared by the committee of music.

[112]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 26, 1893.

THE SYMHHONY CONCERT.

Certain traditions regarding the "Fingal's Cave" overture, by Mendelssohn, with which the sixteenth symphony concert opened last evening, are of peculiar interest. After having enjoyed to his hearts content the social season in London in 1829, Mendelssohn being then but twenty years old, visited with his friend Klingemann the Scotch Highlands, where he made a six weeks' tour. The wonders of Fingal's Cave deeply impressed the composer and according to Ferdinand Hiller, "the first few bars containing the principal subject, actually occurred to him on the spot;" yet according to Moscheles the overture was not complete until the composer arrived in Rome Dec. 16, 1830. Moscheles' account of it is generally accepted by later authorities.

One writer tells how Mendelssohn, after having conceived the principal theme as above described, left the cave with his friend and in all possible haste rushed to the residence of a well known Scotch family who refused him the privilege of playing it on; their excellent pianoforte, because by so doing he would violate their rigorous Sabbath rule; and the two friends, Mendelssohn and Klingeman, actually sat up until midnight in order to play the theme. Mendelssohn's vascillation as to the title of the overture is somewhat singular. Before the work was completed he frequently referred it as "The Hebrides"; yet the first score is entitled "The Lonely Island." Strangely enough another change of title was made at the first performance of the overture at the Crystal Palace concert, Oct. 14, 1871, when it was announced in the programme as "The Isles of Fingal." Regarding the title under which it was performed last evening, it would be interesting to know wherein it has the authority of Mendelssohn. The work for the most part was exquisitely played, and the rich combination of instruments assigned in connection with its second theme with the poetic cantabile in attendance upon it, was uncommonly well reproduced. The fiery passage, however, that brings back the chief subject in its original key was by no means given the prodigious power that rendered it so effective when the work was performed here under Mr. Gericke, Nov. 17, 1888.

The concerto for violin by Saint-Saens which Mr. Lœffler played last evening, is a thoroughly characteristic and charming work, throughout which a rare consistency is shown in maintaining the prominent as well as the subordinate relations respectively of the solo instrument and orchestra. It is a remarkably effective composition especially in the hands of an artist so eminently well qualified for its interpretation as Mr. C. M. Lœffler. The poetic spirit of the work and its wide variety of arch and piquant strains were one and all presented by Mr. Lœffler with a pervading sense of deep feeling, sympathetic delivery and a masterly execution tempered by the very best of taste, so that the performance as a whole, was remarkable beyond cavil in the justice it reflected upon one of the most refined and beautiful of concerti that any composer of the present generation has produced. The cadenza to the work, which is Mr. Loeffler's own, is a master-piece, every note of which has a spontaneous origin,—no less inspired than exceptionally appropriate. At its close the artist received one of the heartiest and best merited ovations that has greeted any artist who has appeared here this season.

After the concerto came the familiar "Peer Gynt" suite No. 2, by Grieg. The work, which is a quasi epitome of the voluminous music Grieg wrote to Ibsen's drama of "Peer Gynt,,' had its initial version played for the first time in Boston at one of the popular concerts in 1889, it has had several hearings, notably at the fourteenth symphony concert Jan. 25, 1890.

The symphony No. 2 in D minor, op. 20, Dvorak, had its first performance in London under Dvorak April 22, 1885; and it has also had at least one previous hearing in our own city. Its chief characteristics are with its unmistakably Slavonic themes. Although the work was designated on last evening's programme as Dvorak's second symphony, yet such designation is only accurate in its relation to the composer's published works. Dr. Josef Zubatz, a biographer of Dvorak, says that as long ago as 1864 Dvorak had two already composed two symphonies. This was years before he had obtained the "artist's stipend" from the Austrian government, which enabled him to devote himself exclusively to composition and through Brahms and Hanslick, who were committee on awards, opened for him his road to fame. Dr. Hanslick, when he introduced Dvorak to the Vienna public, related that among the compositions which accompanied the young Bohemian artist's application for a stipend was "a symphony, pretty wild and untrammeled, but at the same time so full of talent that Herbeck, then a member of our committee, interested himself warmly in it." The key of this work was not mentioned in Hanslick's report, but it was probably the symphony in E flat composed in 1874. If this inference is of value, then the so-called second symphony may be Dvorak's fifth,
His first two published symphonies are respectively in D major op. 60, produced in Boston by Mr. Henschel and D minor, the one performed last evening. It is also worthy of note that Dvorak composed a scherzo for a symphony in D minor in 1874 and it is quite probable that the London Philharmonic's work was constructed around the movement composed eleven years before." If so the fact is a suggestive commentary on the extent to which success stimulates appreciation and might also serve as an indication that the unknown Dvorak of eleven years ago was even a worthier composer than the musical lion of today, for the opinion that the Scherzo is by far the best movement of the D minor symphony will be generally indorsed by critics and musicians. Both the suite and the symphony were worthly played.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 27, 1893.

The 16th Symphony Concert.

The programme for the 16th Symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday, could but have proven comprehensive and eclectic enough to have satisfied the not over-exacting demands of the many amateurs who are in the habit of attending the symphony concerts simply because it is the proper thing to do. To local musicians, too, the programme was not without interest, although the Peer Gynt suite, No. 2, might wisely have been spared, and some other symphony than Dvorak's in D minor would doubtless have proven more acceptable.

Mendelssohn's overture, now known as "Fingal's Cave," a title which its composer probably never intended for it, is always welcome. It is one of the few orchestral compositions by Mendelssonn that, in its organic whole, shows genius and mastery of the very highest order. Mendelssohn always had his say with a rare charm, naturalness, like one who utters his own thoughts in his own way, and with a cloying grace, sweetness and beauty with which even a child might sympathize. Now the "Fingal's Cave" overture, so called, not only delights, and it is not simply Mendelssohnian in form and spirit, but it also impels intellectual admiration.

Before Mendelssohn had finished the work at the early age of 20, he named it "The Hebrides"; but the score first appeared under the title of "The Lonely Island," while at its first performance at one of the Crystal Palace concerts in 1871, it was announced as "The Isle of Finland" overture.

It is known, however, that the initial thoughts of the overture came to the composer when, during his tarry in the Scotch Highlands in 1829, he visited Fingal's Cave; "the first two bars," according to Ferdinand Hiller, actually occurring to him on the spot.

Mendelssohn's constant companion at that time was Klingemann, a fairly well-known poet and musician. It is said that when the chief theme of the overture suggested itself to Mendelssohn he hurriedly left Fingal's cave, and, with his friend, sought in vain for a pianoforte upon which to improvise; but it was the Sabbath day, and, furthermore, it was the Scotchman's Sabbath day. So scrupulous were Mendelssohn's Scotch friends in their observance of it that the composer was admonished that he must wait until after midnight in order to musicalize the inspiration that had come to him in the wondrous "Fingal's Cave." And he waited.

The overture was not completed until a year later, and then upon Mendelssohn's visit to Rome, Dec. 16, 1830. It received a fairly effective performance under conductor Nikisch, and the rich combination of instruments assigned for its second theme, notwithstanding slight deviations from a true pitch, were finely reproduced. The fiery passage that was superbly brought out when Herr Gericke performed it here in 1888, fell far short of the ideal effect that conductors other than Herr Nikisch have felt to be its due.

For the concerto by Saint Saens, No. 1, in A major, op. 20, the soloist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

About the concerto itself, the disposition is willing, but the time and space at command are insufficient to treat with justice its merits and defects. Certainly but few modern concerti demand such exceptional talent for execution; but few great masterworks for violin require so constantly as does this concerto in A major the high faculty of poetical expression. Mr. Loeffler's response to such demands were more than adequate. The masterly cadenza of his own composition that he charmingly introduced at the finale was, to say the least for it, one of the most interesting features of his performance.

Negatively considered his playing was free from the slightest virtuosal obtrusiveness or sentimental self-display. On the contrary while all personal and material virtuosity was subordinated by the artist with an objective regard for the interest of the art work itself, the conception and execution of the concerto could not have failed to satisfy the most exacting admirer of the Saint-Saens. Not only did the tone flow naturally from the artist's singing instrument, and not only did he realize the full extent of his ability as a master au fond, but his interpretation, in all its psychological beardings, while his lithe and pliant right arm contributed a characteristic and brilliant share to the success of his performance. In brief, critic and optimist alike seemed enamored both of the concerto and of Mr. Loeffler's playing. The performance acted as a powerful magnet or charm in holding the attention of the audience, and its close was immediately followed by some of the heartiest plaudits that any artist has received at the symphony concerts this season.

It need not be told that the second orchestral suite from the Grieg-Ibsen music drama interested the audience immensely; and it was effectually played, but the voluptuous, and ear-tickling effects of its livelier movements on the one hand are so permeated with musical vulgarity, and on the other, its andante is imbued with such mawkish sentimentality that it seems inexplicable how Mr. Nikisch could have tolerated a performance of the work at a symphony concert.

Dvorak's symphony No. 2 (sic) gains no material advantage as the result of repeated hearings. The symphonic architecture of the work is superbly constructed, but its psychical effects are more or less fettered by the crude and doleful character of the weird folk-mode to which its composer too constantly adheres, and with results in which no musical person can be expected to take more than a transient degree of interest, howsoever reverently he may rate Dvorak as one of the foremost masters of his time.

The final impressions of the concert came with as sterling and a substantial performance of the symphony as one would care to hear. The contrasting fortès and pianos of the first movement, the pizzicato accompaniment of the strings in the adagio, and the buoyant dance rhythms of the scherzo were notably given out with exquisit effect.

C. L. CAPEN.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1893.

The Sixteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin, No. 1, A major.....Saint-Saens
Suite No. 2, "Peer Gynt," Op. 55.....Grieg
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony, D minor, No. 2, Op. 70.....Dvorak

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the solo violinist.

Saint-Saens's violin concerto, Op. 20, was dedicated to Sarasate, and it was played by the great Spaniard at a concert at the Chatelet. It is my impression that it was brought out in Boston by Mr. Adamowski in March, 1885, at a Symphony concert, and the work was then called a "concertstueck."

This concerto is a work of eminent distinction, pure and refined, graceful in melody, always interesting in harmonic structure, and elegant in the discreet simplicity of instrumental color. It was played most sympathetically by Mr. Loeffler. His performance, faultless from the technical standpoint, was marked by purity of style, warmth of expression, and a largeness, a liberality of conception. In whole and in detail it was a noteworthy performance. It was a lesson to the student, a pleasure to the professional as well as the amateur, an honor to the orchestra of which Mr. Loeffler is a member. Not the least agreeable feature was the modesty of the player, the modesty that is characteristic of the true artist.

Mr. Loeffler, it is said, wrote the cadenza that he introduced. The cadenza is a relict of the past. In a work of to-day it seems a mere survival, like unto the organ of unknown use in the human body that endangers the life, and might perhaps be extirpated.

Who was the first that invented the habit of flourishing with breath, or bow or fingers while accompanists and audience were silent spectators of ingenuity employed chiefly for self-glorification? Alas, the habit is apparently as old as the vanity of mankind. To be sure there are wiseacres who say boldly the cadenza was invented in such a year and by a certain person. They are not unlike the well-known lecturer in a Western law school. Although, as Judge, he was a worthy follower of Cyriac Skinner's "grandsire on the Royal Bench of British Themis," he was nervous when he addressed the students, and so he had recourse to alcoholic preparation. Thus fortified, he laid everything to the Corsican, and he would blandly begin as follows: "Bills of exchange, young gentlemen, and promissory notes were invented by the First Napoleon."

Mr. Loeffler's interpolation was in good taste, and it displayed his virtuosoship; but the concerto would have pleased as much without the addition.

***

Grieg wrote incidental music (op. 23) for Ibsen's long-winded dramatic poem, "Peer Gynt." The music contains numbers for solo voices, chorus and orchestra. The first suite (op. 46) is well known. The second suite (op. 55) was played here last week for the first time.

This second suite is not equal to the first. With the exception of the beautiful arrangement of "Solvejg's Song" the music is cheap stuff. It may serve in the theatre to enhance strange scenic effects or grotesque situations, but in the concert room it is without value. The "Return of Peer Gynt" has echoes of "The Flying Dutchman," but each echo seems a burlesque. The "Arabian Dance" suggests the invasion of Arabia by the Salvation Army, personally conducted by one of the numerous relatives of General Booth; and there was a time during the dance when all necks in the audience were stretched in joyful expectation of the apparition of Miss Lottie Collins. However, the number was written long before the ingenious arrangement of music to "Ta-ra-ra, Boom-de-ay."

This "Arabian Dance" is local color with a vengeance; that is, it is Grieg's idea of Arabian music. He that wishes to know the real character of Arabian music, with a description of instruments, melodies, tonality and the "danse du ventre," may consult with pleasure Tiersot's "Musiques pittoresques."

The last number, "Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter," is a wretched replica of the last movement, a wretched original of the first suite. Throughout the movements, with the above-named delightful exception, the "doubling drum is beat with furious heat;" not only kettle-drums, but other pulsatile instruments strive laboriously for effect. The xylophone puts an end to the charivari. Now, the xylophone is an instrument of antiquity. Holbein introduced it in his "Dance of Death," and the skeleton beats upon it there with ghastly glee. Saint-Saens used it with prodigious effect in the "Danse Macabre." As used by Grieg, it brings to mind the variety show.

"Solvejg's Song" was applauded. The other numbers met with a cold reception, although there was a desire to laugh after the finale.

***

The symphony and the overture were played with marked effect, and the performance of the latter was, indeed, brilliant.

***

The programme of the next rehearsal and concert is as follows: Overture "Der Freischuetz;" Brahm's Fourth Symphony; Riemenschneider's "Dance of Death;" Nicolai's overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor."

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 27, 1893.

The programme of the sixteenth Symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, was artistically satisfactory in every detail. Mr. C. M. Loeffler, who is a member of the orchestra, was the soloist, and gave some finished playing on the violin, at the conclusion of which he was enthusiastically encored. His selection was the concerto in A major, by Saint-Saens, which he executed most admirably, with that breadth of style that characterizes all his playing and gained him the prominence of an artist. Just before the close Mr. Loeffler introduced a cadenza of his own, which continues with more and more brilliancy, and so brings the concerto to the end. The full orchestra under Mr. Nikisch did some finished playing in the support. Particularly enjoyable was the orchestral suite No. 2 by Grieg, "Peer Gynt," a composition of novel orchestral effects, and which is likely to become as popular as the suite No. 1. Mendelssohn's familiar "Fingals Cave" was the opening number, a work full of wild sounds and realism in music, which was ably given by the orchestra. The symphony in D minor, Dvorak, closed the evening's programme. The next concert will take place Saturday evening, March 4.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 26, 1893.

Echoes from the Sixteenth Symphony.

Piano Recital by Mr. Nikisch—Grossmith's Merry Entertainment.

Mr. Nikisch introduced as the soloist at the Symphony rehearsal and concert last week the well-known artist and composer, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, the fourth member of the violin contingent of the orchestra that has appeared as soloist under Mr. Nikisch's baton during the season. Saint-Saens' concerto No. 1, for violin, although in three parts, is linked by cadenza-like passages, making it practically one movement, a slow episode being inserted in the middle.

Mr. Loeffler's playing was, in the main, commendable. He has an excellent command of his bow, and his broad tones were sweetly resonant and devoid of harshness. The repeated trills in the andante were clearly given and well sustained, and his leading themes were clean cut and firm, though lacking somewhat in strength.

The slides running through the composition were unpleasantly frequent, although that was probably not the fault of the performer.

Without being particularly brilliant, Mr. Loeffler played with facility and commendable dash. Just before the close of the piece he introduced a cadenza of his own, which was in keeping with the general tone of the composition and very well performed.

The artist was enthusiastically received, being recalled several times at the close of his performance.

Mendelssohn's fantastic overture, "Fingal's Cave," was played with great effect. Each part of the orchestra did its work splendidly. The fragments of themes which the great composer introduces throughout the work are impartially distributed among the instruments, and the fine contrasts and changes in tempo and harmony were given in such a manner as to realize a tone picture of great beauty.

Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt," was a novelty, Norwegian in treatment and at times startling in its grotesque orchestration, the 'cellos being added to the instruments of percussion by the performers striking the strings with the back of the bow.

It was played with great spirit and the proper abandon, the dance, "The Mountain King's Daughter," with its glissando terminal by the xylophone, being the sensational feature of the number.

Dvorak's symphony in D minor, No. 2, closed the concert. The beautiful orchestral coloring of the first two movements were effectively presented, and the Sla ic characteristics of the composer in the last numbers were given with admirable contrasting energy and boldness.

The programme for the next rehearsal and concert will consist of the overture from "Der Freischuetz," Weber; symphony No. 4 in E minor, Brahms; "Todtentanz," for orchestra, first time, Riemenschneider, and overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai.

The Nikisch Recital.

The well-known artists, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, will give their first recital this season in Chickering Hall, next Tuesday evening. They will be assisted by the young violinist, Miss Leonora von Stosch.

Mrs. Nikisch will sing these songs: "Im Lenze," "Schiffarth," "Sommerabend," "Der Kranz," "In der Beeren," "Vergebliches Staendchen," by Brahms; Schubert's "Freuhlingslaube," "Stille Sicherheit" and "Auf der Wanderschaft," by Franz; "Unter den Linden," Busoni; "Rosentage" and "Treuss Roesslein," by Paderewski; "Princessin," Heinrichs; "Wandwalderung," Greig; "Auftraege," Schumann; "Ein Bettlerpaerchen," Henberger.

Miss von Stosch will play Vieuxtemps' "Reverie" and Scharwenka's rondo.

The Kneisel quartet has received an invitation likely to be accepted, namely, to give a series of concerts at the World's fair late in May. This will add an important feature to the excellent programme prepared by the committee of music.

[112]

...EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
Vol. XCIII., NO. 57.

...FEBRUARY 26, 1898.

...phony Concert, Soloist Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

...evening's Symphony concert Mr. ... gave the patrons of the season's ... programme of rare interest, and ... performance was in keeping with the ... of the several compositions per...

...soloist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler, who ... with Mr. Kneisel the first desk in ... section. Mr. Loeffler was heard ... concerto by Saint-Saens in A major, ... selection peculiarly suited to display ... excellencies as a soloist. It is ... a pleasure to listen to such honest ... is done by this artist at all times. ... master of the violin, he plays ... a lack of affectation that is a source ... pleasure to the listener. His tone ... faultlessly true, his taste so artistic ... detail, and his bowing so free and ..., that he gives a degree of satisfac... seldom realized in the playing of ... pretentious artists. In the final ... of the concerto Mr. Loeffler in... a brilliant original cadenza full ... which were given with ad... skill and effect. His associates in ... orchestra gave him excellent support, ... Mr. Nikisch's baton, and joined ... enthusiasm in the applause which re... Mr. Loeffler as he completed his ...

...gramme was introduced with the ... "Fingal's Cave" overture by ...delssohn, which was read with charm... its contrasts being judiciously ...tically heightened with pleasing ...

...novelty of the evening was the ...," suite No. 2, by Grieg, which ... given its first complete hearing here ... occasion. It is likely to become ... popular as the already familiar ... from the same work, and an idea ... characteristics can best be gained ... description of the scenes its ... movements are supposed to depict, ... in the preface to the full score, ... reads as follows:

...Gynt, the only son of poor peas... drawn by the poet as a character of ...ically developed fancy and a prey to ...mania. In his youth he has many ...ventures—comes, for instance, to a ...'s wedding, where he carries off the ... to the mountain peaks. Here he ...(No. 1, Ingrid's Lament) to roam ... wild cow herd girls. He then ... kingdom of the Mountain King, ... daughter falls in love with him and ... to him (No. 5, Dance of the ...tain King's Daughter). But he ... at the dance and the droll ..., whereupon the enraged mountain... ...ish to kill him. But he succeeds in ..., and wanders to foreign countries. ... others to Morocco, where he ap... as a prophet, and is greeted by Arab ... (No. 2, Arabian dance). After many ...derful guidings of fate he at last re... as an old man, after suffering ship... on his way (No. 3, Peer Gynt's re... to his home as poor as he left it. Here ...sweetheart of his youth, Solvejg, who ...served true to him all these years, ...m; and his weary head at last ...t in her lap (No. 4 Solvejg's song)."

...who have heard the first suite from ... work can easily imagine how the ... has improved the opportunities ... orchestral scoring afforded in such a se... of tone pictures, and whatever criti... may be made of his use of effects com... with the popular composers of t e day, ... admitted that he has got some ...etting results by his free use of the ... and percussion adjuncts of the ...theatre orchestra.

...isch and his men entered into the ... of the composition with as much zest ... would display in a Brahms sym... and the audience followed the lead ... musicians, showing a degree of de... ...the quaint forms of the suite and ...ment that fully proved the ...ility of the second "Peer Gynt" ... it shall have gained a more ... hearing.

...'s symphony in D minor No. 2 ... programme, and Mr. Nikisch ... all his best talents to its inter... bringing out its many tuneful ...istics with fine effect and winning ... hearty appreciation of the work it ... here.

...Saturday evening's programme will ... Weber's overture, "Der Frei... Brahms' symphony No. 4, in E ... Riemenschneider's "Todtentanz" ... (first time), and Nicolai's over... "Merry Wives of Windsor."

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1...

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Opus 26.
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for violin, No. 1, in A major, Opus 20.
Grieg: Orchestral suite No. 2, from the music to "Peer Gynt," op. 55.
Dvorvák: Symphony No. 2, in D minor, Opus 70.
Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the violinist.

Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" ("Hebrides") was given one of the best and most satisfying performances we can remember. The music was played wholly in accord with its intrinsic character, with nicety of finish, buoyancy of phrasing, and immense beauty of effect. Especially good was the way in which the staccato episode in the third part of the work was treated.

In strong contrast with this admirable work, in which romantic imaginativeness and picturesqueness go hand in hand with classic beauty of form, was the new suite by Grieg that came next but one on the programme. One can not help looking with a certain distrust at these "second" suites from incidental music to plays; one feels that the cream of the music must have gone into the first suite, and that the second must be made up largely of discarded leavings. This one of Grieg's is made up of five numbers: I. "The Abduction of the Bride" (Ingrid's Lament). II. Arabian Dance. III. "Peer Gynt's Return" (Stormy Evening on the Coast). IV. Solvejg's Song. V. Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter. It is impossible to deny this music a certain amount of emotional force; one feels that one has to do with a man who is something more than merely clever. Nevertheless his forms of expression are so reckless of artistic dignity, so forgetful of beauty, that one hesitates to welcome this music of his to the concert-room. In its place, as melodramatic music, it is undoubtedly strongly effective; but such music was never meant to stand in the foreground and take up the listener's undivided attention; it is but a musical background to a dramatic scene. No doubt composers of high artistic aim have written melodramatic music that was far better than the bare necessities of the case demanded, and could stand closer inspection as music on its own merits. But we cannot feel that Grieg has done this in the present case; this "Peer Gynt" music does not rise to the concert level; it is too merely melodramatic. He has not even shown his usual cleverness; his scoring of Solvejg's song for strings, with a few wind instruments, weakens the peculiar wild accent of the music, and goes far to spoil what was in its original shape a tolerably good song. The "Stormy Evening on the Coast" sounds as if it had been made up from the waste baskets of any composers you please, who had tried their hand at thunder-and-lightning effects. The "Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter" is avowedly a piece of burlesque extravagance, for in the story Peer Gynt gets himself into decidedly hot water by laughing at it; but burlesque extravagance got by xylophones, fancy "champion drum corps" effects, and playing on stringed instruments with the bow upside down, is rather a cheap business. Upon the whole, this second "Peer Gynt" suite is not only inferior to the first, but is utterly unworthy a place on the programme of a serious concert. That it was admirably played did not mend matters very much.

Dvorák's second symphony wears better than we expected. There is not a measure in it that begins to compare, for brilliancy of inspiration, with the wonderful beginning of the first symphony; but it is as a whole a far better-written and more coherent work. When it was first played here some years ago a good deal in it sounded rather cheap and melodramatic; one felt that Dvorák had fallen into the trap into which many another composer had stumbled before him, in being merely theatrical where he meant to be dramatic, but this first impression has pretty well worn off by this time, and the real earnestness of purpose that underlies the music is beginning to show through. For one thing, we know of no other work of Dvorák's in which there is so much real beauty of color, so little that is merely conventionally brilliant in the orchestration. How thoroughly he has made his four horns pay in that passage in the slow movement! Since Weber's "Freischütz" overture we can recall no other instance of such really refined and poetic use of a combination which too often produces one of the cheapest effects in all modern orchestration. And this is but one instance out of many in the symphony. Then the whole work has an individual atmosphere of its own; one feels a real man behind it. The performance was of a very high character, and showed the work in its true light.

Saint-Saëns's A major violin concerto is an eminently genial, pleasing composition, and one wonders a little how it could have remained so long in manuscript after its two (to our thinking, far inferior) successors were published. It belongs to Saint-Saëns's best period, to a time when that ambition to write for the stage which possesses every Frenchman was as yet in embryo, and the composer was still devoting his best strength to writing for the concert-room. The form of the work, if not wholly original, is admirably adapted to its purpose, and is well worth imitating by other concerto writers. The plan of it is this: Instead of the regulation three (or four) movements, Saint-Saëns has here taken the standard sonata form—usually applied to first movements of concertos—and cut it in two through the middle; into the gap thus formed he inserts a short, slow movement. Thus the work begins as other concertos do, and goes on regularly through the first part of the first movement up to about the middle of the working out; here it breaks off, and we have the little andante espressivo episode, which is really an independent movement in itself. This episode over, the working-out of the "first" movement is taken up again and carried through, leading to the regular third part and the final coda. If the cantabile second theme does not make its appearance again in this third part, this is but a matter of detail, and by no means unprecedented in modern writing. This form is simply admirable; it gives the work the brevity and conciseness that is so desirable in modern concerto writing—for one is not so patient nowadays in listening to a solo instrument disport itself above the orchestra for a long time together as one ...in the ...n of Plancus—while it also ...written in concert ... ...ctor of the solo instru... ...ge, which ... foreground almost without intermission. ...o short, it is well written, charming music, such as one delights in listening to. Mr. Loeffler outdid himself. A larger tone and something more of dash and brio in style would have done no harm; but for pure beauty of tone, crystalline clearness, grace of phrasing, and a certain masterly unity of style, one sees not how the performance could have been surpassed. It was simply exquisite from beginning to end. Mr. Loeffler has taken it upon himself to change the ending of the concerto: he cuts off the last page or two, and introduces an elaborate cadenza and an ending of his own. The principle is a dangerous one, but in this case the change is so well done, with such musicianly skill and so fine a sense of fitness, that little, if anything, is to be urged against it. For one thing, the cadenza gave Mr. Loeffler an opportunity of showing the purest, smoothest, most lusciously sweet tone in four-string chords and arpeggi that we can remember hearing from any violinist. One forgot that there was such a thing as rosin in the world. He was enthusiastically and repeatedly recalled at the end.

The next programme is: Weber, overture to "Der Freischütz;" Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98; Riemenschneider, "Todtentanz" for orchestra (first time); Nicolai, overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor." There will be no solo.

New Century Drawing Room.

The Kneisel Quartet

of Boston.

Franz Kneisel, 1st Violin
L. Svecenski, Viola
Otto Roth, 2d Violin
Alwin Schroeder, Violoncello

Thursday Afternoon, March 9, at 3.

Programme.

DVORAK . . . . Quartet in E major, Op. 80
Allegro.
Andante con moto.
Allegro scherzando.
Finale (Allegro con brio).

TSCHAIKOWSKY . Andante from Quartet in D major

SCHUMANN . . . Quartet in A major, Op. 41, No. 3
Andante espressivo; Allegro molto moderato—
Assai agitato—
Adagio molto—
Finale (Allegro molto vivace).

Tickets now on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 57.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

At last evening's Symphony concert Mr. Nikisch gave the patrons of the season's series a programme of rare interest, and its performance was in keeping with the merits of the several compositions performed.

The soloist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler, who shares with Mr. Kneisel the first desk in the violin section. Mr. Loeffler was heard in the concerto by Saint-Saens in A major, a composition peculiarly suited to display his many excellencies as a soloist. It is always a pleasure to listen to such honest work as is done by this artist at all times. A thorough master of the violin, he plays with a lack of affectation that is a source of much pleasure to the listener. His tone is so faultlessly true, his taste so artistic in every detail, and his bowing so free and graceful, that he gives a degree of satisfaction seldom realized in the playing of more pretentious artists. In the final movement of the concerto Mr. Loeffler introduced a brilliant original cadenza full of difficulties, which were given with admirable skill and effect. His associates in the orchestra gave him excellent support, under Mr. Nikisch's baton, and joined with enthusiasm in the applause which rewarded Mr. Loeffler as he completed his performance.

The programme was introduced with the familiar "Fingal's Cave" overture by Mendelssohn, which was read with charming taste, its contrasts being judiciously and artistically heightened with pleasing results.

The novelty of the evening was the "Peer Gynt," suite No. 2, by Grieg, which was given its first complete hearing here on this occasion. It is likely to become quite as popular as the already familiar first suite from the same work, and an idea of its characteristics can best be gained from the description of the scenes its several movements are supposed to depict, given in the preface to the full score, which reads as follows:

"Peer Gynt, the only son of poor peasants, is drawn by the poet as a character of a morbidly developed fancy and a prey to megalomania. In his youth he has many wild adventures—comes, for instance, to a peasant's wedding, where he carries off the bride up to the mountain peaks. Here he leaves her (No. 1, Ingrid's Lament) to roam about with wild cow herd girls. He then enters the kingdom of the Mountain King, whose daughter falls in love with him and dances to him (No. 5, Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter). But he laughs at the dance and the droll music, whereupon the enraged mountain-folk wish to kill him. But he succeeds in escaping, and wanders to foreign countries, among others to Morocco, where he appears as a prophet, and is greeted by Arab girls (No. 2, Arabian dance). After many wonderful guidings of fate he at last returns as an old man, after suffering shipwreck on his way (No. 3, Peer Gynt's return), to his home as poor as he left it. Here the sweetheart of his youth, Solvejg, who has stayed true to him all these years, meets him; and his weary head at last finds rest in her lap (No. 4 Solvejg's song)."

Those who have heard the first suite from the same work can easily imagine how the composer has improved the opportunities for orchestral scoring afforded in such a series of tone pictures, and whatever criticism may be made of his use of effects common with the popular composers of t e day, it must be admitted that he has got some very startling results by his free use of the jingling and percussion adjuncts of the usual theatre orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch and his men entered into the spirit of the composition with as much zest as they would display in a Brahms symphony, and the audience followed the lead of the musicians, showing a degree of delight over the quaint forms of the suite and their novel treatment that fully proved the early popularity of the second "Peer Gynt" suite when it shall have gained a more general hearing.

Dvorak's symphony in D minor No. 2 ended the programme, and Mr. Nikisch brought all his best talents to its interpretation, bringing out its many tuneful characteristics with fine effect and winning the most hearty appreciation of the work it has ever had here.

Next Saturday evening's programme will include Weber's overture, "Der Freischuetz;" Brahms' symphony No. 4, in E minor; Riemenschneider's "Todtentanz" for orchestra (first time), and Nicolai's overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor."

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Opus 26.
Saint-Saens: Concerto for violin, No. 1, in A major, Opus 20.
Grieg: Orchestral suite No. 2, from the music to "Peer Gynt," op. 55.
Dvorák: Symphony No. 2, in D minor, Opus 70.
Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the violinist.

Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" ("Hebrides") was given one of the best and most satisfying performances we can remember. The music was played wholly in accord with its intrinsic character, with nicety of finish, buoyancy of phrasing, and immense beauty of effect. Especially good was the way in which the staccato episode in the third part of the work was treated.

In strong contrast with this admirable work, in which romantic imaginativeness and picturesqueness go hand in hand with classic beauty of form, was the new suite by Grieg that came next but one on the programme. One can not help looking with a certain distrust at these "second" suites from incidental music to plays; one feels that the cream of the music must have gone into the first suite, and that the second must be made up largely of discarded leavings. This one of Grieg's is made up of five numbers: I. "The Abduction of the Bride" (Ingrid's Lament). II. Arabian Dance. III. "Peer Gynt's Return" (Stormy Evening on the Coast). IV. Solveig's Song. V. Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter. It is impossible to deny this music a certain amount of emotional force; one feels that one has to do with a man who is something more than merely clever. Nevertheless his forms of expression are so reckless of artistic dignity, so forgetful of beauty, that one hesitates to welcome this music of his to the concert-room. In its place, as melodramatic music, it is undoubtedly strongly effective; but such music was never meant to stand in the foreground and take up the listener's undivided attention; it is but a musical background to a dramatic scene. No doubt composers of high artistic aim have written melodramatic music that was far better than the bare necessities of the case demanded, and could stand closer inspection as music on its own merits. But we cannot feel that Grieg has done this in the present case; this "Peer Gynt" music does not rise to the concert level; it is too merely melodramatic. He has not even shown his usual cleverness; his scoring of Solveig's song for strings, with a few wind instruments, weakens the peculiar wild accent of the music, and goes far to spoil what was in its original shape a tolerably good song. The "Stormy Evening on the Coast" sounds as if it had been made up from the waste baskets of any composers you please, who had tried their hand at thunder-and-lightning effects. The "Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter" is avowedly a piece of burlesque extravagance, for in the story Peer Gynt gets himself into decidedly hot water by langhing at it; but burlesque extravagance got by xylophones, fancy "champion drum corps" effects, and playing on stringed instruments with the bow upside down, is rather a cheap business. Upon the whole, this second "Peer Gynt" suite is not only inferior to the first, but is utterly unworthy a place on the programme of a serious concert. That it was admirably played did not mend matters very much.

Dvorák's second symphony wears better than we expected. There is not a measure in it that begins to compare, for brilliancy of inspiration, with the wonderful beginning of the first symphony; but it is as a whole a far better-written and more coherent work. When it was first played here some years ago a good deal in it sounded rather cheap and melodramatic; one felt that Dvorák had fallen into the trap into which many another composer had stumbled before him, in being merely theatrical where he meant to be dramatic, but this first impression has pretty well worn off by this time, and the real earnestness of purpose that underlies the music is beginning to show through. For one thing, we know of no other work of Dvorák's in which there is so much real beauty of color, so little that is merely conventionally brilliant in the orchestration. How thoroughly he has made his four horns pay in that passage in the slow movement! Since Weber's "Freischütz" overture we can recall no other instance of such really refined and poetic use of a combination which too often produces one of the cheapest effects in all modern orchestration. And this is but one instance out of many in the symphony. Then the whole work has an individual atmosphere of its own; one feels a real man behind it. The performance was of a very high character, and showed the work in its true light.

Saint-Saëns's A major violin concerto is an eminently genial, pleasing composition, and one wonders a little how it could have remained so long in manuscript after its two (to our thinking, far inferior) successors were published. It belongs to Saint-Saëns's best period, to a time when that ambition to write for the stage which possesses every Frenchman was as yet in embryo, and the composer was still devoting his best strength to writing for the concert-room. The form of the work, if not wholly original, is admirably adapted to its purpose, and is well worth imitating by other concerto writers. The plan of it is this: Instead of the regulation three (or four) movements, Saint-Saëns has here taken the standard sonata form—usually applied to first movements of concertos—and cut it in two through the middle; into the gap thus formed he inserts a short, slow movement. Thus the work begins as other concertos do, and goes on regularly through the first part of the first movement up to about the middle of the working out; here it breaks off, and we have the little andante espressivo episode, which is really an independent movement in itself. This episode over, the working-out of the "first" movement is taken up again and carried through, leading to the regular third part and the final coda. If the cantabile second theme does not make its appearance again in this third part, this is but a matter of detail, and by no means unprecedented in modern writing. This form is simply admirable; it gives the work the brevity and conciseness that is so desirable in modern concerto writing—for one is not so patient nowadays in listening to a solo instrument disport itself above the orchestra for a long time together as one was in the comfortable days of Plancus—while it also [illegible] well-balanced unity that belongs to symphonic writing. The concerto itself is graceful, easily flowing, and at times very brilliant; it is written in constant sympathy with the character of the solo instrument, which occupies the foreground almost without intermission. In short, it is well written, charming music, such as one delights in listening to. Mr. Loeffler outdid himself. A larger tone and something more of dash and brio in style would have done no harm; but for pure beauty of tone, crystalline clearness, grace of phrasing, and a certain masterly unity of style, one sees not how the performance could have been surpassed. It was simply exquisite from beginning to end. Mr. Loeffler has taken it upon himself to change the ending of the concerto: he cuts off the last page or two, and introduces an elaborate cadenza and an ending of his own. The principle is a dangerous one, but in this case the change is so well done, with such musicianly skill and so fine a sense of fitness, that little, if anything, is to be urged against it. For one thing, the cadenza gave Mr. Loeffler an opportunity of showing the purest, smoothest, most lusciously sweet tone in four-string chords and arpeggj that we can remember hearing from any violinist. One forgot that there was such a thing as rosin in the world. He was enthusiastically and repeatedly recalled at the end.

The next programme is: Weber, overture to "Der Freischütz;" Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98; Riemenschneider, "Todtentanz" for orchestra (first time); Nicolai, overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor." There will be no solo.

New Century Drawing Room.

The Kneisel Quartet
of Boston.

Franz Kneisel, 1st Violin
Otto Roth, 2d Violin
L. Svecenski, Viola
Alwin Schroeder, Violoncello

Thursday Afternoon, March 9, at 3.

Programme.

DVORAK . . . . Quartet in E major, Op. 80
Allegro.
Andante con moto.
Allegro scherzando.
Finale (Allegro con brio).

TSCHAIKOWSKY . . Andante from Quartet in D major

SCHUMANN . . . Quartet in A major, Op. 41, No. 3
Andante espressivo; Allegro molto moderato—
Assai agitato—
Adagio molto—
Finale (Allegro molto vivace).

Tickets now on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

[113]

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.

Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. ERNST PERABO.

VII. CONCERT.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in A major, op. 18, No. 5. Allegro—Menuetto.—Andante cantabile.—Allegro.
SCHUBERT.	RONDEAU BRILLANT for PIANO and VIOLIN, in B minor, op. 70.
C. M. LOEFFLER.	SEXTUOR for 2 VIOLINS, 2 VIOLAS, and 2 'CELLOS, in A minor. Allegro vivo e appassionato.—Andante.—Presto.—Andante.—Allegro con spirito. (Manuscript.—first time.) 2d Viola, MR. MAX ZACH. 2d 'Cello, MR. LEO SCHULZ.

The date of the Eighth Concert is March 27.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The seventh concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening in Chickering Hall. The quartet was assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist; Mr. Max Zach, violinist, and Mr. Leo Schulz, 'cellist. The programme was as follows:

Quartette, A major, op. 18, No. 5.....Beethoven
Rondeau brillant, piano and violin, op. 70.....Schubert
Sextet, A minor.....C. M. Loeffler
(Manuscript—first time.)

The sextet by Mr. Loeffler is an interesting and, in many respects, a strong work. It is true that passages are ugly, that passages are bizarre; but there is the revelation of an individuality. The individuality is seen in the treatment of the themes rather than in the themes. The first movement, a passionate allegro, might be compared to a quarrel of Russians and Hungarians over an opening theme by Brahms. Not that the theme is found in Brahms's complete works, but there is a suggestion of the son of the double bass player of Hamburg. There is a tonality here, as indeed throughout the work, that is akin to the vague tonality of many Russian folk songs, with alternating or conflicting modes; the cadences often suggest the plain song that influenced these folk songs. Singular and effective harmonies are side by side with harmonies that are neither agreeable nor effective, and are ugly without purpose. The development is, as a rule, interesting; at the same time there are fugal measures that tell of a feeling on the part of the composer of a necessity of displaying counterpoint purely for scholastic purpose. The returns to the delivery of the chief theme are ingenious, and the coda is a masterly piece of work.

The second movement is a combination of andante, presto and andante, and is in memory of the late Dennis Bunker. The chief theme of the andante is the Russian "Ay, Ouchnem," a song sung by the bargemen who, with straps around their bodies, pull boats on Russian rivers against wind and tide. This theme is impressively declaimed at first and it is handled throughout in artistic fashion. The movement is a lament of utmost sadness only broken by spasmodic and impotent defiance of Fate. It is dramatic to the verge of intensity, and yet in this movement that which is bizarre enters and is welcomed by the composer. But the grotesque does not, paradoxical as it may seem, strike the hearer as out of place in this gloomy, hopeless, almost savage wail. The movement is certainly the strongest and the most dramatic. It is a question whether the intensely dramatic has any place in a sextette of this nature; but the question is perhaps old-fashioned and even ridiculous in these days of nervous music.

The effect of the finale was marred in a measure by the unfortunate interruption caused by the breaking of a string. The themes are not of marked originality. This movement, like the second, is of decided Sclavonic character, and it smells strongly of vodka.

As a whole, this sextet, dedicated to Mr. Franz Kneisel, is a strong composition. It is full of color; it is written with infinite care. The development often appears to be a procession of spontaneous thought. The very passages that appear needlessly, cruelly harsh, as well as certain hair raising harmonies, are evidently the matured purpose of the composer. A second hearing, which the work deserves, might possibly remove certain doubts or perplexities that follow its introduction. There was hearty applause after the movements, and at the end there were loud calls for the composer.

***

Mr. Loeffler's sextet was played with loving care by his associates. So, too, for the performance of the quartette by Beethoven there is nothing but warm praise. Mr. Perabo again proved himself an admirable chamber player, and the number by Schubert was given with brilliancy by him and Mr. Kneisel.

There was a large audience. The date of the eighth concert is March 27.

PHILIP HALE.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1893.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Perabo, Mr. Max Zach, and Mr. Leo Schulz, gave the seventh concert of this season in Chickering Hall, last evening, the programme being as follows:

Beethoven: Quartet in A major, Opus 18, No. 5.
Schubert: Rondeau brillant for pianoforte and violin in B minor, Opus 70.
C. M. Loeffler: Sextet for two violins, two violas, and two 'celli, in A minor.
(Manuscript, first time.)

The ever-delightful Beethoven quartet, with its winsome andante with variations, was exquisitely played; the finale was in excellent wonderful bit of ensemble-playing, combining as it did the most perfect accuracy with an absolute apparent freedom on the part of each individual player. This is the ideal of quartet playing, an ideal which no orchestral performance of chamber music "by all the strings" can ever hope to approach.

Mr. Perabo, as he stepped upon the platform with Mr. Kneisel to play the Schubert rondo, was given the warmest of receptions by the audience—which seemed rather to surprise him, modesty, by the way—and played delightfully. Here was as fine an example as could be wished of how well a fully open pianoforte can be made to sound in concerted chamber-music when it is handled by an artist. One of the worst features of modern pianoforte-playing—the immediate result of pitting the pianoforte against too heavy orchestration in modern concerto-writing—is the habit so many pianists have formed of playing very loud, just as so many opera-singers have formed the habit of screaming, for a very similar reason. Pianists know that they have to exert a great deal of force in playing concertos with orchestra in large halls; the strength needed for this sort of playing must be acquired by arduous practice, so pianists accustom themselves to practising with a constant output of great physical strength. This becomes habitual after a while, and their ear grows so used to hearing the pianoforte sound very loud that they gradually lose all appreciation of what a tremendous noise they are making and of what its effect is upon the average listener. Most concert pianists nowadays play very much as we all of us speak after talking for awhile with a deaf person; the average of the dynamic force they use is abnormally high. When they play in a drawing-room or a small hall, the memory of struggling with an orchestra in large halls, still hangs around their performance; playing loud has become a second nature with them. Paderewski is a glowing exception in this matter; you always feel that he is listening to his own playing, and judging of its effect by what he hears. Mr. Perabo is another exception; he can play as strong as any one, but you feel all the while that he is playing that neither his forte nor his piano is merely automatic and involuntary, but that he carefully grades the strength he employs according to a conscious perception of the immediate necessities of the situation. The reason so many pianists prefer to play concerted chamber music with a closed pianoforte is not that they cannot play delicately enough not to drown out the other instruments, but that they fear that, in the interest and excitement of performance, they may forget to play delicately enough, and fall back into their habitual pounding. Both Mr. Perabo and Mr. Kneisel played the Schubert rondo to perfection; the work itself has aged somewhat, and one feels as if it were not quite so unquestionably on the "Davidsbündler" side of the line as it once was; but, although aged a little, it is still hale and hearty.

In Mr. Loeffler's new sextet we hail a work that can be musically and unreservedly enjoyed from beginning to end. How far further acquaintance and intimacy may modify this enjoyment we cannot as yet predict; but last evening, the enjoyment was unalloyed and complete. We know of no sextet for strings in which the almost unavoidable thickness of tone resulting from the preponderance of instruments of a low register has been so triumphantly overcome as in this one. The "instrumentation" of the work is simply masterly. And how fresh, vital, naturally musical its themes are! The first movement is a dream of beauty, of grace of outline and sensuous wealth of color. It might be entitled a vision of "Kubla Khan." The slow movement, which alternates with the nimbly tripping scherzo, is based upon a Russian folk-theme of the most poignant expressiveness. Mr. Loeffler's treatment of it shows great power; some of his modal cadences are overwhelming in their effect. And through it all runs a fine sense for musical beauty; it is not merely expressive and impressive, but it is musically so. The first entrance of the two 'celli, bringing a major third into the bare fifth of the other instruments, is an inspiration. The finale is simply delightful. There is an immense amount of elaborate work in the sextet, and carried through with a very sure hand; but the elaboration of details never blurs nor distorts the main outline; the whole is strong, coherent, and full of meaning. It is a work for Boston to be proud of. The performance was admirable at every point.

....There was something almost of affection in the enthusiasm with which Mr. Perabo was welcomed by the fine representative audience at the Kneisel concert last evening. The Boston which really knows and really enjoys classical music knows well that there is no better pianist nor one truer to high ideals than its own Perabo, now of many years' record in holding up the standards among us, and yet almost as youthful looking as twenty years ago.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 28, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

It has been well said that "happy are those nations which have no histories"; and it is equally true that those concerts are excellent on which no criticisms can be written. There is but little to write of the quartette concert given in Chickering Hall last night. The fifth quartette of the series, which forms Beethoven's op. 18, was given with a perfection that aroused the audience (which was as large as the hall would allow) to the most fervid applause at the end of each movement. Such marvellous ensemble, such exquisite shading, require something more graphic than type for adequate description. The Schubert rondo, for violin and piano, brought Mr. Perabo to the latter instrument. He received a most enthusiastic welcome. Mr. Kneisel played the violin, and the performance was interesting and brilliant throughout.

The chief interest of the occasion centred in the final number of the programme, which was a sextet for strings, by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, and in which Messrs. Max Zach and Leo Schultz were added to the regular forces of the club. It is by far the best work which the talented violinist has yet given to the public. Founded on folk themes, it has a degree of development that is not in the earlier works of the composer, and the leading of the voices is easy and masterly everywhere.

The chief theme of the first movement is melodious and richly harmonized, but the second theme is odd and quaint and full of spasmodic interruption; this affords excellent contrast, and the canonic touches in the development are masterly. The returning passage to the chief theme is ineffably sweet. The andante is full of Muscovite melancholy; it is founded on a Russian sailor's song, very popular along the Volga, of which the first four notes form an admirable figure for treatment, which is used with charming reiteration through the movement. By a pleasant presentation of this figure in diminution the movement is transformed into a Presto, which at last, however, returns to an andante tempo in which brusque scales and unison work give new phases of the chief subject. It is all very effective and logical in its transformations.

The finale is a rapid theme, almost a "Kamarinskaia" (the Russian folk dance which is the favorite of the peasantry) and it becomes almost a moto perpetuo in its constant rapidity and feverish frenzy. The breaking of a string on Mr. Kneisel's violin caused an involuntary interruption, which however did not injure the effect of the work. One may cordially congratulate the players upon their well won recognition at the hands of the audience and Mr. Loeffler upon his distinct advance in the art of composition.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, FEB. 28, 1893.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The seventh of this season's series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given in Chickering Hall, last evening, and, as is always the case at a public appearance of this admirable organization, a brilliant assemblage gave cordial recognition to the merit of the evening's offerings.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's quartet in A major, op. 18, No. 5, Schubert's rondeau brilliant for piano and violin, in B minor, op. 70, and C. M. Loeffler's sextuor for two violins, two violas, two 'cellos, in A minor.

The sextuor was the novelty of the evening, and being a new composition by a composer who is highly esteemed in Boston and recognized as one of the first of local violinists, considerable interest was naturally felt in this, the first performance of the work. It is an interesting work, notable for its originality, beauty of harmony and artistic treatment. The composition is a most creditable one, and a second hearing will be welcome. An excellent performance was given the new work, in interpreting which the quartet had the assistance of those two capable musicians, Mr. Max Zach, viola, and Mr. Leo Schulz, cello.

Mr. Ernst Perabo was the piano soloist, and he was heard with much pleasure in Schubert's charming rondeau. The Beethoven quartet was given a finished and artistic interpretation, and, in short, the concert as a whole was one to be remembered with pleasure.

The next concert by the Kneisel quartet will be given at Chickering Hall on March 27.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 28, 1893.

The seventh concert of the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, was given in Chickering Hall last evening before a large and very enthusiastic audience. Beethoven's Quartet in A major was admirably played. Mr. Perabo's playing of Schubert's "Rondeau Brilliant" for piano and violin was exquisite and evoked much applause. The breaking of a string on Mr. Kneisel's instrument brought the third selection to an abrupt ending. The concert was one of the most enjoyable of the season. The next concert will be held March 28.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 59.

TUESDAY. FEB. 28, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The programme announced for the seventh of the season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet at Chickering Hall last evening had a double attraction aside from the always admirable string playing to be expected from Mr. Kneisel and his associates on all occasions.

The first of these was the original performance of a sextet for strings, composed by Mr. C. M. Loeffler of the Symphony orchestra, in which the quartet had the aid of Messrs. Max Zach, viola and Leo Schulz, 'cello. The sextet proved a valuable addition to the repertoire of chamber music given under Mr. Kneisel's direction, and its reception by last evening's audience was a most flattering tribute to the skill and genius shown by the composer.

The opening movement is somewhat studied, and its elaborations appear the result of careful methodical work, rather than inspiration, but all of the subsequent movements are written with splendid freedom and give evidence of the most positive ability. There is a strong flavor of the dash and vigor of the Hungarian school of writing in the presto and the final allegro, and throughout the latter movements the strong individuality of the composer is always apparent. It was played with fine effect throughout, and at its conclusion Mr. Loeffler was given an ovation, which he modestly acknowledged from his seat in the hall.

The playing of the Schubert rondo for piano and violin, with Mr. Ernst Perabo at the piano, made the other unusual attraction, and the composition was most heartily enjoyed. The quartet in A major, op. 18, by Beethoven, completed the evening's programme, and had a highly satisfying performance by Mr. Kneisel and his associates.

[114]

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.

Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. ERNST PERABO.

VII. CONCERT.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in A major, op. 18, No. 5. Allegro—Menuetto.—Andante cantabile.—Allegro.
SCHUBERT.	RONDEAU BRILLANT for PIANO and VIOLIN, in B minor, op. 70.
C. M. LOEFFLER.	SEXTUOR for 2 VIOLINS, 2 VIOLAS, and 2 'CELLOS, in A minor. Allegro vivo e appassionato.—Andante.—Presto.—Andante.—Allegro con spirito. (Manuscript.—first time.)

2d Viola, MR. MAX ZACH. 2d 'Cello, MR. LEO SCHULZ.

The date of the Eighth Concert is March 27.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The seventh concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening in Chickering Hall. The quartet was assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist; Mr. Max Zach, violinist, and Mr. Leo Schulz, 'cellist. The programme was as follows:

Quartette, A major, op. 18, No. 5.....Beethoven
Rondeau brillant, piano and violin, op. 70.....Schubert
Sextet, A minor.....C. M. Loeffler
(Manuscript—first time.)

The sextet by Mr. Loeffler is an interesting and, in many respects, a strong work. It is true that passages are ugly, that passages are bizarre; but there is the revelation of an individuality. The individuality is seen in the treatment of the themes rather than in the themes. The first movement, a passionate allegro, might be compared to a quarrel of Russians and Hungarians over an opening theme by Brahms. Not that the theme is found in Brahms's complete works, but there is a suggestion of the son of the double-bass player of Hamburg. There is a tonality here, as indeed throughout the work, that is akin to the vague tonality of many Russian folk songs, with alternating or conflicting modes; the cadences often suggest the plain song that influenced these folk songs. Singular and effective harmonies are side by side with harmonies that are neither agreeable nor effective, and are ugly without purpose. The development is, as a rule, interesting; at the same time there are fugal measures that tell of a feeling on the part of the composer of a necessity of displaying counterpoint purely for scholastic purpose. The returns to the delivery of the chief theme are ingenious, and the coda is a masterly piece of work.

The second movement is a combination of andante, presto and andante, and is in memory of the late Dennis Bunker. The chief theme of the andante is the Russian "Ay, Ouchnem," a song sung by the bargemen who, with straps around their bodies, pull boats on Russian rivers against wind and tide. This theme is impressively declaimed at first and it is handled throughout in artistic fashion. The movement is a lament of utmost sadness, only broken by spasmodic and impotent defiance of Fate. It is dramatic to the verge of intensity, and yet in this movement that which is bizarre enters and is welcomed by the composer. But the grotesque does not, paradoxical as it may seem, strike the hearer as out of place in this gloomy, hopeless, almost savage wail. The movement is certainly the strongest and the most dramatic. It is a question whether the intensely dramatic has any place in a sextette of this nature; but the question is perhaps old-fashioned and even ridiculous in these days of nervous music.

The effect of the finale was marred in a measure by the unfortunate interruption caused by the breaking of a string. The themes are not of marked originality. This movement, like the second, is of decided Sclavonic character, and it smells strongly of vodka.

As a whole, this sextet, dedicated to Mr. Franz Kneisel, is a strong composition. It is full of color; it is written with infinite care. The development often appears to be a procession of spontaneous thought. The very passages that appear needlessly, cruelly harsh, as well as certain hair raising harmonies, are evidently the matured purpose of the composer. A second hearing, which the work deserves, might possibly remove certain doubts or perplexities that follow its introduction. There was hearty applause after the movements, and at the end there were loud calls for the composer.

***

Mr. Loeffler's sextet was played with loving care by his associates. So, too, for the performance of the quartette by Beethoven there is nothing but warm praise. Mr. Perabo again proved himself an admirable chamber player, and the number by Schubert was given with brilliancy by him and Mr. Kneisel.

There was a large audience. The date of the eighth concert is March 27.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Transcript.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1893.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Max Zach, and Mr. Leo Schulz, gave the seventh concert of this, its eighth, season in Chickering Hall, last evening, the programme being as follows:

Beethoven: Quartet in A major, Opus 18, No. 5.
Schubert: Rondeau brillant for pianoforte and violin, in B minor, Opus 70.
C. M. Loeffler: Sextet for two violins, two violas, and two 'celli, in A minor.
(Manuscript, first time.)

The ever-delightful Beethoven quartet, with its winsome andante with variations, was exquisitely played; the finale was in especial a wonderful bit of ensemble-playing, combining as it did the most perfect accuracy with an absolute apparent freedom on the part of each individual player. This is the ideal of quartet-playing, an ideal which no orchestral performance of chamber music "by all the strings" can ever hope to approach.

Mr. Perabo, as he stepped upon the platform with Mr. Kneisel to play the Schubert rondo, was given the warmest of receptions by the audience—which seemed rather to surprise his modesty, by the way—and played delightfully. Here was as fine an example as could be wished of how well a fully open pianoforte can be made to sound in concerted chamber-music, when it is handled by an artist. One of the worst features of modern pianoforte-playing—the immediate result of pitting the pianoforte against too heavy orchestration in modern concerto-writing—is the habit so many pianists have formed of playing very loud, just as so many opera-singers have formed the habit of screaming, for a very similar reason. Pianists know that they have to exert a great deal of force in playing concertos with orchestra in large halls; the strength needed for this sort of playing must be acquired by arduous practice, so pianists accustom themselves to practising with a constant output of great physical strength. This becomes habitual after a while, and their ear grows so used to hearing the pianoforte sound very loud that they gradually lose all appreciation of what a tremendous noise they are making and of what its effect is upon the average listener. Most concert pianists nowadays play very much as we all of us speak after talking for awhile with a deaf person; the average of the dynamic force they use is abnormally high. When they play in a drawing-room or a small hall, the memory of struggling with an orchestra in large halls, still hangs around their performance; playing loud has become a second nature with them. Paderewski is a glowing exception in this matter; you always feel that he is listening to his own playing, and judging of its effect by what he hears. Mr. Perabo is another exception; he can play as strong as any one, but you feel all the while that he is playing that neither his forte nor his piano is merely automatic and involuntary, but that he carefully grades the strength he employs according to a conscious perception of the immediate necessities of the situation. The reason so many pianists prefer to play concerted chamber music with a closed pianoforte is not that they cannot play delicately enough not to drown out the other instruments, but that they fear that, in the interest and excitement of performance, they may forget to play delicately enough, and fall back into their habitual sounding. Both Mr. Perabo and Mr. Kneisel played the Schubert rondo to perfection; the work itself has aged somewhat, and one feels as if it were not quite so unquestionably on the "Davidsbündler" side of the line as it once was; but, although aged a little, it is still hale and hearty.

In Mr. Loeffler's new sextet we hail a work that can be musically and unreservedly enjoyed from beginning to end. How far further acquaintance and intimacy may modify this enjoyment we cannot as yet predict; but last evening the enjoyment was unalloyed and complete. We know of no sextet for strings in which the almost unavoidable thickness of tone resulting from the preponderance of instruments of a low register has been so triumphantly overcome as in this one. The "instrumentation" of the work is simply masterly. And how fresh, vital, naturally musical its themes are! The first movement is a dream of beauty, of grace of outline and sensuous wealth of color. It might be entitled a vision of "Kubla Khan." The slow movement, which alternates with the nimbly tripping scherzo, is based upon a Russian folk-theme of the most poignant expressiveness. Mr. Loeffler's treatment of it shows great power; some of his modal cadences are overwhelming in their effect. And through it all runs a fine sense for musical beauty; it is not merely expressive and impressive, but it is musically so. The first entrance of the two 'celli, bringing a major third into the bare fifth of the other instruments, is an inspiration. The finale is simply delightful. There is an immense amount of elaborate work in the sextet, and carried through with a very sure hand; but the elaboration of details never blurs nor distorts the main outline: the whole is strong, coherent, and full of meaning. It is a work for Boston to be proud of. The performance was admirable at every point.

....There was something almost of affection in the enthusiasm with which Mr. Perabo was welcomed by the fine representative audience at the Kneisel concert last evening. The Boston which really knows and really enjoys its classical music knows well that there is no better pianist nor one truer to high ideals than its own Perabo, now of many years' record in holding up the standards among us, and yet almost as youthful looking as twenty years ago.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 28, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

It has been well said that "happy are those nations which have no histories"; and it is equally true that those concerts are excellent on which no criticisms can be written. There is but little to write of the quartette concert given in Chickering Hall last night. The fifth quartette of the series, which forms Beethoven's op. 18, was given with a perfection that aroused the audience (which was as large as the hall would allow) to the most fervid applause at the end of each movement. Such marvellous ensemble, such exquisite shading, require something more graphic than type for adequate description. The Schubert rondo, for violin and piano, brought Mr. Perabo to the latter instrument. He received a most enthusiastic welcome. Mr. Kneisel played the violin, and the performance was interesting and brilliant throughout.

The chief interest of the occasion centred in the final number of the programme, which was a sextet for strings, by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, and in which Messrs. Max Zach and Leo Schultz were added to the regular forces of the club. It is by far the best work which the talented violinist has yet given to the public. Founded on folk themes, it has a degree of development that is not in the earlier works of the composer, and the leading of the voices is easy and masterly everywhere.

The chief theme of the first movement is melodious and richly harmonized, but the second theme is odd and quaint and full of spasmodic interruption; this affords excellent contrast, and the canonic touches in the development are masterly. The returning passage to the chief theme is ineffably sweet. The andante is full of Muscovite melancholy; it is founded on a Russian sailor's song, very popular along the Volga, of which the first four notes form an admirable figure for treatment, which is used with charming reiteration through the movement. By a pleasant presentation of this figure in diminution the movement is transformed into a Presto, which at last, however, returns to an andante tempo in which brusque scales and unison work give new phases of the chief subject. It is all very effective and logical in its transformations.

The finale is a rapid theme, almost a "Kamarinskaia" (the Russian folk dance which is the favorite of the peasantry) and it becomes almost a moto perpetuo in its constant rapidity and feverish frenzy. The breaking of a string on Mr. Kneisel's violin caused an involuntary interruption which however did not injure the effect of the work. One may cordially congratulate the players upon their well won recognition at the hands of the audience and Mr. Loeffler upon his distinct advance in the art of composition. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, FEB. 28, 1893.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The seventh of this season's series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given in Chickering Hall, last evening, and, as is always the case at a public appearance of this admirable organization, a brilliant assemblage gave cordial recognition to the merit of the evening's offerings.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's quartet in A major, op. 18, No. 5, Schubert's rondeau brilliant for piano and violin, in B minor, op. 70, and C. M. Loeffler's sextuor for two violins, two violas, two 'cellos, in A minor.

The sextuor was the novelty of the evening, and being a new composition by a composer who is highly esteemed in Boston and recognized as one of the first of local violinists, considerable interest was naturally felt in this, the first performance of the work. It is an interesting work, notable for its originality, beauty of harmony and artistic treatment. The composition is a most creditable one, and a second hearing will be welcome. An excellent performance was given the new work, in interpreting which the quartet had the assistance of those two capable musicians, Mr. Max Zach, viola, and Mr. Leo Schulz, cello.

Mr. Ernst Perabo was the piano soloist, and he was heard with much pleasure in Schubert's charming rondeau. The Beethoven quartet was given a finished and artistic interpretation, and, in short, the concert as a whole was one to be remembered with pleasure.

The next concert by the Kneisel quartet will be given at Chickering Hall on March 27.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 28, 1893.

The seventh concert of the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, was given in Chickering Hall last evening before a large and very enthusiastic audience. Beethoven's Quartet in A major was admirably played. Mr. Perabo's playing of Schubert's "Rondeau Brilliant" for piano and violin was exquisite and evoked much applause. The breaking of a string on Mr. Kneisel's instrument brought the third selection to an abrupt ending. The concert was one of the most enjoyable of the season. The next concert will be held March 28.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 59.

TUESDAY, FEB. 28, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The programme announced for the seventh of the season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet at Chickering Hall last evening had a double attraction aside from the always admirable string playing to be expected from Mr. Kneisel and his associates on all occasions.

The first of these was the original performance of a sextet for strings, composed by Mr. C. M. Loeffler of the Symphony orchestra, in which the quartet had the aid of Messrs. Max Zach, viola and Leo Schulz, 'cello. The sextet proved a valuable addition to the repertoire of chamber music given under Mr. Kneisel's direction, and its reception by last evening's audience was a most flattering tribute to the skill and genius shown by the composer.

The opening movement is somewhat studied, and its elaborations appear the result of careful methodical work, rather than inspiration, but all of the subsequent movements are written with splendid freedom and give evidence of the most positive ability. There is a strong flavor of the dash and vigor of the Hungarian school of writing in the presto and the final allegro, and throughout the latter movements the strong individuality of the composer is always apparent. It was played with fine effect throughout, and at its conclusion Mr. Loeffler was given an ovation, which he modestly acknowledged from his seat in the hall.

The playing of the Schubert rondo for piano and violin, with Mr. Ernst Perabo at the piano, made the other unusual attraction, and the composition was most heartily enjoyed. The quartet in A major, op. 18, by Beethoven, completed the evening's programme, and had a highly satisfying performance by Mr. Kneisel and his associates.

[114]

EXCELSIOR JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1893.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcement of the date of the final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (April 5), which was to be found on one page of last night's programme, served to emphasize the fact that the concert season is beginning to draw toward a close. Another month, or six weeks will see the end of about all the important musical events for the season of 1892-3. None of these will leave with the true music-lover a pleasanter or more abiding memory than the series of superb concerts which the great Boston Orchestra have given us, which have this year exceeded in number the quota with which we have been favored in years past. They have been not only a source of pleasure, but a means of broadening the musical culture of every one who has been privileged to listen to them, a number, to the credit of Providence be it said, by no means small. The concert of last night did not fall below the level of its predecessors, either in the quality of the music offered, or the skill of its rendition. The following was the programme:

Symphony, No. 2, in C-major, op. 61.....Robert Schumann
Aria from "Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Mr. Meyn.
Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D-minor, op. 31.....Henri Vieuxtemps
Miss von Stosch.
Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24.....Berlioz
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkyrie".....Richard Wagner
Mr. Meyn and Orchestra.

Schumann's C-major Symphony, although considered by the critics inferior in some respects to the one in D-minor, is, taken as a whole, one of the most powerful orchestral works which he—or any one else, for that matter—ever wrote. It presents an almost bewildering maze of the richest harmony, keeping the hearer at the pitch of expectation from first to last. Little use is made of the devices of imitation or elaboration; not one of its many beautiful themes is "worked out" after the manner of more economical composers; reliance is had rather upon ever-shifting chord combinations, counterpoint of the most florid sort, and effective contrast of the different orchestral groups, the whole flavored with the peculiar and original individuality which is indelibly stamped upon all Schumann's music. It was played by the orchestra with masterly vigor and admirable treatment of its many subtle nuances of dynamics and tempo. The two excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" were given with all the delicacy called for by the music of elves and fairies, and the Wagner selections which ended the programme were also magnificently played. A better contrasted programme would be hard to imagine than these characteristic numbers by three of the greatest orchestral composers who have ever lived. Not only was the work of the orchestra most admirable, but Mr. Nikisch displayed in his reading of these widely different composers that keen insight and ability to bring out the inner meaning of each, which goes to the making of a great conductor.

The vocalist of the evening, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, is a painstaking, but not always satisfactory singer. His method of tone production is such that, while his voice seems a naturally strong one, it fails to fill Infantry Hall, and is completely overwhelmed by a forte from the orchestra. It is somewhat difficult to understand how such a singer can attain the prominence which Mr. Meyn has achieved in the past two or three years, except upon the theory often hinted at that to get into the good graces of a certain Boston clique means opportunity for mediocrity, while to fail of that often means the obscuring of undeniable talent. Mr. Meyn did his best singing in the "Wotan's Farewell."

Miss Von Stosch, the violinist, proved to be a most excellent player. The concerto of Vieuxtemps, which she played, is, like most compositions of virtuosi, remarkable rather for the difficulties to be overcome than for any great musical value. The difficulties did not seem to exist for Miss Von Stosch, whose tone, bowing, phrasing and all were of the highest excellence. Several well-deserved recalls folowed her fine performance, which she gracefully acknowledged, but refused to play again.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1893.

INFANTRY HALL.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcement of the date of the final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (April 5), which was to be found on one page of last night's programme, served to emphasize the fact that the concert season is beginning to draw toward a close. Another month, or six weeks will see the end of about all the important musical events for the season of 1892-3. None of these will leave with the true music-lover a pleasanter or more abiding memory than the series of superb concerts which the great Boston Orchestra have given us, which have this year exceeded in number the quota with which we have been favored in years past. They have been not only a source of pleasure, but a means of broadening the musical culture of every one who has been privileged to listen to them, a number, to the credit of Providence be it said, by no means small. The concert of last night did not fall below the level of its predecessors, either in the quality of the music offered, or the skill of its rendition. The following was the programme:

Symphony, No. 2, in C-major, op. 61.....Robert Schumann
Aria from "Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Mr. Meyn.
Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D-minor, op. 31.....Henri Vieuxtemps
Miss von Stosch.
Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24.....Berlioz
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkyrie".....Richard Wagner
Mr. Meyn and Orchestra.

Schumann's C-major Symphony, although considered by the critics inferior in some respects to the one in D-minor, is, taken as a whole, one of the most powerful orchestral works which he—or any one else, for that matter—ever wrote. It presents an almost bewildering maze of the richest harmony, keeping the hearer at the pitch of expectation from first to last. Little use is made of the devices of imitation or elaboration; not one of its many beautiful themes is "worked out" after the manner of more economical composers; reliance is had rather upon ever-shifting chord combinations, counterpoint of the most florid sort, and effective contrast of the different orchestral groups, the whole flavored with the peculiar and original individuality which is indelibly stamped upon all Schumann's music. It was played by the orchestra with masterly vigor and admirable treatment of its many subtle nuances of dynamics and tempo. The two excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" were given with all the delicacy called for by the music of elves and fairies, and the Wagner selections which ended the programme were also magnificently played. A better contrasted programme would be hard to imagine than these characteristic numbers by three of the greatest orchestral composers who have ever lived. Not only was the work of the orchestra most admirable, but Mr. Nikisch displayed in his reading of these widely different composers that keen insight and ability to bring out the inner meaning of each, which goes to the making of a great conductor.

The vocalist of the evening, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, is a painstaking, but not always satisfactory singer. His method of tone production is such that, while his voice seems a naturally strong one, it fails to fill Infantry Hall, and is completely overwhelmed by a forte from the orchestra. It is somewhat difficult to understand how such a singer can attain the prominence which Mr. Meyn has achieved in the past two or three years, except upon the theory often hinted at that to get into the good graces of a certain Boston clique means opportunity for mediocrity, while to fail of that often means the obscuring of undeniable talent. Mr. Meyn did his best singing in the "Wotan's Farewell."

Miss Von Stosch, the violinist, proved to be a most excellent player. The concerto of Vieuxtemps, which she played, is, like most compositions of virtuosi, remarkable rather for the difficulties to be overcome than for any great musical value. The difficulties did not seem to exist for Miss Von Stosch, whose tone, bowing, phrasing and all were of the highest excellence. Several well-deserved recalls folowed her fine performance, which she gracefully acknowledged, but refused to play again.

THE [illegible] NEWS.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1893.

SYMPHONY.

Fifth of the Season of the Boston Orchestra at Infantry Hall.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall last night was one of the most popular and enjoyable that Mr. Nikisch has ever given here.

The program was varied, and was in no part heavy or so severely classical as to be beyond the comprehension of the ordinary musical intellegence. It was, for Mr. Nikisch, quite decidedly lively, and so "popular" as to catch the fancy of the most hardened of the people who go to the concerts because other people go.

The program included Schumann's No. 2 Symphony, an aira from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" for the baritone soloist, a concerto for the violin by Vieuxtemps, two movements from Berloiz's "Faust," and Wotan's farewell from Wagner's "Die Walkyrie."

The soloists were Heinrich Meyn, baritone, and Miss Leonora von Stosch, violin. Mr. Meyn's performance was creditable, and his voice is just capable of enabling him to do creditable work. That is about all, and about the best, that can be said of him. He has been heard in this city before, and in the same music. Mr. Meyn's voice seems to be rather better than his method, and the effect is not as pleasing as it ought naturally to be. There is strength and a fair degree of cultivation, but for some reason the tone is frequently lost to the auditors, and the effect is disjointed.

Miss Stosch is a young violinist of promise, not to be reckoned with some who have delighted Providence audiences as yet, but evidently with a future. The technique of her work was generally good, though she showed nervousness at first.

Of the work of the orchestra there is the usual verdict to be given. It was superb. Whatever might be found to criticise in the orchestral numbers of last night's program exists in the compositions and not in their performance. The three selections given are among the most difficult and noted, as well as varied, ever written for orchestral performance. They did not daunt the orchestra, however, nor Mr. Nikisch, whose wonderful capacity for leadership was never more acutely put in evidence.

There is but one more concert in this series this season, on April 5.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1893.

THE PROGRAM DELIGHTED.

Performance Last Night By Boston's Big Symphony Orchestra.

For the fifth time this season the always welcome Boston symphony orchestra visited Providence last night, and in Infantry hall treated the best audience of the winter to the best entertainment. Schumann's symphony No. 2, two of the most interesting portions of "The Damnation of Faust," which the Arion club has sung, "Wotan's Farewell," and the "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkyrie," form a group of numbers which sparkle on every side. All, of course, were given with the usual brilliancy and thoroughness of this corps of musicians.

Miss Leonora von Stosch, a Boston young lady, was introduced for a violin solo, and she left the platform with the audience convinced of the great excellence of her work. She played a concerto by Vieuxtemps, and gave to it thought and sincere effort, combining in her interpretation dexterity, precision, capital coloring and cleanness of style.

Heinrich Meyn, who has sung in the city before, rendered an aria from the "Marriage of Figaro" with characteristic vigor.

The closing concert will take place April 5.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, well played, began well the sixteenth Symphony concert. An attentive audience, almost filling the hall in spite of the heavy snow-fall, delighted in the familiar but ever-welcome poetry of its sea-music, calling from resounding caves, beating up in gust and storm, shouting as with the titanic voice of the old Norse Eygre and pulsing with the subsident lapse of great, lonesome seas—ocean and coast music unmistakable in spite of its having no imitative page and no attempt to make mere artificial instruments cope with the tremendous powers and endless gamut of Nature's orchestra. At the end of the concert stood an excellent reading of Dvorak's second symphony, romantically laid out, earnestly directed and fully in conformity to the composer's evident craving for much sound and forcefulness of rendering. A second series of selections from Grieg's "Peer Gynt" melodramatic music was also presented by the orchestra, more to the enlivenment than the edification of the listener; and yet, although most of it was quite in the ad captandum style, one is glad to have heard it. The story which it illustrates is as legendary and appeals as much to credulity and the love of extravagance as any tale of Scheherazade's contriving, and dignified and reserved composition would suit with it as little as with any show-piece of the current drama. Its Arabian dance is a clashing, clangorous invention, not much like the strident, incisive individuality of the real thing, and its dance of the Mountain-King's Daughters is a clattering, rattle-ti-bang trifle not so far removed from circus pieces; but taken in their connection they undoubtedly "fill the bill" and it is something to know that Grieg can be absurd as well as gloomy and burlesque orchestration with xylophones and the rim of the snare-drum. There are a short storm bit which is commendable and a rather suave arrangement of the beautiful and tender "Solveig's Song" so long agreeably familiar in the repertory of tasteful sopranos. Saint-Saëns's violin concerto gave unquestionably the chief pleasure of the evening. It is informal in its construction, passing through its changes of mood and time without a break and affording opportunity for feeling without exaggeration and technique without ostentation. Its themes are obvious and its treatment open and gratifying to professional ears as well as to the layman's hearing. Mr. Loeffler played its solo pages beautifully and with that ripeness of style and sentiment which we have noted in his chamber work of this season. His tone was ever limpid and warm, his phrasing masterly with quiet, modest power, and his execution clear, true and facile, so that the concerto needed nothing which he did not give it. Just before the conclusion he introduced a cadenza of his own which made, as is expected of such things, a display of agility and skill, and, better yet, showed a distinctly traceable and logical use of the thematic material derived from the main body of the work. He was listened to with close attention and called forward again and again when he had finished.

Tonight's programme stands: Overture, "Der Freischütz"; Brahms's fourth symphony; a "Dance of Death," by Riemenschneider—a novelty; and the "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture. No soloist.

THE KNEISEL CONCERTS.

The penultimate concert of the Kneisel Quartette's present series was given on Monday evening in Chickering Hall, the audience being of the wonted fineness and amplitude. It began with Beethoven's A-major quartette, opus 18, No. 5, played to perfection and renewing the ever fresh feeling that Beethoven's music is still good enough for every man and every mood—and too good for many! Then Schubert's rondo in B-minor, opus 70, for violin and piano, was performed with entirely mutual feeling and technical brightness by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Perabo, who was received with great warmth and whom it was good to hear again. Finally came a novelty of extreme interest and importance—a manuscript sextuor for two violins, two violas and two 'cellos, written by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, Messrs. Schulz and Zach being joined to the quartette for the performance. The composition impresses the hearer instantly by its intensely personal spirit and its deep, full, earnest life. It meant much to the writer, who has not hesitated to be abstruse and difficult in expression, but has never lost his hold upon his forceful purpose or his listeners' attention. The themes are so brief and so simple that they are received and held with ease, and one almost is inclined to wonder what there is in them to serve as the bases of entire movements; but Mr. Loeffler's invention and art expand them and draw from them such movements as appear only too brief when they are ended. There are bold as well as beautiful passages, vehement discords as well as grateful harmonies, sudden alternations as well as sustained calms, and episodes which may always jar upon some ears, as well as others which must win upon all. But originality, independence, distinct purpose, courage and real feeling are eminent through out. The student will also admire the skill with which the instruments have been treated; they never seem to be scattered widely apart, nor yet are they so compacted together that their individuality is lost and their mingling tones made dense and monotonous. The composition was played with brotherly care, taste and earnestness, and it was received with quick and strong welcome and applause.

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

On Tuesday evening Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang to an audience which was fashionable and critical and almost filled Chickering Hall, in spite of the storm, three groups of lieder, numbering eighteen in all. The selection and arrangement were admirable, not a dull or thin song being presented, and the names of Paderewski, Hinrichs and the Boston pianist and composer, Busoni, standing beside those of Schubert, Franz, Brahms, Grieg and Chopin. Mrs. Nikisch threw unremitting earnestness into her singing and spared no pains to make each song deliver its message effectively and truthfully. That she did not accomplish the fulfilment of her clear wish and intention, must be ascribed to the inadequacy of her vocal method. She has certainly overcome some of the faults which were patent at her first appearance; she breathes better and more easily and many of her tones—the upper ones, especially—are better posed and issue more freely. But there yet remain faults which will be more difficult to overcome—indefiniteness of attack, unsure intonation, excess of portamento and indiscreet expenditure of energy. There are rich, full and strong tones in her voice, and if good schooling could make that voice even, true and docile, her lieder singing might interest as much as it gives proof of sincerity and good will. Miss Leonora von Stosch, the violinist, played a reverie of Vieuxtemps and a rondo of Scharwenka with large, noble and sympathetic tone and with fulness of temperamental feeling which sometimes was more predominant than musicianly. Mr. Nikisch was at the piano and his accompaniments were notable illustrations of fine art in that department, although they came very near to excessive volume now and then and their interludes—particularly those to the Brahms songs—sounded as if he were getting carried away by the personal influence of the music. This notice would be incomplete without a word of recognition for Mr. Busoni's delightful "Under den Linden," the theme introductory to which was developed and interwrought with the whole structure of the song, giving variety and adornment to the gay and persuasive melody.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1, 1893.

The program of the sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin, A major.....Saint-Saëns
Suite No. 2, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Symphony No. 2, D minor, op. 70.....Dvorák

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the solo violinist.

The second suite from "Peer Gynt" was played here for the first time. It is not equal in merit to the first, nor does it lend itself easily to concert purposes. With the exception of the exquisite arrangement of "Solvejgs Lied," it is theatrical music pure and simple, and it should be allowed to remain in its home, where it accompanies the various antics of "Peer Gynt." Even as theatrical music it seems as a whole unworthy of Grieg's fancy. The "Arabian Dance," for instance, begins with a regular Salvation Army tone painting, and in a moment Lottie Collins is brought vividly to the mind. The "Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter" is a damaged replica of the last movement of the first "Peer Gynt" suite, and not even the xylophone glissando at the end saves it from the charge of vulgarity. "Solvejgs Lied" was applauded; the other movements met with a cool reception.

Mr. Loeffler gave an exceedingly good performance of the Saint-Saëns concerto. From the technical standpoint it was faultless, and the player displayed refined taste and warm, poetic feeling.

The symphony and the overture were well played, in fact the performance of the overture was brilliant.

Mr. MacDowell will play his new piano sonata (the "Tragic," published lately in Leipsic) at the eighth concert of the Kneisel Quartet.

Mr. Horatio W. Parker, of New York, will assume his duties as organist of Trinity Church, Boston, May 1.

It is said that Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith will leave Mr. Arthur Foote's choir and be the soprano of the new quartet at the Ruggles Street Baptist Church.

The next program of the Symphony Orchestra includes a "Todtentanz," by Riemenschneider.

PHILIP HALE.

[115]

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1893.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcement of the date of the final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (April 5), which was to be found on one page of last night's programme, served to emphasize the fact that the concert season is beginning to draw toward a close. Another month, or six weeks will see the end of about all the important musical events for the season of 1892-3. None of these will leave with the true music-lover a pleasanter or more abiding memory than the series of superb concerts which the great Boston Orchestra have given us, which have this year exceeded in number the quota with which we have been favored in years past. They have been not only a source of pleasure, but a means of broadening the musical culture of every one who has been privileged to listen to them, a number, to the credit of Providence be it said, by no means small. The concert of last night did not fall below the level of its predecessors, either in the quality of the music offered, or the skill of its rendition. The following was the programme:

Symphony, No. 2, in C-major, op. 61.....Robert Schumann
Aria from "Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Mr. Meyn.
Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D-minor, op. 31.....Henri Vieuxtemps
Miss von Stosch.
Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24.....Berlioz
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkyrie".....Richard Wagner
Mr. Meyn and Orchestra.

Schumann's C-major Symphony, although considered by the critics inferior in some respects to the one in D-minor, is, taken as a whole, one of the most powerful orchestral works which he—or any one else, for that matter—ever wrote. It presents an almost bewildering maze of the richest harmony, keeping the hearer at the pitch of expectation from first to last. Little use is made of the devices of imitation or elaboration; not one of its many beautiful themes is "worked out" after the manner of more economical composers; reliance is had rather upon ever-shifting chord combinations, counterpoint of the most florid sort, and effective contrast of the different orchestral groups, the whole flavored with the peculiar and original individuality which is indelibly stamped upon all Schumann's music. It was played by the orchestra with masterly vigor and admirable treatment of its many subtle nuances of dynamics and tempo. The two excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" were given with all the delicacy called for by the music of elves and fairies, and the Wagner selections which ended the programme were also magnificently played. A better contrasted programme would be hard to imagine than these characteristic numbers by three of the greatest orchestral composers who have ever lived. Not only was the work of the orchestra most admirable, but Mr. Nikisch displayed in his reading of these widely different composers that keen insight and ability to bring out the inner meaning of each, which goes to the making of a great conductor.

The vocalist of the evening, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, is a painstaking, but not always satisfactory singer. His method of tone production is such that, while his voice seems a naturally strong one, it fails to fill Infantry Hall, and is completely overwhelmed by a forte from the orchestra. It is somewhat difficult to understand how such a singer can attain the prominence which Mr. Meyn has achieved in the past two or three years, except upon the theory often hinted at that to get into the good graces of a certain Boston clique means opportunity for mediocrity, while to fail of that often means the obscuring of undeniable talent. Mr. Meyn did his best singing in the "Wotan's Farewell."

Miss Von Stosch, the violinist, proved to be a most excellent player. The concerto of Vieuxtemps, which she played, is, like most compositions of virtuosi, remarkable rather for the difficulties to be overcome than for any great musical value. The difficulties did not seem to exist for Miss Von Stosch, whose tone, bowing, phrasing and all were of the highest excellence. Several well-deserved recalls folowed her fine performance, which she gracefully acknowledged, but refused to play again.

THE EVENING BULLETIN.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1893.

INFANTRY HALL.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcement of the date of the final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (April 5), which was to be found on one page of last night's programme, served to emphasize the fact that the concert season is beginning to draw toward a close. Another month, or six weeks will see the end of about all the important musical events for the season of 1892-3. None of these will leave with the true music-lover a pleasanter or more abiding memory than the series of superb concerts which the great Boston Orchestra have given us, which have this year exceeded in number the quota with which we have been favored in years past. They have been not only a source of pleasure, but a means of broadening the musical culture of every one who has been privileged to listen to them, a number, to the credit of Providence be it said, by no means small. The concert of last night did not fall below the level of its predecessors, either in the quality of the music offered, or the skill of its rendition. The following was the programme:

Symphony, No. 2, in C-major, op. 61.....Robert Schumann
Aria from "Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Mr. Meyn.
Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D-minor, op. 31.....Henri Vieuxtemps
Miss von Stosch.
Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24.....Berlioz
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkyrie".....Richard Wagner
Mr. Meyn and Orchestra.

Schumann's C-major Symphony, although considered by the critics inferior in some respects to the one in D-minor, is, taken as a whole, one of the most powerful orchestral works which he—or any one else, for that matter—ever wrote. It presents an almost bewildering maze of the richest harmony, keeping the hearer at the pitch of expectation from first to last. Little use is made of the devices of imitation or elaboration; not one of its many beautiful themes is "worked out" after the manner of more economical composers; reliance is had rather upon ever-shifting chord combinations, counterpoint of the most florid sort, and effective contrast of the different orchestral groups, the whole flavored with the peculiar and original individuality which is indelibly stamped upon all Schumann's music. It was played by the orchestra with masterly vigor and admirable treatment of its many subtle nuances of dynamics and tempo. The two excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" were given with all the delicacy called for by the music of elves and fairies, and the Wagner selections which ended the programme were also magnificently played. A better contrasted programme would be hard to imagine than these characteristic numbers by three of the greatest orchestral composers who have ever lived. Not only was the work of the orchestra most admirable, but Mr. Nikisch displayed in his reading of these widely different composers that keen insight and ability to bring out the inner meaning of each, which goes to the making of a great conductor.

The vocalist of the evening, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, is a painstaking, but not always satisfactory singer. His method of tone production is such that, while his voice seems a naturally strong one, it fails to fill Infantry Hall, and is completely overwhelmed by a forte from the orchestra. It is somewhat difficult to understand how such a singer can attain the prominence which Mr. Meyn has achieved in the past two or three years, except upon the theory often hinted at that to get into the good graces of a certain Boston clique means opportunity for mediocrity, while to fail of that often means the obscuring of undeniable talent. Mr. Meyn did his best singing in the "Wotan's Farewell."

Miss Von Stosch, the violinist, proved to be a most excellent player. The concerto of Vieuxtemps, which she played, is, like most compositions of virtuosi, remarkable rather for the difficulties to be overcome than for any great musical value. The difficulties did not seem to exist for Miss Von Stosch, whose tone, bowing, phrasing and all were of the highest excellence. Several well-deserved recalls folowed her fine performance, which she gracefully acknowledged, but refused to play again.

THE PROVIDENCE NEWS.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1893.

SYMPHONY.

Fifth of the Season of the Boston Orchestra at Infantry Hall.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall last night was one of the most popular and enjoyable that Mr. Nikisch has ever given here.

The program was varied, and was in no part heavy or so severely classical as to be beyond the comprehension of the ordinary musical intellegence. It was, for Mr. Nikisch, quite decidedly lively, and so "popular" as to catch the fancy of the most hardened of the people who go to the concerts because other people go.

The program included Schumann's No. 2 Symphony, an aira from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" for the baritone soloist, a concerto for the violin by Vieuxtemps, two movements from Berloiz's "Faust," and Wotan's farewell from Wagner's "Die Walkyrie."

The soloists were Heinrich Meyn, baritone, and Miss Leonora von Stosch, violin. Mr. Meyn's performance was creditable, and his voice is just capable of enabling him to do creditable work. That is about all, and about the best, that can be said of him. He has been heard in this city before, and in the same music. Mr. Meyn's voice seems to be rather better than his method, and the effect is not as pleasing as it ought naturally to be. There is strength and a fair degree of cultivation, but for some reason the tone is frequently lost to the auditors, and the effect is disjointed.

Miss Stosch is a young violinist of promise, not to be reckoned with some who have delighted Providence audiences as yet, but evidently with a future. The technique of her work was generally good, though she showed nervousness at first.

Of the work of the orchestra there is the usual verdict to be given: It was superb. Whatever might be found to criticise in the orchestral numbers of last night's program exists in the compositions and not in their performance. The three selections given are among the most difficult and noted, as well as varied, ever written for orchestral performance. They did not daunt the orchestra, however, nor Mr. Nikisch, whose wonderful capacity for leadership was never more acutely put in evidence.

There is but one more concert in this series this season, on April 5.

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1893.

THE PROGRAM DELIGHTED.

Performance Last Night By Boston's Big Symphony Orchestra.

For the fifth time this season the always welcome Boston symphony orchestra visited Providence last night, and in Infantry hall treated the best audience of the winter to the best entertainment. Schumann's symphony No. 2, two of the most interesting portions of "The Damnation of Faust," which the Arion club has sung, "Wotan's Farewell," and the "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkyrie," form a group of numbers which sparkle on every side. All, of course, were given with the usual brilliancy and thoroughness of this corps of musicians.

Miss Leonora von Stosch, a Boston young lady, was introduced for a violin solo, and she left the platform with the audience convinced of the great excellence of her work. She played a concerto by Vieuxtemps, and gave to it thought and sincere effort, combining in her interpretation dexterity, precision, capital coloring and cleanness of style.

Heinrich Meyn, who has sung in the city before, rendered an aria from the "Marriage of Figaro" with characteristic vigor.

The closing concert will take place April 5.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1, 1893.

* * *

The program of the sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin, A major.....Saint-Saëns
Suite No. 2, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Symphony No. 2, D minor, op. 70.....Dvorák

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the solo violinist.

The second suite from "Peer Gynt" was played here for the first time. It is not equal in merit to the first, nor does it lend itself easily to concert purposes. With the exception of the exquisite arrangement of "Solvejgs Lied," it is theatrical music pure and simple, and it should be allowed to remain in its home, where it accompanies the various antics of "Peer Gynt." Even as theatrical music it seems as a whole unworthy of Grieg's fancy. The "Arabian Dance," for instance, begins with a regular Salvation Army tone painting, and in a moment Lottie Collins is brought vividly to the mind. The "Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter" is a damaged replica of the last movement of the first "Peer Gynt" suite, and not even the xylophone glissando at the end saves it from the charge of vulgarity. "Solvejgs Lied" was applauded; the other movements met with a cool reception.

Mr. Loeffler gave an exceedingly good performance of the Saint-Saëns concerto. From the technical standpoint it was faultless, and the player displayed refined taste and warm, poetic feeling.

The symphony and the overture were well played, in fact the performance of the overture was brilliant.

Mr. MacDowell will play his new piano sonata (the "Tragic," published lately in Leipsic) at the eighth concert of the Kneisel Quartet.

Mr. Horatio W. Parker, of New York, will assume his duties as organist of Trinity Church, Boston, May 1.

It is said that Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith will leave Mr. Arthur Foote's choir and be the soprano of the new quartet at the Ruggles Street Baptist Church.

The next program of the Symphony Orchestra includes a "Todtentanz," by Riemenschneider. PHILIP HALE.

[115]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, well played, began well the sixteenth Symphony concert. An attentive audience, almost filling the hall in spite of the heavy snow-fall, delighted in the familiar but ever-welcome poetry of its sea-music, calling from resounding caves, beating up in gust and storm, shouting as with the titanic voice of the old Norse Eygre and pulsing with the subsident lapse of great, lonesome seas—ocean and coast music unmistakable in spite of its having no imitative page and no attempt to make mere artificial instruments cope with the tremendous powers and endless gamut of Nature's orchestra. At the end of the concert stood an excellent reading of Dvorak's second symphony, romantically laid out, earnestly directed and fully in conformity to the composer's evident craving for much sound and forcefulness of rendering. A second series of selections from Grieg's "Peer Gynt" melodramatic music was also presented by the orchestra, more to the enlivenment than the edification of the listener; and yet, although most of it was quite in the ad captandum style, one is glad to have heard it. The story which it illustrates is as legendary and appeals as much to credulity and the love of extravagance as any tale of Scheherazade's contriving, and dignified and reserved composition would suit with it as little as with any show-piece of the current drama. Its Arabian dance is a clashing, clangorous invention, not much like the strident, incisive individuality of the real thing, and its dance of the Mountain-King's Daughters is a clattering, rattle-ti-bang trifle not so far removed from circus pieces; but taken in their connection they undoubtedly "fill the bill" and it is something to know that Grieg can be absurd as well as gloomy and burlesque orchestration with xylophones and the rim of the snare-drum. There are a short storm bit which is commendable and a rather suave arrangement of the beautiful and tender "Solveig's Song" so long agreeably familiar in the repertory of tasteful sopranos. Saint-Saëns's violin concerto gave unquestionably the chief pleasure of the evening. It is informal in its construction, passing through its changes of mood and time without a break and affording opportunity for feeling without exaggeration and technique without ostentation. Its themes are obvious and its treatment open and gratifying to professional ears as well as to the layman's hearing. Mr. Loeffler played its solo pages beautifully and with that ripeness of style and sentiment which we have noted in his chamber work of this season. His tone was ever limpid and warm, his phrasing masterly with quiet, modest power, and his execution clear, true and facile, so that the concerto needed nothing which he did not give it. Just before the conclusion he introduced a cadenza of his own which made, as is expected of such things, a display of agility and skill, and, better yet, showed a distinctly traceable and logical use of the thematic material derived from the main body of the work. He was listened to with close attention and called forward again and again when he had finished.

Tonight's programme stands: Overture, "Der Freischütz"; Brahms's fourth symphony; a "Dance of Death," by Riemenschneider—a novelty; and the "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture. No soloist.

THE KNEISEL CONCERTS.

The penultimate concert of the Kneisel Quartette's present series was given on Monday evening in Chickering Hall, the audience being of the wonted fineness and amplitude. It began with Beethoven's A-major quartette, opus 18, No. 5, played to perfection and renewing the ever fresh feeling that Beethoven's music is still good enough for every man and every mood—and too good for many! Then Schubert's rondo in B-minor, opus 70, for violin and piano, was performed with entirely mutual feeling and technical brightness by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Perabo, who was received with great warmth and whom it was good to hear again. Finally came a novelty of extreme interest and importance—a manuscript sextuor for two violins, two violas and two 'cellos, written by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, Messrs. Schulz and Zach being joined to the quartette for the performance. The composition impresses the hearer instantly by its intensely personal spirit and its deep, full, earnest life. It meant much to the writer, who has not hesitated to be abstruse and difficult in expression, but has never lost his hold upon his forceful purpose or his listeners' attention. The themes are so brief and so simple that they are received and held with ease, and one almost is inclined to wonder what there is in them to serve as the bases of entire movements; but Mr. Loeffler's invention and art expand them and draw from them such movements as appear only too brief when they are ended. There are bold as well as beautiful passages, vehement discords as well as grateful harmonies, sudden alternations as well as sustained calms, and episodes which may always jar upon some ears, as well as others which must win upon all. But originality, independence, distinct purpose, courage and real feeling are eminent through out. The student will also admire the skill with which the instruments have been treated; they never seem to be scattered widely apart, nor yet are they so compacted together that their individuality is lost and their mingling tones made dense and monotonous. The composition was played with brotherly care, taste and earnestness, and it was received with quick and strong welcome and applause.

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

On Tuesday evening Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang to an audience which was fashionable and critical and almost filled Chickering Hall, in spite of the storm, three groups of lieder, numbering eighteen in all. The selection and arrangement were admirable, not a dull or thin song being presented, and the names of Paderewski, Hinrichs and the Boston pianist and composer, Busoni, standing beside those of Schubert, Franz, Brahms, Grieg and Chopin. Mrs. Nikisch threw unremitting earnestness into her singing and spared no pains to make each song deliver its message effectively and truthfully. That she did not accomplish the fulfilment of her clear wish and intention, must be ascribed to the inadequacy of her vocal method. She has certainly overcome some of the faults which were patent at her first appearance; she breathes better and more easily and many of her tones—the upper ones, especially—are better posed and issue more freely. But there yet remain faults which will be more difficult to overcome—indefiniteness of attack, unsure intonation, excess of portamento and indiscreet expenditure of energy. There are rich, full and strong tones in her voice, and if good schooling could make that voice even, true and docile, her lieder singing might interest as much as it gives proof of sincerity and good will. Miss Leonora von Stosch, the violinist, played a reverie of Vieuxtemps and a rondo of Scharwenka with large, noble and sympathetic tone and with fulness of temperamental feeling which sometimes was more predominant than musicianly. Mr. Nikisch was at the piano and his accompaniments were notable illustrations of fine art in that department, although they came very near to excessive volume now and then and their interludes—particularly those to the Brahms songs—sounded as if he were getting carried away by the personal influence of the music. This notice would be incomplete without a word of recognition for Mr. Busoni's delightful "Under den Linden," the theme introductory to which was developed and interwrought with the whole structure of the song, giving variety and adornment to the gay and persuasive melody.

INCOMPLETE

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4,

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

A large, fashionable and demonstrative audience greeted Mrs. Nikisch in Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening. The program was elaborately varied with songs by Schubert, Franz, Chopin, Busoni, Brahms, Paderewski, Heinrichs, Grieg, Schumann and Henberger.

It would be gratifying to record any improvement in the singing of Mrs. Nikisch since her last public appearance here, but in spite of a charming personality and a naturally pleasing vocal aptitude, the singer has little upon which to base her claim as an artist.

The first requisite, a voice, is her inherent possession; furthermore, she is not without temperament, but anything like a true legato she has not. Her interpretations are graceful and indicative of good musical talent, rather than careful study.

The Brahms songs were the least satisfactory. "Unter den Linden," by Busoni, was one of the most pleasing numbers on the program.

Though Mr. Nikisch's position on the program was one not calculated for self-glory, yet it can be truly said that it was the artistic event of the evening. Anything in the way of accompanying, more sustaining yet sympathetic, simple yet subtle—it would seem impossible to imagine. In brief, it was ideality in accompaniment.

Miss Leonora von Stosch added much pleasure by her violin solos, "Reverie," by Vieuxtemps, and "Rondo," by Scharwenka. She is the happy possessor of that vague, artistic necessity known as temperament; she also exhibits great freedom of bow and has a captivating presence.

The one thing needful to attain to the highest place in art is self-abnegation.

Future appearances in public of either Mr. Arthur Nikisch or Miss von Stosch in concert, or even of Mrs. Nikisch as one of the audience, will always be welcome.

The Kneisel Quartet has made arrangements for three concerts in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, on Wednesday evenings, March 29, April 12 and 26.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will close its home season, April 29. A three weeks' tour of the western cities has been planned, to begin May 1, and include a series of concerts at the Exposition.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 64.

SUNDAY, MARCH 5, 1893.

Symphony Concert—The Durell Opera Season.

No soloist appeared at the 17th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening, the programme given under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction being as follows: Weber, overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms, symphony No. 4 in E minor, opus 98; Riemenschneider, "Todtentanz" for orchestra (first time); Nicolai, overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

Director Nikisch rather had those who have studiously avoided a rehearing of Mr. Brahms' fourth symphony at a disadvantage in this return to the Henschel arrangement of the programme at these concerts. Even the old city reporter, who in this day, after a generation of service in Boston churches, brags that he has "never heard a prayer and never missed a text," would be puzzled to have timed his arrival so as to have avoided a hearing of Mr. Brahms' over elaboration of short musical phrases which he dignifies with the title of symphony.

Mr. Nikisch and his men were very faithful in their efforts to give the work a good performance, and the followers of the composer appeared well satisfied with the results.

The novelty of the evening, "The Dance of Death," proved a very fascinating bit of bizarre writing. It is designed to describe the scene of Goethe's poem, which tells of the experiences of a watchman stationed upon a tower which overlooks a graveyard. The traditional visit to earthly scenes by the inhabitants of the tombs below him and their usual revels occur, the dancers castingaside the habiliments of the grave to gain greater freedom. Thinking to play a practical joke and to send one ghost back to his abiding place in a condition to be troubled with rheumatism, the watchman steals down from the tower and abstracts one pite of grave clothes, whichhe carries back to his point of observation.

As the dancers tire of their revelry they are supposed to return, one by one, to their graves, showing the same indifference to personal property as they had, presumably, while in the flesh after similar enjoyment. Of course, the last ghost left has no clothes, and, spying the watchman in possession of the lost garment, makes an effort to regain it by climbing the tower. Just as he is about to clutch the watchman and his clothes the clock strikes 1, and down he tumbles into his usual resting place.

As abstract music, the composition is full of tuneful ideas, cleverly elaborated and making a most enjoyable impression at a first hearing. As to whether the act of disrobing and the scenes of excitement incidental to the discovery that all the other fellows have gone has been correctly depicted in this "tone poem" is, at least, an open question. The composer has given the ghosts the usual instruments to dance by, and has written some music that set many a foot tapping at the measures as they were played under Mr. Nikisch's baton.

The "Freischutz" overture was given a somewhat dull and dreary performance, but Nicolai's brilliant "Merry Wives" overture had a splendid performance, and sent the audience away full of its tuneful themes.

Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, pianist, is the soloist next Saturday, and the programme will be Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"; Rubinstein's concerto for pianforte, in D minor; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl, and Schumann's symphony No. 3 (Rhenish), in E flat.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch drew out a fashionable audience for their recital at Chickering Hall last Tuesday evening, with the assistance of Miss Lenora Von Stosch. Mrs. Nikisch was a picture of brunette beauty in an exquisite gown of blue bro[cade]. Miss Von Stosch looked [charm]ing in an aesthetic gown of [illegible]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 6, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

It was a rather oddly arranged programme that was given at the concert of Saturday, in which the earnest and the spectral were sandwiched between the romantic and the jovial. It began with the overture to "Der Freischuetz." A great deal of liberty is to be allowed in the reading of a Weber work, for this composer was of the theatre and employed the devices of the stage more freely than other great composers; but there was a tendency to exaggerate these points in the performance, an evident desire to prolong pauses into acute suspense, and to increase the bursts of sound to cyclones of fury. Spite of these shortcomings, and they jarred but little in such a work, the performance was a memorable one. The clarinette theme was most charmingly played; to Weber, in fact, belongs the credit of having discovered the true possibilities of the instrument, and the dark, spectral tone-color of the lower register (the "Chalumeau") is here used to excellent advantage. Although Mozart had given prominence to the clarinette more than 30 years before, he seems never to have grasped the effect of this register; only Mendelssohn, in "Elijah" and in the Scoth Symphony, may be ranked with Weber in the masterly use of the clarinette. Not less striking as a remarkable bit of tone color is the pizzicato A, which follows the horn quartette; it is the most graphic effect ever produced on a single note on the contrabasses. The famous horn quartette (progenitor of hymns innumerable) has been much better given in Boston than it was on this occasion. There was no actual break of tone, but the whole passage was too loud, and altogether lacked the tenderness and romance which should have characterized it.

The placing of a Brahms' symphony in the centre of the programme had the advantage that the audience heard it all; generally, when a symphony by this master ends the programme, the audience file out after one or two movements, believing either that Brahms is too dull to listen to, or that he is too deep for the average comprehension. The symphony received a performance that may be called magnificent. Every musician played as if he loved the work, and the reading, if a trifle too heavy at times, was yet full of power and virility. The writer of this can never forget the remark made by Dr. Hiller shortly before his death, "Who have we today in the symphonic school? Brahms, and Brahms alone"! It is true, development is the keystone of the symphonic construction, and no other living man is such a master of thematic development; no one can present the logic of music as Brahms does. The symphony is the most difficult form to master because two diverse styles of writing are represented in it. Beethoven remains unrivalled in this field because intellectuality and emotion are in such perfect equipoise in his work. Brahms falls short of the great master, chiefly in the fact that with him the intellectual side outweighs the emotional, but how wonderfully this intellect shines forth in the first and last movements! What marvellous treatment the unpromising chief theme receives in the first movement, and with what ease the kaleidoscopic transformations are accomplished! The final variations are worthy of Beethoven: in fact one might imagine that Beethoven had inspired the simple theme which leads so naturally up to grandeur, for the older master frequently used just such devices. The Passacaglia, which is here the subject for variation, is little else than a simple diatonic scale. It is an ancient Spanish dance that is often misunderstood in its modern reproductions; the very name might mislead the composer, for Calle is Spanish for "street," and the word means "running the streets." But the Passacaglia was the most inflated and bombastic dance of the Spanish court, where it was danced by the grandees one or two at a time and in full costume. There is, therefore, nothing of street life to be sought for in the Passacaglia, and the word probably comes from an Italian source; "Passo Gallo"—"The Rooster's Step" might explain it all. The tempo in which this movement was taken calls for commendation; it is often spoiled by being taken too fast. Its performance was most brilliant; the violins were thrillingly effective in their incisive power, and the flute solo, with its Oriental flavor and its drone-bass was remarkably well done.

One may call the second movement the most effective slow movement that Brahms has ever composed. Wonderful new touches are brought out of a very old scale-form; the first eight measures alone are sufficient to stamp the composer as a genius. The 'cellos did some admirable work here, as also did the woodwind.

The third movement, one of the deviations from the scherzo which Brahms has established, is the weakest of the work, yet the performance brought out beauties which I had never perceived before. A spirit of mediæval revelry, such as Wagner has depicted in the prentice life of Nuremberg, seemed to permeate it all, and it was at least exciting. All in all, a great performance.

After this, Herr Riemenschneider told us a ghost story. While it did not thrill the auditor as the dance inspired by Sieur Maccaber, it gave a dash of tamtam, of piccolo, and of other cemetery adjuncts as usually presented in the concert room. In this spectral Soiree Dansunte the participants were rather phlegmatic Teutonic ghosts, and even the energetic one who climbed the tower in pursuit of the party who had robbed the coat-room while the dance was in progress, was tame in comparison with the living skeletons exhibited by Saint-Saens. The overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" was enjoyable—a draught of musical champagne; but one may question the fitness of such a work after a Brahms' symphony. If the object is simply to please, and if the bid is purely for popularity, it is all right; but if the intention is to uplift and educate, to give a true appreciation of the masterworks, then it is all wrong.

Naturally this overture received abundance of applause, and it deserved it, for it was a charming work admirably played; but, for all that, it seemed to the reviewer the right thing in the wrong place.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 5, 1893.

No Soloist at Last Night's Symphony Concert.

There were no soloists introduced at the 17th symphony concert and rehearsal, Mr. Nikisch making up his programme entirely of orchestral numbers. Of the four selections but one was new, Riemenschneider's "Dance of Death," being given for the first time here. Weber's romantic overture to "Der Freischutz," Brahm's symphony No. 4, and Nicolai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" were the other offerings.

Weber's delightful work calls for little comment, the interpretation, as a whole, being admirable. In the beautiful adagio, in which occur the sylvan melodies, the charming themes were most daintily given by the strings and quartet of horns. The incantation music was also effectively played. The impressive finale, with its rushing, ascending passages, was at times indistinct, the full orchestra not following promptly their conductor's baton beat.

The Brahm number was marred by the imperfect tones of the brasses in the closing movement. The solemn and elaborate harmonies of the second part, given first to the wood winds and horns, and later to the strings, were, perhaps, the best portion of the performance.

The Riemenschneider "Dance of Death" is a musical setting of Goethe's ballad in which a watchman sees the corpses in a churchyard sally forth and indulge in a dance, after removing their shrouds.

The watchman steals a garment, and when the dancers return to their graves the skeleton who has been deprived of his habiliments seeks out the watchman, who has climbed to the top of the tower in affright. Just as the skeleton is about to regain his winding-sheet the clock strikes 1 and the spirit falls to the pavement below, shattered to atoms.

The character piece is of an order which may be called "diabolique," and is orchestrated to carry out the ghostly ideas of the story. The opening theme is very pretty and the first of the dance movement is melodious, but the work soon becomes chaotic and weird and is only to be judged by its effect, which certainly is symbolical of an infernal revel. The orchestra evidently achieved the results intended by the composer.

As a contrast to the foregoing number Nicolai's "Merry Wives" overture was most welcome, and the merry, fairy-like composition, a notable example of pure comic opera, seemed particularly enjoyable. The dash and spirit which the orchestra infused into its work was marked, and the audience evinced its pleasure by according this number the most liberal plaudits of the evening.

The programme for the rehearsal and concert, March 10 and 11, will be as follows: Overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; concerto for piano, D minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, E flat. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Every One Anxious to Get a Glimpse at Princess Kaiulani.

"They say that Chinese princess is here."

"You don't say so! Where is she?"

And so on and so forth ran the comments at the Symphony concert last night.

It was quite true. The princess was there, not from China, but the pretty Princess Victoria Kaiulani of Hawaii, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Davies and Miss Davies.

The ladies were all in evening dresses of light tint, the princess wearing a charming gown of cream and gold, and as the party occupied seats upon the floor of the hall, they were easily recognizable from all parts of the house.

Their opera wraps, that of the princess being of ophelia cloth, made them comparatively inconspicuous as they entered, and as they arrived early there was no showing of anything unusual happening so far as the gathering audience was concerned.

But it soon got noised about that "the princess" or "a princess somebody," or "some dignitary" was in the hall, and between the numbers the ushers were importuned by those in back seats to tell just who she was and where she was.

The ignorance as to the nationality of the distinguished young visitor was amusing.

At the close of the concert people stood on the seats to see her and crowded the corridors until the throng was next to impassable.

"Guess Miss Glenborn 'll think we're an unmannerly set," said one.

"Royalty 's used to being stared at," said another.

"And isn't she pretty?" said everybody who got a peep at her.

Meantime the strangers in our midst slowly made their way to their carriage, the princess looking as happy as she had done throughout the programme, which she seemed much to enjoy.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Freitag, 3. März 1893.

Das berühmte Kneisel-Quartett von Boston wird am „Donnerstag den 9. März Nachmittags um 3 Uhr in dem New Century Drawing Room ein weiteres Kammer-Konzert geben. Zum Vortrag gelangen das E Dur Quartett von Dvorak, das Andante aus dem D Dur Quartett von Tschaikowsky und das A Dur Quartett von Schumann. Reservirte Sitze zum Preise von $1.50 sind schon jetzt bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 5, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

The seventeenth symphony concert last evening had a programme against which no serious objections could be urged. It was no such programme as either Conductor Nikisch or the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra might have chosen for their own edification. For this reason it was certainly none the less a popular programme. It contained two well worn yet ever acceptable overtures, "Der Freischuetz," and "The Merry Wives of Windsor;" also Brahms' most easily intelligible symphony No. 4, in E minor; and for a novelty the Todtentanz, by Georg Riemenschneider.

In a small book entitled "Der Freischutz Buch by Frederic Kind, who was von Weber's librettist, it is stated, that at its first performance, in Paris in 1824, "Der Freischutz" was hissed—a singular exception to the popularity of an opera that in this respect has probably never been surpassed either before or since Weber's time. It is even recorded that its music once became, so familir in London, and among all classes of people that a gentleman advertising for a servant conspiculously stipulated that no applicant would be accepted who could whistle its airs.

It is bearly possible that "Der Freischutz" was exceptionally unpopular in Paris owing to the revolutionary spirit that Weber exhibited towards the art works of his immediate predecessors and contemporaries, whose overtures were nearly all independent compositions of themselves; the Weberian form of overture being a very complete epitome of the opera which follows, especially the overtures to "Oberon," "Euryanthe" and "Der Freischutz." In the performance last evening the ever delightful horn passage with which the overture begins was given with a slovenly untunefulness and inartistic apathy that were well nigh intolerable. The incantation music, Agathe's moonlight scene, which contains perhaps, the most familiar theme of the opera and the episodes connected with the action of Max and Casper, were for the most part performed in a manner so mediocre, that any member of the old Harvard Musical Association Orchestra might consistently have blushed for shame to have participated in such a performance; one that had indeed but a single noteworthy precedent, and that, when the overture was performed under Conductor Nikisch in Symphony concert series of two years ago.

Brahms fourth symphony in E minor will generally be regarded as containing by far the most genial and melodious specimens of symphonic material that have yet appeared from his pen. Throughout the work he is conspicuous in making the song form his central point, and with a success that he has certainly not surpassed if equalled in any other of his concerted works. Especially in the allegro non-troppo movements may be founnd an abundance of just such melody as has its basis, not in the profound scholastic's mind, but in the earnest, sympathetic feeling of the genius-born musician. Here the last of the three great "B's" is quite unlike himself in permitting the soul of his symphony to mold its own body, and the more technical laws of his art are nobly subordinated to the Supreme will. As the late Professor Tyndall would say, there is "a self-renunciation which has something noble in it."

This symphony more than almost any other work, composed since Beethoven's time, magnificently transcends the labored and pedagogic pursuit of music as a science, so called, and appears as the worthiest application of that genuine science that is invariably congenial to the exercise of the imagination and a love of the beautiful. Of what other symphony of Brahms can the same be said? No two votaries of musical art have so widely differed as Koestlin in theory, and Brahms, in practice; but with Brahms' opus 98 we find a "rich, expressive and subjective state of feeling," etc., that fairly "outkoestlins" Koestlin. Possibly it may seem that the andante is somewhat fantastic—too weirdly and too mournfully conceived, but as a real tone poem of human sorrow, as a sad and painful yearning it has few equals outside the ever matchless Beethoven andantes. The sherzo is full of gay satiric humor, which now and then borders on the grotesque. It is richly colored and replete with charming changes. The finale has as its worthiest characteristic a short theme with variations, in which the intellectual side of the theme and its inherent sentiment becomes the predominating motive of each theme.

It is a pleasure to record that the symphony was performed in the orchestra's noblest manner. It was ably interpreted by Conductor Nikisch, and the tone contrasts throughout were excellently observed.

The Todtentanz, by Riemenschneider, is a weakly sensational specimen of programme music in its lowest estate. Both the Todtentanz and the well known overture by Nicolai were praiseworthily rendered.

RECITAL BY MR. AND MRS. NIKISCH.

The recital given by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch in Chickering Hall, Tuesday evening, had an excellent attendance. Miss Leonora von Stosch, a young violinist, not wholly unknown in this vicinity, assisted Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch.

Preliminary to a direct reference to Mrs. Nikisch's singing at this concert we must call attention to the assertion of a contemporary, that the personally esteemed singer interpreted her admiral repertoire at the disadvantage of her "usual voeal means." Our contemporary places this singer's art (?) upon a level that is altogether too low to incite criticism. Mrs. Nikisch is certainly entitled to honest, intelligent and discriminating attention, whereas by not appearing even at the advantage of "her usual vocal means," her singing could justly be ingnored. From any such would-be friendly criticism as Mrs. Nikisch has received from our contemporary she should be delivered. The "usual vocal (?) means" of her singing are all too well known by intelligent musicians in this vicinity, not to make any discount of her appearing at her best, seem unnecessarily impolite and unkind.

Fortunately, however, the fact will not be disputed by the real friends of Mrs. Nikisch, neither by impartial musicians, that upon no previous occasion has the esteemed lady appeared before a Boston public in better voice or with more adequate "vocal means" than at the concert where our contemporary professes to have heard her at such an uncharacteristic disadvantage.

It is nevertheless true that Mrs. Nikisch's "vocal means" were very poor indeed at the concert in question. And in connnection with this verdict, there can be nothing new nor strange. Our contemporary in a spirit of mistaken charity has simply provoked the comment that Mrs. Nikisch has not yet proven herself in this city to be sufficiently well endowed with "vocal means" to appear in public as an artistic singer. Not once on Tuesday evening did Mrs. Nikisch sing straightforwardly to the key. Not a single song of her entire repertoire was granted a true cantable; nor at any time could there be discovered any such focus to her tone-production, as might have produced a round, full sympathetic and musical tone. All the songs of her repertoire were admirably memorized and her sense of musical rhythm throughout was excellent; but a singing artist, Mrs. Nikisch unfortunately is not; neither will she be so rated by any conscientious, well schooled and impartial vocal teacher or musician. Mr. Nikisch's pianoforte accompaniments, save that at times when the he played with a somewhat ill-tempered sense of passion that, nevertheless, had an altogether obscuring and hence improving effect upon the attending singing were excellent. The repertoire for the evening included songs by Schubert, Franz, Chopin, Busoni, Brahms, Paderewski, Hinrichs, Grieg, Schumann and Henberger. Miss von Stosch played a reverie by Vienxtemps and a "rondo" by Scharwenka. Miss von Stosch is bountifully endowed with an artistic temperament and has been finely schooled.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Concert Master Kneisel arranged a notably attractive ordre du soir for the chamber concert by his quartet in Chickering Hall Monday evening. The Beethoven quartet in A major, op. 18, came first. The work has never attained any special preference among local dilettantti. It is filled throughout with the spirit of Haydn, the moments being simply transient when one can recognize in it the later Beethoven; yet it is extremely endowed with passages of great beauty. It has also a clearness, delicate and noble simplicity, as well as symmetry in each of its movements which impress themselves on the listener even before he has become especially interested. It was given an interpretation so full of ...th and sympathy that addi...

[116]

INCOMPLETE

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4,

THE NIKISCH RECITAL.

A large, fashionable and demonstrative audience greeted Mrs. Nikisch in Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening. The program was elaborately varied with songs by Schubert, Franz, Chopin, Busoni, Brahms, Paderewski, Heinrichs, Grieg, Schumann and Henberger.

It would be gratifying to record any improvement in the singing of Mrs. Nikisch since her last public appearance here, but in spite of a charming personality and a naturally pleasing vocal aptitude, the singer has little upon which to base her claim as an artist.

The first requisite, a voice, is her inherent possession; furthermore, she is not without temperament, but anything like a true legato she has not. Her interpretations are graceful and indicative of good musical talent, rather than careful study.

The Brahms songs were the least satisfactory. "Unter den Linden," by Busoni, was one of the most pleasing numbers on the program.

Though Mr. Nikisch's position on the program was one not calculated for self-glory, yet it can be truly said that it was the artistic event of the evening. Anything in the way of accompanying, more sustaining yet sympathetic, simple yet subtle—it would seem impossible to imagine. In brief, it was ideality in accompaniment.

Miss Leonora von Stosch added much pleasure by her violin solos, "Reverie," by Vieuxtemps, and "Rondo," by Scharwenka. She is the happy possessor of that vague, artistic necessity known as temperament; she also exhibits great freedom of bow and has a captivating presence.

The one thing needful to attain to the highest place in art is self-abnegation.

Future appearances in public of either Mr. Arthur Nikisch or Miss von Stosch in concert, or even of Mrs. Nikisch as one of the audience, will always be welcome.

The Kneisel Quartet has made arrangements for three concerts in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, on Wednesday evenings, March 29, April 12 and 26.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will close its home season, April 29. A three weeks' tour of the western cities has been planned, to begin May 1, and include a series of concerts at the Exposition.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 64.

SUNDAY, MARCH 5, 1893.

Symphony Concert—The Durell Opera Season.

No soloist appeared at the 17th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening, the programme given under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction being as follows: Weber, overture to "Der Freischutz"; Brahms, symphony No. 4 in E minor, opus 98; Riemenschneider, "Todtentanz" for orchestra (first time); Nicolai, overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

Director Nikisch rather had those who have studiously avoided a rehearing of Mr. Brahms' fourth symphony at a disadvantage in this return to the Henschel arrangement of the programme at these concerts. Even the old city reporter, who in this day, after a generation of service in Boston churches, brags that he has "never heard a prayer and never missed a text," would be puzzled to have timed his arrival so as to have avoided a hearing of Mr. Brahms' over elaboration of short musical phrases which he dignifies with the title of symphony.

Mr. Nikisch and his men were very faithful in their efforts to give the work a good performance, and the followers of the composer appeared well satisfied with the results.

The novelty of the evening, "The Dance of Death," proved a very fascinating bit of bizarre writing. It is designed to describe the scene of Goethe's poem, which tells of the experiences of a watchman stationed upon a tower which overlooks a graveyard. The traditional visit to earthly scenes by the inhabitants of the tombs below him and their usual revels occur, the dancery castingaside the habiliments of the grave to gain greater freedom. Thinking to play a practical joke and to send one ghost back to his abiding place in a condition to be troubled with rheumatism, the watchman steals down from the tower and abstracts one pite of grave clothes, whichhe carries back to his point of observation.

As the dancers tire of their revelry they are supposed to return, one by one, to their graves, showing the same indifference to personal property as they had, presumably, while in the flesh after similar enjoyment. Of course, the last ghost left has no clothes, and, spying the watchman in possession of the lost garment, makes an effort to regain it by climbing the tower. Just as he is about to clutch the watchman and his clothes the clock strikes 1, and down he tumbles into his usual resting place.

As abstract music, the composition is full of tuneful ideas, cleverly elaborated and making a most enjoyable impression at a first hearing. As to whether the act of disrobing and the scenes of excitement incidental to the discovery that all the other fellows have gone has been correctly depicted in this "tone poem" is, at least, an open question. The composer has given the ghosts the usual instruments to dance by, and has written some music that set many a foot tapping at the measures as they were played under Mr. Nikisch's baton.

The "Freischutz" overture was given a somewhat dull and dreary performance, but Nicolai's brilliant "Merry Wives" overture had a splendid performance, and sent the audience away full of its tuneful themes.

Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, pianist, is the soloist next Saturday, and the programme will be Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"; Rubinstein's concerto for pianforte, in D minor; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl, and Schumann's symphony No. 3 (Rhenish), in E flat.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch drew out a fashionable audience for their recital at Chickering Hall last Tuesday evening, with the assistance of Miss Lenora Von Stosch. Mrs. Nikisch was a picture of brunette beauty in an exquisite gown of blue brocaded silk, and Miss Von Stosch looked charming in an effective æsthetic gown of

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 6, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

It was a rather oddly arranged programme that was given at the concert of Saturday, in which the earnest and the spectral were sandwiched between the romantic and the jovial. It began with the overture to "Der Freischuetz." A great deal of liberty is to be allowed in the reading of a Weber work, for this composer was of the theatre and employed the devices of the stage more freely than other great composers; but there was a tendency to exaggerate these points in the performance, an evident desire to prolong pauses into acute suspense, and to increase the bursts of sound to cyclones of fury. Spite of these shortcomings, and they jarred but little in such a work, the performance was a memorable one. The clarinette theme was most charmingly played; to Weber, in fact, belongs the credit of having discovered the true possibilities of the instrument, and the dark, spectral tone-color of the lower register (the "Chalumeau") is here used to excellent advantage. Although Mozart had given prominence to the clarinette more than 30 years before, he seems never to have grasped the effect of this register; only Mendelssohn, in "Elijah" and in the Scoth Symphony, may be ranked with Weber in the masterly use of the clarinette. Not less striking as a remarkable bit of tone color is the pizzicato A, which follows the horn quartette; it is the most graphic effect ever produced on a single note on the contrabasses. The famous horn quartette (progenitor of hymns innumerable) has been much better given in Boston than it was on this occasion. There was no actual break of tone, but the whole passage was too loud, and altogether lacked the tenderness and romance which should have characterized it.

The placing of a Brahms' symphony in the centre of the programme had the advantage that the audience heard it all; generally, when a symphony by this master ends the programme, the audience file out after one or two movements, believing either that Brahms is too dull to listen to, or that he is too deep for the average comprehension. The symphony received a performance that may be called magnificent. Every musician played as if he loved the work, and the reading, if a trifle too heavy at times, was yet full of power and virility. The writer of this can never forget the remark made by Dr. Hiller shortly before his death, "Who have we today in the symphonic school? Brahms, and Brahms alone"! It is true, development is the keystone of the symphonic construction, and no other living man is such a master of thematic development; no one can present the logic of music as Brahms does. The symphony is the most difficult form to master because two diverse styles of writing are represented in it. Beethoven remains unrivalled in this field because intellectuality and emotion are in such perfect equipoise in his work. Brahms falls short of the great master, chiefly in the fact that with him the intellectual side outweighs the emotional, but how wonderfully this intellect shines forth in the first and last movements! What marvellous treatment the unpromising chief theme receives in the first movement, and with what ease the kaleidoscopic transformations are accomplished! The final variations are worthy of Beethoven: in fact one might imagine that Beethoven had inspired the simple theme which leads so naturally up to grandeur, for the older master frequently used just such devices. The Passacaglia, which is here the subject for variation, is little else than a simple diatonic scale. It is an ancient Spanish dance that is often misunderstood in its modern reproductions; the very name might mislead the composer, for Calle is Spanish for "street," and the word means "running the streets." But the Passacaglia was the most inflated and bombastic dance of the Spanish court, where it was danced by the grandees one or two at a time and in full costume. There is, therefore, nothing of street life to be sought for in the Passacaglia, and the word probably comes from an Italian source; "Passo Gallo"—"The Rooster's Step" might explain it all. The tempo in which this movement was taken calls for commendation; it is often spoiled by being taken too fast. Its performance was most brilliant; the violins were thrillingly effective in their incisive power, and the flute solo, with its Oriental flavor and its drone-bass was remarkably well done.

One may call the second movement the most effective slow movement that Brahms has ever composed. Wonderful new touches are brought out of a very old scale-form; the first eight measures alone are sufficient to stamp the composer as a genius. The 'cellos did some admirable work here, as also did the woodwind.

The third movement, one of the deviations from the scherzo which Brahms has established, is the weakest of the work, yet the performance brought out beauties which I had never perceived before. A spirit of mediæval revelry, such as Wagner has depicted in the prentice life of Nuremberg, seemed to permeate it all, and it was at least exciting. All in all, a great performance.

After this, Herr Riemenschneider told us a ghost story. While it did not thrill the auditor as the dance inspired by Sieur Maccaber, it gave a dash of tamtam, of piccolo, and of other cemetery adjuncts as usually presented in the concert room. In this spectral Soiree Dansante the participants were rather phlegmatic Teutonic ghosts, and even the energetic one who climbed the tower in pursuit of the party who had robbed the coat-room while the dance was in progress, was tame in comparison with the living skeletons exhibited by Saint-Saens. The overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" was enjoyable—a draught of musical champagne; but one may question the fitness of such a work after a Brahms' symphony. If the object is simply to please, and if the bid is purely for popularity, it is all right; but if the intention is to uplift and educate, to give a true appreciation of the masterworks, then it is all wrong.

Naturally this overture received abundance of applause, and it deserved it, for it was a charming work admirably played; but, for all that, it seemed to the reviewer the right thing in the wrong place.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 5, 1893.

No Soloist at Last Night's Symphony Concert.

There were no soloists introduced at the 17th symphony concert and rehearsal, Mr. Nikisch making up his programme entirely of orchestral numbers. Of the four selections but one was new, Riemenschneider's "Dance of Death," being given for the first time here. Weber's romantic overture to "Der Freischutz," Brahm's symphony No. 4, and Nicolai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" were the other offerings.

Weber's delightful work calls for little comment, the interpretation, as a whole, being admirable. In the beautiful adagio, in which occur the sylvan melodies, the charming themes were most daintily given by the strings and quartet of horns. The Incantation music was also effectively played. The impressive finale, with its rushing, ascending passages, was at times indistinct, the full orchestra not following promptly their conductor's baton beat.

The Brahm number was marred by the imperfect tones of the brasses in the closing movement. The solemn and elaborate harmonies of the second part, given first to the wood winds and horns, and later to the strings, were, perhaps, the best portion of the performance.

The Riemenschneider "Dance of Death" is a musical setting of Goethe's ballad in which a watchman sees the corpses in a churchyard sally forth and indulge in a dance, after removing their shrouds.

The watchman steals a garment, and when the dancers return to their graves the skeleton who has been deprived of his habiliments seeks out the watchman, who has climbed to the top of the tower in affright. Just as the skeleton is about to regain his winding-sheet the clock strikes 1 and the spirit falls to the pavement below, shattered to atoms.

The character piece is of an order which may be called "diabolique," and is orchestrated to carry out the ghostly ideas of the story. The opening theme is very pretty and the first of the dance movement is melodious, but the work soon becomes chaotic and weird and is only to be judged by its effect, which certainly is symbolical of an infernal revel. The orchestra evidently achieved the results intended by the composer.

As a contrast to the foregoing number Nicolai's "Merry Wives" overture was most welcome, and the merry, fairy-like composition, a notable example of pure comic opera, seemed particularly enjoyable. The dash and spirit which the orchestra infused into its work was marked, and the audience evinced its pleasure by according this number the most liberal plaudits of the evening.

The programme for the rehearsal and concert, March 10 and 11, will be as follows: Overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; concerto for piano, D minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, E flat. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Every One Anxious to Get a Glimpse at Princess Kaiulani.

"They say that Chinese princess is here."

"You don't say so! Where is she?"

And so on and so forth ran the comments at the Symphony concert last night.

It was quite true. The princess was there, not from China, but the pretty Princess Victoria Kaiulani of Hawaii, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Davies and Miss Davies.

The ladies were all in evening dresses of light tint, the princess wearing a charming gown of cream and gold, and as the party occupied seats upon the floor of the hall, they were easily recognizable from all parts of the house.

Their opera wraps, that of the princess being of ophelia cloth, made them comparatively inconspicuous as they entered, and as they arrived early there was no showing of anything unusual happening so far as the gathering audience was concerned.

But it soon got noised about that "the princess" or "a princess somebody," or "some dignitary" was in the hall, and between the numbers the ushers were importuned by those in back seats to tell just who she was and where she was.

The ignorance as to the nationality of the distinguished young visitor was amusing.

At the close of the concert people stood on the seats to see her and crowded the corridors until the throng was next to impassable.

"Guess Miss Glenhorn 'll think we're an unmannerly set," said one.

"Royalty 's used to being stared at," said another.

"And isn't she pretty?" said everybody who got a peep at her.

Meantime the strangers in our midst slowly made their way to their carriage, the princess looking as happy as she had done throughout the programme, which she seemed much to enjoy.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Freitag, 3. März 1893.

Das berühmte Kneisel-Quartett von Boston wird am „Donnerstag den 9. März Nachmittags um 3 Uhr in dem New Century Drawing Room ein weiteres Kammer-Konzert geben. Zum Vortrag gelangen das E Dur Quartett von Dvorak, das Andante aus dem D Dur Quartett von Tschaikowsky und das A Dur Quartett von Schumann. Reservirte Sitze zum Preise von $1.50 sind schon jetzt bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str. zu haben.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 5, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

The seventeenth symphony concert last evening had a programme against which no serious objections could be urged. It was no such programme as either Conductor Nikisch or the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra might have chosen for their own edification. For this reason it was certainly none the less a popular programme. It contained two well worn yet ever acceptable overtures, "Der Freischuetz," and "The Merry Wives of Windsor;" also Brahms' most easily intelligible symphony No. 4, in E minor; and for a novelty the Todtentanz, by Georg Riemenschneider.

In a small book entitled "Der Freischutz Buch by Frederic Kind, who was von Weber's libretist, it is stated, that at its first performance, in Paris in 1824, "Der Freischutz" was hissed—a singular exception to the popularity of an opera that in this respect has probably never been surpassed either before or since Weber's time. It is even recorded that its music once became, so familir in London, and among all classes of people that a gentleman advertising for a servant conspiculously stipulated that no applicant would be accepted who could whistle its airs.

It is bearly possible that "Der Freischutz" was exceptionally unpopular in Paris owing to the revolutionary spirit that Weber exhibited towards the art works of his immediate predecesors and contemporaries, whose overtures were nearly all independent compositions of themselves; the Weberian form of overture being a very complete epitome of the opera which follows, especially the overtures to "Oberon," "Euryanthe" and "Der Freischutz." In the performance last evening the ever delightful horn passage with which the overture begins was given with a slovenly untunefulness and inartistic apathy that were well nigh intolerable. The incantation music, Agathe's moonlight scene, which contains perhaps, the most familiar theme of the opera and the episodes connected with the action of Max and Casper, were for the most part performed in a manner so mediocre, that any member of the old Harvard Musical Association Orchestra might consistently have blushed for shame to have participated in such a performance; one that had indeed but a single noteworthy precedent, and that, when the overture was performed under Conductor Nikisch in Symphony concert series of two years ago.

Brahms fourth symphony in E minor will generally be regarded as containing by far the most genial and melodious specimens of symphonic material that have yet appeared from his pen. Throughout the work he is conspicuous in making the song form his central point, and with a success that he has certainly not surpassed if equalled in any other of his concerted works. Especially in the allegro non-troppo movements may be founnd an abundance of just such melody as has its basis, not in the profound scholastic's mind, but in the earnest, sympathetic feeling of the genius-born musician. Here the last of the three great "B's" is quite unlike himself in permitting the soul of his symphony to mold its own body, and the more technical laws of his art are nobly subordinated to the Supreme will. As the late Professor Tyndall would say, there is "a self-renunciation which has something noble in it."

This symphony more than almost any other work, composed since Beethoven's time, magnificently transcends the labored and pedagogic pursuit of music as a science, so called, and appears as the worthiest application of that genuine science that is invariably congenial to the exercise of the imagination and a love of the beautiful. Of what other symphony of Brahms can the same be said? No two votaries of musical art have so widely differed as Koestlin in theory, and Brahms, in practice; but with Brahms' opus 98 we find a "rich, expressive and subjective state of feeling," etc., that fairly "outkoestlins" Koestlin. Possibly it may seem that the andante is somewhat fantastic—too weirdly and too mournfully conceived, but as a real tone poem of human sorrow, as a sad and painful yearning it has few equals outside the ever matchless Beethoven andantes. The sherzo is full of gay satiric humor, which now and then borders on the grotesque. It is richly colored and replete with charming changes. The finale has as its worthiest characteristic a short theme with variations, in which the intellectual side of the theme and its inherent sentiment becomes the predominating motive of each theme.

It is a pleasure to record that the symphony was performed in the orchestra's noblest manner. It was ably interpreted by Conductor Nikisch, and the tone contrasts throughout were excellently observed.

The Todtentanz, by Riemenschneider, is a weakly sensational specimen of programme music in its lowest estate. Both the Todtentanz and the well known overture by Nicolai were prasiseworthily rendered.

RECITAL BY MR. AND MRS. NIKISCH.

The recital given by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch in Chickering Hall, Tuesday evening, had an excellent attendance. Miss Leonora von Stosch, a young violinist, not wholly unknown in this vicinity, assisted Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch.

Preliminary to a direct reference to Mrs. Nikisch's singing at this concert we must call attention to the assertion of a contemporary, that the personally esteemed singer interpreted her admiral repertoire at the disadvantage of her "usual vocal means." Our contemporary places this singer's art (?) upon a level that is altogether too low to incite criticism. Mrs. Nikisch is certainly entitled to honest, intelligent and discriminating attention, whereas by not appearing even at the advantage of "her usual vocal means," her singing could justly be ingnored. From any such would-be friendly criticism as Mrs. Nikisch has received from our contemporary she should be delivered. The "usual vocal (?) means" of her singing are all too well known by intelligent musicians in this vicinity, not to make any discount of her appearing at her best, seem unnecessarily impolite and unkind.

Fortunately, however, the fact will not be disputed by the real friends of Mrs. Nikisch, neither by impartial musicians, that upon no previous occasion has the esteemed lady appeared before a Boston public in better voice or with more adequate "vocal means" than at the concert where our contemporary professes to have heard her at such an uncharacteristic disadvantage.

It is nevertheless true that Mrs. Nikisch's "vocal means" were very poor indeed at the concert in question. And in connection with this verdict, there can be nothing new nor strange. Our contemporary in a spirit of mistaken charity has simply provoked the comment that Mrs. Nikisch has not yet proven herself in this city to be sufficiently well endowed with "vocal means" to appear in public as an artistic singer. Not once on Tuesday evening did Mrs. Nikisch sing straightforwardly to the key. Not a single song of her entire repertoire was granted a true cantable; nor at any time could there be discovered any such focus to her tone-production, as might have produced a round, full sympathetic and musical tone. All the songs of her repertoire were admirably memorized and her sense of musical rhythm throughout was excellent; but a singing artist, Mrs. Nikisch unfortunately is not; neither will she be so rated by any conscientious, well schooled and impartial vocal teacher or musician. Mr. Nikisch's pianoforte accompaniments, save that at times when the he played with a somewhat ill-tempered sense of passion that, nevertheless, had an altogether obscuring and hence improving effect upon the attending singing were excellent. The repertoire for the evening included songs by Schubert, Franz, Chopin, Busoni, Brahms, Paderewski, Hinrichs, Grieg, Schumann and Henberger. Miss von Stosch played a reverie by Vienxtemps and a "rondo" by Scharwenka. Miss von Stosch is bountifully endowed with an artistic temperament and has been finely schooled.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Concert Master Kneisel arranged a notably attractive ordre du soir for the chamber concert by his quartet in Chickering Hall Monday evening. The Beethoven quartet in A major, op. 18, came first. The work has never attained any special preference among local diletantti. It is filled throughout with the spirit of Haydn, the moments being simply transient when one can recognize in it the later Beethoven; yet it is extremely endowed with passages of great beauty. It has also a clearness, delicate and noble simplicity, as well as symmetry in each of its movements which impress themselves on the listener even before he has become especially interested. It was given an interpretation so full of ...th and sympathy that addi...

[116]

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, MARCH 6, 1893.

The Seventeenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
Concerto No. 4, in D minor.....Brahms
Overture, "Fodentanz" (first time).....Riemenschneider
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai

Louis Ehrlert, in an article, "The Concert System of Berlin," wrote in this manner: "For more than 25 years the same old master-works have been accepted and listened to, reproduced in the same old monotonous manner, and with the same contracted and affected conception of their meaning. Instead of opening the doors frequently, and on exceptional occasions only to the important productions of contemporary composers, it were a better plan to keep accounts with many of the departed masters. There is no longer a necessity annually to revive Weber's overtures, which have been heard hundreds of times; the day has come in which to limit them to their proper places before their respective operas."

Weber's appear annually in Boston Weber's overtures, but under the present reign they are not always "reproduced in the same old monotonous manner." The adagio was taken at so slow a pace Saturday evening that the movement was adagiosissimo. The rhythm, therefore, fell to the ground, and the horn quartette suffered. There was exaggeration in the slackening of the pace, where the "Zamiel and Max motives" occur for the last time, just before the great crash in C major.

In the measures that follow the Wagnerian theory was observed: In the thirteenth measure the mark Sforzato was interpreted as diminuendo, and the broad melody in C major was begun in sentimental fashion, not in a triumphant spirit. With these exceptions, the performance was excellent, often intensely dramatic.

***

The overture to "Der Frieschuetz" was first played in 1821. Nicolai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" was first played in its proper place in 1849, although as a concert number it may have been given at the farewell concert of the composer in Vienna (1847), for several instrumental numbers from the then unfinished opera were included in the programme. The latter overture seems to-day the older work. Nevertheless it was welcome. It is to be hoped that light overtures by Auber, and others of the French school, may also find a place in Music Hall.

These overtures abound in sparkling melody, piquant harmony; and, as a rule, the instrumentation is a delight to the hearer and a lesson to the student.

***

Georg Riemenschneider was unknown to our audiences, although he is about 45 years old, the composer of orchestral pieces (such as "Donna Diana," "A Night in July," a "Festival Prelude"), and the writer of an opera, "The Ice Maiden," which has never, I believe, been heard in public. The "Dance of the Dead" was his introduction to this city.

Mr. Bayes in "The Rehearsal" prepared himself for literary work in this ingenious manner: "If I am to write familiar things, as sonnets to Armida, and the like, I make use of stew'd prunes only: but when I have a grand design in hand, I even take physic, and let blood; for, when you would have pure swiftness of thought and fiery flights of fancy, you must have a care of the pensive part. In fine, you must purge the stomach."

Ernst Theodor Amadeus Hoffmann recommended Rhine wines to him that would write a mass; Burgundy to the composer of a grand opera; champagne to the writer of a comic opera; a fiery Italian wine to the author of passionate canzonets, and arrack punch to the man who thought of a second "Don Giovanni."

Fuseli ate raw pork that he might arouse his imagination.

Mr. Riemenschneider seems to have prepared himself for his task by indulging in copious draughts of flaxseed tea.

In illustration of a wild and grotesque poem by Goethe, Riemenschneider wrote music that is devoid of character. He nailed his episodes together, and at times the nails appear. He started out with conventional commonplaces, and it suddenly occurred to him that his music was without diablerie. He then bethought him of pulsatile instruments and a piccolo for spectral purposes. But beat and blow as he would, the ghosts did not obey his incantation. His dance-tune was neither mocking in its sensuousness, nor fantastic in its melody or rhythm. The thoughts were neither horrible nor grotesque, and the expression was prosaic.

However this piece by Riemenschneider serves one useful purpose; it recalls, in contrast, that masterpiece of Saint-Saens, the "Danse Macabre."

"Zig and zig and zag, Death keeps time,
Beating on a tomb with his heel;
Death plays at midnight a dance-tune,
Zig and zig and zag, on his fiddle."

***

The symphony of Brahms, in which masterly workmanship is more apparent than inspiration, was given with breadth and intensity.

***

The programme of the rehearsal and concert of this week is as follows: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; concerto for piano-forte, D minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner, and Schumann's Symphony No. 3 (Rhenish), E flat. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

Object of Much Attention at Symphony Concert.

The Party to Leave Boston Tuesday.

Princess Kaiulani and her party went to church three times yesterday, each occasion to a different house of worship. Otherwise they spent a quiet Sunday at the Brunswick. In the morning, all being good church people, they attended St. Paul's, hearing Dr. Lindsay preach and remaining to the communion service. At 4 o'clock they went to Trinity, and heard Dr. Donald's sermon. In the evening the Park Street Church was the objective point, and Mr. Lansing's good Congregationalism edified their listening ears.

Altogether it was a pretty good, conscientious round of duty, and the Princess and the younger ladies of the party did not attempt much else, aside from a "constitutional" along Boylston street in the afternoon. Mr. and Mrs. Davies made a call just before tea time, but the others remained in their apartments.

Music Hath Charms.

During the latter part of the evening they all gathered together and sang hymns with great zest and delight. There are several good singers in the party. The Princess herself is possessor of a liquid soprano, very sweet and of great power, which has been carefully trained. She is fond of using it, too. Mrs. Davies, who is also musical, and her husband the tenor, Mr. Davies as the tenor always is called for a long while the

Every [illegible] knows and recognizes the tall, dark girl who hurriedly flits up and down the passages and hastens to render her service. When she goes in to dinner she is the object of some solicitude on the part of the other guests of the hotel, but she does not mind that. It is one of the penalties of royalty to be conspicuous. Her toilets have been simple, even to severity. Kaiulani ("Lani," as they familiarly call her), looks like a dignified young school girl, rather than the heir presumptive to a throne. She has usually worn glasses to protect her eyes from the unaccustomed glare of the snow.

At the several churches the party attracted much attention, and were the object of a more or less curious scrutiny on the part of their neighbors.

Saturday was such an unpleasant day that the Princess was unable to enjoy the contemplated sleigh ride, much to her disappointment. If this morning be fair the royal equipage will certainly be seen upon the boulevards. During the afternoon a number of people called or left cards, among them Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Ames.

At the Symphony Concert.

In the large audience which attended the Symphony concert at Music Hall on Saturday night were included Mr. and Mrs. Davies, Princess Kaiulani and Miss Davies. Nearly everyone was on the lookout for them, and their seats were the cynosure of hundreds of curious eyes. People in the balconies leveled their opera glasses at the distinguished group, and surveyed them intently, while those in the immediate proximity paid much more attention to their royal neighbor than to the efforts of Herr Nikisch's musicians. The ushers were nearly driven distracted pointing "her" out, and when the concert was over people stood up in the chairs and peered over one another's shoulders in the effort to obtain so much as a glimpse of Her Highness.

Princess Kaiulani wore a dress of black satin, something which the ladies present regarded as rather unusual for a young girl. Her wrap of heavy red cloth was covered with a profusion of most elegant gold embroidery. Mrs. Davies wore a superb evening gown of cream and gold. Her daughter's attire was simple and tasty.

On leaving the hall they had to make their way through to the Winter street entrance, and even Mr. Davies's decided avoirdupois was not equal to the task of forcing a passage through the dense throng which collected about them. They had to drift with the current, as it were. It seemed as though every person present were struggling to get a look at a genuine Princess, and to judge from the time it took to reach the carriage nearly all must have achieved the object of their heart's desire. It was not an impolite crowd, but its curiosity was aroused and had to be satisfied. It took 10 minutes for the Princess and her escort to traverse the short journey indicated.

An Elaborate Gown.

The Princess is so well pleased with America that she is having made an evening gown which she will wear while in Washington. The Princess is very fond of blue; it is her preference above all other colors; accordingly her choice was a handsome satin brocade of a very light shade of blue, with a pattern in garland effect of very small leaves and flowers of turquoise blue. There was hardly enough life in the pale blue to suit the dark skin, and, after trials of different combinations, it was decided to use satin ribbon of turquoise, very much to the Princess's satisfaction.

The skirt is very wide and is lined throughout with the lightest weight crinoline, such as has long been used in skirts and is not an outcome of the hoopskirt fad. But it was enough to alarm the little lady and she wished it taken out, as she would in no way recognize the crinoline or the hoop skirt, and she didn't even want her gown to "stick out." She was finally pursuaded, however, that it was not meant for that purpose, but was merely a lining that gave no appreciable weight to the skirt, and she consented to allow it to remain.

Ribbon about an inch and a half in width, quilted in the old-fashioned style, trims the skirt, five rows being used set far apart, so that the trimming is about two-thirds of the skirt in depth. The waist is made with the silk drawn quite full from the shoulders into a broad belt of turquoise ribbon. The Princess expressed a desire to have a decidedly short wasted effect. She admires the Empire and Louis XV. styles. The sleeves are very large puffs and a bertha of very rich point applique trims about the neck, which is cut round and very slightly decollete.

The programme to-day, so far as arranged, is to ride in the morning, return several calls in the early afternoon, and from 4 o'clock to 6 receive visitors. In the evening one of the theatres will probably be visited.

The party goes to Washington Tuesday night, instead of Tuesday morning, as was originally intended.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892--93.

CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

(ONLY APPEARANCE THIS SEASON.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, MARCH 6TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

AMBROISE THOMAS. OVERTURE. "Mignon."

ANTON RUBINSTEIN. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in D minor, No. 4, op. 70.
Moderato.—Moderato assai.—Allegro assai.

FRANZ SCHUBERT. UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor.
Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.

AMBROISE THOMAS. OPHELIA'S DYING SCENE, from "Hamlet."

GEORGE F. HANDEL. LARGO.
Solo Violin, MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

RICHARD WAGNER. PRELUDE to "Die Meistersinger."

SOLOISTS:

MISS PRISCILLA WHITE.

MME. FANNY BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 5.

The Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, did not attract a very large audience. The slim attendance was probably owing to the fact that there was no soloist, though the programme was not particularly enticing. It was: Overture, "Der Freyschüz" Weber; Symphony No. 4, Brahms; "Todentanz," Riemenschneider (first time); and overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai. The new work did not make any very favorable impression. It is merely capelmeister music of no special musical value. As a "Dance of Death," it will not bear anything like favorable comparison with Saint Saens's "Danse Macabre." It is unimaginative, without marked character, suggests nothing grim or grotesque, and is barren of interest of any description. Mr. Riemenschneider seems to be of the same order of composers as is Mr. Humperdink, who was also introduced to the Boston public at these concerts. The Nicolai Overture was a pleasing innovation, and now that the ice has been broken, it is to be hoped that we may hear more bright and inspiriting opera overtures, by Auber, Herold, Rossini and others. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "La Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; Concerto for piano, D-minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner, and Symphony No. 3, Schumann. The soloist is to be Madam Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Music Notes.

The last but one of this season's concerts by the Kneisel Quartet, attracted a very large audience to Chickering Hall on Monday evening. The performances began with Beethoven's Quartet in A, op 18, No. 5, a perennially lovely work, always delightful in the hearing. It was perfectly read and played. It was followed by Schubert's Rondo in B-minor, op. 70, for violin and piano, which was given by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Ernst Perabo. The latter was given a most cordial reception. It was a genuine pleasure to hear him again on our concert stage. The performance of this rondo was fine Schubert playing throughout, chaste in feeling, sympathetic in style, and artistic in every essential, Mr. Perabo, in particular, giving a brilliant distinction to his share in the work, by the sincerity of his devotion to the composer's intention. Then came a Sextet for two violins, two altos and two 'cellos, by Mr. C. M. Loeffler. This work is of a worth that entitles Mr. Loeffler to earnest and respectful consideration as a gifted composer. It is in the extreme modern school, but is always clear, easy of comprehension even on a first hearing, and is steadily interesting from the beginning to the end. The themes are charming in their grace and freshness, and their thematic development is equally ingenious and and masterly. The sextet overflows with invention, and though long and elaborate, never loses its hold on the listener's attention. There is enough and to spare of learning, but it is never obtruded, and seems to grow naturally and without effort, from the subjects. One of the special charms of the work is its strongly-marked and original individuality; another is the easy fluency with which the music moves, and still another is the fine skill shown in the combining of the instruments for the production of constantly recurring contrasts in tone color. A deep and chaste poetic sentiment pervades the work, which, as a whole, would be highly creditable as the production of any contemporaneous composer. It would not be easy to overpraise it for its artistic value and its delightful unconventionality, and it has established Mr. Loeffler's right to be considered among the foremost and most estimable of our serious and more able resident composers. The work was carefully and sympathetically read and played, and made an instant success with the critical audience, which applauded it with great fervor and also paid a warm tribute of recognition to the modest composer, who was seated in the auditorium.

[117]

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, MARCH 6, 1893.

The Seventeenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms
"Todtentanz" (first time).....Riemenschneider
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai

Louis Ehrlert, in an article, "The Concert System of Berlin," wrote in this manner: "For more than 25 years the same old master-works have been accepted and listened to, reproduced in the same old monotonous manner, and with the same contracted and affected conception of their meaning. Instead of opening the doors reluctantly, and on exceptional occasions only, to the important productions of contemporary composers, it were a better plan to close accounts with many of the departed ones. There is no longer a necessity annually to revive Weber's overtures, which have been heard hundreds of times; the day has come in which to limit them to their proper places before their respective operas."

We hear annually in Boston Weber's overtures, but under the present reign they are not always "reproduced in the same old monotonous manner." The adagio was taken at so slow a pace Saturday evening that the movement was adagiosissimo. The rhythm, therefore, fell to the ground, and the horn quartette suffered. There was exaggeration in the slackening of the pace, where the "Zamiel and Max motives" enter for the last time, just before the great crash in C major.

In the measures that follow the Wagnerian theory was observed: In the thirteenth measure the mark Sforzato was interpreted as diminuendo, and the broad melody in C major was begun in sentimental fashion, not in a triumphant spirit. With these exceptions, the performance was excellent, often intensely dramatic.

⁂

The overture to "Der Freischuetz" was first played in 1821. Nicolai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" was first played in its proper place in 1849, although as a concert number it may have been given at the farewell concert of the composer in Vienna (1847), for several instrumental numbers from the then unfinished opera were included in the programme. The latter overture seems to-day the older work. Nevertheless it was welcome. It is to be hoped that light overtures by Auber, and others of the French school, may also find a place in Music Hall.

These overtures abound in sparkling melody, piquant harmony; and, as a rule, the instrumentation is a delight to the hearer and a lesson to the student.

⁂

Georg Riemenschneider was unknown to our audiences, although he is about 45 years old, the composer of orchestral pieces (such as "Donna Diana," "A Night in July," a "Festival Prelude"), and the writer of an opera, "The Ice Maiden," which has never, I believe, been heard in public. The "Dance of the Dead" was his introduction to this city.

Mr. Bayes in "The Rehearsal" prepared himself for literary work in this ingenious manner: "If I am to write familiar things, as sonnets to Armida, and the like, I make use of stew'd prunes only: but when I have a grand design in hand, I even take physic, and let blood; for, when you would have pure swiftness of thought and fiery flights of fancy, you must have a care of the pensive part. In fine, you must purge the stomach."

Ernst Theodor Amadeus Hoffmann recommended Rhine wines to him that would write a mass; Burgundy to the composer of a grand opera; champagne to the writer of a comic opera; a fiery Italian wine to the author of passionate canzonets, and arrack punch to the man who thought of a second "Don Giovanni."

Fuseli ate raw pork that he might arouse his imagination.

Mr. Riemenschneider seems to have prepared himself for his task by indulging in copious draughts of flaxseed tea.

In illustration of a wild and grotesque poem by Goethe, Riemenschneider wrote music that is devoid of character. He nailed his episodes together, and at times the nails appear. He started out with conventional commonplaces, and it suddenly occurred to him that his music was without diablerie. He then bethought him of pulsatile instruments and a piccolo for spectral purposes. But beat and blow as he would, the ghosts did not obey his incantation. His dance-tune was neither mocking in its sensuousness, nor fantastic in its melody or rhythm. The thoughts were neither horrible nor grotesque, and the expression was prosaic.

However this piece by Riemenschneider serves one useful purpose; it recalls, in contrast, that masterpiece of Saint-Saens, the "Danse Macabre."

"Zig and zig and zag, Death keeps time,
Beating on a tomb with his heel;
Death plays at midnight a dance-tune,
Zig and zig and zag, on his fiddle."

⁂

The symphony of Brahms, in which masterly workmanship is more apparent than inspiration, was given with breadth and intensity.

⁂

The programme of the rehearsal and concert of this week is as follows: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; concerto for pianoforte, D minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner, and Schumann's Symphony No. 3 (Rhenish), E flat. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

Object of Much Attention ... Symphony Concert.

The Party to Leave Boston Tuesday.

Princess Kaiulani and her party went to church three times yesterday, each occasion to a different house of worship. Otherwise they spent a quiet Sunday at the Brunswick. In the morning, all being good church people, they attended St. Paul's, hearing Dr. Lindsay preach and remaining to the communion service. At 4 o'clock they went to Trinity, and heard Dr. Donald's sermon. In the evening the Park Street Church was the objective point, and Mr. Lansing's good Congregationalism edified their listening ears.

Altogether it was a pretty good, conscientious round of duty, and the Princess and the younger ladies of the party did not attempt much else, aside from a "constitutional" along Boylston street in the afternoon. Mr. and Mrs. Davis paid a call just before tea time, but the others remained in their apartments.

Music Hath Charms.

During the latter part of the evening they all gathered together and sang hymns with great spirit and delight. There are several good voices in the party. The Princess herself is the possessor of a liquid soprano, very sweet, if of no great power, which has been carefully cultivated. She is fond of using it, too. Mrs. Davies furnishes the contralto, and her husband the [illegible]. With Mr. Clive Davies as the tenor all parts were filled, and for a long while the [illegible] in the hotel stood on the stairways and [illegible] and listened to the music which [illegible] confidence and power bred [illegible]

Everybody in and about the Brunswick now knows and recognizes the tall, dark girl who noiselessly flits up and down the passages and hastens to render her service. When she goes in to dinner she is the object of some solicitude on the part of the other guests of the hotel, but she does not mind that. It is one of the penalties of royalty to be conspicuous. Her toilets have been simple, even to severity. Kaiulani ("Lani," as they familiarly call her), looks like a dignified young school girl, rather than the heir presumptive to a throne. She has usually worn glasses to protect her eyes from the unaccustomed glare of the snow.

At the several churches the party attracted much attention, and were the object of a more or less curious scrutiny on the part of their neighbors.

Saturday was such an unpleasant day that the Princess was unable to enjoy the contemplated sleigh ride, much to her disappointment. If this morning be fair the royal equipage will certainly be seen upon the boulevards. During the afternoon a number of people called or left cards, among them Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Ames.

At the Symphony Concert.

In the large audience which attended the Symphony concert at Music Hall on Saturday night were included Mr. and Mrs. Davies, Princess Kaiulani and Miss Davies. Nearly everyone was on the lookout for them, and their seats were the cynosure of hundreds of curious eyes. People in the balconies leveled their opera glasses at the distinguished group, and surveyed them intently, while those in the immediate proximity paid much more attention to their royal neighbor than to the efforts of Herr Nikisch's musicians. The ushers were nearly driven distracted pointing "her" out, and when the concert was over people stood up in the chairs and peered over one another's shoulders in the effort to obtain so much as a glimpse of Her Highness.

Princess Kaiulani wore a dress of black satin, something which the ladies present regarded as rather unusual for a young girl. Her wrap of heavy red cloth was covered with a profusion of most elegant gold embroidery. Mrs. Davies wore a superb evening gown of cream and gold. Her daughter's attire was simple and tasty.

On leaving the hall they had to make their way through to the Winter street entrance, and even Mr. Davies's decided avoirdupois was not equal to the task of forcing a passage through the dense throng which collected about them. They had to drift with the current, as it were. It seemed as though every person present were struggling to get a look at a genuine Princess, and to judge from the time it took to reach the carriage nearly all must have achieved the object of their heart's desire. It was not an impolite crowd, but its curiosity was aroused and had to be satisfied. It took 10 minutes for the Princess and her escort to traverse the short journey indicated.

An Elaborate Gown.

The Princess is so well pleased with America that she is having made an evening gown which she will wear while in Washington. The Princess is very fond of blue; it is her preference above all other colors; accordingly her choice was a handsome satin brocade of a very light shade of blue, with a pattern in garland effect of very small leaves and flowers of turquoise blue. There was hardly enough life in the pale blue to suit the dark skin, and, after trials of different combinations, it was decided to use satin ribbon of turquoise, very much to the Princess's satisfaction.

The skirt is very wide and is lined throughout with the lightest weight crinoline, such as has long been used in skirts and is not an outcome of the hoopskirt fad. But it was enough to alarm the little lady and she wished it taken out, as she would in no way recognize the crinoline or the hoop skirt, and she didn't even want her gown to "stick out." She was finally pursuaded, however, that it was not meant for that purpose, but was merely a lining that gave no appreciable weight to the skirt, and she consented to allow it to remain.

Ribbon about an inch and a half in width, quilted in the old-fashioned style, trims the skirt, five rows being used set far apart, so that the trimming is about two-thirds of the skirt in depth. The waist is made with the silk drawn quite full from the shoulders into a broad belt of turquoise ribbon. The Princess expressed a desire to have a decidedly short wasted effect. She admires the Empire and Louis XV. styles. The sleeves are very large puffs and a bertha of very rich point applique trims about the neck, which is cut round and very slightly decollete.

The programme to-day, so far as arranged, is to ride in the morning, return several calls in the early afternoon, and from 4 o'clock to 6 receive visitors. In the evening one of the theatres will probably be visited.

The party goes to Washington Tuesday night, instead of Tuesday morning, as was originally intended.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892--93.

CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

(ONLY APPEARANCE THIS SEASON.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, MARCH 6TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

AMBROISE THOMAS.	OVERTURE. "Mignon."
ANTON RUBINSTEIN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in D minor, No. 4, op. 70. Moderato.—Moderato assai.—Allegro assai.
FRANZ SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor. Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.
AMBROISE THOMAS.	OPHELIA'S DYING SCENE, from "Hamlet."
GEORGE F. HANDEL.	LARGO. Solo Violin, MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.
RICHARD WAGNER.	PRELUDE to "Die Meistersinger."

SOLOISTS:

MISS PRISCILLA WHITE.

MME. FANNY BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 5.

The Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, did not attract a very large audience. The slim attendance was probably owing to the fact that there was no soloist, though the programme was not particularly enticing. It was: Overture, "Der Freyschütz," Weber; Symphony No. 4, Brahms; "Todtentanz," Riemenschneider (first time); and overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai. The new work did not make any very favorable impression. It is merely capelmeister music of no special musical value. As a "Dance of Death," it will not bear anything like favorable comparison with Saint Saens's "Danse Macabre." It is unimaginative, without marked character, suggests nothing grim or grotesque, and is barren of interest of any description. Mr. Riemenschneider seems to be of the same order of composers as is Mr. Humperdink, who was also introduced to the Boston public at these concerts. The Nicolai Overture was a pleasing innovation, and now that the ice has been broken, it is to be hoped that we may hear more bright and inspiriting opera overtures, by Auber, Herold, Rossini and others. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "La Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; Concerto for piano, D-minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner, and Symphony No. 3, Schumann. The soloist is to be Madam Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Music Notes.

The last but one of this season's concerts by the Kneisel Quartet, attracted a very large audience to Chickering Hall on Monday evening. The performances began with Beethoven's Quartet in A, op 18 No. 5, a perennially lovely work, always delightful in the hearing. It was perfectly read and played. It was followed by Schubert's Rondo in B-minor, op. 70, for violin and piano, which was given by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Ernst Perabo. The latter was given a most cordial reception. It was a genuine pleasure to hear him again on our concert stage. The performance of this rondo was fine Schubert playing throughout, chaste in feeling, sympathetic in style, and artistic in every essential, Mr. Perabo, in particular, giving a brilliant distinction to his share in the work, by the sincerity of his devotion to the composer's intention. Then came a Sextet for two violins, two altos and two 'cellos, by Mr C. M. Loeffler. This work is of a worth that entitles Mr. Loeffler to earnest and respectful consideration as a gifted composer. It is in the extreme modern school, but is always clear, easy of comprehension even on a first hearing, and is steadily interesting from the beginning to the end. The themes are charming in their grace and freshness, and their thematic development is equally ingenious and and masterly. The sextet overflows with invention, and though long and elaborate, never loses its hold on the listener's attention. There is enough and to spare of learning, but it is never obtruded, and seems to grow naturally and without effort, from the subjects. One of the special charms of the work is its strongly-marked and original individuality; another is the easy fluency with which the music moves, and still another is the fine skill shown in the combining of the instruments for the production of constantly recurring contrasts in tone color. A deep and chaste poetic sentiment pervades the work, which, as a whole, would be highly creditable as the production of any contemporaneous composer. It would not be easy to overpraise it for its artistic value and its delightful unconventionality, and it has established Mr. Loeffler's right to be considered among the foremost and most estimable of our serious and more able resident composers. The work was carefully and sympathetically read and played, and made an instant success with the critical audience, which applauded it with great fervor and also paid a warm tribute of recognition to the modest composer, who was seated in the auditorium.

...DAY, MARCH 6, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Weber: Overture to "Der Freischütz."
Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Opus 98.
Riemenschneider: "Todtentanz."
Nicolai: Overture to "Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor."

The overture to the "Freischütz" began with a long-held C such as we never experienced before. There are some famous long notes in music—think, for instance, of the thirteen measures of A in the soprani in the ninth symphony—but they are for the most part organ-points, against which other voices do something interesting; but this long C stands all by itself, nothing accompanies it, nothing has preceded it, and, after a while, it seems as if nothing were destined to follow it. One feels like calling out, "Enough! stop! assez! basta! we understand! the note is C; yes, we know it!" What is Mr. Nikisch thinking of, to take the tempo at such a crawl that you absolutely lose all interest in every note before the next note comes? When it came to the Samiel business, he had to hurry up, as we were glad to note. The quick movement was played with great dash and effect—albeit we do not like that little jump in the phrasing of the Agathe theme in the flute, clarinet and bassoon—and the great C-major chords rang out grandly; in the coda Mr. Nikisch followed Wagner's idea of starting in piano with the theme, after the first dash; this does seem really an improvement upon the old fortissimo way, and Wagner's clever sophistry proves quite conclusively enough that Weber must have intended the passage to go so.

With the Brahms symphony we again struck upon the snag of Mr. Nikisch's passion for making things slow. Ah! come, now! There is only one slow movement in this symphony, and Mr. Nikisch gives us three! The opening Allegro non troppo was played as an Andante poco moto; the final Passacaglia, marked Allegro energico e passionato, was played Allegretto moderato. The only move the ear could recognize as a distinctly quick movement was the third, Allegro giocoso. The result of this slow tempo in the first and last movements, added to the rather morose Phrygian mode of the slow movement and the forbidding cross-relation in the second measure of the theme of the third, was to give the whole symphony a singularly sinister expression. No doubt a certain sombre grandeur and impressiveness was at times gained thereby; but it was a very Sahara-like sort of grandeur, of which the ear soon tires, and in not a few places the effect seemed rather over-sentimental than grand. Now, likely enough, Mr. Nikisch can say that he has been through this very symphony with Brahms himself, and that he takes it just as the composer wished it to go. Were the first part of this true, the second part does not necessarily follow. One can not imagine Brahms having the queer fancy Rubinstein had at one time, of marking some of his movements as he did not want them to go. Once, when Rubinstein came to Vienna to conduct some new works of his which the orchestra had already rehearsed under its regular conductor, every one was surprised at the last rehearsal, which Rubinstein conducted in person, to find how very differently he took some tempi; the conductor who had conducted the preliminary rehearsals excused himself to the composer for the blunder he had apparently made in taking some of his movements wrong, by saying, "How could you expect me to divine that you meant the music to go so slow, when you have marked it allegretto?" Rubinstein answered, "Oh! that is nothing; the term allegretto has certain personal associations for me in this connection, and I marked the movement so, more for my own satisfaction than for anything else; it is true it does not give a very clear notion of the proper tempo, but I did not mind that." But, if Rubinstein can do things of this sort, one can not well imagine Brahms being so unpractical; when he says allegro, it may be taken as at least prima facie evidence that he means allegro. Another argument on our side is that Mr. Nikisch took both the first and last movements of this symphony even slower at the Friday-afternoon rehearsal than at the Saturday-evening concert; both tempi can not be right even from his point of view. But the strongest argument on our side is, after all, this—that an especial fondness for very slow allegros is a strongly-marked trait in Mr. Nikisch's conducting in general, no matter who the composer may be; the opportunities a deliberate tempo gives for expressive phrasing, for highly-potentized emotional coloring, and for producing impressive effects, seem peculiarly tempting to him. He is an "emotional" conductor, if ever there were one, and his instinctive bent is to make things as dramatic as possible. Well, if a man have a right to anything, it is to his own individuality; he has a right to his, and we to ours. It is not our fault if what seems strongly dramatic and impressive to him, often seems merely theatrical and trivial to us. And we may be pardoned for being a little tired of the monotony of having to say so so often; like enough, he is just as tired of hearing us say so. The symphony was, upon the whole, excellently played, although some few passages might have been given with greater clearness and accuracy of ensemble; the great Passacaglia of the last movement was enormously impressive; to us it is one of the grandest of Brahms's orchestral movements, to be ranked with the first movement and finale of his C minor symphony. Nothing but its inherent force, but the genius in it, could have made it palatable in its place in the symphony, especially after the preceding Allegro giocoso, which sounds so much like a finale itself.

Riemenschneider's "Todtentanz," written on a queer ballad by Goethe, is a work that can fairly be dismissed without comment, as the audience dismissed it without applause. Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture did one good to hear. It was played with immense and contagious brilliancy, if in a way that was wholly new to us. We should have liked to hear the violins take that demure, roguish little second theme more delicately, with something more of siren fascination. And then that slackening up before its last appearance, and making a marked ritenuto on its first measure or two! Is not this sort of thing, in the last analysis, nothing more nor less than the familiar, ...-covered effect that belongs properly to ... overtures of Strauss waltzes? But, ... executions, the overture was given ... dash and vim.

...me is: Berlioz, overture, ...ain," opus 9; Rubinstein, ... No. 4, in D minor, opus 70; ...ed Idyll;" Schumann, sympho... E flat major ("Rhenish"), opus 97. ...Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the

---

FALL RIVER DAILY HERALD. TUESDAY. MARCH 7, 1893.

GRATIFYING SUCCESS.

Lovers of Music Second Mr. Borden's Efforts Most Heartily.

In view of the large and brilliant audience that gathered in the academy of music Monday night to hear the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, it may be prudent to modify a little the unfriendly criticism which has appeared from time to time on local musical tastes. The attendance proved that at the expense of sufficient energy an interest in high class music can be awakened here, and O. Elton Borden deserves a word of congratulation for the unusual success which crowned his efforts to get together an audience for the concert which would be a credit to the city, and to the greatest musical organization in the country. There was scarcely a desirable seat to be had on the first and second floors, and the gallery was unusually well filled. It was the largest audience that ever attended a symphony concert in Fall River.

The musicians took their places promptly at the hour announced for beginning the concert, and people who were a few moments late were requested to await the completion of the first number before they found their seats. The program opened with the overture to "Mignon," in which there are many strains familiar to persons not severely musical. The latter class of patrons, of whom, it must be confessed, the great part of concert audiences are made up, are always awakened to a high pitch of enthusiasm at hearing familiar airs performed by a master musician or musical organization, and there is a longing very frequently, near the middle of the program, to hear the performers switch into something everybody knows, even if it is one of the familiar ballads or psalm tunes in which breathes the soul of music. That is perhaps why the "Mignon" overture and Handel's "Largo" would have been voted the best numbers for the orchestra by a large majority—particularly the latter, the soul-stirring harmony of which awoke the audience to round after round of applause, to which the wonderful conductor, Arthur Nikisch, bowed his acknowledgements.

A layman treads on delicate ground in venturing to criticise classical performance, and it may be safer to take refuge behind generalities. If the "Mignon" overture and the largo movement with Franz Kneisel's short solo pleased one, the unfinished symphony in B minor by Franz Schubert, or the royal prelude to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner may have pleased another. If there were false notes in any of the orchestra's performance, an untempered ear could not detect them, and when a critic undertakes to pitch into the shortcomings of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Mr. Nikisch's magic wand, he must needs have a very intimate acquaintance with what he is about.

The piano playing of Fanny Bloomfield-Zersler was a performance full of energy. Her selection was Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, number four, opus 70, consisting of three movements: moderato, moderato assai and allegro assai. The second was particularly beautiful, although the entire performance won the appreciative applause of the audience.

Priscilla White, soprano, was a surprise and a delight. She won the audience no less by her rich and thoroughly trained voice than by the charming grace with which she sang. Her selection was Ophelia's dying scene from "Hamlet," by Ambroise Thomas. The audience was quite enraptured by the singing and recalled the songster very persistently in the hope of securing at least one encore, but without success.

On this point, a little fault could be fairly found with the concert. At any concert there is applause and applause. It is just as apparent to the performers as to the applauders whether the hand-clapping is merely the token of complimentary appreciation of a performance, or whether it is a hearty and unanimous expression of unusual pleasure at a particular selection which deserves to be recognized by more than a courtesy. The applause which followed Miss White's singing and the performance of the Handel selection was very easily interpreted to belong to the latter class, and it was without any great degree of presumption that the audience expected an encore and expressed its disappointment when it was not granted.

FALL RIVER, MASS., THE DAILY GLOBE.

MARCH 7, 1893.

EXCELLENT CONCERT.

Crowded House at the Academy to Hear the Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played to a paying house last night for the second time in a great many years. Mr. Arthur Nikesch was the conductor, the soloists were Miss Priscilla White, soprano, and Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, pianiste.

The first number was a grand rendition from favorite opera.

Mmme. Bloomfield-Zeisler treated the audience to a most brilliant performance on the piano. Her execution was simply marvelous, and touch most exquisite. Miss White's voice was remarkable as showing a voice of great range and sweetness. Her trills and runs were magnificently sung. She was compelled to bow her acknowledgments three different times to the audience, which kept up a continuous round of applause.

The instrumental gem of the evening was Handel's Largo. The solo part was played by Franz Kneisel. The perfect melody of the masterpiece kept the audience breathlessly charmed until the end, when enthusiastic plaudits burst from all parts of the house.

FALL RIVER EVENING NEWS, TUE... MARCH 7, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The largest audience that ever attended a symphony concert greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last evening. The symphony concerts have grown in favor here from year to year, and now the management of this great collection of artists can be assured of at least one big house during the season.

The audience was a fashionable one, but in it were included all the musical people of the city. While many undoubtedly went because it was "the" thing to go to, the large majority were attracted by their love for the best of music, and these were amply repaid for going. From the opening of the grand overture from "Mignon," when the many instruments were heard in such perfect unison, to the close of the last selection, the prelude to Wagner's "Die Miester-singer," there was not a tedious moment for the large audience. Even those who had not been favored with a musical education found enough in each number that was enjoyable to applaud warmly.

The orchestra was the largest that the Boston Symphony has ever brought here, and the magnificent playing of the strings was a very noticeable feature. Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the celebrated conductor, was warmly applauded when he appeared, some minutes after 8 o'clock. The delay was occasioned by the tardiness of the audience in getting seated.

Miss White will always be a welcome visitor here in the future. She was recalled repeatedly by the audience in the hope to hear something less tragic than "Ophelia's Dying Scene," but she would not sing again. Incidentally, but at the first glance, every lady in the house noted the fact that Miss White was wearing a crinoline, and if this dreaded invader is to present no more terrifying spectacle to timid men than did the handsome gown she wore last night, a large amount of talk and many columns of newspaper space have been wasted upon the subject.

Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler is a wonderful performer, but her style of playing is not graceful, and the attention of those who are not experts was divided between the brilliant playing and the violent efforts which she put forth to secure it.

That the concert was such a decided financial success is a credit to the musical taste of the city, and much of the credit of its cultivation is due to those who have from year to year worked so hard to bring the symphony orchestra here.

The Mignon overture commenced the programme, a comparatively short selection but melodious and tuneful. The next number, "Concerto for pianoforte in D minor," Anton Rubenstein, was the most important work presented, and introduced Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who proved to be a most thorough artist. Her work was exceptionally clear and expressive, and was never marred by the slightest blur, the last movement, the Allegro, especially replete with most difficult passages, being given with a delicacy and brilliance that deserved the highest commendation. Schubert's unfinished "Symphony in B minor" followed, and the beautiful theme and its treatment seem a symphonic poem, rather than an intellectual study, like a symphony of Beethoven's or Brahms', and was heard with pleasure by all degrees of musical culture.

Miss Priscilla White is a singer new to Fall River, and her selection, "Ophelia's Dying Seance," from Ambroiser Thomas' Hamlet, embraced every degree of pathos and tragedy. Miss White has a pure and resonant soprano, thoroughly trained and under control, and at the close she was several times recalled. Handel's "Largo," a well known and popular number, was next given with Franz Kneisel as soloist, the excellent work of the harpist adding greatly to the effect. The number is wholly lacking in orchestral intricacies, but the solemn beauties of the harmonies and the perfect rendering made it the most enjoyable of the evening.

Nothing could form a greater contrast to the foregoing than the last number, the prelude to Wagner's only comic opera, "Dei Meistersinger." A strong march movement with all the accompaniments of a Wagnerian selection; brasses, kettle drum and cymbals. The concert was thoroughly enjoyed and it is hoped that Fall River will be kept on the visiting list of this unequalled combination of musicians.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 8, 1893.

The seventh concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given the 27th ult. in Chickering Hall. The quartet was assisted by Messrs. Perabo, piano; Zach, violist; Schulz, 'cellist. The program was as follows:

Quartet, A Major, op. 18, No. 5.....Beethoven
Rondeau brilliant, piano and violin, op. 70.....Schubert
Sextet, A minor.....C. M. Loeffler

The sextet by Mr. Loeffler is in manuscript, and it was played for the first time in public at this concert. It is dedicated to Mr. Franz Kneisel, and the second movement is in memory of Dennis Bunker, the painter. The work as a whole is strong and interesting. Individuality is seen in the treatment of the themes rather than in the themes.

The first movement is a passionate allegro. There is a strange tonality, a tonality akin to that of many Russian folk songs, with alternating or conflicting modes. The cadences are quasi-ecclesiastical, and they are sometimes peculiarly Loefflerian. The chief theme suggests Brahms, but the development is charged with Russian spirit tempered by an admiration for Brahms. The development is really a development; it flows as though it were spontaneous from the theme, and only once is there a contrapuntal passage that seems lugged in by the heels to satisfy the pedant. The returns to the delivery of the chief theme are most excellent, and the close is masterly in the conception and in the carrying out of the conception.

The second movement is an andante with a presto middle. The chief theme is the Russian burden, "Ay, Ouchnem," a song of weary bargemen. The theme is delivered impressively, and it is treated throughout in a very artistic fashion. The lament is intense in its mournfulness, and at times it rises to a height of dramatic feeling. This is the strongest of the three movements.

The third movement is even more Sclavonic, and it reeks with the fumes of Vodka. It abounds in hair-raising passages, and in harmonies that are bizarre and almost grotesque.

The sextet is full of color. It is fascinating, even when it is in passages absolutely bizarre, if not ugly. Mr. Loeffler had something to say and he said it in his own way.

The ensemble work was wholly admirable, and Mr. Perabo showed his rare gifts as a player in chamber music.

* * *

Mrs. Nikisch gave a song recital in Chickering Hall the 28th ult. She sang songs by Brahms, Schubert, Franz, Busoni, Paderewski, Hinrichs, Schumann, Grieg and others. She was assisted by Mr. Nikisch, whose accompaniments were delightfully sympathetic, and by Miss Leonora von Stosch, violinist, who displayed a strongly marked temperament in Vieuxtemps' "Réverie" and a rondo by Scharwenka. In spite of disagreeable weather, there was a large audience, and Mrs. Nikisch was loudly applauded.

* * *

The program of the seventeenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Symphony, No. 4, E minor.....Brahms
"Todtentanz".....Riemenschneider
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai

The opening movement of the overture by Weber was taken at so slow a pace that the rhythm suffered, and the quartet of horns sustained their tones with difficulty, or, in other words, the melos did not come clearly to the light. With this exception the reading was dramatic and the performance was admirable. The symphony was finely played and Nicolai's overture gave pleasure.

Do you know Riemenschneider's "Todtentanz?" It was played here for the first time. Do not journey one mile to hear it. The man, a pupil of Kiel, knows his trade; he connects his sentences, he dots his i's and crosses his t's, but he is without imagination. The piece is a musical illustration of Goethe's poem, and the poem can get along very well without the musical embellishment.

There are moderately slow passages with constant modulation. They are inoffensive and conventional. Then a gong is sounded, and the dance is neither sensuous nor grotesque. The piccolo, the instrument that with the bassoon is so often used to characterize Mephistopheles, is freely employed, but in a cheap manner, and, in fact, the instrumentation is too orthodox and respectable for the subject. There is no touch of the devilish or the ghastly in the whole composition. The work naturally suggests the "Danse Macabre," of Saint-Saëns, but the suggestion is only in the title. Any page taken at random from Saint-Saëns' piece outweighs in musical merit the whole labor of Riemenschneider, and as regards fancy or dramatic power there is no comparison between the two works.

* * *

Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler will play the solo part of Rubinstein's D minor piano concerto at the next symphony concert.

[118]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 6, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Weber: Overture to "Der Freischütz."
Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Opus 98.
Riemenschneider: "Todtentanz."
Nicolai: Overture to "Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor."

The overture to the "Freischütz" began with a long-held C such as we never experienced before. There are some famous long notes in music—think, for instance, of the thirteen measures of A in the soprani in the ninth symphony—but they are for the most part organ-points, against which other voices do something interesting; but this long C stands all by itself, nothing accompanies it, nothing has preceded it, and, after a while, it seems as if nothing were destined to follow it. One feels like calling out, "Enough! stop! assez! basta! we understand! the note is C; yes, we know it!" What is Mr. Nikisch thinking of, to take the tempo at such a crawl that you absolutely lose all interest in every note before the next note comes? When it came to the Samiel business, he had to hurry up, as we were glad to note. The quick movement was played with great dash and effect—albeit we do not like that little jump in the phrasing of the Agathe theme in the flute, clarinet and bassoon—and the great C-major chords rang out grandly; in the coda Mr. Nikisch followed Wagner's idea of starting in piano with the theme, after the first dash; this does seem really an improvement upon the old fortissimo way, and Wagner's clever sophistry proves quite conclusively enough that Weber must have intended the passage to go so.

With the Brahms symphony we again struck upon the snag of Mr. Nikisch's passion for making things slow. Ah! come, now! There is only one slow movement in this symphony, and Mr. Nikisch gives us three! The opening Allegro non troppo was played as an Andante poco moto; the final Passacaglia, marked Allegro energico e passionato, was played Allegretto moderato. The only move the ear could recognize as a distinctly quick movement was the third, Allegro giocoso. The result of this slow tempo in the first and last movements, added to the rather morose Phrygian mode of the slow movement and the forbidding cross-relation in the second measure of the theme of the third, was to give the whole symphony a singularly sinister expression. No doubt a certain sombre grandeur and impressiveness was at times gained thereby; but it was a very Sahara-like sort of grandeur, of which the ear soon tires, and in not a few places the effect seemed rather over-sentimental than grand. Now, likely enough, Mr. Nikisch can say that he has been through this very symphony with Brahms himself, and that he takes it just as the composer wished it to go. Were the first part of this true, the second part does not necessarily follow. One can not imagine Brahms having the queer fancy Rubinstein had at one time, of marking some of his movements as he did not want them to go. Once, when Rubinstein came to Vienna to conduct some new works of his which the orchestra had already rehearsed under its regular conductor, every one was surprised at the last rehearsal, which Rubinstein conducted in person, to find how very differently he took some tempi; the conductor who had conducted the preliminary rehearsals excused himself to the composer for the blunder he had apparently made in taking some of his movements wrong, by saying, "How could you expect me to divine that you meant the music to go so slow, when you have marked it allegretto?" Rubinstein answered, "Oh! that is nothing; the term allegretto has certain personal associations for me in this connection, and I marked the movement so, more for my own satisfaction than for anything else: it is true it does not give a very clear notion of the proper tempo, but I did not mind that." But, if Rubinstein can do things of this sort, one can not well imagine Brahms being so unpractical; when he says allegro, it may be taken as at least prima facie evidence that he means allegro. Another argument on our side is that Mr. Nikisch took both the first and last movements of this symphony even slower at the Friday-afternoon rehearsal than at the Saturday-evening concert; both tempi can not be right even from his point of view. But the strongest argument on our side is, after all, this—that an especial fondness for very slow allegros is a strongly-marked trait in Mr. Nikisch's conducting in general, no matter who the composer may be; the opportunities a deliberate tempo gives for expressive phrasing, for highly potentized emotional coloring, and for producing impressive effects, seem peculiarly tempting to him. He is an "emotional" conductor, if ever there were one, and his instinctive bent is to make things as dramatic as possible. Well, if a man have a right to anything, it is to his own individuality; he has a right to his, and we to ours. It is not our fault if what seems strongly dramatic and impressive to him, often seems merely theatrical and trivial to us. And we may be pardoned for being a little tired of the monotony of having to say so so often; like enough, he is just as tired of hearing us say so. The symphony was, upon the whole, excellently played, although some few passages might have been given with greater clearness and accuracy of ensemble; the great Passacaglia of the last movement was enormously impressive; to us it is one of the grandest of Brahms's orchestral movements, to be ranked with the first movement and finale of his C minor symphony. Nothing but its inherent force, but the genius in it, could have made it palatable in its place in the symphony, especially after the preceding Allegro giocoso, which sounds so much like a finale itself.

Riemenschneider's "Todtentanz," written on a queer ballad by Goethe, is a work that can fairly be dismissed without comment, as the audience dismissed it without applause. Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture did one good to hear. It was played with immense and contagious brilliancy, if in a way that was wholly new to us. We should have liked to hear the violins take that demure, roguish little second theme more delicately, with something more of siren fascination. And then that slackening up before its last appearance, and making a marked ritenuto on its first measure or two! Is not this sort of thing, in the last analysis, nothing more nor less than the familiar, hackneyed effect that belongs properly to concert performances of Strauss waltzes? But, with these exceptions, the overture was given with tremendous dash and vim.

The next programme is: Berlioz, overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," opus 9; Rubinstein, pianoforte concerto No. 4, in D minor, opus 70; Wagner, "Siegfried Idyll;" Schumann, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Rhenish"), opus 97. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

FALL RIVER DAILY HERALD. TUESDAY. MARCH 7, 1893.

GRATIFYING SUCCESS.

Lovers of Music Second Mr. Borden's Efforts Most Heartily.

In view of the large and brilliant audience that gathered in the academy of music Monday night to hear the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, it may be prudent to modify a little the unfriendly criticism which has appeared from time to time on local musical tastes. The attendance proved that at the expense of sufficient energy an interest in high class music can be awakened here, and O. Elton Borden deserves a word of congratulation for the unusual success which crowned his efforts to get together an audience for the concert which would be a credit to the city, and to the greatest musical organization in the country. There was scarcely a desirable seat to be had on the first and second floors, and the gallery was unusually well filled. It was the largest audience that ever attended a symphony concert in Fall River.

The musicians took their places promptly at the hour announced for beginning the concert, and people who were a few moments late were requested to await the completion of the first number before they found their seats. The program opened with the overture to "Mignon," in which there are many strains familiar to persons not severely musical. The latter class of patrons, of whom, it must be confessed, the great part of concert audiences are made up, are always awakened to a high pitch of enthusiasm at hearing familiar airs performed by a master musician or musical organization, and there is a longing very frequently, near the middle of the program, to hear the performers switch into something everybody knows, even if it is one of the familiar ballads or psalm tunes in which breathes the soul of music. That is perhaps why the "Mignon" overture and Handel's "Largo" would have been voted the best numbers for the orchestra by a large majority—particularly the latter, the soul-stirring harmony of which awoke the audience to round after round of applause, to which the wonderful conductor, Arthur Nikisch, bowed his acknowledgements.

A layman treads on delicate ground in venturing to criticise classical performance, and it may be safer to take refuge behind generalities. If the "Mignon" overture and the largo movement with Franz Kneisel's short solo pleased one, the unfinished symphony in B minor by Franz Schubert, or the royal prelude to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner may have pleased another. If there were false notes in any of the orchestra's performance, an untempered ear could not detect them, and when a critic undertakes to pitch into the shortcomings of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Mr. Nikisch's magic wand, he must needs have a very intimate acquaintance with what he is about.

The piano playing of Fanny Bloomfield-Zersler was a performance full of energy. Her selection was Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, number four, opus 70, consisting of three movements: moderato, moderato assai and allegro assai. The second was particularly beautiful, although the entire performance won the appreciative applause of the audience.

Priscilla White, soprano, was a surprise and a delight. She won the audience no less by her rich and thoroughly trained voice than by the charming grace with which she sang. Her selection was Ophelia's dying scene from "Hamlet," by Ambroise Thomas. The audience was quite enraptured by the singing and recalled the songster very persistently in the hope of securing at least one encore, but without success.

On this point, a little fault could be fairly found with the concert. At any concert there is applause and applause. It is just as apparent to the performers as to the applauders whether the hand-clapping is merely the token of complimentary appreciation of a performance, or whether it is a hearty and unanimous expression of unusual pleasure at a particular selection which deserves to be recognized by more than a courtesy. The applause which followed Miss White's singing and the performance of the Handel selection was very easily interpreted to belong to the latter class, and it was without any great degree of presumption that the audience expected an encore and expressed its disappointment when it was not granted.

FALL RIVER, MASS., THE DAILY GLOBE.

MARCH 7, 1893.

EXCELLENT CONCERT.

Crowded House at the Academy to Hear the Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played to a paying house last night for the second time in a great many years. Mr. Arthur Nikesch was the conductor, the soloists were Miss Priscilia White, soprano, and Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, pianiste.

The first number was a grand rendition from favorite opera.

Mmme. Bloomfield-Zeisler treated the audience to a most brilliant performance on the piano. Her execution was simply marvelous, and touch most exquisite. Miss White's voice was remarkable as showing a voice of great range and sweetness. Her trills and runs were magnificently sung. She was compelled to bow her acknowledgments three different times to the audience, which kept up a continuous round of applause.

The instrumental gem of the evening was Handel's Largo. The solo part was played by Franz Kneisel. The perfect melody of the masterpiece kept the audience breathlessly charmed until the end, when enthusiastic plaudits burst from all parts of the house.

FALL RIVER EVENING NEWS, TUE MARCH 7, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The largest audience that ever attended a symphony concert greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last evening. The symphony concerts have grown in favor here from year to year, and now the management of this great collection of artists can be assured of at least one big house during the season.

The audience was a fashionable one, but in it were included all the musical people of the city. While many undoubtedly went because it was "the" thing to go to, the large majority were attracted by their love for the best of music, and these were amply repaid for going. From the opening of the grand overture from "Mignon," when the many instruments were heard in such perfect unison, to the close of the last selection, the prelude to Wagner's "Die Miester-singer," there was not a tedious moment for the large audience. Even those who had not been favored with a musical education found enough in each number that was enjoyable to applaud warmly.

The orchestra was the largest that the Boston Symphony has ever brought here, and the magnificent playing of the strings was a very noticeable feature. Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the celebrated conductor, was warmly applauded when he appeared, some minutes after 8 o'clock. The delay was occasioned by the tardiness of the audience in getting seated.

Miss White will always be a welcome visitor here in the future. She was recalled repeatedly by the audience in the hope to hear something less tragic than "Ophelia's Dying Scene," but she would not sing again. Incidentally, but at the first glance, every lady in the house noted the fact that Miss White was wearing a crinoline, and if this dreaded invader is to present no more terrifying spectacle to timid men than did the handsome gown she wore last night, a large amount of talk and many columns of newspaper space have been wasted upon the subject.

Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler is a wonderful performer, but her style of playing is not graceful, and the attention of those who are not experts was divided between the brilliant playing and the violent efforts which she put forth to secure it.

That the concert was such a decided financial success is a credit to the musical taste of the city, and much of the credit of its cultivation is due to those who have from year to year worked so hard to bring the symphony orchestra here.

The Mignon overture commenced the programme, a comparatively short selection but melodious and tuneful. The next number, "Concerto for pianoforte in D minor," Anton Rubenstein, was the most important work presented and introduced Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who proved to be a most thorough artist. Her work was exceptionally clear and expressive, and was never marred by the slightest blur, the last movement, the Allegro, especially replete with most difficult passages, being given with a delicacy and brilliance that deserved the highest commendation. Schubert's unfinished "Symphony in B minor" followed, and the beautiful theme and its treatment seem a symphonic poem, rather than an intellectual study, like a symphony of Beethoven's or Brahms', and was heard with pleasure by all degrees of musical culture.

Miss Priscilla White is a singer new to Fall River, and her selection, "Ophelia's Dying Seance," from Ambroiser Thomas' Hamlet, embraced every degree of pathos and tragedy. Miss White has a pure and resonant soprano, thoroughly trained and under control, and at the close she was several times recalled. Handel's "Largo," a well known and popular number, was next given with Franz Kneisel as soloist, the excellent work of the harpist adding greatly to the effect. The number is wholly lacking in orchestral intricacies, but the solemn beauties of the harmonies and the perfect rendering made it the most enjoyable of the evening.

Nothing could form a greater contrast to the foregoing than the last number, the prelude to Wagner's only comic opera, "Dei Meistersinger." A strong march movement with all the accompaniments of a Wagnerian selection; brasses, kettle drum and cymbals. The concert was thoroughly enjoyed and it is hoped that Fall River will be kept on the visiting list of this unequalled combination of musicians.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 8, 1893.

The seventh concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given the 27th ult. in Chickering Hall. The quartet was assisted by Messrs. Perabo, piano; Zach, violist; Schulz, 'cellist. The program was as follows:

Quartet, A Major, op. 18, No. 5.....Beethoven
Rondeau brilliant, piano and violin, op. 70.....Schubert
Sextet, A minor.....C. M. Loeffler

The sextet by Mr. Loeffler is in manuscript, and it was played for the first time in public at this concert. It is dedicated to Mr. Franz Kneisel, and the second movement is in memory of Dennis Bunker, the painter. The work as a whole is strong and interesting. Individuality is seen in the treatment of the themes rather than in the themes.

The first movement is a passionate allegro. There is a strange tonality, a tonality akin to that of many Russian folk songs, with alternating or conflicting modes. The cadences are quasi-ecclesiastical, and they are sometimes peculiarly Loefflerian. The chief theme suggests Brahms, but the development is charged with Russian spirit tempered by an admiration for Brahms. The development is really a development; it flows as though it were spontaneous from the theme, and only once is there a contrapuntal passage that seems lugged in by the heels to satisfy the pedant. The returns to the delivery of the chief theme are most excellent, and the close is masterly in the conception and in the carrying out of the conception.

The second movement is an andante with a presto middle. The chief theme is the Russian burden, "Ay, Ouchnem," a song of weary bargemen. The theme is delivered impressively, and it is treated throughout in a very artistic fashion. The lament is intense in its mournfulness, and at times it rises to a height of dramatic feeling. This is the strongest of the three movements.

The third movement is even more Sclavonic, and it reeks with the fumes of Vodka. It abounds in hair-raising passages, and in harmonies that are bizarre and almost grotesque.

The sextet is full of color. It is fascinating, even when it is in passages absolutely bizarre, if not ugly. Mr. Loeffler had something to say and he said it in his own way.

The ensemble work was wholly admirable, and Mr. Perabo showed his rare gifts as a player in chamber music.

* * *

Mrs. Nikisch gave a song recital in Chickering Hall the 28th ult. She sang songs by Brahms, Schubert, Franz, Busoni, Paderewski, Hinrichs, Schumann, Grieg and others. She was assisted by Mr. Nikisch, whose accompaniments were delightfully sympathetic, and by Miss Leonora von Stosch, violinist, who displayed a strongly marked temperament in Vieuxtemps' "Réverie" and a rondo by Scharwenka. In spite of disagreeable weather, there was a large audience, and Mrs. Nikisch was loudly applauded.

* * *

The program of the seventeenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Symphony, No. 4, E minor.....Brahms
"Todtentanz".....Riemenschneider
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai

The opening movement of the overture by Weber was taken at so slow a pace that the rhythm suffered, and the quartet of horns sustained their tones with difficulty, or, in other words, the melos did not come clearly to the light. With this exception the reading was dramatic and the performance was admirable. The symphony was finely played and Nicolai's overture gave pleasure.

Do you know Riemenschneider's "Todtentanz?" It was played here for the first time. Do not journey one mile to hear it. The man, a pupil of Kiel, knows his trade; he connects his sentences, he dots his i's and crosses his t's, but he is without imagination. The piece is a musical illustration of Goethe's poem, and the poem can get along very well without the musical embellishment.

There are moderately slow passages with constant modulation. They are inoffensive and conventional. Then a gong is sounded, and the dance is neither sensuous nor grotesque. The piccolo, the instrument that with the bassoon is so often used to characterize Mephistopheles, is freely employed, but in a cheap manner, and, in fact, the instrumentation is too orthodox and respectable for the subject. There is no touch of the devilish or the ghastly in the whole composition. The work naturally suggests the "Danse Macabre," of Saint-Saëns, but the suggestion is only in the title. Any page taken at random from Saint-Saëns' piece outweighs in musical merit the whole labor of Riemenschneider, and as regards fancy or dramatic power there is no comparison between the two works.

* * *

Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler will play the solo part of Rubinstein's D minor piano concerto at the next symphony concert.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

That the conductor of the Symphony concerts is a man of impulses, no one sees more clearly than himself, and he has even admitted frankly that in his interpretations a planned and intended reading not infrequently slips away from the control of his will, if a strong mood, evoked by something in the music or associated with it, interposes and sways him. In the direction of his seventeenth programme he must have been carried away often by his feelings, because nothing else could explain the extreme relaxations of tempo into which he several times sank. The concert began with the "Freischütz" overture, the opening adagio had less "linked sweetness" than "long-drawn-out"-ness, for it was taken so slowly that the beautiful and gently melting horn quartette lost its persuasiveness in the effort the players had to make to find breath enough for their usual phrases, without attempting to give uniformity and smoothness to their union. The allegro swept almost as far in the other direction, and fairly rushed to its conclusion save when some special delay upon a note or two held it back before another plunge. In the symphony, too—which was that laboriously elaborated fourth of Brahms—the tempo was slackened in all but the last movement, thus opposing the composer's directions, but giving the hearer a better chance to follow and understand and the director a longer dwelling in his lingering mood. Yet be it understood that with this exception taken to the tempi, there could be no special criticism brought against either the technical handling of the parts or the energy and earnestness of the reading. After the Brahms came a kind of ghost story in music—a "Todtendanz"—by George Riemenschneider, which added nothing to the value of the concert, although it will count as one more in the list of the season's novelties. There is some fancy in it, but of the rather deliberate and intentional sort, and it has some clattering and rattling and clashing, some quivering of fiddle strings and some whistling shrieks of the piccolo. But it is not to be mentioned in the same epoch with Saint-Saëns's unrivalled "Danse Macâbre," gloomy and impressive with its wild, persistent voice of the viola and its swift, weird dispersion of the gaunt, fleshless revellers whom the strange, compulsive strain has summoned. The evening ended with a brilliant but rather too exhilarated rendering of Nicolai's bright, gay and elegant "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture.

Tonight there will be no novelty. The symphony will be Schumann in E-flat—the "Rhenish"—and the overture, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival." Between these stand the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and Rubinstein's D-minor pianoforte concerto, to be played by that able and passionate artist, Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Donnerstag, 9. März 1893.

Das fünfte und letzte große Concert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters findet am Mittwoch, den 15. März, Abends 8 Uhr in der Academy of Music statt. Herr Franz Kneisel wird als Solist mitwirken. Ein brillantes und interessantes Programm ist soeben aufgestellt. Tickets sind schon jetzt bei Ditson, No. 1221 Chestnut Straße zu haben.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

12th SEASON, 1892-93.

March Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 12, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Monday, March 13, Broad Street Station, Penn. R. R. 6.40 A.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 14, 11.35 A.M. B.& O. Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 10.50 A.M. Wednesday, March 15.
Arrive Philadelphia, 1.10 P.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, March 16, 9.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 11.55 A.M.
—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 1 P.M.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 17, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 18, at 8.15 P.M.
Leave New York Saturday, February 11, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, March 19, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 11, 1893.

PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893

1 WEST FIFTY-SEVENTH STREET

Academy of Music.

Strawbridge & Clothier

ENTERTAINMENT.

Monday Evening, March 13, 1893.

Eighth Series.

[119]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

That the conductor of the Symphony concerts is a man of impulses, no one sees more clearly than himself, and he has even admitted frankly that in his interpretations a planned and intended reading not infrequently slips away from the control of his will, if a strong mood, evoked by something in the music or associated with it, interposes and sways him. In the direction of his seventeenth programme he must have been carried away often by his feelings, because nothing else could explain the extreme relaxations of tempo into which he several times sank. The concert began with the "Freischütz" overture, the opening adagio had less "linked sweetness" than "long-drawn-out"-ness, for it was taken so slowly that the beautiful and gently melting horn quartette lost its persuasiveness in the effort the players had to make to find breath enough for their usual phrases, without attempting to give uniformity and smoothness to their union. The allegro swept almost as far in the other direction, and fairly rushed to its conclusion save when some special delay upon a note or two held it back before another plunge. In the symphony, too—which was that laboriously elaborated fourth of Brahms—the tempo was slackened in all but the last movement, thus opposing the composer's directions, but giving the hearer a better chance to follow and understand and the director a longer dwelling in his lingering mood. Yet be it understood that with this exception taken to the tempi, there could be no special criticism brought against either the technical handling of the parts or the energy and earnestness of the reading. After the Brahms came a kind of ghost story in music—a "Todtendanz"—by George Riemenschneider, which added nothing to the value of the concert, although it will count as one more in the list of the season's novelties. There is some fancy in it, but of the rather deliberate and intentional sort, and it has some clattering and rattling and clashing, some quivering of fiddle strings and some whistling shrieks of the piccolo. But it is not to be mentioned in the same epoch with Saint-Saëns's unrivalled "Danse Macâbre," gloomy and impressive with its wild, persistent voice of the viola and its swift, weird dispersion of the gaunt, fleshless revellers whom the strange, compulsive strain has summoned. The evening ended with a brilliant but rather too exhilarated rendering of Nicolai's bright, gay and elegant "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture.

Tonight there will be no novelty. The symphony will be Schumann in E-flat—the "Rhenish"—and the overture, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival." Between these stand the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and Rubinstein's D-minor pianoforte concerto, to be played by that able and passionate artist, Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Donnerstag, 9. März 1893.

Das fünfte und letzte große Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters findet am Mittwoch, den 15. März, Abends 8 Uhr in der Academy of Music statt. Herr Franz Kneisel wird als Solist mitwirken. Ein reichhaltiges und interessantes Programm ist dafür aufgestellt. Tickets sind schon jetzt bei Ritcher, No. 1221 Chestnut Straße zu haben.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

12th SEASON, 1892-93.

March Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 12, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Monday, March 13, Broad Street Station, Penn. R. R. 6.40 A.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 14, 11.35 A.M. B.& O. Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 10.50 A.M. Wednesday, March 15.
Arrive Philadelphia, 1.10 P.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, March 16, 9.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 11.55 A.M.
—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 1 P.M.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 17, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 18, at 8.15 P.M.
Leave New York Saturday, February 11, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, March 19, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 11, 1893.

PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893

1 WEST FIFTY-SEVENTH STREET

[119]

Academy of Music.

Strawbridge & Clothier

ENTERTAINMENT.

Monday Evening, March 13, 1893.

Eighth Series.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

That the conductor of the Symphony concerts is a man of impulses, no one sees more clearly than himself, and he has even admitted frankly that in his interpretations a planned and intended reading not infrequently slips away from the control of his will, if a strong mood, evoked by something in the music or associated with it, interposes and sways him. In the direction of his seventeenth programme he must have been carried away often by his feelings, because nothing else could explain the extreme relaxations of tempo into which he several times sank. The concert began with the "Freischütz" overture, the opening adagio had less "linked sweetness" than "long-drawn-out"-ness, for it was taken so slowly that the beautiful and gently melting horn quartette lost its persuasiveness in the effort the players had to make to find breath enough for their usual phrases, without attempting to give uniformity and smoothness to their union. The allegro swept almost as far in the other direction, and fairly rushed to its conclusion save when some special delay upon a note or two held it back before another plunge. In the symphony, too—which was that laboriously elaborated fourth of Brahms—the tempo was slackened in all but the last movement, thus opposing the composer's directions, but giving the hearer a better chance to follow and understand and the director a longer dwelling in his lingering mood. Yet be it understood that with this exception taken to the tempi, there could be no special criticism brought against either the technical handling of the parts or the energy and earnestness of the reading. After the Brahms came a kind of ghost story in music—a "Todtendanz"—by George Riemenschneider, which added nothing to the value of the concert, although it will count as one more in the list of the season's novelties. There is some fancy in it, but of the rather deliberate and intentional sort, and it has some clattering and rattling and clashing, some quivering of fiddle strings and some whistling shrieks of the piccolo. But it is not to be mentioned in the same epoch with Saint-Saëns's unrivalled "Danse Macâbre," gloomy and impressive with its wild, persistent voice of the viola and its swift, weird dispersion of the gaunt, fleshless revellers whom the strange, compulsive strain has summoned. The evening ended with a brilliant but rather too exhilarated rendering of Nicolai's bright, gay and elegant "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture.

Tonight there will be no novelty. The symphony will be Schumann in E-flat—the "Rhenish"—and the overture, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival." Between these stand the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and Rubinstein's D-minor pianoforte concerto, to be played by that able and passionate artist, Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Donnerstag, 9. März 1893.

Das fünfte und letzte große Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters findet am Mittwoch, den 15. März, Abends 8 Uhr in der Academy of Music statt. Herr Franz Kneisel wird als Solist mitwirken. Ein reichhaltiges und interessantes Programm ist dafür aufgestellt. Tickets sind schon jetzt bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Straße zu haben.

PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893

1 WEST FIFTY-SEVENTH STREET

[119]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

12th SEASON, 1892-93.

March Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 12, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Monday, March 13, Broad Street Station, Penn. R. R. 6.40 A.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 14, 11.35 A.M. B.& O. Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 10.50 A.M. Wednesday, March 15.
Arrive Philadelphia, 1.10 P.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, March 16, 9.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 11.55 A.M.
—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 1 P.M.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 17, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 18, at 8.15 P.M.
Leave New York Saturday, February 11, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, March 19, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 11, 1893.

Academy of Music.

Strawbridge & Clothier

ENTERTAINMENT.

Monday Evening, March 13, 1893.

Eighth Series.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

That the conductor of the Symphony concerts is a man of impulses, no one sees more clearly than himself, and he has even admitted frankly that in his interpretations a planned and intended reading not infrequently slips away from the control of his will, if a strong mood, evoked by something in the music or associated with it, interposes and sways him. In the direction of his seventeenth programme he must have been carried away often by his feelings, because nothing else could explain the extreme relaxations of tempo into which he several times sank. The concert began with the "Freischütz" overture, the opening adagio had less "linked sweetness" than "long-drawn-out"-ness, for it was taken so slowly that the beautiful and gently melting horn quartette lost its persuasiveness in the effort the players had to make to find breath enough for their usual phrases, without attempting to give uniformity and smoothness to their union. The allegro swept almost as far in the other direction, and fairly rushed to its conclusion save when some special delay upon a note or two held it back before another plunge. In the symphony, too—which was that laboriously elaborated fourth of Brahms—the tempo was slackened in all but the last movement, thus opposing the composer's directions, but giving the hearer a better chance to follow and understand and the director a longer dwelling in his lingering mood. Yet be it understood that with this exception taken to the tempi, there could be no special criticism brought against either the technical handling of the parts or the energy and earnestness of the reading. After the Brahms came a kind of ghost story in music—a "Todtendanz"—by George Riemenschneider, which added nothing to the value of the concert, although it will count as one more in the list of the season's novelties. There is some fancy in it, but of the rather deliberate and intentional sort, and it has some clattering and rattling and clashing, some quivering of fiddle strings and some whistling shrieks of the piccolo. But it is not to be mentioned in the same epoch with Saint-Saëns's unrivalled "Danse Macâbre," gloomy and impressive with its wild, persistent voice of the viola and its swift, weird dispersion of the gaunt, fleshless revellers whom the strange, compulsive strain has summoned. The evening ended with a brilliant but rather too exhilarated rendering of Nicolai's bright, gay and elegant "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture.

Tonight there will be no novelty. The symphony will be Schumann in E-flat—the "Rhenish"—and the overture, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival." Between these stand the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and Rubinstein's D-minor pianoforte concerto, to be played by that able and passionate artist, Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Donnerstag, 9. März 1893.

Das fünfte und letzte große Concert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters findet am Mittwoch, den 15. März, Abends 8 Uhr in der Academy of Music statt. Herr Franz Kneisel wird als Solist mitwirken. Ein reichhaltiges und interessantes Programm ist wieder aufgestellt. Tickets sind schon jetzt bei Ditson & Co. No. 1221 Chestnut Straße zu haben.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

12th SEASON, 1892-93.

March Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 12, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Monday, March 13, Broad Street Station, Penn. R. R. 6.40 A.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 14, 11.35 A.M. B.& O. Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 10.50 A.M. Wednesday, March 15.
Arrive Philadelphia, 1.10 P.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, March 16, 9.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 11.55 A.M.
—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 1 P.M.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 17, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 18, at 8.15 P.M.
Leave New York Saturday, February 11, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, March 19, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 11, 1893.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH
AND
THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

. . PROGRAMME . .

RUBINSTEIN . . . . . Bal Costumé
a. Introduction
b. Berger et Bergere
c. Pecheur Napolitain et Napolitaine.

SCHUMANN . . . . . "Traeumerei"

MOSZKOWSKI . . . Two Movements from Suite No. 1
a. Thema con variazioni
b. Perpetuum mobile

WEBER-BERLIOZ . . . . . Invitation to Dance

MASCAGNI . . . . . "Cavalleria Rusticana"
a. Prelude et Siciliano
b. Intermezzo

HANDEL . . . . . Largo
Solo Violin, MR. FRANZ KNEISEL
(By Request)

RUBINSTEIN . . . . . Bal Costumé
d. Toreadore et Andalouse
e. Royal Tambour et Vivandiére

[119]

Academy of Music.

Strawbridge & Clothier

ENTERTAINMENT.

Monday Evening, March 13, 1893.

Eighth Series.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1893

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

That the conductor of the Symphony concerts is a man of impulses, no one sees more clearly than himself, and he has even admitted frankly that in his interpretations a planned and intended reading not infrequently slips away from the control of his will, if a strong mood, evoked by something in the music or associated with it, interposes and sways him. In the direction of his seventeenth programme he must have been carried away often by his feelings, because nothing else could explain the extreme relaxations of tempo into which he several times sank. The concert began with the "Freischütz" overture, the opening adagio had less "linked sweetness" than "long-drawn-out"-ness, for it was taken so slowly that the beautiful and gently melting horn quartette lost its persuasiveness in the effort the players had to make to find breath enough for their usual phrases, without attempting to give uniformity and smoothness to their union. The allegro swept almost as far in the other direction, and fairly rushed to its conclusion save when some special delay upon a note or two held it back before another plunge. In the symphony, too—which was that laboriously elaborated fourth of Brahms—the tempo was slackened in all but the last movement, thus opposing the composer's directions, but giving the hearer a better chance to follow and understand and the director a longer dwelling in his lingering mood. Yet be it understood that with this exception taken to the tempi, there could be no special criticism brought against either the technical handling of the parts or the energy and earnestness of the reading. After the Brahms came a kind of ghost story in music—a "Todtendanz"—by George Riemenschneider, which added nothing to the value of the concert, although it will count as one more in the list of the season's novelties. There is some fancy in it, but of the rather deliberate and intentional sort, and it has some clattering and rattling and clashing, some quivering of fiddle strings and some whistling shrieks of the piccolo. But it is not to be mentioned in the same epoch with Saint-Saëns's unrivalled "Danse Macâbre," gloomy and impressive with its wild, persistent voice of the viola and its swift, weird dispersion of the gaunt, fleshless revellers whom the strange, compulsive strain has summoned. The evening ended with a brilliant but rather too exhilarated rendering of Nicolai's bright, gay and elegant "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture.

Tonight there will be no novelty. The symphony will be Schumann in E-flat—the "Rhenish"—and the overture, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival." Between these stand the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and Rubinstein's D-minor pianoforte concerto, to be played by that able and passionate artist, Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Philadelphia Abend-Post

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

12th SEASON, 1892-93.

March Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 12, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia, Monday, March 13, Broad Street Station, Penn. R. R. 6.40 A.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 14, 11.35 A.M. B.& O. Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P. M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 10.50 A.M. Wednesday, March 15.
Arrive Philadelphia, 1.10 P.M.
—CONTINENTAL HOTEL.—
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Ninth and Green Streets, Thursday, March 16, 9.30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 11.55 A.M.
—PARK AVENUE HOTEL.—
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 1 P.M.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 17, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 18, at 8.15 P.M.
Leave New York Saturday, February 11, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, March 19, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 11, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

ASSISTED BY

Miss Gertrude Edmands, Contralto.

* * *

Steinway Piano used.

* * *

Programme.

* * *

Grand Polonaise in A major, - - - - LISZT.

Overture—"Merry Wives of Windsor," - - NICOLAI.

ARIA from "Le Prophete," - - - MEYERBEER.

Miss GERTRUDE EDMANDS.

Allegretto from Symphony No. 7. - - BEETHOVEN.

Suite for Orchestra, in D major, Op. 39. - - DVORAK.

I. Praeludium (Pastorale), Allegro moderato (D major) 4-4.
II. Polka, Allegretto grazioso (D minor), - 2-4.
III. Menuett (Sousedska), Allegro giusto (B-flat major), 3-4.
IV. Romanze, Andante con moto (G major), - 9-8.
V. Finale (Furiant), Presto (D minor), 3-4.

SONGS (with Piano):
a. "No one my grief can feel," TSCHAIKOWSKY.
b. "The Little Dustman," - BRAHMS.
c. "My Love is Fair," - BRAHMS.

Miss GERTRUDE EDMANDS.

SOLO FOR FLUTE, Tremolo, - - DEMERSSEMAN.

Mons. Chas. Molé.

LARGO, - - - - - - HANDEL.

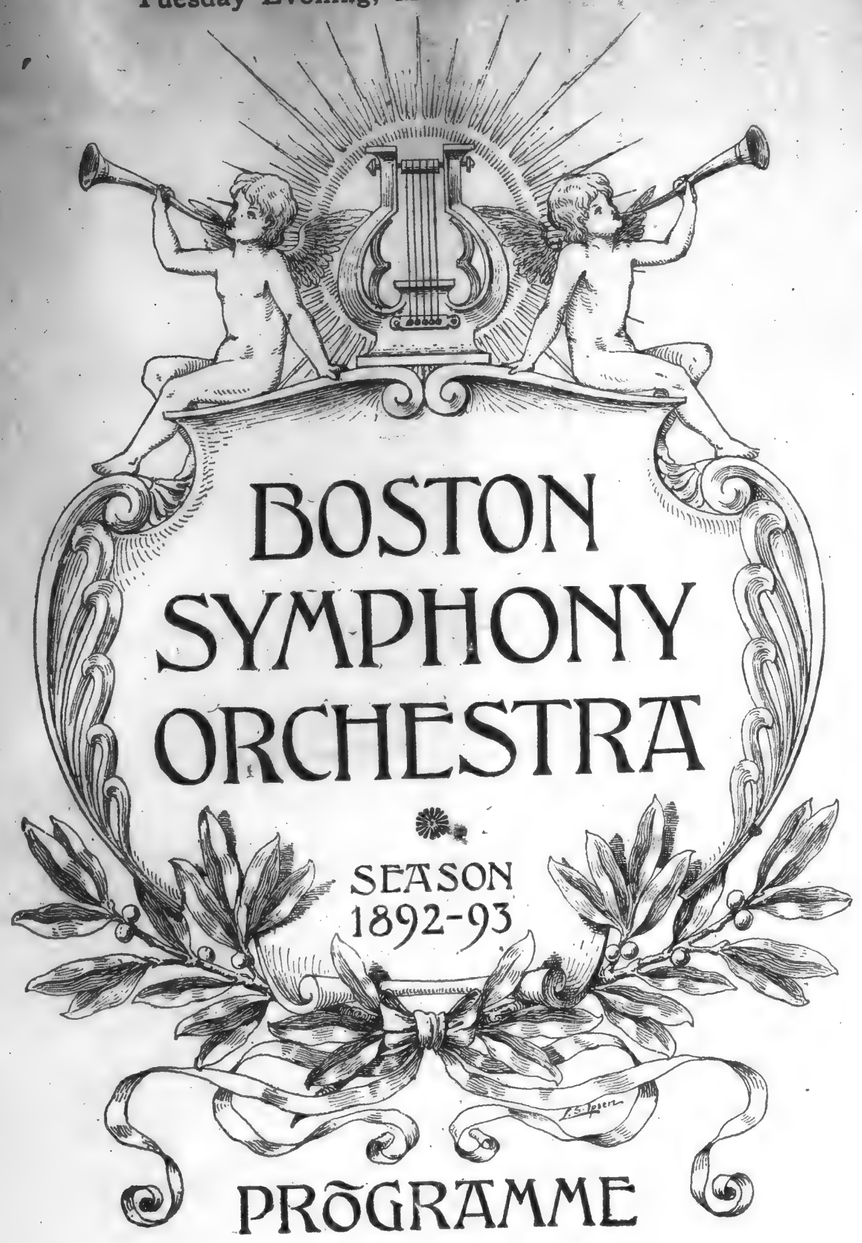
Solo Violin, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Overture—"Mignon," - - - A. THOMAS.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,

Tuesday Evening, March 14, at 8 o'clock.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA,

Wednesday Evening, March 15, at 8.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut St.

CHICKERING HALL, ... NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, March 16, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

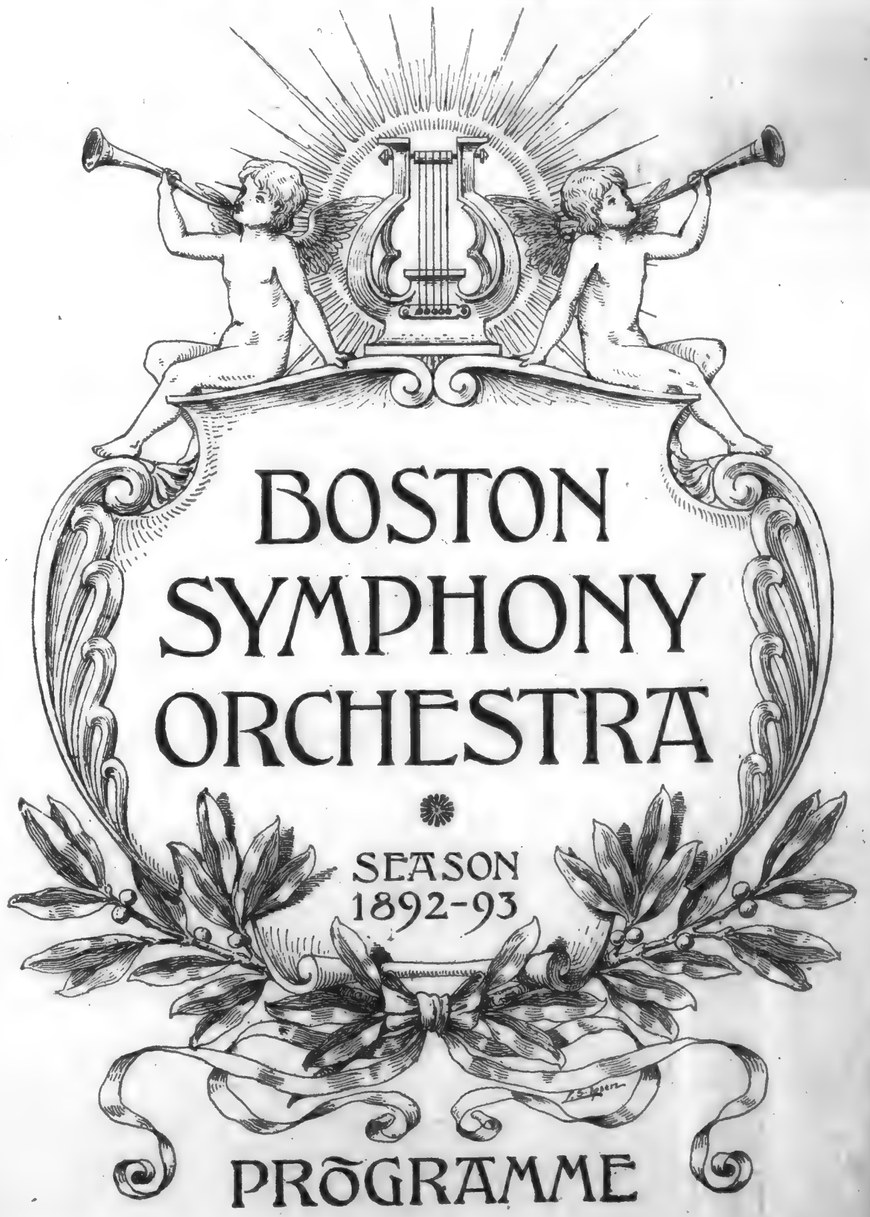
5

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, March 17, at 3. Saturday Evening, March 18, at 8.15

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street. . .

[120]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 12.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romaine," Berlioz; Concerto for piano, D. minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; Symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish"), in E-flat, Schumann. The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler. There were no novelties in the programme, which, perhaps, was not to be lamented, in view of the peculiar quality of the new works presentd so far this season. When we recall "Frülingswogen," by P. Scharwenka; the "Humoresque," by E. Humperdink; the Symphony, by E. d'Albert, and the "Todentanz," by G. Riemenschneider, and several other compositions, that have been heard here for the first time this season, we do not feel that there is much cause for grieving because we are spared more of the same kind. Still, less hackeneyd selections than these of last night might not have proved wholly unwelcome. The Wagner Idyl could have been spared without giving rise to an impulse to go into deep mourning by reason of its non-appearance on the programme. Wagner has already had more than his share of these concerts this year. Seven compositions of his have been given this season. It is true that seven works of Beethoven have also been performed, so that there is no reason to complain that both masters have not been placed on an equal footing, at least, as far as the number of times their names have been seen on the programmes. Next in order comes Saint-Saëns, four of whose compositions have been played. Then come Schumann, Brahms, Berlioz and Dvorak, with three each. Mendelssohn has been represented by two works; Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Gade and Rubinstein have been confined to one hearing each; but in this regard they have been treated no worse than Humperdink and Riemenschneider. Nevertheless, with all due admiration for the phenomenal fautity to which these two moderns have shown their capacity to sink, we do not believe that we are extravagantly unreasonable in thinking that they might have been passed by in favor of one of the other composere who were honored by the performance of only one work; say Mozart, for instance, who has only been heard this year in the "Letter Aria," from "Don Giovanni. Seven selections from Wagner, and only one, an opera aria from Mozart, does seem a balance immoderately in favor of the former, particularly when we recall that these are primarily and essentially symphony concerts. But programme making, as we have had frequent occasion to observe in the past, is not among the happiest manifestations of the conductor's talents. The Berlioz overture was brilliantly given as far as spirit is concerned, and was well colored; but the wood wind gave a frequent taste of their now chronic tendency to play out of time, while the strings were not always uniform in attack, and at times were exceedingly ragged in execution. It is hardly worth while to refer again to the deterioration in the playing of the orchestra, and its steady, but certain recession from the splendid state of efficiency in which it was four years ago, and of which it now suggests scarcely a shadow. There must be a laxity of discipline somewhere, or else a want of knowledge regarding the essentials of perfect orchestral playing. Under Mr. Gericke's regime the performers sat up firmly to their work, and seemed to be absorbed in it. Under the existing regime they, for the most part, lean back in their chairs and take their ease leisurely, as if they were acquitting themselves of their tasks automatically, and had no especial interest in them. The Idyl was carefully and judiciously read, and was played with smoothness and finish. It was, on the whole, the most satisfying performance of the evening. The symphony was overelaborated in point of expression, and was now and then given with a boisterous noisiness which, it would seem, the conductor considers to be an indispensable quality in the interpretation of Schumann. The tempi were dealt with as if the work were of an operatic nature, and no opportunity to emphasize and effect by retarding or hastening the the t me were to be lost. This excess of sentiment, obstinately persevered in through a long work, becomes at last cloying, wearisome and irritating, not to speak of the commonplace conventionality it impresses on a lofty composition. It will not do to fasten a sensuous Wagner color on every composer. Mrs. Zeisler's performance of the concerto was remarkable in its virility and its passionateness. It was an admirable display of technique, and the reading was large in style, wholly in keeping with the character of the work, and tempered by keen artistic intelligence. Now and then there was an excess of force in striking the keys, but on the whole, the performance may be cordially and justly praised. The artist was vigorously applauded and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: "La Mer," Symphonic Sketches, by Paul Gilson, (first time); "La Fée d'Amour," for violin, by Raff, and Goldmark's "A Rustic Wedding," symphony. The soloist is to be Mr. Otto Roth.

American Art Journal.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1893.

Loeffler's Rendering of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

At a recent Boston Symphony Concert Mr. Loeffler played the Mendelssohn Concerto, which called forth the following from the erudite critic of the Gazette:

Mr. Loeffler played the fine violin concerto with exquisite taste, perfect finish of style, purity and brilliancy of technique, and nobility of sentiment. The warm and graceful artistic feeling, and the conscientious devotion to the composer that always give a characteristic distinction to his playing were manifested at their fullest, and proved a potent element in the pleasure that his performance afforded. He was applauded with exceptional enthusiasm, and was three times recalled with tremendous fervor.

[121]

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 12, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of Saturday was slightly longer than usual, but was made up of interesting material from first to last. Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture began the concert. It was given a vigorous reading, and spite of the capricious effects, the orchestra was kept well in hand. The English horn solo at the beginning of the work was especially well played, and so were the viola passages which followed it. These passages breathe a tender melancholy that is peculiarly suited to the character of the instruments employed. There is contrast here, even in similarity, for the English horn pictures a dreamy sadness, as the viola does, but the change from wind to string tone prevents anything like sameness. After the serenade the revelry seems to burst forth in wildest fashion. It takes considerable technique to give the chromatic runs which usher in this hurly-burly without blurring, yet this passage was clearly played on this occasion. But the work is as spasmodic as its composer was, and, spite of its gaudy colors, it remains a thing of shreds and patches.

This is one great point of difference between Berlioz and Wagner in orchestral treatment: when the former attains even the greatest effects one feels the effort behind them, all is spasmodic and artificial, while the ability to sustain a high level is one of the characteristics of the German composer. Had Berlioz composed 1000 years he could not have attained the equality (to say nothing of the power) of the first act of "Die Walkuere" or the last of "Die Meistersinger."

Yet Wagner was presented on the programme of this concert at a disadvantage; the "Siegfried Idylle" was a most charming birthday surprise for Mme. Wagner. Nothing more charming than the secret composition, the smuggling of the orchestra into the house, the placing the musicians along the stairway leading to the chamber, and the presentation of the poem explaining the purport of the music, can be imagined; but the very exigencies of the case militated against the conditions of the concert room; the orchestra was of necessity a small one, the scoring light, the themes (chiefly the "Melody of Peace" and "Siegfried, the World's Treasure") require explanation, and the entire work can appeal powerfully only to the initiated Wagnerian. The Swiss musicians who participated in the performance playfully called the work "Treppen-musik" (stairway music), and, truth to tell, its fullest power lay in the circumstances and surroundings of that first performance. Yet there are beautiful touches in it, even though the effect of the same themes in their place in the operas is not attained. It was a poetic thought to intertwine the melody of Peace with that of Siegfried (in augmentation) as a final phrase, for these two themes taken from the operas of "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," here typify Wagner's happiness in his Brunnhilde (Cosima Wagner) and his only child, Siegfried, and the lines in the poem which originally accompanied the music:—

And in the cadence I have held united
Siegfried, our dearly-cherished son, and thee,

make the intention very clear. But all of this was lost on the auditor who listened to the work as pure music, and while the figure treatment is very ingenious and the performance was very good, the composition did not do full justice to the great composer. There were some startling liberties taken with the first phrases, a very bold and extended ritenuto being introduced.

If Wagner's compositions are sometimes autobiographical, Schumann's almost invariably are, and if the B flat symphony speaks of the sunburst of happiness in the life of the composer, the one in E flat, which was performed on this occasion, tells us no less certainly of the last flickerings of that happiness, when the musician came to feel the charm of the Rhine-life, and was excited by the hearty ways of the dwellers in Dusseldorf and Cologne. Yet Schumann was never able to enter heartily into rollicking humor or joviality; even in this work the scherzo has the form but not the spirit of such a movement. There is mystery, tenderness, sweetness here, but not a trace of that playful abandon which Mendelssohn was able to portray so successfully, or of the grotesqueness in which Beethoven so frequently indulged. To the writer the two last movements seem the most striking, partly no doubt because of their graphic contrast. The effect of the trombone passages in the cathedral scene (the fourth movement) is that of a mighty organ in some old Catholic theme, and the chatter and vivacity of the finale (a nearer approach to the spirit of the scherzo is found in this than in the second movement) has been well compared to the holiday spirit which is apparent in the streets of Cologne when the crowd pours forth from the grand old edifice. The work was given in proper spirit and would have made a greater effect had not the audience been somewhat wearied with an exceptionally long programme. As it was, the organ theme seemed to be accepted as a sort of closing voluntary or postlude, to cover the footsteps of the departing congregation.

It remains to speak of an excellent soloist. Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist, and she played Rubinstein's D minor concerto in a manner calling only for commendation. A few mannerisms, such as the throwing about of the hands in an unnecessary fashion (and this might have been copied from Rubinstein himself) or an occasional excess of power, might be commented on, but the work as a whole, was played in a manner that places the artist in the front rank of female pianists. The ensemble was undisturbed throughout, and the shading of the second movement was especially commendable. Best of all was the fact that while there was abundant display of technique, it was made only the means to an end, the pianist entering into the spirit of the work in a manner that caused one to forget technicalities. She was recalled many times at the close of the concerto. There is one point in the instrumentation of the third movement of this concerto that shows that Rubinstein has taken a lesson of Berlioz. In the "Childe Harold" symphony Berlioz imitates the tone of heavy and light bells by twangs of the harp, followed first by tones of the horn, and then by higher notes on clarinette and flute. Nothing closer to the reverberations of bells can be imagined. In this concerto Rubinstein produces a similar effect, but the impact of the bell-hammer is now given by violin pizzicati instead of by harp. But as St. Saens [illegible]

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, MARCH 13, 1893.

The Eighteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain,".....Berlioz
Concerto for Pianoforte, D minor No. 4.....Rubinstein
Siegfried Idyl.....Wagner
Symphony No. 3, E flat major.....Schumann

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler was the pianist.

According to the programme-book, Rubinstein was born Nov. 30, 1830. The same date is given in certain music lexicons. But Rubinstein in his Autobiography declares that he was born in 1829, and the birthday was the 28th of November. Eugen Zabel, the latest biographer of the composer-pianist, confirms Rubinstein's impression. The translator of the Autobiography into English did not make allowance for the Russian reckoning, and so it is stated in the translation that the birthday was the 16th. The right date is undoubtedly Nov. 28, 1829.

***

The feature of the concert was the performance of the familiar concerto of Rubinstein by Mrs. Zeisler. Mrs. Zeisler played like a man; not like a little man, but like a robust and bearded creature rejoicing in his strength. Her technique was above reproach, and there is no need of looking at her from the strictly pedagogical point of view. From the æsthetical standpoint her performance was one of remarkable passion. The pianoforte and the fingers of the player were simply servants of a hot and consuming temperament.

Now, this temperament possessed so thoroughly the woman that there was no need of superficial and annoying manifestations of it. Yet there were tossings of arms aloft; there was facial italicizing of deep-seated emotions. All this was unnecessary. The volcano that sweeps away a village does not cry out to the dismayed inhabitants, "come here and feel my pulse. Is this hot enough for you?"

In spite of strength that occasionally degenerated into mere force, in spite of passion that at times was hysteria, the performance was one of power and beauty. It combined virility and feminine delicacy. And there were supreme moments, native moments, when a mighty individuality found full expression in the fiery delivery of fiery thoughts and fiery aspirations.

***

The performance of the orchestral numbers was of uneven merit. The "Siegfried Idyl" was read with intelligence and played with discretion. The overture was given with spirit, which, however, did not atone for untunefulness and lack of precision.

***

The performance of the Symphony may be best characterized by the word boisterous.

Some time ago—I regret that I cannot recall the exact date—the discovery was made in New York that Mr. Nikisch is the greatest living interpreter of the orchestral compositions of Schumann. This utterance of a foreign oracle was, it is true, unaccompanied by any violent perturbation of Nature, such as thunder in a clear sky, or a disappearance of the sun at high noon. The compliment paid to the leader of our orchestra brought in its train a grave responsibility—the necessity of living up to the reputation.

Now Mr. Nikisch is a man of undoubted musical talent. His nature is emotional, dramatic. His training was in the theatre, not in the concert hall. His talent, his nature, his training all lead him one way in the treatment of a symphony by Schumann. The romanticism and the intensity of Schumann appeal to him strongly; he finds that they lend themselves easily to theatrical effect and theatrical exaggeration. If he can gain these effects he is willing to sacrifice the beauty of detail.

It is not to be denied that in this manner he occasionally gains a great effect; but this constant straining after effect, and an utter contempt for dynamic values, soon bring fatigue. If a conductor constantly calls piano, forte and forte, fortissimo, there is nothing left when he arrives at a fortissimo of the composer but screaming and impotent musical frenzy.

If he frets, after the first measure, the calm and serene melody of the composer, the ear of the hearer will be dull to the cry of passion. Regularly recurring hastening and slackening of the pace, at stated intervals and without excuse or meaning, is like unto a see-saw that soon tires even those who ride at first with delight.

Saturday evening the theatrical nature of Mr. Nikisch was clearly revealed in the performance of the Symphony.

The work of Schumann was apparently played in the royal concert hall of Lorbrulgrud, the metropolis of Brobdingnag. The musical fury that would have stunned Gulliver, would undoubtedly have soothed and comforted the King and his attendants. But the music of Schumann was written for men and women of the size of Lemuel Gulliver.

It is true that Schumann was the rough and vehement Florestan; he was also the gentle, the dreamy, the poetic Eusebius, and Eusebius should be heard, even if his voice is soft and low.

***

There will be no concert next week. The programme of the 19th concert the 25th inst. will be as follows: "The Sea," symphonic sketches for orchestra, Paul Gilson (first time in Boston); "The Fairy of Love," for violin and orchestra, Raff; symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY, MARCH 12, 1

Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler appeared as piano soloist at the symphony concert yesterday, and played Rubinstein's concerto, No. 4, in D minor, a favorite piece with many pianists, and the one given by the composer on his first appearance in this city. Mrs. Zeisler's reputation as a pianist is well established in the West, and her abilities have also received warm indorsements from Boston concert-goers, who enjoyed her playing here some years ago.

The difficult Rubinstein concerto was given with wonderful sustained vitality and power and precision of touch. Her style of playing is broad and confident, and her attacks, especially in the rapid fortissimo octave runs, were bold and animated, the tempo and force being retained to the end.

The beautiful theme in the second part was most delicately and sympathetically interpreted, the running passages being rapidly and clearly given, and the hearty plaudits at the close plainly indicated the appreciation the auditors felt for the artist's brilliant work.

In the closing number Mrs. Zeisler's energy was notable, for the elaborate rush of chords for the piano was not drowned by the heavy orchestration.

Her success was undoubted, and she was recalled again and again at the close of her performance.

The Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," began the programme. The composer's treatment of the brasses and instruments of percussion is particularly effective in this piece, and these contingents of the orchestra showed to marked advantage.

The rollicking salterello was played with fine contrasts of rhythm and dynamic force, the strings singing their charming dance music with beautiful effect.

The Schumann "Rhenish" symphony, which closed the programme, was very satisfactorily played.

The programme for next week's rehearsal and concert, March 24 and 25, will be as follows: Paul Gilson's symphonic sketches for orchestra, "The Sea;" "Le Fee d'Amour," for violin and orchestra by Raff, and Goldmark's symphony, "A Rustic Wedding."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 71.

SUNDAY, MARCH 12, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There was nothing novel but much that was pleasing in last evening's symphony concert, the 18th of the present season's series.

The programme included Berlioz' overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," op. 9; Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto, No. 4, in D minor, op. 70; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Schumann's symphony No. 3, in E flat major ("Rhenish"), op. 9.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, a pianist whose earlier appearances here have won her a well recognized prominence, and her playing of the familiar concerto again displayed her splendid gifts as a thoroughly well equipped pianist. The grand, broad fashion in which she read the opening movement showed her abilities to fine advantage, and in the later movements her success was equally gratifying. She was listened to with great attention, and won a hearty recognition of her artistic worth, repeated recalls following the completion of her task.

The orchestra was in excellent form, and gave a particularly brilliant performance of the Berlioz overture, as well as a very pleasing interpretation of the evening's symphony.

The last concerts of the Nikisch orchestra takes place at Mrs. Paran Stevens' house in New York on Friday, and the Adamowski [illegible]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 12.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romaine," Berlioz; Concerto for piano, D minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; Symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish"), in E-flat, Schumann. The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler. There were no novelties in the programme, which, perhaps, was not to be lamented, in view of the peculiar quality of the new works presentd so far this season. When we recall "Frülingswogen," by P. Scharwenka; the "Humoresque," by E. Humperdink; the Symphony," by E. d'Albert, and the "Todentanz," by G. Riemenschneider, and several other compositions, that have been heard here for the first time this season, we do not feel that there is much cause for grieving because we are spared more of the same kind. Still, less hackeneyd selections than those of last night might not have proved wholly unwelcome. The Wagner Idyl could have been spared without giving rise to an impulse to go into deep mourning by reason of its nonappearance on the programme. Wagner has already had more than his share of these concerts this year. Seven compositions of his have been given this season. It is true that seven works of Beethoven have also been performed, so that there is no reason to complain that both masters have not been placed on an equal footing, at least, as far as the number of times their names have been seen on the programmes. Next in order comes Saint-Saëns, four of whose compositions have been played. Then come Schumann, Brahms, Berlioz and Dvorak, with three each. Mendelssohn has been represented by two works; Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Gade and Rubinstein have been confined to one hearing each; but in this regard they have been treated no worse than Humperdink and Riemenschneider. Nevertheless, with all due admiration for the phenomenal fautity to which these two moderns have shown their capacity to sink, we do not believe that we are extravagantly unreasonable in thinking that they might have been passed by in favor of one of the other composere who were honored by the performance of only one work; say Mozart, for instance, who has only been heard this year in the "Letter Aria," from "Don Giovanni. Seven selections from Wagner, and only one, an opera aria from Mozart, does seem a balance immoderately in favor of the former, particularly when we recall that these are primarily and essentially symphony concerts. But programme making, as we have had frequent occasion to observe in the past, is not among the happiest manifestations of the conductor's talents. The Berlioz overture was brilliantly given as far as spirit is concerned, and was well colored; but the wood wind gave a frequent taste of their now chronic tendency to play out of time, while the strings were not always uniform in attack, and at times were exceedingly ragged in execution. It is hardly worth while to refer again to the deterioration in the playing of the orchestra, and its steady, but certain recession from the splendid state of efficiency in which it was four years ago, and of which it now suggests scarcely a shadow. There must be a laxity of discipline somewhere, or else a want of knowledge regarding the essentials of perfect orchestral playing. Under Mr. Gericke's regime the performers sat up firmly to their work, and seemed to be absorbed in it. Under the existing regime they, for the most part, lean back in their chairs and take their ease leisurely, as if they were acquitting themselves of their tasks automatically, and had no especial interest in them. The Idyl was carefully and judiciously read, and was played with smoothness and finish. It was, on the whole, the most satisfying performance of the evening. The symphony was overelaborated in point of expression, and was now and then given with a boisterous noisiness which, it would seem, the conductor considers to be an indispensable quality in the interpretation of Schumann. The tempi were dealt with as if the work were of an operatic nature, and no opportunity to emphasize and effect by retarding or hastening the the t me were to be lost. This excess of sentiment, obstinately persevered in through a long work, becomes at last cloying, wearisome and irritating, not to speak of the commonplace conventionality it impresses on a lofty composition. It will not do to fasten a sensuous Wagner color on every composer. Mrs. Zeisler's performance of the concerto was remarkable in its virility and its passionateness. It was an admirable display of technique, and the reading was large in style, wholly in keeping with the character of the work, and tempered by keen artistic intelligence. Now and then there was an excess of force in striking the keys, but on the whole, the performance may be cordially and justly praised. The artist was vigorously applauded and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: "La Mer," Symphonic Sketches, by Paul Gilson, (first time); "La Fée d'Amour," for violin, by Raff, and Goldmark's "A Rustic Wedding," symphony. The soloist is to be Mr. Otto Roth.

American Art Journal.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1893.

Loeffler's Rendering of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

At a recent Boston Symphony Concert Mr. Loeffler played the Mendelssohu Concerto, which called forth the following from the erudite critic of the Gazette:

Mr. Loeffler played the fine violin concerto with exquisite taste, perfect finish of style, purity and brilliancy of technique, and nobility of sentiment. The warm and graceful artistic feeling, and the conscientious devotion to the composer that always give a characteristic distinction to his playing were manifested at their fullest, and proved a potent element in the pleasure that his performance afforded. He was applauded with exceptional enthusiasm, and was three times recalled with tremendous fervor.

[121]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 13, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of Saturday was slightly longer than usual, but was made up of interesting material from first to last. Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture began the concert. It was given a vigorous reading, and spite of the capricious effects, the orchestra was kept well in hand. The English horn solo at the beginning of the work was especially well played, and so were the viola passages which followed it. These passages breathe a tender melancholy that is peculiarly suited to the character of the instruments employed. There is contrast here, even in similarity, for the English horn pictures a dreamy sadness, as the viola does, but the change from wind to string tone prevents anything like sameness. After the serenade the revelry seems to burst forth in wildest fashion. It takes considerable technique to give the chromatic runs which usher in this hurly-burly without blurring, yet this passage was clearly played on this occasion. But the work is as spasmodic as its composer was, and, spite of its gaudy colors, it remains a thing of shreds and patches.

This is one great point of difference between Berlioz and Wagner in orchestral treatment: when the former attains even the greatest effects one feels the effort behind them, all is spasmodic and artificial, while the ability to sustain a high level is one of the characteristics of the German composer. Had Berlioz composed 1000 years he could not have attained the equality (to say nothing of the power) of the first act of "Die Walkuere" or the last of "Die Meistersinger."

Yet Wagner was presented on the programme of this concert at a disadvantage; the "Siegfried Idylle" was a most charming birthday surprise for Mme. Wagner. Nothing more charming than the secret composition, the smuggling of the orchestra into the house, the placing the musicians along the stairway leading to the chamber, and the presentation of the poem explaining the purport of the music, can be imagined; but the very exigencies of the case militated against the conditions of the concert room; the orchestra was of necessity a small one, the scoring light, the themes (chiefly the "Melody of Peace" and "Siegfried, the World's Treasure") require explanation, and the entire work can appeal powerfully only to the initiated Wagnerian. The Swiss musicians who participated in the performance playfully called the work "Treppen-musik" (stairway music), and, truth to tell, its fullest power lay in the circumstances and surroundings of that first performance. Yet there are beautiful touches in it, even though the effect of the same themes in their place in the operas is not attained. It was a poetic thought to intertwine the melody of Peace with that of Siegfried (in augmentation) as a final phrase, for these two themes taken from the operas of "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," here typify Wagner's happiness in his Brunnhilde (Cosima Wagner) and his only child, Siegfried, and the lines in the poem which originally accompanied the music:—

And in the cadence I have held united
Siegfried, our dearly-cherished son, and thee,

make the intention very clear. But all of this was lost on the auditor who listened to the work as pure music, and while the figure treatment is very ingenious and the performance was very good, the composition did not do full justice to the great composer. There were some startling liberties taken with the first phrases, a very bold and extended ritenuto being introduced.

If Wagner's compositions are sometimes autobiographical, Schumann's almost invariably are, and if the B flat symphony speaks of the sunburst of happiness in the life of the composer, the one in E flat, which was performed on this occasion, tells us no less certainly of the last flickerings of that happiness, when the musician came to feel the charm of the Rhine-life, and was excited by the hearty ways of the dwellers in Dusseldorf and Cologne. Yet Schumann was never able to enter heartily into rollicking humor or joviality; even in this work the scherzo has the form but not the spirit of such a movement. There is mystery, tenderness, sweetness here, but not a trace of that playful abandon which Mendelssohn was able to portray so successfully, or of the grotesqueness in which Beethoven so frequently indulged. To the writer the two last movements seem the most striking, partly no doubt because of their graphic contrast. The effect of the trombone passages in the cathedral scene (the fourth movement) is that of a mighty organ in some old Catholic theme, and the chatter and vivacity of the finale (a nearer approach to the spirit of the scherzo is found in this than in the second movement) has been well compared to the holiday spirit which is apparent in the streets of Cologne when the crowd pours forth from the grand old edifice. The work was given in proper spirit and would have made a greater effect had not the audience been somewhat wearied with an exceptionally long programme. As it was, the organ theme seemed to be accepted as a sort of closing voluntary or postlude, to cover the footsteps of the departing congregation.

It remains to speak of an excellent soloist. Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist, and she played Rubinstein's D minor concerto in a manner calling only for commendation. A few mannerisms, such as the throwing about of the hands in an unnecessary fashion (and this might have been copied from Rubinstein himself) or an occasional excess of power, might be commented on, but the work as a whole, was played in a manner that places the artist in the front rank of female pianists. The ensemble was undisturbed throughout, and the shading of the second movement was especially commendable. Best of all was the fact that while there was abundant display of technique, it was made only the means to an end, the pianist entering into the spirit of the work in a manner that caused one to forget technicalities. She was recalled many times at the close of the concerto. There is one point in the instrumentation of the third movement of this concerto that shows that Rubinstein has taken a lesson of Berlioz. In the "Childe Harold" symphony Berlioz imitates the tone of heavy and light bells by twangs of the harp, followed first by tones of the horn, and then by higher notes on clarinette and flute. Nothing closer to the reverberations of bells can be imagined. In this concerto Rubinstein produces a similar effect, but the impact of the bell-hammer is now given by violin pizzicati instead of by harp. But as St. Saens struck 12 o'clock on the harp in the Danse Macabre, and as composers need bell effects once in a while, perhaps the combination

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, MARCH 13, 1893.

The Eighteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain,".....Berlioz
Concerto for Pianoforte, D minor No. 4.....Rubinstein
Siegfried Idyl.....Wagner
Symphony No. 3, E flat major.....Schumann

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler was the pianist.

According to the programme-book, Rubinstein was born Nov. 30, 1830. The same date is given in certain music lexicons. But Rubinstein in his Autobiography declares that he was born in 1829, and the birthday was the 28th of November. Eugen Zabel, the latest biographer of the composer-pianist, confirms Rubinstein's impression. The translator of the Autobiography into English did not make allowance for the Russian reckoning, and so it is stated in the translation that the birthday was the 16th. The right date is undoubtedly Nov. 28, 1829.

***

The feature of the concert was the performance of the familiar concerto of Rubinstein by Mrs. Zeisler. Mrs. Zeisler played like a man; not like a little man, but like a robust and bearded creature rejoicing in his strength. Her technique was above reproach, and there is no need of looking at her from the strictly pedagogical point of view. From the æsthetical standpoint her performance was one of remarkable passion. The pianoforte and the fingers of the player were simply servants of a hot and consuming temperament.

Now, this temperament possessed so thoroughly the woman that there was no need of superficial and annoying manifestations of it. Yet there were tossings of arms aloft; there was facial italicizing of deep-seated emotions.

All this was unnecessary. The volcano that sweeps away a village does not cry out to the dismayed inhabitants, "come here and feel my pulse. Is this not enough for you?"

In spite of strength that occasionally degenerated into mere force, in spite of passion that at times was hysteria, the performance was one of power and beauty. It combined virility and feminine delicacy. And there were supreme moments, native moments, when a mighty individuality found full expression in the fiery delivery of fiery thoughts and fiery aspirations.

***

The performance of the orchestral numbers was of uneven merit. The "Siegfried Idyl" was read with intelligence and played with discretion. The overture was given with spirit, which, however, did not atone for untunefulness and lack of precision.

***

The performance of the Symphony may be best characterized by the word boisterous.

Some time ago—I regret that I cannot recall the exact date—the discovery was made in New York that Mr. Nikisch is the greatest living interpreter of the orchestral compositions of Schumann. This utterance of a foreign oracle was, it is true, unaccompanied by any violent perturbation of Nature, such as thunder in a clear sky, or a disappearance of the sun at high noon. The compliment paid to the leader of our orchestra brought in its train a grave responsibility—the necessity of living up to the reputation.

Now Mr. Nikisch is a man of undoubted musical talent. His nature is emotional, dramatic. His training was in the theatre, not in the concert hall. His talent, his nature, his training all lead him one way in the treatment of a symphony by Schumann. The romanticism and the intensity of Schumann appeal to him strongly; he finds that they lend themselves easily to theatrical effect and theatrical exaggeration. If he can gain these effects he is willing to sacrifice the beauty of detail.

It is not to be denied that in this manner he occasionally gains a great effect; but this constant straining after effect, and an utter contempt for dynamic values, soon bring fatigue. If a conductor constantly calls piano, forte and forte, fortissimo, there is nothing left when he arrives at a fortissimo of the composer but screaming and impotent musical frenzy.

If he frets, after the first measure, the calm and serene melody of the composer, the ear of the hearer will be dull to the cry of passion. Regularly recurring hastening and slackening of the pace, at stated intervals and without excuse or meaning, is like unto a see-saw that soon tires even those who ride at first with delight.

Saturday evening the theatrical nature of Mr. Nikisch was clearly revealed in the performance of the Symphony.

The work of Schumann was apparently played in the royal concert hall of Lorbrulgrud, the metropolis of Brobdingnag. The musical fury that would have stunned Gulliver, would undoubtedly have soothed and comforted the King and his attendants. But the music of Schumann was written for men and women of the size of Lemuel Gulliver.

It is true that Schumann was the rough and vehement Florestan; he was also the gentle, the dreamy, the poetic Eusebius, and Eusebius should be heard, even if his voice is soft and low.

***

There will be no concert next week. The programme of the 19th concert the 25th inst. will be as follows: "The Sea," symphonic sketches for orchestra, Paul Gilson (first time in Boston); "The Fairy of Love," for violin and orchestra, Raff; symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 71.

SUNDAY, MARCH 12, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There was nothing novel but much that was pleasing in last evening's symphony concert, the 18th of the present season's series.

The programme included Berlioz' overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," op. 9; Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto, No. 4, in D minor, op. 70; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Schumann's symphony No. 3, in E flat major ("Rhenish"), op. 9.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, a pianist whose earlier appearances here have won her a well recognized prominence, and her playing of the familiar concerto again displayed her splendid gifts as a thoroughly well equipped pianist. The grand, broad fashion in which she read the opening movement showed her abilities to fine advantage, and in the later movements her success was equally gratifying. She was listened to with great attention, and won a hearty recognition of her artistic worth, repeated recalls following the completion of her task.

The orchestra was in excellent form, and gave a particularly brilliant performance of the Berlioz overture, as well as a very pleasing interpretation of the evening's symphony.

The last concerts of the Nikisch orchestra takes place at Mrs. Paran Stevens' house in New York on Friday, and the Adamowski quartet on Saturday.

Boston Sunday Globe

SUNDAY, MARCH 12, 1893.

Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler appeared as piano soloist at the symphony concert yesterday, and played Rubinstein's concerto, No. 4, in D minor, a favorite piece with many pianists, and the one given by the composer on his first appearance in this city. Mrs. Zeisler's reputation as a pianist is well established in the West, and her abilities have also received warm indorsements from Boston concert-goers, who enjoyed her playing here some years ago.

The difficult Rubinstein concerto was given with wonderful sustained vitality and power and precision of touch. Her style of playing is broad and confident, and her attacks, especially in the rapid fortissimo octave runs, were bold and animated, the tempo and force being retained to the end.

The beautiful theme in the second part was most delicately and sympathetically interpreted, the running passages being rapidly and clearly given, and the hearty plaudits at the close plainly indicated the appreciation the auditors felt for the artist's brilliant work.

In the closing number Mrs. Zeisler's energy was notable, for the elaborate rush of chords for the piano was not drowned by the heavy orchestration.

Her success was undoubted, and she was recalled again and again at the close of her performance.

The Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," began the programme. The composer's treatment of the brasses and instruments of percussion is particularly effective in this piece, and these contingents of the orchestra showed to marked advantage.

The rollicking salterello was played with fine contrasts of rhythm and dynamic force, the strings singing their charming dance music with beautiful effect.

The Schumann "Rhenish" symphony, which closed the programme, was very satisfactorily played.

The programme for next week's rehearsal and concert, March 24 and 25, will be as follows: Paul Gilson's symphonic sketches for orchestra, "The Sea;" "Le Fee d'Amour," for violin and orchestra by Raff, and Goldmark's symphony, "A Rustic Wedding."

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 15, 1893.

The program of the eighteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Concerto for piano, D minor.....Rubinstein
"Siegfried Idyl".....Wagner
Symphony No. 3, E flat.....Schumann

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist.

This program, of course, is excellent; there are masterpieces of the romantic school, and they have all been heard here many a time. I confess that I 'gin to be a-weary of masterpieces, classical or romantic, when they are presented at regular, frequent intervals and in bulk. I should like to hear things that I should probably dislike during and after the hearing. I should like to hear these new French "machines:" Charpentier's "La vie du Poète" and Saint-Saëns' "Africa."

Would that "Pagliacci" or "A Santa Lucia" or "Mala Vita" might cross the water and drive, at least for a month, symphony concerts and analytical programs into utter darkness and oblivion.

How few of us have the courage to express our thoughts, even in jest, as frankly as was the habit of Thackeray. Do you remember what he wrote concerning the "second rate"? "I have always had a taste for the second rate in life. Second-rate poetry, for instance, is an uncommon deal pleasanter to my fancy than your great thundering first-rate epic poems. Your Miltons and Dantes are magnificent—but a bore. Whereas an ode of Horace or a song of Tommy Moore is always fresh, sparkling and welcome. * * * Second-rate beauty in women is likewise, I maintain, more agreeable than first-rate charms. Your first rate Beauty is grand, severe, awful!—a faultless, frigid angel of 5 feet 9. Superb to behold at church or in the park, or at a Drawing room—but ah! how inferior to a sweet little second rate creature, with smiling eyes and a little second-rate nez retroussé, with which you fall in love in a minute!"

And so I would gladly have exchanged, last evening, the Schumann symphony for an overture by Auber; nor would I have gone to Music Hall, if "The Princess of Trebizond" had received all callers in a snug little theatre. You see that I am not in the mood to speak in detail of the Symphony concert, and after all of what use is the come-and-go over familiar ground?

Mrs. Zeisler played with a strength that occasionally robbed tone of beauty; but her performance as a whole was admirable in the display of technical ease and poetic spirit. Her performance was also a revelation of glowing temperament. This temperament, however, became exuberant; it called attention to itself, as though it were afraid that the hearer might not regard it closely. And this exuberance was not confined to tone; it appeared in gesture, in posture.

PHILIP HALE.

FAREWELL TO NIKISCH.

TO-MORROW evening at Chickering Hall Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his farewell bow to us for at least five years. He goes after urgent requests and the offer of terms that would melt the most obdurate of resolutions, to Buda-Pesth to become the director general of the Royal Opera House in that charming city. Mr. Nikisch will, in addition to conducting the operatic performances, also conduct the Philharmonic Society concerts. He regrets leaving America greatly, for he has made many friendships during his four years' residence here; but then who could resist the temptation of leaving the grey, demure life of Boston to live in one of the most brilliant and cosmopolitan cities of Europe, and to supervise the musical destinies of one of the most complete opera houses in the world, with a life pension attached to the position.

No matter who will be Mr. Nikisch's successor, and there is a rumor of pending negotiations with Hans Richter, Mr. Nikisch's departure is in the nature of a personal loss. The magnetic qualities of his conducting, his superb musicianship, his glowing artistic nature, coupled with his sterling qualities as a man, all have endeared him to his New York audiences, and a wail will go up when the news becomes known. Getting musicianly conductors will not be a trying task for the managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; to get a man to adequately replace Mr. Nikisch in every sense will be next door to the impossible.

He is a union of musicianly, dramatic poetic and virtuoso qualities that is rarely encountered even in this time of versatility. Mr. Nikisch plays Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, for the last time, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music; in Chicago two concerts, 14th and 16th of May, at which the soloists will be Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder, and his season closes in Detroit May 20. About June 1 Mr. Nikisch goes to Europe, and that is probably the last America will see of this great and unique conductor, to whom we can only say hopefully, "Auf Wiedersehen."

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give the closing concert at Chickering Hall to-morrow (Thursday) evening. Mr. Nikisch's program includes the overture "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; concerto for violin, Brahms; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner, and the symphony in E minor, No. 5, Tschaikowsky. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

The orchestra will also give performances at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. T. Adamowski as soloists.

Philadelphia Abend Post.

Donnerstag, 16. März 1893.

Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra". In der „Academy of Music" fand gestern Abend vor einem vollen Hause unter Leitung des Kapellmeisters, Herrn Arthur Nikisch, ein Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" statt. Das Konzert, das fünfte der Saison 1892—1893, reihte sich ebenbürtig an die vorhergehenden an, und das gediegene, mit großer Meisterschaft vorgetragene Programm riß das kunstsinnige Publikum zu lautem, anhaltenden Beifall hin. Leider war der Solist, Herr Franz Kneisel, dessen Auftreten man mit großer Spannung entgegengesehen hatte, durch Unwohlsein verhindert, dem Publikum den erwarteten Genuß zu bereiten, doch wurde dasselbe durch Herrn Adamowski, der an Stelle des plötzlich Erkrankten trat und zwei Piecen aus Max Bruch's G Moll Konzert mit gewohnter Virtuosität vortrug, reichlich entschädigt.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

FAREWELL TO MR. NIKISCH.

New Yorkers Listen for the Last Time to the Symphony Conductor.

Special Dispatch to the Boston Journal.

NEW YORK, March 16. The thought, doubtless, which was uppermost in the minds of the audience at the last concert for this season in Chickering Hall to-night was that most unexpectedly the affair had been turned at the eleventh hour into a farewell to Mr. Nikisch, the conductor. It has been under Mr. Nikisch's direction that the concerts of the organization have taken the high place in popular favor which they have occupied during the last three years. The concert was changed in character by the illness of Mr. Kneisel, who was to have played the first movement of the violin concerto by Brahms. In his absence Mrs. Nikisch sang with the orchestra a "Spring Song," by Feruccio Busoni, and afterward some songs by Brahms, Paderewski and Schumann to the pianoforte accompaniments of her husband. The performances were all most amiable and sympathetic, and were supplemented by Brahms's "Vegebliches Staendchen." The orchestral numbers were Berlioz's overture "Carnaval Romain," Wagner's "Waldweben" and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony.

Mr. Nikisch said after the concert that he had all along expected to make America his future home, and that the separation would be a peculiarly poignant one for him. He felt, however, that the invitation to become the conductor of the opera at Buda-Pesth was such an opportunity as is offered to a musician only once in a lifetime, and that he owed it to his family not to let it go by.

THE WASHINGTON POST, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 15,

PADEREWSKI DREW THE PEOPLE.

Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Under Mr. Nikisch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski as a soloist, packed Metzerott Music Hall last evening to its utmost capacity. Last Saturday morning the last seat in the house was sold and countless applicants were disappointed. Over 200 of these paid for the privilege of standing during the concert so that the walls were well lined. In the lower box on the left of the stage were Princess Kaiaulani and party, and opposite were Prince Cantacuzene and daughter with Mr. Botkine. Mrs. Cleveland was among the disappointed ones, as the boxes were all sold before she applied.

Paderewski was the drawing card, and the audience listened to the C major concerto of Schumann with evident impatience, anxious to greet the Polish pianist. As he entered the hall the audience gave him a hearty welcome, which he modestly acknowledged.

His first number was his own concerto in A minor, which fixes his rank as a musician. It is a vigorous composition, full of youthful fire, introducing folk songs, and treating the piano not as a solo instrument, but only as a part of the orchestra. His performance of it was a brilliant piece of piano work, and his rapid scale passages almost took away one's breath. At the close there was a number of recalls, but the artist declined to do more than acknowledge them.

After Bizet's Suite L'Arlesienne, No. 1, by the orchestra, he played a group of three piano pieces, "Wachtstueck," by Schumann; "Etude Paganini," Schumann, and Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise," No. 12. After these the audience could not be satisfied with bowing, and he played in exquisite style his own "Minuet," which has been played here by a number of artists, notably Aus der Ohe.

The concert closed with the Vorspiel to "Die Miestersinger."

This is the last appearance here of the orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Nikisch, he having accepted the post of director general of the court opera at Buda-Pesth at the highest salary ever paid a conductor.

La...

Philadelphia, Thursday, March 16, 1893.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert which last night closed the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series attracted to the Academy of Music one of the largest audiences of the season. The programme contained four orchestral numbers, including the symphony, and its execution occupied less than an hour and a half, but the concert was one of the most thoroughly enjoyable the Orchestra has ever given here. The "Roman Carnaval" overture of Berlioz, which headed the list, was performed with rare clearness, warmth and finish. A violin solo by Franz Kneisel was to have followed, but Mr. Kneisel's indisposition was announced, and Timothy Adamowsky arose from the ranks of the first violins and took his place. He played the opening and andante movements from Max Brüch's concerto, and with such beauty and purity of tone and refined skill that he received something of an ovation from the house, which gave him round after round of applause, and quite a number of hands were kept in collision with each other for what seemed to be a couple of minutes—long after good taste would have suggested a cessation, indeed—evidently with the object of getting Mr. Adamowsky to play something else.

Mendelssohn's Fourth (Italian) Symphony came next, or in the middle of the list, a happy compromise as between the placing of the symphony at the top or at the bottom of a programme. It would be superfluous to dwell upon the results of Mr. Nikisch's union of power and delicacy in giving graphic form to the exuberant fancy and genial nature that Mendelssohn infused into this work, as it would be to enter into detail as to the remarkable realism of the Waldweben (Wagner's "Seigfried") performance, but nothing was more appreciated during the evening than the closing number, the "Freischutz" overture. If it should turn out to be true that Mr. Nikisch is to surrender the conductorship of the Boston Orchestra at the close of the season and go to Europe to accept a like position, he could have given his Philadelphia admirers no more memorable example of his work than the "Freischutz" overture. The introductory was taken with a slowness of tempo which gave it a draggy effect, and the Prayer (in which, by the way, the horns covered themselves with credit) was taken at a largo rather than adagio, but, despite this, the overture went with a swing and fire that made it really delightful. As a rule, the pause at the close, just before the great fortissimo, is made merely nominal, but Mr. Nikisch held the band until the silence became impressive; then he let go, and the effect was electrical. In matters of detail like this the Boston Orchestra would be apt to go long without his equal should Mr. Nikisch leave.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last Night of Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its season last night at the Academy with a program which included some of the more popular works of classic composers. The symphony was Mendelssohn's Italian, in A major, a beautiful composition, full of light and color, which Mr. Nikisch treats very daintily, in fact, a trifle too much so. The other numbers were the Roman Carnival overture, by Berlioz; the "Waldweben" music from "Siegfried" and the overture to "Der Freischuetz."

The soloist was to have been Mr. Kneisel, but he was ill and Mr. T. Adamowski played two movements of a concerto by Brooks. It is a romantic composition, very pretty, with a delightful orchestral accompaniment, and Mr. Adamowski played with expression and captivated the audience, for the applause that greeted him has seldom been excelled in the Academy, and it was prolonged for ten minutes, but Mr. Nikisch declined to grant an encore.

This is probably the last time Mr. Nikisch will be heard in this city, for he contemplates returning to Europe at the end of this season. His work has made a deep impression on Philadelphia, and while there is plenty of room for honest differences as to his theories of interpretation, particularly as applied to the major compositions of the great classic writers, nevertheless he is a conductor who carries out his purposes most admirably and has given us some of the best music we have heard. In the lighter and more delicate works he has no rival as a conductor. He has remodeled the Boston Orchestra so that there is probably not another organization in the world that can produce more delicate music. In refinement of tone and the production of the more sensuous musical compositions he has reached the highest stage, and he will be sadly missed if he persists in his determination to go back to Europe. The concert last night was pleasing, though somewhat lacking in breadth.

...MARCH 16, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Last Concert for the Season at the Academy a Brilliant Success.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening before one of those crowded and brilliant audiences which nowadays it never fails to attract. The programme, which was extremely varied and interesting, presented as its leading feature Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, a noble composition, nobly played. Other numbers were Berlioz' "Carnival Romain" overture and the overture to "Der Freyschutz," while the inclusion of the "Forest Voices" scene from "Siegfried" enabled Mr. Nikisch to exhibit in an especially impressive and enjoyable manner the superb quality of his strings. Mr. Franz Kneisel was to have been the soloist, but owing to his illness his place was taken by Mr. Adamowski, who played a Bruch concerto with fine intelligence and unfailingly adequate technique.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1893.

Mr. Nikisch Directs for Probably the Last Time in Philadelphia.

The last concert, probably, that Arthur Nikisch will direct in this city was given at the Academy of Music last evening. For the occasion the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in its finest form. It gave to the charming fourth symphony of Mendelssohn a new grace. Perhaps it did not bring out all the splendor that is in the penultimate passages of the "Waldweben," but its playing in this piece though somewhat repressed was never lifeless. Its rendering of the overture to "Der Freischuetz" was dignified and, especially in the opening bars, delightfully smooth.

Because Mr. Kneisel had a cold he could not play the first movement of Brahms' concerto for violin in D major, though he had been announced for this piece. Mr. Adamowski took his place and played extremely well, his rendering of the beautiful music was full of poetic feeling. The audience, which quite filled the Academy, applauded him enthusiastically, but failed to obtain an encore.

TIMES—PHILADELPHIA

MARCH 16, 1893.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Last Concert of the Season Under the Direction of Mr. Nikisch.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Nikisch was altogether the most successful of this very successful season. The programme was well chosen and well arranged and its execution left no occasion for anything but warmest praise. Opening with Berlioz' "Roman Carnival," it closed with the "Freischutz" overture, played not only with romantic spirit, but with unusual fervor, and included between these different works the lovely Italian symphony of Mendelssohn.

The smoothness and grace, the delicacy and refinement characteristic of this great orchestra were beautifully displayed in this eminently poetical and brightly colored symphony, which Mr. Nikisch handled with a vivacity he has not always shown. The other numbers were two movements of the Bruch violin concerto, which Mr. Adamowski played admirably, with a skill that well deserved the warm applause it earned, and the favorite "Waldweben," always one of the most fascinating of the Wagner concert excerpts.

It has been announced that Mr. Nikisch will leave the Boston Orchestra at the end of this season to become director of the Royal Opera at Buda-Pesth. His place will be hard to fill. While he took the orchestra already in complete organization and discipline from the hands of Mr. Gericke, he has brought it still further forward in the line of artistic adaptability, and any conductor who shall follow him will have an opportunity to be envied. He has at the same time impressed his own distinct personality strongly upon it, and while his limitations have been often spoken of there never could be any question of his knowledge and skill or his acute artistic perceptions. In the line of modern music in which his personal sympathies mainly extend, he has achieved results that have not been equaled and are not likely to be surpassed.

[122]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 15, 1893.

The program of the eighteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Concerto for piano, D minor.....Rubinstein
"Siegfried Idyl".....Wagner
Symphony No. 3, E flat.....Schumann

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist.

This program, of course, is excellent; there are masterpieces of the romantic school, and they have all been heard here many a time. I confess that I 'gin to be a-weary of masterpieces, classical or romantic, when they are presented at regular, frequent intervals and in bulk. I should like to hear things that I should probably dislike during and after the hearing. I should like to hear these new French "machines:" Charpentier's "La vie du Poète" and Saint-Saëns' "Africa."

Would that "Pagliacci" or "A Santa Lucia" or "Mala Vita" might cross the water and drive, at least for a month, symphony concerts and analytical programs into utter darkness and oblivion.

How few of us have the courage to express our thoughts, even in jest, as frankly as was the habit of Thackeray. Do you remember what he wrote concerning the "second rate"? "I have always had a taste for the second rate in life. Second-rate poetry, for instance, is an uncommon deal pleasanter to my fancy than your great thundering first-rate epic poems. Your Miltons and Dantes are magnificent—but a bore. Whereas an ode of Horace or a song of Tommy Moore is always fresh, sparkling and welcome. * * * Second-rate beauty in women is likewise, I maintain, more agreeable than first-rate charms. Your first rate Beauty is grand, severe, awful!—a faultless, frigid angel of 5 feet 9. Superb to behold at church or in the park, or at a Drawing room—but ah! how inferior to a sweet little second rate creature, with smiling eyes and a little second-rate nez retroussé, with which you fall in love in a minute!"

And so I would gladly have exchanged, last evening, the Schumann symphony for an overture by Auber; nor would I have gone to Music Hall, if "The Princess of Trebizond" had received all callers in a snug little theatre. You see that I am not in the mood to speak in detail of the Symphony concert, and after all of what use is the come-and-go over familiar ground?

Mrs. Zeisler played with a strength that occasionally robbed tone of beauty; but her performance as a whole was admirable in the display of technical ease and poetic spirit. Her performance was also a revelation of glowing temperament. This temperament, however, became exuberant; it called attention to itself, as though it were afraid that the hearer might not regard it closely. And this exuberance was not confined to tone; it appeared in gesture, in posture.

PHILIP HALE.

FAREWELL TO NIKISCH.

TO-MORROW evening at Chickering Hall Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his farewell bow to us for at least five years. He goes after urgent requests and the offer of terms that would melt the most obdurate of resolutions, to Buda-Pesth to become the director general of the Royal Opera House in that charming city. Mr. Nikisch will, in addition to conducting the operatic performances, also conduct the Philharmonic Society concerts. He regrets leaving America greatly, for he has made many friendships during his four years' residence here; but then who could resist the temptation of leaving the grey, demure life of Boston to live in one of the most brilliant and cosmopolitan cities of Europe, and to supervise the musical destinies of one of the most complete opera houses in the world, with a life pension attached to the position.

No matter who will be Mr. Nikisch's successor, and there is a rumor of pending negotiations with Hans Richter, Mr. Nikisch's departure is in the nature of a personal loss. The magnetic qualities of his conducting, his superb musicianship, his glowing artistic nature, coupled with his sterling qualities as a man, all have endeared him to his New York audiences, and a wail will go up when the news becomes known. Getting musicianly conductors will not be a trying task for the managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; to get a man to adequately replace Mr. Nikisch in every sense will be next door to the impossible.

He is a union of musicianly, dramatic poetic and virtuoso qualities that is rarely encountered even in this time of versatility. Mr. Nikisch plays Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, for the last time, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music; in Chicago two concerts, 14th and 16th of May, at which the soloists will be Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder, and his season closes in Detroit May 20. About June 1 Mr. Nikisch goes to Europe, and that is probably the last America will see of this great and unique conductor, to whom we can only say hopefully, "Auf Wiedersehen."

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give the closing concert at Chickering Hall to-morrow (Thursday) evening. Mr. Nikisch's program includes the overture "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; concerto for violin, Brahms; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner, and the symphony in E minor, No. 5, Tschaikowsky. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

The orchestra will also give performances at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. T. Adamowski as soloists.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Donnerstag, 16. März 1893.

Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra". In der „Academy of Music" fand gestern Abend vor einem vollen Hause unter Leitung des Kapellmeisters, Herrn Arthur Nikisch, ein Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" statt. Das Konzert, das fünfte der Saison 1892—1893, reihte sich ebenbürtig an die vorhergehenden an, und das gediegene, mit großer Meisterschaft vorgetragene Programm riß das kunstsinnige Publikum zu lautem, anhaltenden Beifall hin. Leider war der Solist, Herr Franz Kneisel, dessen Auftreten man mit großer Spannung entgegengesehen hatte, durch Unwohlsein verhindert, dem Publikum den erwarteten Genuß zu bereiten, doch wurde dasselbe durch Herrn Adamowski, der an Stelle des plötzlich Erkrankten trat und zwei Piecen aus Max Bruch's G Moll Konzert mit gewohnter Virtuosität vortrug, reichlich entschädigt.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

FAREWELL TO MR. NIKISCH.

New Yorkers Listen for the Last Time to the Symphony Conductor.

Special Dispatch to the Boston Journal.

NEW YORK, March 16. The thought, doubtless, which was uppermost in the minds of the audience at the last concert for this season in Chickering Hall to-night was that most unexpectedly the affair had been turned at the eleventh hour into a farewell to Mr. Nikisch, the conductor. It has been under Mr. Nikisch's direction that the concerts of the organization have taken the high place in popular favor which they have occupied during the last three years. The concert was changed in character by the illness of Mr. Kneisel, who was to have played the first movement of the violin concerto by Brahms. In his absence Mrs. Nikisch sang with the orchestra a "Spring Song," by Feruccio Busoni, and afterward some songs by Brahms, Paderewski and Schumann to the pianoforte accompaniments of her husband. The performances were all most amiable and sympathetic, and were supplemented by Brahms's "Vegebliches Staendchen." The orchestral numbers were Berlioz's overture "Carnaval Romain," Wagner's "Waldweben" and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony.

Mr. Nikisch said after the concert that he had all along expected to make America his future home, and that the separation would be a peculiarly poignant one for him. He felt, however, that the invitation to become the conductor of the opera at Buda-Pesth was such an opportunity as is offered to a musician only once in a lifetime, and that he owed it to his family not to let it go by.

THE WASHINGTON POST, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 15,

PADEREWSKI DREW THE PEOPLE.

Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Under Mr. Nikisch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski as a soloist, packed Metzerott Music Hall last evening to its utmost capacity. Last Saturday morning the last seat in the house was sold and countless applicants were disappointed. Over 200 of these paid for the privilege of standing during the concert so that the walls were well lined. In the lower box on the left of the stage were Princess Kaianlani and party, and opposite were Prince Cantacuzene and daughter with Mr. Botkine. Mrs. Cleveland was among the disappointed ones, as the boxes were all sold before she applied.

Paderewski was the drawing card, and the audience listened to the C major concerto of Schumann with evident impatience, anxious to greet the Polish pianist. As he entered the hall the audience gave him a hearty welcome, which he modestly acknowledged.

His first number was his own concerto in A minor, which fixes his rank as a musician. It is a vigorous composition, full of youthful fire, introducing folk songs, and treating the piano not as a solo instrument, but only as a part of the orchestra. His performance of it was a brilliant piece of piano work, and his rapid scale passages almost took away one's breath. At the close there was a number of recalls, but the artist declined to do more than acknowledge them.

After Bizet's Suite L'Arlesienne, No. 1, by the orchestra, he played a group of three piano pieces, "Wachtstueck," by Schumann; "Etude Paganini," Schumann, and Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise," No. 12. After these the audience could not be satisfied with bowing, and he played in exquisite style his own "Minuet," which has been played here by a number of artists, notably Aus der Ohe.

The concert closed with the Vorspiel to "Die Miestersinger."

This is the last appearance here of the orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Nikisch, he having accepted the post of director general of the court opera at Buda-Pesth at the highest salary ever paid a conductor.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT

Philadelphia, Thursday, March 16, 1893.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert which last night closed the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series attracted to the Academy of Music one of the largest audiences of the season. The programme contained four orchestral numbers, including the symphony, and its execution occupied less than an hour and a half, but the concert was one of the most thoroughly enjoyable the Orchestra has ever given here. The "Roman Carnaval" overture of Berlioz, which headed the list, was performed with rare clearness, warmth and finish. A violin solo by Franz Kneisel was to have followed, but Mr. Kneisel's indisposition was announced, and Timothy Adamowsky arose from the ranks of the first violins and took his place. He played the opening and andante movements from Max Brüch's concerto, and with such beauty and purity of tone and refined skill that he received something of an ovation from the house, which gave him round after round of applause, and quite a number of hands were kept in collision with each other for what seemed to be a couple of minutes—long after good taste would have suggested a cessation, indeed—evidently with the object of getting Mr. Adamowsky to play something else.

Mendelssohn's Fourth (Italian) Symphony came next, or in the middle of the list, a happy compromise as between the placing of the symphony at the top or at the bottom of a programme. It would be superfluous to dwell upon the results of Mr. Nikisch's union of power and delicacy in giving graphic form to the exuberant fancy and genial nature that Mendelssohn infused into this work, as it would be to enter into detail as to the remarkable realism of the Waldweben (Wagner's "Seigfried") performance, but nothing was more appreciated during the evening than the closing number, the "Freischutz" overture. If it should turn out to be true that Mr. Nikisch is to surrender the conductorship of the Boston Orchestra at the close of the season and go to Europe to accept a like position, he could have given his Philadelphia admirers no more memorable example of his work than the "Freischutz" overture. The introductory was taken with a slowness of tempo which gave it a draggy effect, and the Prayer (in which, by the way, the horns covered themselves with credit) was taken at a largo rather than adagio, but, despite this, the overture went with a swing and fire that made it really delightful. As a rule, the pause at the close, just before the great fortissimo, is made merely nominal, but Mr. Nikisch held the band until the silence became impressive; then he let go, and the effect was electrical. In matters of detail like this the Boston Orchestra would be apt to go long without his equal should Mr. Nikisch leave.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last Night of Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its season last night at the Academy with a program which included some of the more popular works of classic composers. The symphony was Mendelssohn's Italian, in A major, a beautiful composition, full of light and color, which Mr. Nikisch treats very daintily, in fact, a trifle too much so. The other numbers were the Roman Carnival overture, by Berlioz; the "Waldweben" music from "Siegfried" and the overture to "Der Freischuetz."

The soloist was to have been Mr. Kneisel, but he was ill and Mr. T. Adamowski played two movements of a concerto by Brooks. It is a romantic composition, very pretty, with a delightful orchestral accompaniment, and Mr. Adamowski played with expression and captivated the audience, for the applause that greeted him has seldom been excelled in the Academy, and it was prolonged for ten minutes, but Mr. Nikisch declined to grant an encore.

This is probably the last time Mr. Nikisch will be heard in this city, for he contemplates returning to Europe at the end of this season. His work has made a deep impression on Philadelphia, and while there is plenty of room for honest differences as to his theories of interpretation, particularly as applied to the major compositions of the great classic writers, nevertheless he is a conductor who carries out his purposes most admirably and has given us some of the best music we have heard. In the lighter and more delicate works he has no rival as a conductor. He has remodeled the Boston Orchestra so that there is probably not another organization in the world that can produce more delicate music. In refinement of tone and the production of the more sensuous musical compositions he has reached the highest stage, and he will be sadly missed if he persists in his determination to go back to Europe. The concert last night was pleasing, though somewhat lacking in breadth.

NORTH AMERICAN, PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 16, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Last Concert for the Season at the Academy a Brilliant Success.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening before one of those crowded and brilliant audiences which nowadays it never fails to attract. The programme, which was extremely varied and interesting, presented as its leading feature Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, a noble composition, nobly played. Other numbers were Berlioz' "Carnival Romain" overture and the overture to "Der Freyschutz," while the inclusion of the "Forest Voices" scene from "Siegfried" enabled Mr. Nikisch to exhibit in an especially impressive and enjoyable manner the superb quality of his strings. Mr. Franz Kneisel was to have been the soloist, but owing to his illness his place was taken by Mr. Adamowski, who played a Bruch concerto with fine intelligence and unfailingly adequate technique.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1893.

Mr. Nikisch Directs for Probably the Last Time in Philadelphia.

The last concert, probably, that Arthur Nikisch will direct in this city was given at the Academy of Music last evening. For the occasion the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in its finest form. It gave to the charming fourth symphony of Mendelssohn a new grace. Perhaps it did not bring out all the splendor that is in the penultimate passages of the "Waldweben," but its playing in this piece though somewhat repressed was never lifeless. Its rendering of the overture to "Der Freischuetz" was dignified and, especially in the opening bars, delightfully smooth.

Because Mr. Kneisel had a cold he could not play the first movement of Brahms' concerto for violin in D major, though he had been announced for this piece. Mr. Adamowski took his place and played extremely well, his rendering of the beautiful music was full of poetic feeling. The audience, which quite filled the Academy, applauded him enthusiastically, but failed to obtain an encore.

TIMES—PHILADELPHIA MARCH 16, 1893.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Last Concert of the Season Under the Direction of Mr. Nikisch.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Nikisch was altogether the most successful of this very successful season. The programme was well chosen and well arranged and its execution left no occasion for anything but warmest praise. Opening with Berlioz' "Roman Carnival," it closed with the "Freischutz" overture, played not only with romantic spirit, but with unusual fervor, and included between these different works the lovely Italian symphony of Mendelssohn.

The smoothness and grace, the delicacy and refinement characteristic of this great orchestra were beautifully displayed in this eminently poetical and brightly colored symphony, which Mr. Nikisch handled with a vivacity he has not always shown. The other numbers were two movements of the Bruch violin concerto, which Mr. Adamowski played admirably, with a skill that well deserved the warm applause it earned, and the favorite "Waldweben," always one of the most fascinating of the Wagner concert excerpts.

It has been announced that Mr. Nikisch will leave the Boston Orchestra at the end of this season to become director of the Royal Opera at Buda-Pesth. His place will be hard to fill. While he took the orchestra already in complete organization and discipline from the hands of Mr. Gericke, he has brought it still further forward in the line of artistic adaptability, and any conductor who shall follow him will have an opportunity to be envied. He has at the same time impressed his own distinct personality strongly upon it, and while his limitations have been often spoken of there never could be any question of his knowledge and skill or his acute artistic perceptions. In the line of modern music in which his personal sympathies mainly extend, he has achieved results that have not been equaled and are not likely to be surpassed.

[122]

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

NIKISCH'S FAREWELL CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch's last appearance here as leader of the Boston Orchestra attracted the usual great crowd to Chickering Hall last evening. In musical circles it was generally known that this noted musician had decided to accept the offer made to him by the Royal Opera House at Buda-Pesth, and last night's concert was, therefore, something in the nature of a farewell. The audience looked at it in this light, and their applause was, if possible, more enthusiastic than ever. The splendid orchestra was heard in Berlioz's brilliant "Carnival Overture," in the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and in Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. In the Berlioz number was had one of the most brilliant bits of orchestral playing ever heard here. The symphony was also a delight to the critical audience.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was to have played part of Brahms' first violin concerto, but was too ill to appear. In his place Mrs. Nikisch sang a "Spring Song" of Busoni, the Boston composer, rather a long drawn out affair, and also songs by Brahms, Paderewski and Schumann, giving as an encore Brahms' "Vergebliches Staenchen" with much archness and grace.

At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch was recalled five times and there were loud but ineffectual calls for a speech. To a number of friends who remained when the crowd dispersed the conductor expressed his regret at leaving America, but intimated that he might come back some day.

His present contract with the Buda-Pesth Opera House is for three years and his duties will begin next September. He will be intendant of the house and have three conductors under him, so that he will lead the orchestra only upon extraordinary occasions. The contract was signed only last Friday, but the negotiations have been going on for the last three months.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

The Closing Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Series.

It is now definitely settled that Mr. Nikisch accepts his recent call to Buda-Pesth, and that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, if it is not disbanded, must seek another leader. For this reason the fifth concert of this organization, given last evening in Chickering Hall before the usual crowded audience, was announced as the last of the series. Unfortunately it proved the least interesting of any that have so far been heard. The illness of Herr Kneisel took from the programme a work of much power and dignity, the first movement of Brahms's concerto in D for violin, thus letting the meaning and intention of the concert down to a lower plane. For even the pretty songs sung by Mrs. Nikisch, who infused into them a large quantity of effort and German method and sentiment, could not stand quite upon the artistic level of the omitted violin solo, although possibly the exchange was welcome to the audience. At all events, Mrs. Nikisch received warm applause and accepted an enthusiastic encore.

Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" was not as well played as might reasonably have been expected by those who remember how exquisitely the "Queen Mab Scherzo" and other bits of Berlioz's dainty writing have formerly been rendered by the Symphony Orchestra. And the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" was even less successful, seeming quite out of proportion and distorted; the leaves rustled so poorly, so stiffly, and the bird was so much too big for the size of the woods, and there was no flickering sunlight and shadow. Which means that the violins seemed to be playing one solid chord, and that the wind instruments were blown too loudly, and that the picturesque vision of woodland beauty usually spread before the mind of a listener was not present in Mr. Nikisch's version of the "Waldweben."

Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony was more satisfactorily interpreted. It is unlike most symphonies in having three of its movements set as "andante." The first number is full of repetitions which a greater man would have in some way avoided or cut out. But the composition constantly improves until the last movement is energetic, broad, and fine. A good though not exceptional rendering was given to the work. At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch was called out many times by hearty and long-continued applause. A sixth concert was to have been given on the 27th of April, but who can tell now when we may again hear the "Boston Symphony"?

THE EVENING TELEGRAPH

THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The final concert of the Boston Orchestra series was given last evening at the Academy of Music the enterprise being followed to the close by undiminished proofs of interest. The occasion also marked, according to current reports, the end of Mr. Nikisch's contribution to local entertainment, a fact which was likely dwelt on by many of those present, though no public notice was taken of the circumstance. The programme was entirely familiar, but it was also entirely good, and was excellently performed throughout. It embraced the Carnival Romaine (Berlioz) and the Freischutz overtures Wagner's "Waldweben," and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony. The soloist was Mr. T. Adamowski, who took the place of Mr. Franz Kneisel, announced but too ill to appear. There is no great difference in the value of these violinists, and the substitution of Mr. Adamowski was entirely acceptable to the audience. He is a player of strong and full tone, and filled the large theatre completely, a thing which violin soloists do not often succeed in doing. Mr. Adamowski's selection was a portion of a concerto by Bruch, and the artist secured a hearty triumph. Doubtless the violin and the violoncello are the chief solo instruments, but there are others, and it seems strange that they are not oftener employed in orchestral concerts. While not seriously competing with the great string instruments, they have value and would give variety. This reflection was especially induced last night in listening to the beautiful effects of the horn in the third movement of the symphony and in the Freischutz overture. Fine things have been written for horn solos, duets, and quartettes; also for bassoon, oboe, clarionet, and flute. There are concertos with orchestra for all these instruments, by eminent composers. But we have got into certain ruts in programme-making and neglect stores of some of the finest music in the world. It is certain that a conductor with wit enough to disregard the conventions of the day would do an immense work in this direction in gratifying and instructing the public. And if we are [illegible] he would therein also make

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

MARCH 18, 1893.

This year there comes a repetition of the talk which we had last year about the resignation of Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with this difference, that now it seems to be well founded. Last year his contract had not expired, but the current rumor that he was going to leave probably had some foundation, and if it had such, it discredits, to a certain extent, the statement now made that it is purely love for the fatherland which leads Nikisch to go.

I am not surprised at this action and one can hardly blame him for going, even leaving the great honor which is to be his out of the question. He came here and took an excellent orchestra, no doubt, but under him it has taken a much higher position than it held before. Musicians may disagree with me here, and I do not pretend to judge from my own knowledge, but take the opinions of those who are best able to say.

Paderewski, for instance, has been quoted as saying that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had no superior and hardly an equal in all Europe, and certainly his word is good for something. But there is a large class of people here in Boston who are deliberately engaged in belittling home affairs. Of course, Nikisch has been made a lion of socially, and the concerts have never been more fashionable and therefore financially successful.

But many of the critics have seemed banded together to rap the conductor whenever they got a chance. They reminded me of flies around an ox, and the great animal gives a twist of his tail and they fly away only to renew the attack at the first opportunity. Allied to these insects are others which fly around and make a buzzing noise. They are the musicians who were not selected to play, or who were dropped out, or who had a friend who was not re-engaged. And then there is the great number of small music-teachers all of whom could give Nikisch points, who wish to show their erudition by finding fault.

And so all of these have swarmed around the Symphony's leader, and have made life somewhat of a burden, I fancy. The critics pretend that they want high-class music, and when they get a man who tries to give it them, they pick minor flaws, look at them under a microscope and then "go" for him. By this I mean some of the critics, for I would by no means include all in a sweeping assertion of littleness.

But Nikisch does not mention these things, he merely speaks of the amount of work he has been doing in conducting 124 great concerts in seven months, besides traveling. In his Philadelphia interview he stated that his chief inducement for quitting the orchestra, was that he has been offered the position of director-general of the Royal-Opera at Buda-Pesth. He does not state the sum offered, but it is the highest salary ever offered a musician, and the position is one of the greatest honor in the profession. Hans Richter had the post before he left for Vienna, and the latest musician who held it was Count Zichy.

Of course this is a big thing, and no one can blame Nikisch for going back home. But his selection shows what kind of a man he is considered to be, and it also shows another thing, and that is that if we want to get and keep big men we must offer sufficient inducements to bring them and then to hold them. In no other way can anything, any enterprise keep a great man. In the world's markets everybody is looking for the best, and gratitude is not apt to hold a man when something more tangible offers elsewhere.

.....

The resignation of Mr. Arthur Nikisch was a great surprise to his admirers on the Back Bay. When Mr. Nikisch left Leipsic four years ago, he brought the entire house furnishings with him, which those who have had the pleasure of being guests at his home in Brookline know are handsome and artistic. Shortly after his arrival here he was presented with a magnificent piano by the Steinways, and he has added other rare articles of vertu. If Mr. Nikisch contemplates again transporting his household gods across the water, he will have his time fully occupied during the next two months, as he is anxious to sail in June.

.....

Madame Huessner, Mrs. Nikisch's mother, is tearfully joyful at the proposed return. She has not mastered the English language to any great extent, and has sighed for the fatherland, and had it not been for the two little members of the family she would have been very homesick. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch regret leaving friends here, but he feels the strain of American life too great for him, as his health is not of the best.

.....

The last of the Nikisch subscription concerts took place yesterday at the home of Mrs. Paran Stevens in New York. The last Adamowski chamber concert of this season occurs in New York to-day.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1893.

The resignation of Mr. Nikisch from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra come at this time as a surprise, although it had been half expected to take place at the expiration of the full five-year contract. He is to leave this post for another his eminent fitness for which will not be questioned even by those who have been least able or willing to consider him as the right man here—the conductorship at the opera house of Buda-Pesth. He has been much criticized and often severely censured during his term in this city; but wilfulness has rarely been imputed, unless it be of that temperamental sort which makes one take counsel sometimes from impulse rather than from reflection—from the feeling of the moment rather than from deliberate self-control. His is a strongly and ardently musical nature, well cultured, enriched by experience and polished by taste, yet occasionally hasty and erratic. In dramatic music such a disposition will find constant scope for its ambition and ardor, and not be obliged to try—as in classical music—to restrain itself, only to burst out ungovernably at some inopportune moment. Mr. Nikisch has been a conspicuous figure in musical Boston and has won an esteem of which he may properly be proud. Good wishes will attend him when he goes and good news from him will always be welcome.

Well, well! is Mr. Nikisch to be put in the same category with Homer and Columbus and have cities clamoring to claim him as their son? According to one local biographer, he was born at Raab, near Presburg, while another assigns Szent Mikios as the place of his nativity, with others yet to be heard from. At any rate, they agree thus far that Hungary was the country and October 12, 1855, the date. Some of his local admirers are no doubt regretting that he was not born in Boston, since he has taken to adoption so kindly.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 19.

Mr. Nikisch and the Symphony Orchestra.

To the Editor of the Saturday Evening Gazette.

DEAR SIR: As you are presumably responsible for the musical criticisms which appear in your paper, may I write to you my complaint that this winter the weak points of our Symphony Orchestra have been hammered at incessantly by your critic, much to the neglect of its good points?

Now, good points it has, and it has seemed to others, if not to your critic, that one of those points has been the dignified behavior of its members. One had but to watch closely through the concerts given by the orchestras which have visited Boston this season, to see what some conductors will allow. Why, we should gasp to see Mr. Kneisel do what Mr. Brodsky did, and that was to leave the stage (when young Marteau came on to play a selection with an orchestral accompaniment), and, by way of leaving, to climb over the outstretched feet of the next violinist, as he would over a low, stone wall!

I think, Mr. Editor, your critic and I would be inclined to "lean back" in our chairs once in a while, if we had played in 124 concerts and rehearsals in seven months. I do not wonder that Mr. Nikisch appeared fatigued last Saturday evening, though very possibly that was due to worry over not reaching Music Hall till after eight o'clock, owing to a delayed train.

I have attended, Mr. Editor, every Saturday evening concert in the course this winter, and not once have I seen such tittering and nudges as men permitted in one of the above-mentioned orchestras.

Another good point, although you, perhaps, will consider it a superficial one;—but I cannot agree to that—is the bearing of Mr. Nikisch when with baton in hand: no superfluous motion, no bending of the legs for extra emphasis, as if weak-kneed; no sawing the air with long arms, like a wounded bird trying desperately to rise on wing. A careless observer would say there was not enough motion and emotion in the conducting of Mr. Nikisch to incite his men to highest action; but let that observer for once be less careless, and he will see concentrated power and magnetism in the quiet pose and steady hand. I have yet to see Mr. Nikisch fail to get a tremendous tour de force, or sudden emphasis, or quick tempo, if he so minded.

As I more than have hinted above, the bearing of a conductor seems to me of considerable importance. It is wearying to the spectator to see gymnastics on the conductor's stand, and moppings of brow; to see a conductor "make faces," as the children say, first to his fluteist, when it is time for a bit of a solo, then to the horns when they should come in, and, finally, with worst face of all, and arms on high, like a Dutch windmill, to the drums.

Oh, I have thanked over and over again the Fates, that they made Mr. Nikisch not that kind, thus giving us hearers and onlookers golden opportunities to digest good music, without such usual, I had almost said, distraction.

One more opinion as to our orchestra's worth will be of value, and that is of no less a person than Paderewski. Why should he have been so delighted with their work, if it were poor work? Is he not a good judge?

Of course, there is but one Mr. Gericke, but he has decidedly his limitations in this very modern day; and, by the way, did not the arduous work he did with this orchestra (perhaps, climate had a small share of responsibility) very nearly kill him?

But, if we cannot have Mr. Gericke, what then—is there no balm in Gilead?

KAY.

[illegible]

SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1893.

NIKISCH SORRY TO LEAVE.

But Could Not Neglect Offer From Buda-Pesth.

Fulsome Praise of the Artist by New York Papers.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE TRANSCRIPT.]

NEW YORK, March 17. Mr. Nikisch, who directed the last concert of the Symphony Orchestra in the current series here last night, is credited with the statement that he had long expected to make America his home and that his intended departure was very painful to him, but the opportunity that the engagement at Buda-Pesth offered was not to be neglected. The audience regarded the concert as the conductor's last appearance in New York, and applauded him throughout most heartily, recalling him five times at its end. The singing of Mrs. Nikisch, in lieu of Mr. Kneisel, who was ill, made the concert a sort of family affair.

The newspapers this morning dwell upon the esteem which Mr. Nikisch enjoys here, and speak warmly of his work. "No higher praise can be spoken," says the Tribune, "than this, that he took up the task when Mr. Gericke left it, and carried it forward on his own lines without sacrifice of one iota of his individuality of conception or method, to a conclusion which has excited the admiration and the pride of every true lover of high art."

The Times adds that "the love of music in America will be the stronger for his sojourn here," and that "his departure will leave a void in the art world not easy to fill."

The World is curious to know when we shall look upon his like again, and the Sun ridiculously suggests the possible dispersion of the orchestra after his departure. H. T. P.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, March 16, 1893.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert which last night closed the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series attracted to the Academy of Music one of the largest audiences of the season. The programme contained four orchestral numbers, including the symphony, and its execution occupied less than an hour and a half, but the concert was one of the most thoroughly enjoyable the Orchestra has ever given here. The "Roman Carnaval" overture of Berlioz, which headed the list, was performed with rare clearness, warmth and finish. A violin solo by Franz Kneisel was to have followed, but Mr. Kneisel's indisposition was announced, and Timothy Adamowsky arose from the ranks of the first violins and took his place. He played the opening and andante movements from Max Brüch's concerto, and with such beauty and purity of tone and refined skill that he received something of an ovation from the house, which gave him round after round of applause, and quite a number of hands were kept in collision with each other for what seemed to be a couple of minutes—long after good taste would have suggested a cessation, indeed—evidently with the object of getting Mr. Adamowsky to play something else.

Mendelssohn's Fourth (Italian) Symphony came next, or in the middle of the list, a happy compromise as between the placing of the symphony at the top or at the bottom of a programme. It would be superfluous to dwell upon the results of Mr. Nikisch's union of power and delicacy in giving graphic form to the exuberant fancy and genial nature that Mendelssohn infused into this work, as it would be to enter into detail as to the remarkable realism of the Waldweben (Wagner's "Seigfried") performance, but nothing was more appreciated during the evening than the closing number, the "Freischutz" overture. If it should turn out to be true that Mr. Nikisch is to surrender the conductorship of the Boston Orchestra at the close of the season and go to Europe to accept a like position, he could have given his Philadelphia admirers no more memorable example of his work than the "Freischutz" overture. The introductory was taken with a slowness of tempo which gave it a draggy effect, and the Prayer (in which, by the way, the horns covered themselves with credit) was taken at a largo rather than adagio, but, despite this, the overture went with a swing and fire that made it really delightful. As a rule, the pause at the close, just before the great fortissimo, is made merely nominal, but Mr. Nikisch held the band until the silence became impressive; then he let go, and the effect was electrical. In matters of detail like this the Boston Orchestra would be apt to go long without his equal should Mr. Nikisch leave.

[123]

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

NIKISCH'S FAREWELL CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch's last appearance here as leader of the Boston Orchestra attracted the usual great crowd to Chickering Hall last evening. In musical circles it was generally known that this noted musician had decided to accept the offer made to him by the Royal Opera House at Buda-Pesth, and last night's concert was, therefore, something in the nature of a farewell. The audience looked at it in this light, and their applause was, if possible, more enthusiastic than ever. The splendid orchestra was heard in Berlioz's brilliant "Carnival Overture," in the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and in Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. In the Berlioz number was had one of the most brilliant bits of orchestral playing ever heard here. The symphony was also a delight to the critical audience.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was to have played part of Brahms' first violin concerto, but was too ill to appear. In his place Mrs. Nikisch sang a "Spring Song" of Busoni, the Boston composer, rather a long drawn out affair, and also songs by Brahms, Paderewski and Schumann, giving as an encore Brahms' "Vergebliches Staenchen" with much archness and grace.

At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch was recalled five times and there were loud but ineffectual calls for a speech. To a number of friends who remained when the crowd dispersed the conductor expressed his regret at leaving America, but intimated that he might come back some day.

His present contract with the Buda-Pesth Opera House is for three years and his duties will begin next September. He will be intendant of the house and have three conductors under him, so that he will lead the orchestra only upon extraordinary occasions. The contract was signed only last Friday, but the negotiations have been going on for the last three months.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

The Closing Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Series.

It is now definitely settled that Mr. Nikisch accepts his recent call to Buda-Pesth, and that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, if it is not disbanded, must seek another leader. For this reason the fifth concert of this organization, given last evening in Chickering Hall before the usual crowded audience, was announced as the last of the series. Unfortunately it proved the least interesting of any that have so far been heard. The illness of Herr Kneisel took from the programme a work of much power and dignity, the first movement of Brahms's concerto in D for violin, thus letting the meaning and intention of the concert down to a lower plane. For even the pretty songs sung by Mrs. Nikisch, who infused into them a large quantity of effort and German method and sentiment, could not stand quite upon the artistic level of the omitted violin solo, although possibly the exchange was welcome to the audience. At all events, Mrs. Nikisch received warm applause and accepted an enthusiastic encore.

Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" was not as well played as might reasonably have been expected by those who remember how exquisitely the "Queen Mab Scherzo" and other bits of Berlioz's dainty writing have formerly been rendered by the Symphony Orchestra. And the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" was even less successful, seeming quite out of proportion and distorted; the leaves rustled so poorly, so stiffly, and the bird was so much too big for the size of the woods, and there was no flickering sunlight and shadow. Which means that the violins seemed to be playing one solid chord, and that the wind instruments were blown too loudly, and that the picturesque vision of woodland beauty usually spread before the mind of a listener was not present in Mr. Nikisch's version of the "Waldweben."

Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony was more satisfactorily interpreted. It is unlike most symphonies in having three of its movements set as "andante." The first number is full of repetitions which a greater man would have in some way avoided or cut out. But the composition constantly improves, until the last movement is energetic, broad, and fine. A good though not exceptional rendering was given to the work. At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch was called out many times by hearty and long-continued applause. A sixth concert was to have been given on the 27th of April, but who can tell now when we may again hear the "Boston Symphony"?

THE EVENING TELEGRAPH

THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The final concert of the Boston Orchestra series was given last evening at the Academy of Music the enterprise being followed to the close by undiminished proofs of interest. The occasion also marked, according to current reports, the end of Mr. Nikisch's contribution to local entertainment, a fact which was likely dwelt on by many of those present, though no public notice was taken of the circumstance. The programme was entirely familiar, but it was also entirely good, and was excellently performed throughout. It embraced the Carnival Romaine (Berlioz) and the Freischutz overtures Wagner's "Waldweben," and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony. The soloist was Mr. T. Adamowski, who took the place of Mr. Franz Kneisel, announced but too ill to appear. There is no great difference in the value of these violinists, and the substitution of Mr. Adamowski was entirely acceptable to the audience. He is a player of strong and full tone, and filled the large theatre completely, a thing which violin soloists do not often succeed in doing. Mr. Adamowski's selection was a portion of a concerto by Bruch, and the artist secured a hearty triumph. Doubtless the violin and the violoncello are the chief solo instruments, but there are others, and it seems strange that they are not oftener employed in orchestral concerts. While not seriously competing with the great string instruments, they have value and would give variety. This reflection was especially induced last night in listening to the beautiful effects of the horn in the third movement of the symphony and in the Freischutz overture. Fine things have been written for horn solos, duets, and quartettes; also for bassoon, oboe, clarionet, and flute. There are concertos with orchestra for all these instruments, by eminent composers. But we have got into certain ruts in programme-making and neglect stores of some of the finest music in the world. It is certain that a conductor with wit enough to disregard the conventions of the day could do an immense work in this direction in gratifying and instructing the public. And if we are not mistaken he would therein also make

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

MARCH 18, 1893.

This year there comes a repetition of the talk which we had last year about the resignation of Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with this difference, that now it seems to be well founded. Last year his contract had not expired, but the current rumor that he was going to leave probably had some foundation, and if it had such, it discredits, to a certain extent, the statement now made that it is purely love for the fatherland which leads Nikisch to go.

I am not surprised at this action and one can hardly blame him for going, even leaving the great honor which is to be his out of the question. He came here and took an excellent orchestra, no doubt, but under him it has taken a much higher position than it held before. Musicians may disagree with me here, and I do not pretend to judge from my own knowledge, but take the opinions of those who are best able to say.

Paderewski, for instance, has been quoted as saying that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had no superior and hardly an equal in all Europe, and certainly his word is good for something. But there is a large class of people here in Boston who are deliberately engaged in belittling home affairs. Of course, Nikisch has been made a lion of socially, and the concerts have never been more fashionable and therefore financially successful.

But many of the critics have seemed banded together to rap the conductor whenever they got a chance. They reminded me of flies around an ox, and the great animal gives a twist of his tail and they fly away only to renew the attack at the first opportunity. Allied to these insects are others which fly around and make a buzzing noise. They are the musicians who were not selected to play, or who were dropped out, or who had a friend who was not re-engaged. And then there is the great number of small music-teachers all of whom could give Nikisch points, who wish to show their erudition by finding fault.

And so all of these have swarmed around the Symphony's leader, and have made life somewhat of a burden, I fancy. The critics pretend that they want high-class music, and when they get a man who tries to give it them, they pick minor flaws, look at them under a microscope and then "go" for him. By this I mean some of the critics, for I would by no means include all in a sweeping assertion of littleness.

But Nikisch does not mention these things, he merely speaks of the amount of work he has been doing in conducting 124 great concerts in seven months, besides traveling. In his Philadelphia interview he stated that his chief inducement for quitting the orchestra, was that he has been offered the position of director-general of the Royal-Opera at Buda-Pesth. He does not state the sum offered, but it is the highest salary ever offered a musician, and the position is one of the greatest honor in the profession. Hans Richter had the post before he left for Vienna, and the latest musician who held it was Count Zichy.

Of course this is a big thing, and no one can blame Nikisch for going back home. But his selection shows what kind of a man he is considered to be, and it also shows another thing, and that is that if we want to get and keep big men we must offer sufficient inducements to bring them and then to hold them. In no other way can anything, any enterprise keep a great man. In the world's markets everybody is looking for the best, and gratitude is not apt to hold a man when something more tangible offers elsewhere.

.....

The resignation of Mr. Arthur Nikisch was a great surprise to his admirers on the Back Bay. When Mr. Nikisch left Leipsic four years ago, he brought the entire house furnishings with him, which those who have had the pleasure of being guests at his home in Brookline know are handsome and artistic. Shortly after his arrival here he was presented with a magnificent piano by the Steinways, and he has added other rare articles of vertu. If Mr. Nikisch contemplates again transporting his household gods across the water, he will have his time fully occupied during the next two months, as he is anxious to sail in June.

.....

Madame Huessner, Mrs. Nikisch's mother, is tearfully joyful at the proposed return. She has not mastered the English language to any great extent, and has sighed for the fatherland, and had it not been for the two little members of the family she would have been very homesick. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch regret leaving friends here, but he feels the strain of American life too great for him, as his health is not of the best.

.....

The last of the Nikisch subscription concerts took place yesterday at the home of Mrs. Paran Stevens in New York. The last Adamowski chamber concert of this season occurs in New York to-day.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1893.

The resignation of Mr. Nikisch from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra come at this time as a surprise, although it had been half expected to take place at the expiration of the full five-year contract. He is to leave this post for another his eminent fitness for which will not be questioned even by those who have been least able or willing to consider him as the right man here—the conductorship at the opera house of Buda-Pesth. He has been much criticized and often severely censured during his term in this city; but wilfulness has rarely been imputed, unless it be of that temperamental sort which makes one take counsel sometimes from impulse rather than from reflection—from the feeling of the moment rather than from deliberate self-control. His is a strongly and ardently musical nature, well cultured, enriched by experience and polished by taste, yet occasionally hasty and erratic. In dramatic music such a disposition will find constant scope for its ambition and ardor, and not be obliged to try—as in classical music—to restrain itself, only to burst out ungovernably at some inopportune moment. Mr. Nikisch has been a conspicuous figure in musical Boston and has won an esteem of which he may properly be proud. Good wishes will attend him when he goes and good news from him will always be welcome.

Well, well! is Mr. Nikisch to be put in the same category with Homer and Columbus and have cities clamoring to claim him as their son? According to one local biographer, he was born at Raab, near Presburg, while another assigns Szent Mikios as the place of his nativity, with others yet to be heard from. At any rate, they agree thus far that Hungary was the country and October 12, 1855, the date. Some of his local admirers are no doubt regretting that he was not born in Boston, since he has taken to adoption so kindly.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 19.

Mr. Nikisch and the Symphony Orchestra.

To the Editor of the Saturday Evening Gazette.

DEAR SIR: As you are presumably responsible for the musical criticisms which appear in your paper, may I write to you my complaint that this winter the weak points of our Symphony Orchestra have been hammered at incessantly by your critic, much to the neglect of its good points?

Now, good points it has, and it has seemed to others, if not to your critic, that one of those points has been the dignified behavior of its members. One had but to watch closely through the concerts given by the orchestras which have visited Boston this season, to see what some conductors will allow. Why, we should gasp to see Mr. Kneisel do what Mr. Brodsky did, and that was to leave the stage (when young Marteau came on to play a selection with an orchestral accompaniment), and, by way of leaving, to climb over the outstretched feet of the next violinist, as he would over a low, stone wall!

I think, Mr. Editor, your critic and I would be inclined to "lean back" in our chairs once in a while, if we had played in 124 concerts and reheasals in seven months. I do not wonder that Mr. Nikisch appeared fatigued last Saturday evening, though very possibly that was due to worry over not reaching Music Hall till after eight o'clock, owing to a delayed train.

I have attended, Mr. Editor, every Saturday evening concert in the course this winter, and not once have I seen such tittering and nudges as men permitted in one of the above-mentioned orchestras.

Another good point, although you, perhaps, will consider it a superficial one;—but I cannot agree to that—is the bearing of Mr. Nikisch when with baton in hand: no superfluous motion, no bending of the legs for extra emphasis, as if weak-kneed; no sawing the air with long arms, like a wounded bird trying desperately to rise on wing. A careless observer would say there was not enough motion and emotion in the conducting of Mr. Nikisch to incite his men to highest action; but let that observer for once be less careless, and he will see concentrated power and magnetism in the quiet pose and steady hand. I have yet to see Mr. Nikisch fail to get a tremendous tour de force, or sudden emphasis, or quick tempo, if he so minded.

As I more than have hinted above, the bearing of a conductor seems to me of considerable importance. It is wearying to the spectator to see gymnastics on the conductor's stand, and moppings of brow; to see a conductor "make faces," as the children say, first to his fluteist, when it is time for a bit of a solo, then to the horns when they should come in, and, finally, with worst face of all, and arms on high, like a Dutch windmill, to the drums.

Oh, I have thanked over and over again the Fates, that they made Mr. Nikisch not that kind, thus giving us hearers and onlookers golden opportunities to digest good music, without such usual, I had almost said, distraction.

One more opinion as to our orchestra's worth will be of value, and that is of no less a person than Paderewski. Why should he have been so delighted with their work, if it were poor work? Is he not a good judge?

Of course, there is but one Mr. Gericke, but he has decidedly his limitations in this very modern day; and, by the way, did not the arduous work he did with this orchestra (perhaps, climate had a small share of responsibility) very nearly kill him?

But, if we cannot have Mr. Gericke, what then—is there no balm in Gilead?

KAY.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1893.

NIKISCH SORRY TO LEAVE.

But Could Not Neglect Offer From Buda-Pesth.

Fulsome Praise of the Artist by New York Papers.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE TRANSCRIPT.]

NEW YORK, March 17. Mr. Nikisch, who directed the last concert of the Symphony Orchestra in the current series here last night, is credited with the statement that he had long expected to make America his home and that his intended departure was very painful to him, but the opportunity that the engagement at Buda-Pesth offered was not to be neglected. The audience regarded the concert as the conductor's last appearance in New York, and applauded him throughout most heartily, recalling him five times at its end. The singing of Mrs. Nikisch, in lieu of Mr. Kneisel, who was ill, made the concert a sort of family affair.

The newspapers this morning dwell upon the esteem which Mr. Nikisch enjoys here, and speak warmly of his work. "No higher praise can be spoken," says the Tribune, "than this, that he took up the task when Mr. Gericke left it, and carried it forward on his own lines without sacrifice of one iota of his individuality of conception or method, to a conclusion which has excited the admiration and the pride of every true lover of high art."

The Times adds that "the love of music in America will be the stronger for his sojourn here," and that "his departure will leave a void in the art world not easy to fill."

The World is curious to know when we shall look upon his like again, and the Sun ridiculously suggests the possible dispersion of the orchestra after his departure. H. T. P.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, March 16, 1893.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert which last night closed the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series attracted to the Academy of Music one of the largest audiences of the season. The programme contained four orchestral numbers, including the symphony, and its execution occupied less than an hour and a half, but the concert was one of the most thoroughly enjoyable the Orchestra has ever given here. The "Roman Carnaval" overture of Berlioz, which headed the list, was performed with rare clearness, warmth and finish. A violin solo by Franz Kneisel was to have followed, but Mr. Kneisel's indisposition was announced, and Timothy Adamowsky arose from the ranks of the first violins and took his place. He played the opening and andante movements from Max Brüch's concerto, and with such beauty and purity of tone and refined skill that he received something of an ovation from the house, which gave him round after round of applause, and quite a number of hands were kept in collision with each other for what seemed to be a couple of minutes—long after good taste would have suggested a cessation, indeed—evidently with the object of getting Mr. Adamowsky to play something else.

Mendelssohn's Fourth (Italian) Symphony came next, or in the middle of the list, a happy compromise as between the placing of the symphony at the top or at the bottom of a programme. It would be superfluous to dwell upon the results of Mr. Nikisch's union of power and delicacy in giving graphic form to the exuberant fancy and genial nature that Mendelssohn infused into this work, as it would be to enter into detail as to the remarkable realism of the Waldweben (Wagner's "Seigfried") performance, but nothing was more appreciated during the evening than the closing number, the "Freischutz" overture. If it should turn out to be true that Mr. Nikisch is to surrender the conductorship of the Boston Orchestra at the close of the season and go to Europe to accept a like position, he could have given his Philadelphia admirers no more memorable example of his work than the "Freischutz" overture. The introductory was taken with a slowness of tempo which gave it a draggy effect, and the Prayer (in which, by the way, the horns covered themselves with credit) was taken at a largo rather than adagio, but, despite this, the overture went with a swing and fire that made it really delightful. As a rule, the pause at the close, just before the great fortissimo, is made merely nominal, but Mr. Nikisch held the band until the silence became impressive; then he let go, and the effect was electrical. In matters of detail like this the Boston Orchestra would be apt to go long without his equal should Mr. Nikisch leave.

PHILADELPHIA

EVENING, MARCH 16.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Last Concert of the Season Under the Direction of Mr. Nikisch.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Nikisch was altogether the most successful of this very successful season. The programme was well chosen and well arranged and its execution left no occasion for anything but warmest praise. Opening with Berlioz' "Roman Carnival," it closed with the "Freischutz" overture, played not only with romantic spirit, but with unusual fervor, and included between these different works the lovely Italian symphony of Mendelssohn.

The smoothness and grace, the delicacy and refinement characteristic of this great orchestra were beautifully displayed in this eminently poetical and brightly colored symphony, which Mr. Nikisch handled with a vivacity he has not always shown. The other numbers were two movements of the Bruch violin concerto, which Mr. Adamowski played admirably, with a skill that well deserved the warm applause it earned, and the favorite "Waldweben," always one of the most fascinating of the Wagner concert excerpts.

It has been announced that Mr. Nikisch will leave the Boston Orchestra at the end of this season to become director of the Royal Opera at Buda-Pesth. His place will be hard to fill. While he took the orchestra already in complete organization and discipline from the hands of Mr. Gericke, he has brought it still further forward in the line of artistic adaptability, and any conductor who shall follow him will have an opportunity to be envied. He has at the same time impressed his own distinct personality strongly upon it, and while his limitations have been often spoken of there never could be any question of his knowledge and skill or his acute artistic perceptions. In the line of modern music in which his personal sympathies mainly extend, he has achieved results that have not been equaled and are not likely to be surpassed.

Commercial Advertiser.

[Established 1797.]

JOHN A. COCKERILL, Editor.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 17, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mr. Nikisch's Last Appearance as the Conductor of This Orchestra.

There was a tinge of melancholy in the interest which was felt in the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in Chickering Hall, owing to the fact that it meant Mr. Nikisch's farewell to New York. In the brief space of time in which he has been permitted to give concerts here it is quite safe to say that he has contributed as much as any other one man toward the development of our musical tastes and the cultivation of the finer musical instincts. The series of concerts which he and his orchestra have given this year and in preceding seasons have been a rare treat for all who have had the privilege of hearing them, and the fact that he is to be with us no longer comes in the nature of a great personal loss to each one of us. That this sentiment was uppermost in the minds of all in the great audience there last night was made obvious by the splendid ovation which was extended to him at the conclusion of the entertainment, one which he acknowledged with becoming dignity and evident feeling.

The programme was somewhat shorter than usual, but was made up of most interesting material from beginning to end. Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" was the opening piece and went with brilliant spirit and force, with precisely the rush and the elan which the composer must have wished for. To be sure it is a spasmodic work, thoroughly characteristic of Berlioz, and in spite of its gay plumage is in reality a paltry affair. But played as it was last evening one forgets all this and longs for more. Just here lies the point of contrast between Wagner and Berlioz in the treatment of orchestrial scores. The latter is all nervous, hysterical, artificiality, without any apparent reserve force or sense of repose, a defect fatal to true art. Whereas, with Wagner you always feel the ability to sustain a high level and the existence of much force and power which have not been revealed. His beautiful and poetic "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" was the third number on the programme last evening and emphasized this difference in a striking manner. It was given perfectly, in a way to disclose its marvelous variety of tone coloring and moods, while its musical form was always maintained.

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's wondrous fifth, which is rather a vast musical poem than a real symphony. From beginning to end it pulsates and throbs with joy and sorrow and ecstasy and every mood in the gamut of human sensations. And how beautifully it was played! A fitting conclusion, indeed, to Mr. Nikisch's musical experiences with us.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was to have played the first movement from Brahms's violin concerto in D, but was prevented by illness from appearing. His place was very acceptably filled, however, by Mrs. Nikisch, who sang with the orchestra a "Spring Song" by Busoni, and afterward a group of songs by Schumann, Paderewski and Brahms, in which she was exquisitely accompanied by her husband.

New York, Friday, March 17, 1893.

The Last Nikisch Concert.

To one who observes the signs of the times and the changes in the musical world, the most striking of all phenomena is the growing importance attached to conductors. There was a time when the singer was the absolute tyrant of conductors, librettists, and composers. To-day we are beginning to understand that the singer is only one factor in a musical production, and that if we are to have a really artistic performance he must be subordinated to the composer and to the conductor of the whole. Thirty-five years ago, when Wagner had his "Tristan" ready for performance, he complained that Dr. Hans von Bülow was the only living conductor in whom he had any confidence; he himself had trained Bülow, as he subsequently trained Hans Richter and Anton Seidl. His superb pamphlet 'On Conducting' for the first time properly emphasized the importance of the conductor for a satisfactory musical performance, and it is owing to his influence that we have now reached a point where connoisseurs inquire who is going to conduct before they ask who will sing.

In Berlin this increased interest in conductors, and their different methods of interpretation, has been shown this winter by the engagement of several prominent leaders to conduct the Philharmonic concerts in succession. In America, where the best in everything is insisted upon, because we have the money to pay for it, the value of conductors has long been recognized; and in one respect we are beginning to Americanize Europe—namely, in the matter of proper remuneration. Formerly the singers got all the profits of operas and concerts; now that operas are no longer written for singers alone, conductors are beginning to get their proper share. A few months ago Mr. Seidl received an offer of $10,000 a year from the opera at Budapest — the highest sum ever offered an operatic conductor in Hungary. Fortunately Mr. Seidl has become an American citizen and is unwilling to leave his new country; he has an engagement in Chicago this summer which will bring him $15,000 in a few months, and next winter he will probably be back at the Metropolitan Opera-house.

Mr. Nikisch, unfortunately for New York, and still more so for Boston, accepted this offer and will go to Budapest at the close of the present season. Nor will any one blame him for this, however much one may regret his departure. Mr. Nikisch is primarily an operatic conductor, and his Boston engagement, therefore, did not give him opportunity for the display of all his gifts. The position he has occupied for several years is anything but a sinecure. During the last seven months, for instance, he has conducted 124 symphony concerts and spent half his time on railway cars and in hotels. It was this roving life connected with the position of conductor of the Boston Orchestra that made Mr. Gericke glad to return to Vienna.

A large audience was present in Chickering Hall to bid Mr. Nikisch farewell. The programme had to be altered somewhat, owing to the indisposition of Mr. Kneisel. In place of his numbers Mrs. Nikisch sang a few songs. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, the Forest Voices from "Siegfreid," and Tchaikovsky's splendid fifth symphony were the orchestral numbers, and it was fitting that one who so strongly represents the modern romantic spirit in music should make his exit with that glowing Russian work. At the close the audience remained standing and recalled Mr. Nikisch by way of expressing their regrets at his departure. He will leave many friends and admirers behind, and he will also remember the New York press for its cordial recognition of his merits, the absence of carping criticism, and the appreciation of the individuality and unfettered freedom of his interpretations. Mr. Higginson will find it an extremely difficult task to find a successor to Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1893.

BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIC.

The last of the Brooklyn Philharmonic rehearsals occurred yesterday afternoon and with it took place the last appearance but one in that city of Herr Arthur Nikisch. Of course, not a musical matinée devotee was missing, for every one was anxious to join in the last honors that were being paid to the great man from Hungary and Boston, who made the parting sweet sorrow indeed by leading his orchestra in simply flawless fashion.

Mendelssohn's Italian symphony was so beautifully played that it really seemed at times like something altogether fresh and new. Liszt's "Tasso," too, has rarely, if ever, been so impressively given, and the Weber-Berlioz arrangement of the "Invitation to Dance" displayed to the full the orchestra's virtuosity.

Mr. Adamowski's performance of the two first movements of Bruch's G minor concerto may be ranked with the very best violin playing that has been heard here of recent years. The concert was made additionally interesting by a trio of Lieder sung by Mrs. Nikisch with a true appreciation of their poetic contents. "Treues Roeslein," by Paderewski, is so fine as to make one wish that he played less and wrote more, and Brahms' "Im Lenze" is as charming and beautiful a dialogue as was ever carried on between a voice and a piano.

FRIDAY, [illegible]

THE BOSTON SY[illegible]

Nikisch Gives a Farewell Treat to Music Lovers Before He Departs.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Chickering Hall last night, not only marked the close of its present New York season, but also its last appearance in this city under its present conductor, as Mr. Nikisch, alas! will not be with them another season, having, as reported, accepted a flattering offer to return to his native country as Hof-Kappellmeister, at Budapest.

The programme, as usual one of decided interest, though containing no important novelty, was as follows, changed from the one announced, owing to the illness of Mr. Kneisel:

Overture, "Carnival Romain".....Berlioz
"Spring Song," with orchestra.....Busoni
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
Songs, with piano accompaniment..Brahms, Schumann, Paderewski
Symphony, No. 5, E minor.....Tschaikowsky
Soloist, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

For all that, the Berlioz overture, which was written as an intermezzo for the opera "Benvenuti Cellini," is free almost to wildness. There is evident method and purpose in its madness—the method of a man of genius, the purpose picturesque gaiety. It is a rollicking, rushing, whimsical bit of tone painting, and was played with rare crispness, dash and spirit. The "Spring Song," by Busoni, which one does not remember having heard before, is a graceful, genial bit of vocal writing prettily scored, but without marked individuality.

Mrs. Nikisch sang it charmingly, as she also did the group of songs a little later, Mr. Nikisch playing her accompaniments in incomparable fashion. How much of the beauty of what might be called classical songs is lost oftentimes because the accompaniments are carelessly or indifferently played. Mrs. Nikisch was more than warmly received, and was finally compelled to add another song to the group, one by Brahms. The exquisite grace and poetry of the familiar "Waldweben" was never more apparent than in the interpretation given this delightful and fanciful idyl last night. Refinement, varied contrast, the delicate finish of a miniature, the dreamy tenderness and sentiment of summer breezes in sunlit woods were all in Mr. Nikisch's reading and in the way it was rendered. If more buoyant, lightsome and in altogether brighter and lighter mood than his majestic fourth symphony, Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, though equally original, does not equal its predecessor in dramatic force, significance or impressiveness. It is more conventionally symphonic, more on the surface, but none the less attractive on that account. The entire work is rarely melodious in a way which never even approaches the trite or the commonplace. Whatever Tschaikowsky has to say is interesting in and of itself, and he says it in an intense and individual way which makes it all the more so. Even the trivial valse tempo, which characterizes the third movement of the symphony, doing duty as a scherzo, in the hands of this master becomes instinct with not only novelty but even dignity. Besides Tschaikowsky, only Berlioz has dared to introduce a valse into a symphonic work, but as the result in each instance is more than satisfactory—why not? And then the nobility and romantic charm of the Andante Cantabile; the force and fire of the majestic finale! Truly is Tschaikowsky a giant, a master-mind, a musical wonder-worker. The symphony was magnificently rendered, and effectually dispelled a slight impression of flimsiness created by the earlier portion of the programme. At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch was recalled again and again in token of the audience's admiration and farewell. New York is loath, indeed, to part with him, and with reason. When shall we look upon his like again? With the deepest regret we bid him farewell and godspeed.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

NEW YORK HERALD.

FOURTEEN PAGES.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

NIKISCH'S FAREWELL CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch's last appearance here as leader of the Boston Orchestra attracted the usual great crowd to Chickering Hall last evening. In musical circles it was generally known that this noted musician had decided to accept the offer made to him by the Royal Opera House at Buda-Pesth, and last night's concert was, therefore, something in the nature of a farewell. The audience looked at it in this light, and their applause was, if possible, more enthusiastic than ever. The splendid orchestra was heard in Berlioz's brilliant "Carnival Overture," in the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and in Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. In the Berlioz number was had one of the most brilliant bits of orchestral playing ever heard here. The symphony was also a delight to the critical audience.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was to have played part of Brahms' first violin concerto, but was too ill to appear. In his place Mrs. Nikisch sang a "Spring Song" of Busoni, the Boston composer, rather a long drawn out affair, and also songs by Brahms, Paderewski and Schumann, giving as an encore Brahms' "Vergebliches Staenchen" with much archness and grace.

At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch was recalled five times and there were loud but ineffectual calls for a speech. To a number of friends who remained when the crowd dispersed the conductor expressed his regret at leaving America, but intimated that he might come back some day.

His present contract with the Buda-Pesth Opera House is for three years and his duties will begin next September. He will be intendant of the house and have three conductors under him, so that he will lead the orchestra only upon extraordinary occasions. The contract was signed only last Friday, but the negotiations have been going on for the last three months.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL ILL.

Owing to the serious illness, due to a cold, of Mr. Franz Kneisel, the leading violin of the Boston Orchestra, the concert of the Kneisel Quartet announced for to-morrow afternoon in Chickering Hall has been postponed to some date yet to be fixed.

[illegible] BY HOWARD [illegible]

FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

MR. NIKISCH'S FAREWELL.

The thought, doubtless, which was uppermost in the minds of the audience at the last concert for this season in Chickering Hall last night, was that most unexpectedly the affair had been turned at the eleventh hour into a farewell to Mr. Nikisch, the conductor. It has been under Mr. Nikisch's direction that the concerts of the organization took the high place in popular favor which they have occupied during the last three years. In saying this we are casting no reflection on Mr. Gericke. The best things in art are not always accepted at once. New-York has always had good orchestral music, and it was long a question whether the concerts of the Boston Orchestra were needed. In fact it was only the cosmopolitan and liberal character of the New-York musical public that opened our doors to the visitors. It chanced that Mr. Gericke did the pioneer work. He did it honestly and intelligently, and no one can have rejoiced more than he when Mr. Nikisch came to garner the fruits of his planting. No higher praise can be spoken of than this that Mr. Nikisch took up the lovely task when Mr. Gericke left it and carried it forward on his own lines, without sacrifice of one iota of his individuality of conception or method, to a conclusion which has excited the admiration and pride of every true lover of high art. He was made to feel the sincerity of the public regard for him last night when, after one of the most delightful concerts of the series which he has conducted, the audience remained in the room to call him back to the stage and thank him by a most cordial demonstration of approval and sympathy.

The concert was changed in character by the illness of Mr. Kneisel, who was to have played the first movement of the violin concerto by Brahms. In his absence Mrs. Nikisch sang with the orchestra a "Spring Song," by Feruccio Busoni (the same that she will sing in Brooklyn this afternoon and to-morrow evening) and afterward some songs by Brahms, Paderewski and Schumann to the masterly pianoforte accompaniments of her husband. The performances were all most amiable and sympathetic, and were supplemented by Brahms's arch and coquettish "Vergebliches Staendchen," in which Mrs. Nikisch's voice and vocal manner are disclosed at their best. The orchestral numbers were Berlioz's overture, "Carnival Romain"; Wagner's "Waldweben," and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, played in the finished yet virile and dramatic style which accounts for much of Mr. Nikisch's hold upon the public heart.

Mr. Nikisch's resolve to return to Europe is not of long standing. He said last night after the concert that he had all along expected to make America his future home, and that the separation would be a peculiarly poignant one for him. He felt, however, that the invitation to become the conductor of the opera at Buda-Pesth was such an opportunity as is offered to a musician only once in a lifetime, and that he owed it to his family not to let it go by. He will start for his new field of labors next month, immediately after the completion of his Boston engagement.

The illness of Mr. Kneisel compels the abandonment of the Kneisel Quartet concert to-morrow.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

MR. NIKISCH'S FAREWELL.

The music lovers of New-York bade farewell to Arthur Nikisch last night. The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Chickering Hall, and with it closed Mr. Nikisch's brilliant American career, so far as the metropolis is concerned. It was an occasion of serious, even pathetic interest; and were we a more demonstrative people than we are, it would doubtless have been marked by a more emotional expression of affection than that which was noted. As it was, nearly the entire audience remained standing at the close of the concert and called Mr. Nikisch out several times with every evidence of the kindest regard. The conductor's appreciation of this proof of public regard was manifest. There can be no doubt that Mr. Nikisch leaves America with regret; but the offer which has come to him from Buda-Pesth he believes to be the opportunity of his life, and he must not let that pass.

The concert last night was from beginning to end an interesting entertainment, though there was an unexpected change in the programme. Franz Kneisel, the accomplished concertmeister of the orchestra, was to have played the first movement of the Brahms violin concerto in D, but he was suffering from a severe cold and was unable to appear. His place was taken by Mrs. Nikisch, who sang a very pretty "Spring Song" by the talented pianist, Ferruccio Busoni, with orchestra, and afterward, with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch, songs by Brahms, Paderewski, and Schumann. It is a simple act of justice to say that not the smaller part of the pleasure gained from this part of the programme was given by Mr. Nikisch's beautiful accompaniments. His accompaniment to Schumann's "Frühingsnacht" was simply marvelous in its poetic feeling and wealth of color.

The orchestral numbers were Berlioz's "Le Carnaval Romain" overture, the "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried," and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. The Wagner number was played with admirable finesse and with excellent appreciation of its sylvan color; but the grand power and sweep of the orchestra were heard to the best advantage in that astounding product of Tschaikowsky's imagination, that irresistible composition which he calls a symphony, but which is rather an instrumental song, embodying the pent-up emotions of this pulsating, half-mad end of the century which is leading human thought heaven knows whither. Perhaps Tschaikowsky meant this work to be a protest against artificial conventionality. At any rate it is the voice of one crying in the musical wilderness and the utterance is not to be ignored.

Such a work, throbbing with the emotional heat of a fully-developed romanticism in music, was a fitting swan song to issue from the graceful but mastering baton of Mr. Nikisch. Its echoes will rise in the memory as an eloquent summary of his magnetic power and winning personality. The love of music in America will be the stronger because of his sojourn here, and his departure will leave a void in the art world not easy to fill. He leaves behind him hosts of sincere admirers of his attainments and an army of grateful friends, to whom his going will be a source of lasting and unavailing regret. It has been a pleasure to note his doings and to praise his achievements. It will be the fervent hope of the many friends he has made in New-York that his future will be one of progress and of never-ceasing advance into the limitless fields of the art of which he is one of the most beloved exponents.

---

[124]

TIMES—PHILADELPHIA

MORNING, MARCH 16.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Last Concert of the Season Under the Direction of Mr. Nikisch.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Nikisch was altogether the most successful of this very successful season. The programme was well chosen and well arranged and its execution left no occasion for anything but warmest praise. Opening with Berlioz' "Roman Carnival," it closed with the "Freischutz" overture, played not only with romantic spirit, but with unusual fervor, and included between these different works the lovely Italian symphony of Mendelssohn.

The smoothness and grace, the delicacy and refinement characteristic of this great orchestra were beautifully displayed in this eminently poetical and brightly colored symphony, which Mr. Nikisch handled with a vivacity he has not always shown. The other numbers were two movements of the Bruch violin concerto, which Mr. Adamowski played admirably, with a skill that well deserved the warm applause it earned, and the favorite "Waldweben," always one of the most fascinating of the Wagner concert excerpts.

It has been announced that Mr. Nikisch will leave the Boston Orchestra at the end of this season to become director of the Royal Opera at Buda-Pesth. His place will be hard to fill. While he took the orchestra already in complete organization and discipline from the hands of Mr. Gericke, he has brought it still further forward in the line of artistic adaptability, and any conductor who shall follow him will have an opportunity to be envied. He has at the same time impressed his own distinct personality strongly upon it, and while his limitations have been often spoken of there never could be any question of his knowledge and skill or his acute artistic perceptions. In the line of modern music in which his personal sympathies mainly extend, he has achieved results that have not been equaled and are not likely to be surpassed.

Commercial Advertiser.

[Established 1797.]

JOHN A. COCKERILL, Editor.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 17, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mr. Nikisch's Last Appearance as the Conductor of This Orchestra.

There was a tinge of melancholy in the interest which was felt in the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in Chickering Hall, owing to the fact that it meant Mr. Nikisch's farewell to New York. In the brief space of time in which he has been permitted to give concerts here it is quite safe to say that he has contributed as much as any other one man toward the development of our musical tastes and the cultivation of the finer musical instincts. The series of concerts which he and his orchestra have given this year and in preceding seasons have been a rare treat for all who have had the privilege of hearing them, and the fact that he is to be with us no longer comes in the nature of a great personal loss to each one of us. That this sentiment was uppermost in the minds of all in the great audience there last night was made obvious by the splendid ovation which was extended to him at the conclusion of the entertainment, one which he acknowledged with becoming dignity and evident feeling.

The programme was somewhat shorter than usual, but was made up of most interesting material from beginning to end. Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" was the opening piece and went with brilliant spirit and force, with precisely the rush and the elan which the composer must have wished for. To be sure it is a spasmodic work, thoroughly characteristic of Berlioz, and in spite of its gay plumage is in reality a paltry affair. But played as it was last evening one forgets all this and longs for more. Just here lies the point of contrast between Wagner and Berlioz in the treatment of orchestrial scores. The latter is all nervous, hysterical, artificiality, without any apparent reserve force or sense of repose, a defect fatal to true art. Whereas, with Wagner you always feel the ability to sustain a high level and the existence of much force and power which have not been revealed. His beautiful and poetic "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" was the third number on the programme last evening and emphasized this difference in a striking manner. It was given perfectly, in a way to disclose its marvelous variety of tone coloring and moods, while its musical form was always maintained.

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's wondrous fifth, which is rather a vast musical poem than a real symphony. From beginning to end it pulsates and throbs with joy and sorrow and ecstasy and every mood in the gamut of human sensations. And how beautifully it was played! A fitting conclusion, indeed, to Mr. Nikisch's musical experiences with us.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was to have played the first movement from Brahms's violin concerto in D, but was prevented by illness from appearing. His place was very acceptably filled, however, by Mrs. Nikisch, who sang with the orchestra a "Spring Song" by Busoni, and afterward a group of songs by Schumann, Paderewski and Brahms, in which she was exquisitely accompanied by her husband.

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, March 17, 1893.

The Last Nikisch Concert.

To one who observes the signs of the times and the changes in the musical world, the most striking of all phenomena is the growing importance attached to conductors. There was a time when the singer was the absolute tyrant of conductors, librettists, and composers. To-day we are beginning to understand that the singer is only one factor in a musical production, and that if we are to have a really artistic performance he must be subordinated to the composer and to the conductor of the whole. Thirty-five years ago, when Wagner had his "Tristan" ready for performance, he complained that Dr. Hans von Bülow was the only living conductor in whom he had any confidence; he himself had trained Bülow, as he subsequently trained Hans Richter and Anton Seidl. His superb pamphlet 'On Conducting' for the first time properly emphasized the importance of the conductor for a satisfactory musical performance, and it is owing to his influence that we have now reached a point where connoisseurs inquire who is going to conduct before they ask who will sing.

In Berlin this increased interest in conductors, and their different methods of interpretation, has been shown this winter by the engagement of several prominent leaders to conduct the Philharmonic concerts in succession. In America, where the best in everything is insisted upon, because we have the money to pay for it, the value of conductors has long been recognized; and in one respect we are beginning to Americanize Europe—namely, in the matter of proper remuneration. Formerly the singers got all the profits of operas and concerts; now that operas are no longer written for singers alone, conductors are beginning to get their proper share. A few months ago Mr. Seidl received an offer of $10,000 a year from the opera at Budapest — the highest sum ever offered an operatic conductor in Hungary. Fortunately Mr. Seidl has become an American citizen and is unwilling to leave his new country; he has an engagement in Chicago this summer which will bring him $15,000 in a few months, and next winter he will probably be back at the Metropolitan Opera-house.

Mr. Nikisch, unfortunately for New York, and still more so for Boston, accepted this offer and will go to Budapest at the close of the present season. Nor will any one blame him for this, however much one may regret his departure. Mr. Nikisch is primarily an operatic conductor, and his Boston engagement, therefore, did not give him opportunity for the display of all his gifts. The position he has occupied for several years is anything but a sinecure. During the last seven months, for instance, he has conducted 124 symphony concerts and spent half his time on railway cars and in hotels. It was this roving life connected with the position of conductor of the Boston Orchestra that made Mr. Gericke glad to return to Vienna.

A large audience was present in Chickering Hall to bid Mr. Nikisch farewell. The programme had to be altered somewhat, owing to the indisposition of Mr. Kneisel. In place of his numbers Mrs. Nikisch sang a few songs. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, the Forest Voices from "Siegfreid," and Tchaikovsky's splendid fifth symphony were the orchestral numbers, and it was fitting that one who so strongly represents the modern romantic spirit in music should make his exit with that glowing Russian work. At the close the audience remained standing and recalled Mr. Nikisch by way of expressing their regrets at his departure. He will leave many friends and admirers behind, and he will also remember the New York press for its cordial recognition of his merits, the absence of carping criticism, and the appreciation of the individuality and unfettered freedom of his interpretations. Mr. Higginson will find it an extremely difficult task to find a successor to Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1893.

BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIC.

The last of the Brooklyn Philharmonic rehearsals occurred yesterday afternoon and with it took place the last appearance but one in that city of Herr Arthur Nikisch. Of course, not a musical matinée devotee was missing, for every one was anxious to join in the last honors that were being paid to the great man from Hungary and Boston, who made the parting sweet sorrow indeed by leading his orchestra in simply flawless fashion.

Mendelssohn's Italian symphony was so beautifully played that it really seemed at times like something altogether fresh and new. Liszt's "Tasso," too, has rarely, if ever, been so impressively given, and the Weber-Berlioz arrangement of the "Invitation to Dance" displayed to the full the orchestra's virtuosity.

Mr. Adamowski's performance of the two first movements of Bruch's G minor concerto may be ranked with the very best violin playing that has been heard here of recent years. The concert was made additionally interesting by a trio of Lieder sung by Mrs. Nikisch with a true appreciation of their poetic contents. "Treues Roeslein," by Paderewski, is so fine as to make one wish that he played less and wrote more, and Brahms' "Im Lenze" is as charming and beautiful a dialogue as was ever carried on between a voice and a piano.

THE WORLD:

FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Nikisch Gives a Farewell Treat to Music Lovers Before He Departs.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Chickering Hall last night, not only marked the close of its present New York season, but also its last appearance in this city under its present conductor, as Mr. Nikisch, alas! will not be with them another season, having, as reported, accepted a flattering offer to return to his native country as Hof-Kappellmeister, at Budapest.

The programme, as usual one of decided interest, though containing no important novelty, was as follows, changed from the one announced, owing to the illness of Mr. Kneisel:

Overture, "Carnival Romain"..... Berlioz
"Spring Song," with orchestra..... Busoni
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried"..... Wagner
Songs, with piano accompaniment..Brahms, Schumann, Paderewski
Symphony, No. 5, E minor..... Tschaikowsky
Soloist, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

For all that, the Berlioz overture, which was written as an intermezzo for the opera "Benvenuti Cellini," is free almost to wildness. There is evident method and purpose in its madness—the method of a man of genius, the purpose picturesque gaiety. It is a rollicking, rushing, whimsical bit of tone painting, and was played with rare crispness, dash and spirit. The "Spring Song," by Busoni, which one does not remember having heard before, is a graceful, genial bit of vocal writing prettily scored, but without marked individuality.

Mrs. Nikisch sang it charmingly, as she also did the group of songs a little later, Mr. Nikisch playing her accompaniments in incomparable fashion. How much of the beauty of what might be called classical songs is lost oftentimes because the accompaniments are carelessly or indifferently played. Mrs. Nikisch was more than warmly received, and was finally compelled to add another song to the group, one by Brahms. The exquisite grace and poetry of the familiar "Waldweben" was never more apparent than in the interpretation given this delightful and fanciful idyl last night. Refinement, varied contrast, the delicate finish of a miniature, the dreamy tenderness and sentiment of summer breezes in sunlit woods were all in Mr. Nikisch's reading and in the way it was rendered. If more buoyant, lightsome and in altogether brighter and lighter mood than his majestic fourth symphony, Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, though equally original, does not equal its predecessor in dramatic force, significance or impressiveness. It is more conventionally symphonic, more on the surface, but none the less attractive on that account. The entire work is rarely melodious in a way which never even approaches the trite or the commonplace. Whatever Tschaikowsky has to say is interesting in and of itself, and he says it in an intense and individual way which makes it all the more so. Even the trivial valse tempo, which characterizes the third movement of the symphony, doing duty as a scherzo, in the hands of this master becomes instinct with not only novelty but even dignity. Besides Tschaikowsky, only Berlioz has dared to introduce a valse into a symphonic work, but as the result in each instance is more than satisfactory—why not? And then the nobility and romantic charm of the Andante Cantabile; the force and fire of the majestic finale! Truly is Tschaikowsky a giant, a master-mind, a musical wonder-worker. The symphony was magnificently rendered, and effectually dispelled a slight impression of flimsiness created by the earlier portion of the programme. At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch was recalled again and again in token of the audience's admiration and farewell. New York is loath, indeed, to part with him, and with reason. When shall we look upon his like again? With the deepest regret we bid him farewell and godspeed.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

NEW YORK HERALD.

FOURTEEN PAGES.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

NIKISCH'S FAREWELL CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch's last appearance here as leader of the Boston Orchestra attracted the usual great crowd to Chickering Hall last evening. In musical circles it was generally known that this noted musician had decided to accept the offer made to him by the Royal Opera House at Buda-Pesth, and last night's concert was, therefore, something in the nature of a farewell. The audience looked at it in this light, and their applause was, if possible, more enthusiastic than ever. The splendid orchestra was heard in Berlioz's brilliant "Carnival Overture," in the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and in Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. In the Berlioz number was had one of the most brilliant bits of orchestral playing ever heard here. The symphony was also a delight to the critical audience.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was to have played part of Brahms' first violin concerto, but was too ill to appear. In his place Mrs. Nikisch sang a "Spring Song" of Busoni, the Boston composer, rather a long drawn out affair, and also songs by Brahms, Paderewski and Schumann, giving as an encore Brahms' "Vergebliches Staenchen" with much archness and grace.

At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch was recalled five times and there were loud but ineffectual calls for a speech. To a number of friends who remained when the crowd dispersed the conductor expressed his regret at leaving America, but intimated that he might come back some day.

His present contract with the Buda-Pesth Opera House is for three years and his duties will begin next September. He will be intendant of the house and have three conductors under him, so that he will lead the orchestra only upon extraordinary occasions. The contract was signed only last Friday, but the negotiations have been going on for the last three months.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL ILL.

Owing to the serious illness, due to a cold, of Mr. Franz Kneisel, the leading violin of the Boston Orchestra, the concert of the Kneisel Quartet announced for to-morrow afternoon in Chickering Hall has been postponed to some date yet to be fixed.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

MR. NIKISCH'S FAREWELL.

The thought, doubtless, which was uppermost in the minds of the audience at the last concert for this season in Chickering Hall last night, was that most unexpectedly the affair had been turned at the eleventh hour into a farewell to Mr. Nikisch, the conductor. It has been under Mr. Nikisch's direction that the concerts of the organization took the high place in popular favor which they have occupied during the last three years. In saying this we are casting no reflection on Mr. Gericke. The best things in art are not always accepted at once. New-York has always had good orchestral music, and it was long a question whether the concerts of the Boston Orchestra were needed. In fact it was only the cosmopolitan and liberal character of the New-York musical public that opened our doors to the visitors. It chanced that Mr. Gericke did the pioneer work. He did it honestly and intelligently, and no one can have rejoiced more than he when Mr. Nikisch came to garner the fruits of his planting. No higher praise can be spoken of than this that Mr. Nikisch took up the lovely task when Mr. Gericke left it and carried it forward on his own lines, without sacrifice of one iota of his individuality of conception or method, to a conclusion which has excited the admiration and pride of every true lover of high art. He was made to feel the sincerity of the public regard for him last night when, after one of the most delightful concerts of the series which he has conducted, the audience remained in the room to call him back to the stage and thank him by a most cordial demonstration of approval and sympathy.

The concert was changed in character by the illness of Mr. Kneisel, who was to have played the first movement of the violin concerto by Brahms. In his absence Mrs. Nikisch sang with the orchestra a "Spring Song," by Feruccio Busoni (the same that she will sing in Brooklyn this afternoon and to-morrow evening) and afterward some songs by Brahms, Paderewski and Schumann to the masterly pianoforte accompaniments of her husband. The performances were all most amiable and sympathetic, and were supplemented by Brahms's arch and coquettish "Vergebliches Staendchen," in which Mrs. Nikisch's voice and vocal manner are disclosed at their best. The orchestral numbers were Berlioz's overture, "Carnival Romain"; Wagner's "Waldweben," and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, played in the finished yet virile and dramatic style which accounts for much of Mr. Nikisch's hold upon the public heart.

Mr. Nikisch's resolve to return to Europe is not of long standing. He said last night after the concert that he had all along expected to make America his future home, and that the separation would be a peculiarly poignant one for him. He felt, however, that the invitation to become the conductor of the opera at Buda-Pesth was such an opportunity as is offered to a musician only once in a lifetime, and that he owed it to his family not to let it go by. He will start for his new field of labors next month, immediately after the completion of his Boston engagement.

The illness of Mr. Kneisel compels the abandonment of the Kneisel Quartet concert to-morrow.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 1893.

MR. NIKISCH'S FAREWELL.

The music lovers of New-York bade farewell to Arthur Nikisch last night. The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Chickering Hall, and with it closed Mr. Nikisch's brilliant American career, so far as the metropolis is concerned. It was an occasion of serious, even pathetic interest; and were we a more demonstrative people than we are, it would doubtless have been marked by a more emotional expression of affection than that which was noted. As it was, nearly the entire audience remained standing at the close of the concert and called Mr. Nikisch out several times with every evidence of the kindest regard. The conductor's appreciation of this proof of public regard was manifest. There can be no doubt that Mr. Nikisch leaves America with regret; but the offer which has come to him from Buda-Pesth he believes to be the opportunity of his life, and he must not let that pass.

The concert last night was from beginning to end an interesting entertainment, though there was an unexpected change in the programme. Franz Kneisel, the accomplished concertmeister of the orchestra, was to have played the first movement of the Brahms violin concerto in D, but he was suffering from a severe cold and was unable to appear. His place was taken by Mrs. Nikisch, who sang a very pretty "Spring Song" by the talented pianist, Ferruccio Busoni, with orchestra, and afterward, with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch, songs by Brahms, Paderewski, and Schumann. It is a simple act of justice to say that not the smaller part of the pleasure gained from this part of the programme was given by Mr. Nikisch's beautiful accompaniments. His accompaniment to Schumann's "Frühingsnacht" was simply marvelous in its poetic feeling and wealth of color.

The orchestral numbers were Berlioz's "Le Carnaval Romain" overture, the "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried," and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. The Wagner number was played with admirable finesse and with excellent appreciation of its sylvan color; but the grand power and sweep of the orchestra were heard to the best advantage in that astounding product of Tschaikowsky's imagination, that irresistible composition which he calls a symphony, but which is rather an instrumental song, embodying the pent-up emotions of this pulsating, half-mad end of the century which is leading human thought heaven knows whither. Perhaps Tschaikowsky meant this work to be a protest against artificial conventionality. At any rate it is the voice of one crying in the musical wilderness and the utterance is not to be ignored.

Such a work, throbbing with the emotional heat of a fully-developed romanticism in music, was a fitting swan song to issue from the graceful but mastering baton of Mr. Nikisch. Its echoes will rise in the memory as an eloquent summary of his magnetic power and winning personality. The love of music in America will be the stronger because of his sojourn here, and his departure will leave a void in the art world not easy to fill. He leaves behind him hosts of sincere admirers of his attainments and an army of grateful friends, to whom his going will be a source of lasting and unavailing regret. It has been a pleasure to note his doings and to praise his achievements. It will be the fervent hope of the many friends he has made in New-York that his future will be one of progress and of never-ceasing advance into the inexhaustible fields of the art of which he is one of the most beloved exponents.

[124]

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1893.

Nikisch Resigns the Conductorship.

Buda-Pesth Wants the Boston Symphony Leader.

Boston, March 14.—Arthur Nikisch, at the end of the present season, is to sever his connection as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in which position he has entertained and delighted music lovers for the past five years.

He has received an offer to become director and leader of the Royal Opera House at Buda-Pesth, Austria, where are located the royal palaces.

He has for a long time hankered for an opportunity to gain fame in Europe, and seven years ago refused a like offer that he might conquer Americans.

Philadelphia, March 14.—Mr. Nikisch was seen in this city last night and said: "It is true that I intend to resign. This work is too hard for me, and I am not in the best of health. I couldn't stand it much longer, for I have to give so many concerts and do so much traveling that it wears me out. My chief inducement for quitting the orchestra, however, is that I have been offered the position of director-general of the Royal Opera at Buda Pesth. I cannot state now the sum offered me, but it is the highest salary every offered a musician, and the position is one of the greatest honor in the profession. Hans Richter had the post before he left for Vienna, and the latest musician who held it was Count Zichy.

"I have not completed all my arrangements yet, as the negotiations require some time to be approved by the Reichstag and the Ministry, it being a royal affair; but I expect to sail by June 1. I shall probably keep my position with the orchestra until Mr. Higginson can make arrangements for my successor, and very likely I will remain with it until the end of the season. We are booked to play at the World's Fair in May, and have other engagements in the West, after which I suppose my work in America will come to an end.

"As I am a Hungarian, I will be glad to return to my fatherland; but I shall also be sorry to leave the orchestra, for my relations here have been of the pleasantest."

Mr. Nikisch is a Hungarian by birth. He was born at Szent Mikos, Oct. 12, 1855. His father was head accountant in the service of Prince Lichtenstein. Nikisch was educated in the Vienna Conservatory, where he studied composition under Dessoff and the violin under Hellmersberger. He left the Conservatory in 1874, with prizes in composition (sextet for strings) and violin playing. In 1878 he was engaged by Neumann as second conductor of the Stadt Theatre in Leipzig, and he then left for Vienna, to take the post of violinist in the Imperial Orchestra. In 1882 he was appointed first chapelmaster at Leipzig. Mr. Nikisch was called in 1889 to take the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a position that was vacated by Mr. William Gericke.

There are rumors already of other directors, says the Boston "Journal." First of all comes the name of Mr. Gericke, who gave to the orchestra the reputation that it so richly deserved. He is now in Vienna, and it is doubtful whether he could be persuaded to leave his home. If he should appear again as conductor of our orchestra, his first appearnce would be a memorable scene, for few are held in such respect by musicians and laymen as the modest and thoroughly capable Gericke.

There is talk of Hans Richter. Richter was born in Raab, Hungary, April 4, 1843. He studied in Vienna the horn, pianoforte and composition. In 1866-67 he was with Wagner in Luzerne. Richter was chorus director in Munich in 1868-69. In 1870 he directed the first performance of "Lohengrin" in Brussels. From 1871 to 1875 he was conductor of the National Threatre at Buda-Pesth. In 1875 he was appointed conductor of the opera and the Philharmonic concerts at Vienna. In 1876 he directed at Baireuth. For some time he has been busied with concerts in London.

Edouard Colonne, of Paris, is also mentioned. He was born at Bordeaux, July 23, 1838, and was a pupil of the Paris Conservatory, where he took, in 1863, the first prize for violin playing. He was then first violin of the Paris Opera, until in 1871 he founded a concert organization, the performances of which were given during the winter, first at the Odeon, afterward at the Chatelet. He is now also first conductor at the Opera. He is known throughout Europe as a conductor of the very first rank.

BOSTON COURIER,

MORNING, MARCH 19,

THE SYMPHONY.

A programme that represented Berlioz, Rubinstein, Wagner and Schumann at their worthiest, as did the programme for the eighteenth symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, March 11, would ordinarily be pronounced by musicians as respectably well chosen.

It is also true that Conductor Nikisch could not have been otherwise than artistically well disposed in arranging a programme that would have inevitably encountered popular failure but for the appearance of so interesting a soloist as Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler with Rubinstein's fourth concerto in D minor. Furthermore there was lively melody and abundance of it in the overture "Le Carnaval Romain," by Berlioz, and it brightened the audience into a humor that is seldom experienced from that composer. Following the overture and concerto came the Siegfried Idyl by Wagner and the symphony, No. 3, in E flat major, by Schumann. Neither of these two works, owing to the peculiar arrangement of the programme, could have been heard at its fairest advantage, and the logical result of any such arrangement was to impose a sense of weariness which was artistically prejudicial not only in its effect upon the selections themselves, but in prolonging the concert until an all too late hour.

The pianist Rubinstein has composed at least six pianoforte concertos—possibly one or two more. In the concerto in D minor the genius of the solo instrument seems to have been studied above any other consideration. The Nestor of contemporaneous musicians, as has been stated, is here at his worthiest, just as was Moscheles when he wrote his now well nigh obsolete concerto in G minor. The work is intensely personel in its relation to the composer. It is musically photographic of the pianist of broad and massive brow, and in the first movement especially it even suggests his swarthy complexion of some ten or fifteen years ago, a complexion that was then more like that of a Tartar or a Turk rather than of a Russian. With the second movement comes a change of mood. The lionine roarings of the opening moderato are indeed followed by a sentimentally pastoral and well nigh lamb-like andante—not a "moderato assai," as announced on the programme. In the finale the concerto loses even such paucity of substance as its earlier movements contained, and simply fritters itself away in a tuneful play of sounds devoid of any deeper meaning. In brief, it fairly seems as though the hand of a pianist and not the genius of a composer had incited this truly Rubeinsteinish concert piece, and it is difficult of belief that anyone can derive other enjoyment from the work than that which may be derived by the numerous yet not over scrupulous devotees to pianoforte playing as an end per se and not as an art.

The performance by Mme. Zeisler was overflowing with subjectiveness of the most intense kind. It was appealingly sympathetic in its quieter moods, yet not without an affection and sentimentality that oft had a very obscuring affect upon the real music of the concerto. Technically considered, the wealth of exacting arpeggios, broken chords, scale passages and all the essentials of true piano-forte bravura with which the concerto is permeated, was easily at the artist's finger tips, and, notably in the first and last movements, despite the fact that Mrs. Zeisler was quite fortunately unsuccessful in her apparent attempt to break all the strings in the piano, she excellently responded to the virtuosic requirement of the composer. Perhaps, on the whole, Mrs. Zeisler's performance had its most characteristic tribute in the very much noise of the applause she received.

Next in order was the "Siegfried Idyl," by Richard Wagner: then came as a finale Schumann's Symphony No. 3, in E flat major.

The first performance in Boston of this work was under Carl Zerrahn, at a concert given by the Harvard Musical Association, Feb. 4, 1869. It has been performed at Boston Symphony concerts, Nov. 24, 1883; Feb. 21, 1885 (Mr. Henschel); April 21, 1888 (Mr. Gericke); Jan. 25, 1890, and last evening (Mr. Nikisch). The vigorous chief theme of the first movement was excellently announced; the fortissimo by horns, bassoons, violas and basses just prior to the entrance of the subordinate theme had as harmonious an ensemble as one would care to hear, and the "second subject" proper had its complete and charming contrast to what had preceded it most admirably set forth. The vigorous coda to this movement, however, was strangely sterilized. The performance of the second movement was slightly too rigid for the menuet galante, which in character if not in form it really is. The andante or third movement (nicht schnell) was granted its full form and spirit as a song without words; and the last two movements of the work left little to be desired.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 19, 1893.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch will cease to be director of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the close of the present season. He will take charge of the Royal Opera, at Buda-Pesth, Hungary, his native land.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 20, 1893.

Colonel Higginson Thinks that the Stockholders Will Not Refuse any Reasonable Offer.

Music Hall may practically be considered as on the market, and it is said by the owners that any reasonable offer is not likely to be rejected. The hall is not all that it should be in many respects, but its central location and retirement from noisy thoroughfares are features greatly in its favor. Should the proposed cross-town street from north to south be run through it would carry Music Hall into oblivion, and with such a possible fate pending the owners are not anxious to continue much longer a piece of property which they assert is not a paying investment. Even with the prospect of increased business for the remainder of this season and perhaps next, owing to the burning of Tremont Temple, which leaves Music Hall the monopoly, the owners are none the less anxious to dispose of their interests in the property. Colonel Henry L. Higginson, who represents the owners, said today that although he had not broached the subject of sale to the other stockholders directly, yet he did not doubt that a fair offer would be accepted. The subject of a site for another hall, should the old one be sold, has always been a perplexing one, and Colonel Higginson says that he is no nearer a solution of the problem today than he was when it was first propounded.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper

OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 21, 1893.

A FAIR OFFER WOULD BUY.

Owners of Music Hall Don't Think It Is a Paying Property.

Who wants Music Hall?

A fair offer will take it, although it has not yet been fully thrown upon the market.

Colonel Henry L. Higginson, who represents the owners, said yesterday that although he had not broached the subject of sale to the stockholders directly, still he did not doubt that a fair offer would be accepted.

The hall is not all that it should be in many respects, but its central location and retirement from noisy thoroughfares are features greatly in its favor. The owners do not consider it a paying property, and it is said are not over-anxious to continue longer with the investment.

The burning of Tremont Temple leaves Music Hall the monopoly in the line of large halls and the prospect of a much better business for this season and a part of next.

If the hall is sold and put to other uses than what it has been in the past, it will disappoint a vast number of music-loving people who have enjoyed many hours there.

Should the proposed cross-town street, from north to south, be carried through, it would destroy Music Hall, as the street would run through Hamilton place.

Manager Ellis was seen by a POST reporter last night at Music Hall, but he said that he had neard no hing in regard to selling the place, but he supposed that if someone came along who made a good offer there would be a prospect of a sale.

Music Hall was built in 1852, the intention being to erect a hall to be devoted to great concerts of orchestral and vocal music. The hall is 130 feet in length, 78 in width and 65 in height, with proportions carefully studied for acoustic effect. It has two balconies, and the walls of solid masonry are broken at intervals by projecting pilasters; it seats about 2600.

The architect was George Snell. For thirty years the most of the concerts of high character have been given there, but of late years all kinds of entertainments have been given, which were not in keeping with the lofty purpose for which it was built.

Not the least inspiring of the memories that cluster about the hall is that of Theodore Parker, who preached here on Sundays during the last years of his active life many of those stirring discourses that gave him so high a place among the foremost men of his time.

In later years the Rev. W. H. H. Murray established a "Metropolitan Church" here which flourished for a while, attracting crowded congregations.

The determination to sell the great organ and remodel the hall so as to make it serviceable for theatrical and operatic entertainments as well as for concerts, was reached in the winter of 1883. The organ was removed in '85, being purchased by the New England Conservatory of Music.

The fate of Music Hall has hung in the balance before. The agitation of extending Hamilton place through to Washington street has disturbed musical people considerably in years past.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 21, 1893.

MUSIC HALL TO BE SOLD.

Any Reasonable Offer Not Likely to be Rejected by the Owners.

Music Hall may practically be considered as on the market, and it is said by the owners that any reasonable offer is not likely to be rejected. The hall is not all that it should be in many respects, but its central location and retirement from noisy thoroughfares are features greatly in its favor. Should the proposed cross-town street from north to south be run through, it would carry Music Hall into oblivion, and with such a possible fate pending the owners are not anxious to continue much longer a piece of property which they assert is not a paying investment. Even with the prospect of increased business for the remainder of this season and perhaps next, owing to the burning of Tremont Temple, which leaves Music Hall the monopoly, the owners are none the less anxious to dispose of their interest in the property. Col. H. L. Higginson, who represents the owners, said today that although he had not broached the subject of sale to the other stockholders directly, yet he did not doubt that a fair offer would be accepted. The subject of a site for another hall, should the old one be sold, has always been a perplexing one, and Col. Higginson says that he is no nearer a solution of the problem today than he was when it was first propounded.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MARCH 21.

WOULD ACCEPT AN OFFER.

Col. Higginson Remarks That Music Hall is for Sale.

In connection with a rumor that Music Hall is for sale, Col. Higginson, who represents the stockholders, is understood to have remarked yesterday that while he has not broached the subject of selling it to them, he has no doubt that any reasonable offer would be accepted by the stockholders, even allowing for the monopoly which the hall will enjoy by reason of the burning of Tremont Temple.

As to the question of a site for a new music hall, should the present one be sold, the colonel says it has had no satisfactory solution.

[125]

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1893.

Nikisch Resigns the Conductorship.

Buda-Pesth Wants the Boston Symphony Leader.

Boston, March 14.—Arthur Nikisch, at the end of the present season, is to sever his connection as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in which position he has entertained and delighted music lovers for the past five years.

He has received an offer to become director and leader of the Royal Opera House at Buda-Pesth, Austria, where are located the royal palaces.

He has for a long time hankered for an opportunity to gain fame in Europe, and seven years ago refused a like offer that he might conquer Americans.

Philadelphia, March 14.—Mr. Nikisch was seen in this city last night and said: "It is true that I intend to resign. This work is too hard for me, and I am not in the best of health. I couldn't stand it much longer, for I have to give so many concerts and do so much traveling that it wears me out. My chief inducement for quitting the orchestra, however, is that I have been offered the position of director-general of the Royal Opera at Buda Pesth. I cannot state now the sum offered me, but it is the highest salary every offered a musician, and the position is one of the greatest honor in the profession. Hans Richter had the post before he left for Vienna, and the latest musician who held it was Count Zichy.

"I have not completed all my arrangements yet, as the negotiations require some time to be approved by the Reichstag and the Ministry, it being a royal affair; but I expect to sail by June 1. I shall probably keep my position with the orchestra until Mr. Higginson can make arrangements for my successor, and very likely I will remain with it until the end of the season. We are booked to play at the World's Fair in May, and have other engagements in the West, after which I suppose my work in America will come to an end.

"As I am a Hungarian, I will be glad to return to my fatherland; but I shall also be sorry to leave the orchestra, for my relations here have been of the pleasantest."

Mr. Nikisch is a Hungarian by birth. He was born at Szent Mikos, Oct. 12, 1855. His father was head accountant in the service of Prince Lichtenstein. Nikisch was educated in the Vienna Conservatory, where he studied composition under Dessoff and the violin under Hellmiersberger. He left the Conservatory in 1874, with prizes in composition (sextet for strings) and violin playing. In 1878 he was engaged by Neumann as second conductor of the Stadt Theatre in Leipzig, and he then left for Vienna, to take the post of violinist in the Imperial Orchestra. In 1882 he was appointed first chapelmaster at Leipzig. Mr. Nikisch was called in 1889 to take the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a position that was vacated by Mr. William Gericke.

There are rumors already of other directors, says the Boston "Journal." First of all comes the name of Mr. Gericke, who gave to the orchestra the reputation that it so richly deserved. He is now in Vienna, and it is doubtful whether he could be persuaded to leave his home. If he should appear again as conductor of our orchestra, his first appearnce would be a memorable scene, for few are held in such respect by musicians and laymen as the modest and thoroughly capable Gericke.

There is talk of Hans Richter. Richter was born in Raab, Hungary, April 4, 1843. He studied in Vienna the horn, pianoforte and composition. In 1866-67 he was with Wagner in Luzerne. Richter was chorus director in Munich in 1868-69. In 1870 he directed the first performance of "Lohengrin" in Brussels. From 1871 to 1875 he was conductor of the National Threatre at Buda-Pesth. In 1875 he was appointed conductor of the opera and the Philharmonic concerts at Vienna. In 1876 he directed at Baireuth. For some time he has been busied with concerts in London.

Edouard Colonne, of Paris, is also mentioned. He was born at Bordeaux, July 23, 1838, and was a pupil of the Paris Conservatory, where he took, in 1863, the first prize for violin playing. He was then first violin of the Paris Opera, until in 1871 he founded a concert organization, the performances of which were given during the winter, first at the Odeon, afterward at the Chatelet. He is now also first conductor at the Opera. He is known throughout Europe as a conductor of the very first rank.

BOSTON COURIER,

MORNING, MARCH 19,

THE SYMPHONY.

A programme that represented Berlioz, Rubinstein, Wagner and Schumann at their worthiest, as did the programme for the eighteenth symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, March 11, would ordinarily be pronounced by musicians as respectably well chosen.

It is also true that Conductor Nikisch could not have been otherwise than artistically well disposed in arranging a programme that would have inevitably encountered popular failure but for the appearance of so interesting a soloist as Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler with Rubinstein's fourth concerto in D minor. Furthermore there was lively melody and abundance of it in the overture "Le Carnaval Romain," by Berlioz, and it brightened the audience into a humor that is seldom experienced from that composer. Following the overture and concerto came the Siegfried Idyl by Wagner and the symphony, No. 3, in E flat major, by Schumann. Neither of these two works, owing to the peculiar arrangement of the programme, could have been heard at its fairest advantage, and the logical result of any such arrangement was to impose a sense of weariness which was artistically prejudicial not only in its effect upon the selections themselves, but in prolonging the concert until an all too late hour.

The pianist Rubinstein has composed at least six pianoforte concertos—possibly one or two more. In the concerto in D minor the genius of the solo instrument seems to have been studied above any other consideration. The Nestor of contemporaneous musicians, as has been stated, is here at his worthiest, just as was Moscheles when he wrote his now well nigh obsolete concerto in G minor. The work is intensely personel in its relation to the composer. It is musically photographic of the pianist of broad and massive brow, and in the first movement especially it even suggests his swarthy complexion of some ten or fifteen years ago, a complexion that was then more like that of a Tartar or a Turk rather than of a Russian. With the second movement comes a change of mood. The lionine roarings of the opening moderato are indeed followed by a sentimentally pastoral and well nigh lamb-like andante—not a "moderato assai," as announced on the programme. In the finale the concerto loses even such paucity of substance as its earlier movements contained, and simply fritters itself away in a tuneful play of sounds devoid of any deeper meaning. In brief, it fairly seems as though the hand of a pianist and not the genius of a composer had incited this truly Rubeinstelnish concert piece, and it is difficult of belief that anyone can derive other enjoyment from the work than that which may be derived by the numerous yet not over scrupulous devotees to pianoforte playing as an end per se and not as an art.

The performance by Mme. Zeisler was overflowing with subjectiveness of the most intense kind. It was appealingly sympathetic in its quieter moods, yet not without an affection and sentimentality that oft had a very obscuring affect upon the real music of the concerto. Technically considered, the wealth of exacting arpeggios, broken chords, scale passages and all the essentials of true piano-forte bravura with which the concerto is permeated, was easily at the artist's finger tips, and, notably in the first and last movements, despite the fact that Mrs. Zeisler was quite fortunately unsuccessful in her apparent attempt to break all the strings in the piano, she excellently responded to the virtuosic requirement of the composer. Perhaps, on the whole, Mrs. Zeisler's performance had its most characteristic tribute in the very much noise of the applause she received.

Next in order was the "Siegfried Idyl," by Richard Wagner: then came as a finale Schumann's Symphony No. 3, in E flat major.

The first performance in Boston of this work was under Carl Zerrahn, at a concert given by the Harvard Musical Association, Feb. 4, 1869. It has been performed at Boston Symphony concerts, Nov. 24, 1883; Feb. 21, 1885 (Mr. Henschel); April 21, 1888 (Mr. Gericke); Jan. 25, 1890, and last evening (Mr. Nikisch). The vigorous chief theme of the first movement was excellently announced; the fortissimo by horns, bassoons, violas and basses just prior to the entrance of the subordinate theme had as harmonious an ensemble as one would care to hear, and the "second subject" proper had its complete and charming contrast to what had preceded it most admirably set forth. The vigorous coda to this movement, however, was strangely sterilized. The performance of the second movement was slightly too rigid for the menuet galante, which in character if not in form it really is. The andante or third movement (nicht schnell) was granted its full form and spirit as a song without words; and the last two movements of the work left little to be desired.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 19, 1893.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch will cease to be director of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the close of the present season. He will take charge of the Royal Opera, at Buda-Pesth, Hungary, his native land.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 20, 1893.

Colonel Higginson Thinks that the Stockholders Will Not Refuse any Reasonable Offer.

Music Hall may practically be considered as on the market, and it is said by the owners that any reasonable offer is not likely to be rejected. The hall is not all that it should be in many respects, but its central location and retirement from noisy thoroughfares are features greatly in its favor. Should the proposed cross-town street from north to south be run through it would carry Music Hall into oblivion, and with such a possible fate pending the owners are not anxious to continue much longer a piece of property which they assert is not a paying investment. Even with the prospect of increased business for the remainder of this season and perhaps next, owing to the burning of Tremont Temple, which leaves Music Hall the monopoly, the owners are none the less anxious to dispose of their interests in the property. Colonel Henry L. Higginson, who represents the owners, said today that although he had not broached the subject of sale to the other stockholders directly, yet he did not doubt that a fair offer would be accepted. The subject of a site for another hall, should the old one be sold, has always been a perplexing one, and Colonel Higginson says that he is no nearer a solution of the problem today than he was when it was first propounded.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 21, 1893.

A FAIR OFFER WOULD BUY.

Owners of Music Hall Don't Think It Is a Paying Property.

Who wants Music Hall?

A fair offer will take it, although it has not yet been fully thrown upon the market.

Colonel Henry L. Higginson, who represents the owners, said yesterday that although he had not broached the subject of sale to the stockholders directly, still he did not doubt that a fair offer would be accepted.

The hall is not all that it should be in many respects, but its central location and retirement from noisy thoroughfares are features greatly in its favor. The owners do not consider it a paying property, and it is said are not over-anxious to continue longer with the investment.

The burning of Tremont Temple leaves Music Hall the monopoly in the line of large halls and the prospect of a much better business for this season and a part of next.

If the hall is sold and put to other uses than what it has been in the past, it will disappoint a vast number of music-loving people who have enjoyed many hours there.

Should the proposed cross-town street, from north to south, be carried through, it would destroy Music Hall, as the street would run through Hamilton place.

Manager Ellis was seen by a POST reporter last night at Music Hall, but he said that he had neard no hing in regard to selling the place, but he supposed that if someone came along who made a good offer there would be a prospect of a sale.

Music Hall was built in 1852, the intention being to erect a hall to be devoted to great concerts of orchestral and vocal music. The hall is 130 feet in length, 78 in width and 65 in height, with proportions carefully studied for acoustic effect. It has two balconies, and the walls of solid masonry are broken at intervals by projecting pilasters; it seats about 2600.

The architect was George Snell. For thirty years the most of the concerts of high character have been given there, but of late years all kinds of entertainments have been given, which were not in keeping with the lofty purpose for which it was built.

Not the least inspiring of the memories that cluster about the hall is that of Theodore Parker, who preached here on Sundays during the last years of his active life many of those stirring discourses that gave him so high a place among the foremost men of his time.

In later years the Rev. W. H. H. Murray established a "Metropolitan Church" here which flourished for a while, attracting crowded congregations.

The determination to sell the great organ and remodel the hall so as to make it serviceable for theatrical and operatic entertainments as well as for concerts, was reached in the winter of 1883. The organ was removed in '85, being purchased by the New England Conservatory of Music.

The fate of Music Hall has hung in the balance before. The agitation of extending Hamilton place through to Washington street has disturbed musical people considerably in years past.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 21, 1893.

MUSIC HALL TO BE SOLD.

Any Reasonable Offer Not Likely to be Rejected by the Owners.

Music Hall may practically be considered as on the market, and it is said by the owners that any reasonable offer is not likely to be rejected. The hall is not all that it should be in many respects, but its central location and retirement from noisy thoroughfares are features greatly in its favor. Should the proposed cross-town street from north to south be run through, it would carry Music Hall into oblivion, and with such a possible fate pending the owners are not anxious to continue much longer a piece of property which they assert is not a paying investment. Even with the prospect of increased business for the remainder of this season and perhaps next, owing to the burning of Tremont Temple, which leaves Music Hall the monopoly, the owners are none the less anxious to dispose of their interest in the property. Col. H. L. Higginson, who represents the owners, said today that although he had not broached the subject of sale to the other stockholders directly, yet he did not doubt that a fair offer would be accepted. The subject of a site for another hall, should the old one be sold, has always been a perplexing one, and Col. Higginson says that he is no nearer a solution of the problem today than he was when it was first propounded.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MARCH 21.

WOULD ACCEPT AN OFFER.

Col. Higginson Remarks That Music Hall is for Sale.

In connection with a rumor that Music Hall is for sale, Col. Higginson, who represents the stockholders, is understood to have remarked yesterday that while he has not broached the subject of selling it to them, he has no doubt that any reasonable offer would be accepted by the stockholders, even allowing for the monopoly which the hall will enjoy by reason of the burning of Tremont Temple.

As to the question of a site for a new music hall, should the present one be sold, the colonel says it has had no satisfactory solution.

[125]

The Musical Herald of the United States

(Formerly the BOSTON MUSICAL HERALD. Established 1889.)

MARCH, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Chickering Hall, disclosed that organization and its conductor, Mr. Nikisch, in their virtuoso mood. There was less in the program to demand a display of technical capabilities than on some previous occasions, but that circumstance could not militate against the pleasure which the concert provided. The program consisted of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Mendelssohn's cheery "Italian" symphony, Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and a movement from a concerto for violoncello, by Davidoff. It is an observation which, we believe, has been made before, that the Boston orchestra is happiest in its solo performers when it chooses them from its own members. The band really needs none of the adventitious help genefally sought when the aid of a singer or pianist is enlisted, but when one of its own artists has been permitted to exhibit his skill in a concerto, the result has always been gratifying. This was again proved the case when Mr. Alwin Schroeder played the violoncello solo. The composition, like most of those written by virtuosi to display the skill attainable on their instruments, exhibits a penury of musical ideas, and fails utterly to bring out the noblest characteristics of the violoncello; but Mr. Schroeder used it as a vehicle which brought his virtuosoship into prominence and achieved a decided triumph.

The vividness and eloquence of Mr. Nikisch's reading of the two Wagner numbers challenged enthusiastic praise, and the performance of the orchestra in them and the sharply contrasted symphony and Liszt piece was all but faultless.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Mr. Franz Kneisel and his associates from Boston won golden opinions at Chickering Hall, with their third concert of chamber music. The program consisted of three works, of which the last was Brahms' quintette for clarinet, two violins, viola and violoncello, which has caused more comment than any piece of chamber music within the last score of years. Practically it was new to the New York public, through Mr. Edward Herrmann and his club performed it here early in the season. At that time the Tribune spoke of its beauties with enthusiasm, and yesterday's hearing mightily intensified the impression carried away from the first performance. It is in every sense a most remarkable work which can scarcely fail to compel admiration for the genius of its creator when played as it was yesterday. The clarinet part was played by Mr. Goldschmidt, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an artist of good parts, though without the full measure of skill demanded by the music. Brahms has treated the instrument with wonderful ingenuity and discretion, but the task set the performer is one that can only be perfectly fulfilled by an artist accustomed to solo playing and commanding a greater variety of expression than is within the reach of Mr. Goldschmidt.

The other numbers of the program were Dr. Dvorak's quartette for strings in E major, Op. 80, a delightfully fresh and engaging composition, and Beethoven's sunny quartette in G major, Op. 18, No. 2. In these works the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his fellows was quite beyond praise, altogether lovely in tone and sentiment and finished in execution. The audience was rapturous in its applause after each movement.—H. E. Krehbiel in N. Y. Tribune.

The Adamowski Quartette closed their afternoon series in Chickering Hall, on January 24. This was the program: Haydn: Quartette in G major. Goldmark: Suite for pianoforte and violin, Op. 11. Saint-Saens: Quartette, Op. 41. Mr. Nikisch played the pianoforte part in the works by Goldmark and Saint-Saens in admirable style. Saint-Saens' quartette seemed to impress with its earnestness and general air of freshness—as if the composer wrote "off hand," and had rather to restrain than to urge his pen.

On February 13, the Kneisel Quartette gave in Chickering Hall the sixth concert of the current series, with this program: Brahms: Trio, pianoforte and strings, Op. 8, revised; songs—"Spring Night." Schumann: "Whither?" "The Poet" and "The Carrier Pigeon." Schubert: Dvorak, quartette, Op. 80. The revision of Brahms' trio has been declared a most successful combination of the composer's younger exuberance and his later reserve, so that it stands among those of his works that promise to live of their own vitality, and without the artificial stimulus of a cult. Jules Jordan sang the songs and Arthur Whiting was the pianist of the occasion.

The Philharmonic Society, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave its fourth rehearsal and concert on Friday and Saturday, winding up the over-crowded week with one of the most successful concerts of the season thus far. The program was felicitously chosen throughout, demonstrating that the highest art is quite compatible with the most elevated æsthetic delight. The numbers were: Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90. Weber: Concertstueck for piano and orchestra, in F minor, by Miss Minnie Wetzler. Bizet: Suite No. 1, from "L'Arlesienne." Handel: Largo, Mr. Kneisel, violin solo. Wagner: "Kaiser-Marsch." Concerning Miss Wetzler's interpretation of the difficult and exceedingly beautiful concertstueck, it is safe to say that we recognize a new artist, wonderfully gifted in temperament, technic and artistic intelligence. Dominated by a supreme enthusiasm, her playing enthuses not only the vast audience, but even the wearied and impassive orchestra. No pianist besides Paderewski has developed such a positive furor of delight, certainly in Brooklyn.

POLYPHONIA.

TUESDAY, MARCH 21, 1893.

MUSIC HALL AWAITS A PURCHASER.

Colonel Higginson Thinks that the Stockholders Will Not Refuse any Reasonable Offer.

Music Hall may practically be considered as on the market, and it is said by the owners that any reasonable offer is not likely to be rejected. The hall is not all that it should be in many respects, but its central location and retirement from noisy thoroughfares are features greatly in its favor. Should the proposed cross-town street from north to south be run through it would carry Music Hall into oblivion, and with such a possible fate pending the owners are not anxious to continue much longer a piece of property which they assert is not a paying investment. Even with the prospect of increased business for the remainder of this season and perhaps next, owing to the burning of Tremont Temple, which leaves Music Hall the monopoly, the owners are none the less anxious to dispose of their interests in the property. Colonel Henry L. Higginson, who represents the owners, said Monday that although he had not broached the subject of sale to the other stockholders directly, yet he did not doubt that a fair offer would be accepted. The subject of a site for another hall, should the old one be sold, has always been a perplexing one, and Colonel Higginson says that he is no nearer a solution of the problem today than he was when it was first propounded.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 22.

MUSIC HALL NOT FOR SALE.

No Cause for Alarm Among Music Lovers, as Col. Higginson Says the Symphonies Will Go, Pay or Not.

Hardly had Boston realized that Tremont Temple was gone, and with it one of the city's two large concert and assembly halls, when the music lovers were startled by the report that they were to be deprived possibly of the very sustenance of the musical life of the city, Music Hall.

Instantly came the thought, what will become of the Symphony concerts, the grand recitals, the oratories, and where shall the leading singers of the world henceforth appear, or will they be able again to bow to Boston applause, for without Music Hall, how could they?

It did seem plausible, especially when the mayor's rapid transit plan, which provided for the abolishment of Music Hall, was also recalled.

But THE GLOBE is able to give the assurance on reliable authority that Music Hall will not be sold yet awhile and no agent has instructions to solicit offers for the property or to represent that the hall is for sale.

Like almost every piece of property in the city the owners would sell at a good sized profit, but they are not anxious to dispose of it under other conditions.

Col. Henry L. Higginson owns three-fourths of the interest which is held by a company in the hall, and he made this statement yesterday afternoon:

"I don't care to say whether it is possible to buy Music Hall or not. I don't know why any one should worry about the hall, but if they do you can assure them that things are liable to go along as they have done. I am not tired of Music Hall, and never have been tired of it. I own the largest part of the interest in it held by the association, and it won't be sold unless I want to sell it.

"Music Hall has never been a success. It has never been a profitable investment.

"The symphony concerts have never been a success. There has never been a year when they have been a success. But I never expected they would be when I started them. Who expected they would be? I am not running them to make money or to lose any either, but have to foot the bills just the same.

"You can say the symphony concerts will go on just as before. There never has been any thought or intention of discontinuing them. They will go on whatever happens to you or I."

In reply to a question as to whether the concerts could be held in another hall Mr. Higginson said: "Music Hall is the only place in the city where symphony concerts could be conducted, and you can depend upon it they will continue to be. As a matter of fact the concerts and Music Hall have no connection."

C. E. Cotting, agent of the hall, said: "I suppose that Music Hall could be bought if any one offered 50 per cent. more than the owners value it at, but in the sense of being on the market, or the owners being anxious to sell, it is not for sale. We are making engagements clear up to June, 1894, and if any one wants it for a date next season, and is prepared to talk business, he can engage it."

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK WEDNESDAY, MARCH 22, 1893.

The Last Nikisch Concert.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH made his farewell bow to New York last Thursday evening in Chickering Hall. It was the occasion of the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at its close Mr. Nikisch was accorded an ovation. Here was the program:

Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
First movement from concerto for violin, in D, op. 77.....Brahms
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
Symphony No. 5, in E minor.....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Kneisel was to have played the Brahms' concerto, but sickness detained him in Philadelphia. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch very gracefully volunteered to fill his place and sang, in her usual musical fashion, a "Spring Song," by Busoni; the "Frühlingsnacht," by Schumann, and other songs by Paderewski and Brahms. She was given a very warm greeting and had to respond with Brahms' "Vergebliches Staendchen." The orchestra and Mr. Nikisch were in a brilliant mood, and the beautiful Tschaikowsky symphony received a remarkable interpretation. Mr. Nikisch's successor has not yet been named. Owing to the illness of Mr. Kneisel the last concert of the Kneisel Quartet, which was to have taken place in Chickering Hall Saturday afternoon last, has been indefinitely postponed.

The Last Brooklyn Philharmonic.—The last Brooklyn Philharmonic concert occurred Saturday night, the afternoon concert taking place Friday. Mr. Nikisch conducted Mendelssohn's Italian symphony, Liszt's "Tasso," and Mr. Adamowski played the first and second movements of Bruch's G minor violin concerto and Mrs. Nikisch sang some songs.

Frederic E. Hahn's Success.—Mr. Frederic E. Hahn, the first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a concert at the New Century Drawing Room, Philadelphia, last Wednesday evening, which was very successful. He was assisted by Miss Weda Cook, contralto; Mr. Heinrich Schwecker, harp, and several of his associates in the orchestra.

The Musical Herald of the United States

(Formerly the BOSTON MUSICAL HERALD. Established 1883.)

MARCH, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Chickering Hall, disclosed that organization and its conductor, Mr. Nikisch, in their virtuoso mood. There was less in the program to demand a display of technical capabilities than on some previous occasions, but that circumstance could not militate against the pleasure which the concert provided. The program consisted of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Mendelssohn's cheery "Italian" symphony, Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and a movement from a concerto for violoncello, by Davidoff. It is an observation which, we believe, has been made before, that the Boston orchestra is happiest in its solo performers when it chooses them from its own members. The band really needs none of the adventitious help generally sought when the aid of a singer or pianist is enlisted, but when one of its own artists has been permitted to exhibit his skill in a concerto, the result has always been gratifying. This was again proved the case when Mr. Alwin Schroeder played the violoncello solo. The composition, like most of those written by virtuosi to display the skill attainable on their instruments, exhibits a penury of musical ideas, and fails utterly to bring out the noblest characteristics of the violoncello; but Mr. Schroeder used it as a vehicle which brought his virtuososhiip into prominence and achieved a decided triumph.

The vividness and eloquence of Mr. Nikisch's reading of the two Wagner numbers challenged enthusiastic praise, and the performance of the orchestra in them and the sharply contrasted symphony and Liszt piece was all but faultless.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Mr. Franz Kneisel and his associates from Boston won golden opinions at Chickering Hall, with their third concert of chamber music. The program consisted of three works, of which the last was Brahms' quintette for clarinet, two violins, viola and violoncello, which has caused more comment than any piece of chamber music within the last score of years. Practically it was new to the New York public, through Mr. Edward Herrmann and his club performed it here early in the season. At that time the Tribune spoke of its beauties with enthusiasm, and yesterday's hearing mightily intensified the impression carried away from the first performance. It is in every sense a most remarkable work which can scarcely fail to compel admiration for the genius of its creator when played as it was yesterday. The clarinet part was played by Mr. Goldschmidt, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an artist of good parts, though without the full measure of skill demanded by the music. Brahms has treated the instrument with wonderful ingenuity and discretion, but the task set the performer is one that can only be perfectly fulfilled by an artist accustomed to solo playing and commanding a greater variety of expression than is within the reach of Mr. Goldschmidt.

The other numbers of the program were Dr. Dvorak's quartette for strings in E major, Op. 80, a delightfully fresh and engaging composition, and Beethoven's sunny quartette in G major, Op. 18, No. 2. In these works the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his fellows was quite beyond praise, altogether lovely in tone and sentiment and finished in execution. The audience was rapturous in its applause after each movement.—H. E. Krehbiel in N. Y. Tribune.

The Adamowski Quartette closed their afternoon series in Chickering Hall, on January 24. This was the program: Haydn: Quartette in G major. Goldmark: Suite for pianoforte and violin, Op. 11. Saint-Saens: Quartette, Op. 41. Mr. Nikisch played the pianoforte part in the works by Goldmark and Saint-Saens in admirable style. Saint-Saens' quartette seemed to impress with its earnestness and general air of freshness—as if the composer wrote "off hand," and had rather to restrain than to urge his pen.

On February 13, the Kneisel Quartette gave in Chickering Hall the sixth concert of the current series, with this program: Brahms: Trio, pianoforte and strings, Op. 8, revised; songs—"Spring Night." Schumann: "Whither?" "The Poet" and "The Carrier Pigeon." Schubert: Dvorak, quartette, Op. 80. The revision of Brahms' trio has been declared a most successful combination of the composer's younger exuberance and his later reserve, so that it stands among those of his works that promise to live of their own vitality, and without the artificial stimulus of a cult. Jules Jordan sang the songs and Arthur Whiting was the pianist of the occasion.

The Philharmonic Society, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave its fourth rehearsal and concert on Friday and Saturday, winding up the over-crowded week with one of the most successful concerts of the season thus far. The program was felicitously chosen throughout, demonstrating that the highest art is quite compatible with the most elevated æsthetic delight. The numbers were: Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90. Weber: Concertstueck for piano and orchestra, in F minor, by Miss Minnie Wetzler. Bizet: Suite No. 1, from "L'Arlesienne." Handel: Largo, Mr. Kneisel, violin solo. Wagner: "Kaiser-Marsch." Concerning Miss Wetzler's interpretation of the difficult and exceedingly beautiful concertstueck, it is safe to say that we recognize a new artist, wonderfully gifted in temperament, technic and artistic intelligence. Dominated by a supreme enthusiasm, her playing enthuses not only the vast audience, but even the wearied and impassive orchestra. No pianist besides Paderewski has developed such a positive furor of delight, certainly in Brooklyn.

POLYPHONIA.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, MARCH 21, 1893.

MUSIC HALL AWAITS A PURCHASER.

Colonel Higginson Thinks that the Stockholders Will Not Refuse any Reasonable Offer.

Music Hall may practically be considered as on the market, and it is said by the owners that any reasonable offer is not likely to be rejected. The hall is not all that it should be in many respects, but its central location and retirement from noisy thoroughfares are features greatly in its favor. Should the proposed cross-town street from north to south be run through it would carry Music Hall into oblivion, and with such a possible fate pending the owners are not anxious to continue much longer a piece of property which they assert is not a paying investment. Even with the prospect of increased business for the remainder of this season and perhaps next, owing to the burning of Tremont Temple, which leaves Music Hall the monopoly, the owners are none the less anxious to dispose of their interests in the property. Colonel Henry L. Higginson, who represents the owners, said Monday that although he had not broached the subject of sale to the other stockholders directly, yet he did not doubt that a fair offer would be accepted. The subject of a site for another hall, should the old one be sold, has always been a perplexing one, and Colonel Higginson says that he is no nearer a solution of the problem today than he was when it was first propounded.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 22.

MUSIC HALL NOT FOR SALE.

No Cause for Alarm Among Music Lovers, as Col. Higginson Says the Symphonies Will Go, Pay or Not.

Hardly had Boston realized that Tremont Temple was gone, and with it one of the city's two large concert and assembly halls, when the music lovers were startled by the report that they were to be deprived possibly of the very sustenance of the musical life of the city, Music Hall.

Instantly came the thought, what will become of the Symphony concerts, the grand recitals, the oratories, and where shall the leading singers of the world henceforth appear, or will they be able again to bow to Boston applause, for without Music Hall, how could they?

It did seem plausible, especially when the mayor's rapid transit plan, wh ch provided for the abolishment of Music Hall, was also recalled.

But THE GLOBE is able to give the assurance on reliable authority that Music Hall will not be sold yet awhile and no agent has instructions to solicit offers for the property or to represent that the hall is for sale.

Like almost every piece of property in the city the owners would sell at a good sized profit, but they are not anxious to dispose of it under other conditions.

Col. Henry L. Higginson owns three-fourths of the interest which is held by a company in the hall, and he made this statement yesterday afternoon:

"I don't care to say whether it is possible to buy Music Hall or not. I don't know why any one should worry about the hall, but if they do you can assure them that things are liable to go along as they have done. I am not tired of Music Hall, and never have been tired of it. I own the largest part of the interest in it held by the association, and it won't be sold unless I want to sell it.

"Music Hall has never been a success. It has never been a profitable investment.

"The symphony concerts have never been a success. There has never been a year when they have been a success. But I never expected they would be when I started them. Who expected they would be? I am not running them to make money or to lose any either, but have to foot the bills just the same.

"You can say the symphony concerts will go on just as before. There never has been any thought or intention of discontinuing them. They will go on whatever happens to you or I."

In reply to a question as to whether the concerts could be held in another hall Mr. Higginson said: "Music Hall is the only place in the city where symphony concerts could be conducted, and you can depend upon it they will continue to be. As a matter of fact the concerts and Music Hall have no connection."

C. E. Cotting, agent of the hall, said: "I suppose that Music Hall could be bought if any one offered 50 per cent. more than the owners value it at, but in the sense of being on the market, or the owners being anxious to sell, it is not for sale. We are making engagements clear up to June, 1894, and if any one wants it for a date next season, and is prepared to talk business, he can engage it."

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK WEDNESDAY, MARCH 22, 1893.

The Last Nikisch Concert.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH made his farewell bow to New York last Thursday evening in Chickering Hall. It was the occasion of the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at its close Mr. Nikisch was accorded an ovation. Here was the program:

Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
First movement from concerto for violin, in D, op. 77.....Brahms
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
Symphony No. 5, in E minor.....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Kneisel was to have played the Brahms' concerto, but sickness detained him in Philadelphia. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch very gracefully volunteered to fill his place and sang, in her usual musical fashion, a "Spring Song," by Busoni; the "Frühlingsnacht," by Schumann, and other songs by Paderewski and Brahms. She was given a very warm greeting and had to respond with Brahms' "Vergebliches Staendchen." The orchestra and Mr. Nikisch were in a brilliant mood, and the beautiful Tschaikowsky symphony received a remarkable interpretation. Mr. Nikisch's successor has not yet been named. Owing to the illness of Mr. Kneisel the last concert of the Kneisel Quartet, which was to have taken place in Chickering Hall Saturday afternoon last, has been indefinitely postponed.

The Last Brooklyn Philharmonic.—The last Brooklyn Philharmonic concert occurred Saturday night, the afternoon concert taking place Friday. Mr. Nikisch conducted Mendelssohn's Italian symphony, Liszt's "Tasso," and Mr. Adamowski played the first and second movements of Bruch's G minor violin concerto and Mrs. Nikisch sang some songs.

Frederic E. Hahn's Success.—Mr. Frederic E. Hahn, the first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a concert at the New Century Drawing Room, Philadelphia, last Wednesday evening, which was very successful. He was assisted by Miss Weda Cook, contralto; Mr. Heinrich Schwecker, harp, and several of his associates in the orchestra.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 23, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Coriolanus."
DAVIDOFF.	CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO. (In one movement.)
MOSZKOWSKI.	TWO MOVEMENTS from SUITE No. 1. a) THEME AND VARIATIONS. b) PERPETUUM MOBILE.
	SOLI FOR VIOLONCELLO.
a) CHOPIN.	NOCTURNE.
b) KLENGEL.	CAPRICCIO.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 5, in E minor. I. Andante.—Allegro con anima. II. Andante cantabile. III. Valse, (Allegro moderato). IV. Finale, (Andante maestoso.—Allegro vivace).

SOLOIST:

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER

Tuesday Evening, March 28, at 7.45 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

The American Hebrew

Love ye the truth and the peace. והאמת והשלם אהבו

PHILIP COWEN, Publisher.

New York, Nissan 7, 5653, March 24, 1893.

Those who have attended the concerts this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left the hall after the last concert on Thursday evening of last week with feelings of sorrow. The concerts for this season were over, and no more of these most pleasurable musical entertainments could be looked forward to until next season. Then, too, we had bidden adieu to Mr. Nikisch, who goes back to Europe to accept a most flattering engagement as conductor at the opera house in Buda-Pesth. With all our orchestral music in New York, the regular visits of Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra have been among the brightest episodes in our musical season. In writing about the concerts, we have exhausted all the expressions of praise that could be applied to them, and there has been little left to do but to record the fact of a concert having been given and to mention the programme. That this was, in a large measure, due to the high attainment reached by this organization under the individuality and lofty conception of his art by Mr. Nikisch cannot for a moment be disputed, and every true lover of music has taken a just pride in his work. How this was felt by the audience last Thursday night was shown by the ovation tendered him at the conclusion of the concert, when he was compelled to come forward again and again to bow his acknowledgements for the cordial demonstrations of good feeling and approval. The concert was one of the best of the series. The orchestral numbers were Berlioz's overture "Le Carnaval Romain," Wagner's "Waldweben" and Tschaikowsky's great fifth symphony. It is needless to say that all were played in that perfect manner for which the orchestra is famous, and the symphony received the dramatic and glowing interpretation which befits the Russian composer. Mr. Kneisel was to have been the soloist, but as he was ill his place was taken by Mrs. Nikisch, who sang several songs in her usual charming style and manner.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 20.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner; "La Mer" Symphonic Sketches for orchestra, Paul Gilson (first time), "La Fée d 'Amour," for violin and orchestra, Raff; Symphony, "A Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. The heartiest applause of the evening was accorded the Wagner overture, which was most brilliantly and finely played. The Raff work for the violin is not particularly interesting, or if it be, Mr. Roth, who was the soloist of the occasion, did not make it appear so. He played it tastefully and with excellent technique, but it seems to be a work that requires a Marteau to do it full justice. The selections from the symphonic sketches by Paul Gilson are cleverly and effectively scored, but they are programme music pure and simple, and are more ambitious than edifying. The concert was somewhat dull, not to say dreary. We have omitted to state that Mr. Roth was vigorously applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: "Romeo and Juliet," Techaikowsky; Concerto in A-major, Liszt; Scherzo Capriccioso, Dvorak, and Symphony No. 4, Beethoven. The soloist is Mr. F. B. Busoni.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 27, 1893.

Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture was the opening number on the programme of the nineteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, Saturday evening. It was given a most brilliant and effective rendering throughout. The Pilgrim's song of redemption at the finale received a most enthusiastic applause. The two new numbers introduced for the first time here did not make a marked impression. "The Love Fairy," by Roff, is a graceful composition and was first played in Boston with piano accompaniment by Sarasate a year or two ago. Mr. Otto Roeth played the violin solo part with great intelligence, at the conclusion of which he received a hearty encore. "The Sea," by Paul Gilson, is a composition of three symphonic sketches based on a poem of the same name by Eddy Levis. It had its first hearing in Brussels, where its composer recently graduated from the conservatoire. It represents "Sunrise," "Sailors' Songs and Dances" and "Twilight" and each one of the movements has an independent form in itself. Mr. Gilson possesses ability, as the work shows originality and there is a musical rhythm and poetic strain throughout the piece. Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" closed the programme and was given a fine interpretation. The rehearsal of this week will occur on Thursday afternoon, March 30, on account of the Good Friday evening performance of the Handel and Haydn Society and the concert April 1. Mr. Ferruccio Busoni will be the soloist.

[127]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 23, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Coriolanus."
DAVIDOFF.	CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO. (In one movement.)
MOSZKOWSKI.	TWO MOVEMENTS from SUITE No. 1. a) THEME AND VARIATIONS. b) PERPETUUM MOBILE.
	SOLI FOR VIOLONCELLO.
a) CHOPIN.	NOCTURNE.
b) KLENGEL.	CAPRICCIO.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 5, in E minor. I. Andante.—Allegro con anima. II. Andante cantabile. III. Valse, (Allegro moderato). IV. Finale, (Andante maestoso.—Allegro vivace).

SOLOIST:

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER

Tuesday Evening, March 28, at 7.45 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

The American Hebrew

Love ye the truth and the peace. ואמת והשלם אהבו

PHILIP COWEN, Publisher.

New York, Nissan 7, 5653, March 24, 1893.

Those who have attended the concerts this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left the hall after the last concert on Thursday evening of last week with feelings of sorrow. The concerts for this season were over, and no more of these most pleasurable musical entertainments could be looked forward to until next season. Then, too, we had bidden adieu to Mr. Nikisch, who goes back to Europe to accept a most flattering engagement as conductor at the opera house in Buda-Pesth. With all our orchestral music in New York, the regular visits of Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra have been among the brightest episodes in our musical season. In writing about the concerts, we have exhausted all the expressions of praise that could be applied to them, and there has been little left to do but to record the fact of a concert having been given and to mention the programme. That this was, in a large measure, due to the high attainment reached by this organization under the individuality and lofty conception of his art by Mr. Nikisch cannot for a moment be disputed, and every true lover of music has taken a just pride in his work. How this was felt by the audience last Thursday night was shown by the ovation tendered him at the conclusion of the concert, when he was compelled to come forward again and again to bow his acknowledgements for the cordial demonstrations of good feeling and approval. The concert was one of the best of the series. The orchestral numbers were Berlioz's overture "Le Carnaval Romain," Wagner's "Waldweben" and Tschaikowsky's great fifth symphony. It is needless to say that all were played in that perfect manner for which the orchestra is famous, and the symphony received the dramatic and glowing interpretation which befits the Russian composer. Mr. Kneisel was to have been the soloist, but as he was ill his place was taken by Mrs. Nikisch, who sang several songs in her usual charming style and manner.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 26.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner; "La Mer" Symphonic Sketches for orchestra, Paul Gilson (first time), "La Fée d'Amour," for violin and orchestra, Raff; Symphony, "A Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. The heartiest applause of the evening was accorded the Wagner overture, which was most brilliantly and finely played. The Raff work for the violin is not particularly interesting, or if it be, Mr. Roth, who was the soloist of the occasion, did not make it appear so. He played it tastefully and with excellent technique, but it seems to be a work that requires a Marteau to do it full justice. The selections from the symphonic sketches by Paul Gilson are cleverly and effectively scored, but they are programme music pure and simple, and are more ambitious than edifying. The concert was somewhat dull, not to say dreary. We have omitted to state that Mr. Roth was vigorously applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; Concerto in A-major, Liszt; Scherzo Capriccioso, Dvorak, and Symphony No. 4, Beethoven. The soloist is Mr. F. B. Busoni.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 27, 1893.

Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture was the opening number on the programme of the nineteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, Saturday evening. It was given a most brilliant and effective rendering throughout. The Pilgrim's song of redemption at the finale received a most enthusiastic applause. The two new numbers introduced for the first time here did not make a marked impression. "The Love Fairy," by Roff, is a graceful composition and was first played in Boston with piano accompaniment by Sarasate a year or two ago. Mr. Otto Roeth played the violin solo part with great intelligence, at the conclusion of which he received a hearty encore. "The Sea," by Paul Gilson, is a composition of three symphonic sketches based on a poem of the same name by Eddy Levis. It had its first hearing in Brussels, where its composer recently graduated from the conservatoire. It represents "Sunrise," "Sailors' Songs and Dances" and "Twilight and each one of the movements has an independent form in itself. Mr. Gilson possesses ability, as the work shows originality and there is a musical rhythm and poetic strain throughout the piece. Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" closed the programme and was given a fine interpretation. The rehearsal of this week will occur on Thursday afternoon, March 30, on account of the Good Friday evening performance of the Handel and Haydn Society and the concert April 1. Mr. Ferruccio Busoni will be the soloist.

[127]

...DAY HERALD

MARCH 26, 1893

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Otto Roth.

It may be said of last evening's Symphony concert, the 19th of the present season's series, under Mr. Nikisch's direction, that what was new was not interesting and what was interesting was not new.

The programme began with the "Tannhäuser" overture, and no one who heard this performance of the famous old composition will be inclined to dispute the statement that it has never had a better interpretation. There was a splendid virility in the work of the men throughout, and the grand climax was worked up in a magnificent fashion, the brasses giving out a solidity of tone which created the audience in almost a frenzy of excitement, and called out a spontaneous outburst of the most enthusiastic applause after the finale.

Raff's concert piece, "La Fee d'Amour," which was played here by Sarasate during his last visit with pianoforte accompaniment, made the second number on the programme, the violin part being played by Mr. Otto Roth. It is a composition better suited to display the technical attainments of the soloist than to interest a general audience. Mr. Roth is to be commended for a very careful, refined and intelligent treatment of the solo part, and he was listened to with marked attention by the audience and heartily applauded as he concluded his task. The orchestration adds little to the interest of the work, and its choice by Mr. Roth for his annual appearance is a little difficult to explain.

This novelty was followed by a second composition which was given its first performance in this city. "La Mer," a series of three symphonic sketches by Paul Gilson, is based upon a poem of the same title by Eddy Levis. It had its first hearing at the Concerts Populaire in Brussels recently, where its composer had just graduated from the Conservatoire. Each of the movements is complete in itself, the designations being "Sunrise," "Sailors' Songs and Dances" and "Twilight." The first and last movements are decidedly romantic in their characteristics, and show evidences of mechanical training rather than inspiration on the part of the composer. In the second movement the composer has written some very jolly dance music, and the songs are melodious and interesting. As a whole these sketches appeal with little force to an audience having no personal interest in the composer.

The programme was ended with a splendid performance of Karl Goldmark's Rustic Wedding symphony, which was given a thoroughly interesting interpretation, and left a very pleasing impression of the evening's concert.

The 20th concert will have for its programme Tschaikowsky's overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet"; Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2; Dvorak's scherzo capriccioso, Op. 66, and Beethoven's symphony in B flat, No. 4, the soloist being Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni.

The musical performances at the Chicago exhibition will be inaugurated on May 15 by the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the first choral festival by representative choirs of the eastern states will be held June 7 to 9, a massed chorus of 2000 and an orchestra of 200 taking part. The programme will include Mr. Becker's "Hallelujah" cantata and selections from M. Rubinstein's "Moses."

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 27, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."
Raff: "La Fée d'Amour." Characteristic concert piece for violin and orchestra, op. 67.
Gilson: "La Mer." Symphonic sketches.
Goldmark: "Ländliche Hochzeit." Symphony, op. 23.

Mr. Otto Roth was the violinist.

The "Tannhäuser" overture came in for one of the most superb performances we have ever heard; Mr. Nikisch was at his very best. The performance was a succession of splendid strokes; and yet each stroke was so felicitous, so well-timed and in harmony with the spirit of the passage in hand, that the unity of the general impression produced was only enhanced thereby. In the peroration, at the last return of the pilgrims' chant in the six brass instruments in unison, Mr. Nikisch once more brought out that tremendous effect, the novelty and impressiveness of which were so striking in his first performance of the overture here. In the third phrase of the chant, as that flaming dominant-seventh chord (D-sharp, F-double-sharp, A-sharp, C-sharp) draws near, he whips up the horns to almost superhuman exertions, so that, when the chord comes, the D-sharp and F-double-sharp in the horns sound almost as strong as the C-sharp in the trumpets and trombones and, instead of the passage sounding like a brass solo against a hardly audible accompaniment, you actually hear it in full harmony. The effect is overwhelming! From this chord onward, the peroration reminded us of an anecdote told by Wagner of Schnorr von Carolsfeld at the preliminary rehearsals of "Tristan." Schnorr complained that the great "Love-Curse" in the third act was physically impossible, unless Wagner allowed him to take it at a more rapid tempo; that to sing this terrible passage as slow as he had just been trying to do was more than human lungs and breath could stand. Wagner replied that, so far from singing it too slow, he had not sung it half slow enough, and then sang it to him himself in the way he wished it to go. A light seemed to dawn upon Schnorr, and he immediately sang the passage much slower than before, with a far greater expenditure of vocal means, but without any sign of exhaustion. Of this Wagner said that, as soon as Schnorr had really understood the passage, he could sing it, and the enormous physical exertion required vanished from his consciousness in the passionate fervor of the moment. So in this peroration to the overture of "Tannhäuser" last Saturday evening; after that tremendous chord it seemed as if flesh and blood could do no more; and yet Mr. Nikisch, by some magic, pushed his forces on, crescendo e sempre più crescendo, up to the end. Nothing more stupendous in its effect could be imagined! Yet this stroke was but one among many; the holding back the orchestra at each entrance of that passionate motive on the higher strings against ascending chromatic scale—passages in the 'celli, and then gradually quickening the beat, faster and faster, until the strings launch themselves upon Tannhäuser's Song to Venus in a perfect tiger-spring was another. The playing of the magical episode where the clarinet comes in with Venus's "Geliebter, komm! Sieh' dort die Grotte," pleased us less; the clarinet played the phrase too loud and passionately; it should be played more whisperingly, sweetly, seductively. But, with this exception, the overture was played magnificently, and the audience showed plainly that they appreciated it, too, for they recalled Mr. Nikisch twice when it was over.

The new suite, "La Mer," by Paul Gilson (of which only the first three movements were given, the fourth, "Tempest," being omitted) contains a good deal that is interesting and some things that are beautiful. As a piece of instrumentation, it may be regarded as the last word, so far, of orchestral epicureanism. After looking through the score, one stands aghast at the elaborate, hair-splitting pains the young composer has been at to mix the colors on his orchestral palette. Few things in Wagner's "Nibelungen" approach this score for minuteness of orchestral detail-work. Whether the same results could have been obtained by simpler means, or not, we will not try to determine; but certainly the results are exceedingly beautiful in their way. An enormous volume and brilliancy of tone is obtained without noisiness, and many of the softer effects are positively entrancing. It is modern French orchestration of the very finest sort. As for the intrinsically musical contents of the work, that is another matter. Of the three movements given (I. "Sunrise;" II. "Sailors' Songs and Dances;" III. "Twilight") we like the third unspeakably the best. The first is a glowing bit of color, but does not show much invention. In the second Mr. Gilson has the not uncommon French failing of mistaking a magnifying glass for idealization; his sailors seem to stand twenty feet in their stockings, and do not seem to be much better fellows for it. There is something monstrous and antidiluvian about the whole conception. But the "Twilight" movement does seem genuinely and beautifully poetic. That mournful little dialogue between the flute and English-horn, in 5-4 time, shows something that one is almost tempted to call genius. Upon the whole, the suite is one of the most interesting, and least repelling, French (or Belgian) things we have heard for some time. The composer is a young man who recently graduated with high honors from the Brussels Conservatoire—so we have been given to understand—and this suite of his has already won him distinguished fame in Belgium and elsewhere. Our orchestra had evidently spent great pains upon rehearsing the work, for it was most admirably played.

We are heartily tired of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding!" What did the man mean by calling it a symphony? He, an Austrian, of all things in the world! If anything in the form of variations can be found that is more tedious than the first movement, we, for one, should—not like to hear it. The "Scene in the Garden" contains much that is lovely; the opening clarinet theme may even pass muster as very beautiful; but the rest is trivial at best.

Raff's "Love Fairy" left no impression upon us whatever when Sarasate played it here with pianoforte accompaniment some time ago. We had hoped that Raff's clever orchestration might put a different face upon the work. But no! The thing still seems aimless, devoid of inspiration, and terribly spun-out. The cantabile love passage in the middle, from which we had hoped something on reading the score, turns out to be very like Wagner at his feeblest, without his effectiveness. It may express love, for all we know, but it surely does not express it musically. Neither does the instrumentation show us Raff at his best; it is not particularly effective. Then, too, the work even goes beyond other modern things for violin and orchestra we have heard of late, in the persistency with which it keeps the solo instrument hard at work saying nothing at all; with few exceptions, what is not mere preluding reduces itself to accompanying the orchestra with apparently hap-hazard figures of no interest in themselves, and without any striking effectiveness in the way of coloring. Nothing but the dire poverty of the literature of the violin in compositions in this form could save such a work from prompt oblivion. Violinists cannot keep playing the Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Bruch and Brahms concertos over and over again forever! The public worm has already begun to turn at revivals of "virtuose" concertos, by Paganini, Vieuxtemps, et al. tal. What are violinists to do? Mr. Roth performed his task (we can call it nothing else!) with artistic security, accuracy and grace. In a word, he played admirably. We have heard his tone sound larger before, but the orchestral part here is almost constantly pretty hard on the solo instrument, and a violin finds difficulty in sounding very big against several wooden wind instruments capering about in running passages. But his tone was sweet and pure, and he played throughout with rare elegance of style. As for compositions of this calibre being so often taken from the shelves where they are trying to repose in peace, may it not partly be accounted for on the same ground as the persistency with which pianists play Liszt Hungarian Rhapsodies, "Venezia e Napoli" and the like?—on the ground of their being, for some technical reasons, uncommonly good fun to play?

The next programme is: Tschaikowski, overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet;" Liszt, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in A major; Dvorák, scherzo capriccioso, opus 66; Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B flat major, opus 60. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni will be the pianist.

Established 1872.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR[illegible], 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

The first number of the programme was by far the best of the programme of last Saturday, both in its contents and in its performance. Not that the "Tannhäuser" overture has not received a clearer interpretation in Boston ere this, but it had a virility and power that most thoroughly reflected the spirit of the composer, and an occasional unclearness in chromatics and in the great violin figure which accompanies the Pilgrim's Chorus at its last appearance could readily be condoned because of the brilliancy of the general effect. The treatment of the Pilgrim's Chorus alluded to is the real climax of the overture, and nothing can show Wagner's loyalty to his opinions better than the fact that he deliberately cut out this powerful part, in rewriting the work for the Paris representations, because a "prelude" rather than an "overture" was demanded by his theories. A greater contrast than that between this work and the one which followed it can scarcely be imagined. Raff's "Fee d'Amour" is musical Eau Sucrée with a vengeance. It is a long fantasie, spasmodic to a degree, but seldom rising above sweetness in its effects. It is modern in its scoring, and occasionally reminds one of a greatly diluted and sweetened Wagner. Mr. Roth was the soloist in this, and although his tone seemed shallow and feeble, his technique was admirable. His intonation was always sure, and the cadenza introduced some excellent double-stopping and artificial harmonics. The soloist was recalled with much warmth, and evidently made a good impression on the general public.

It was decidedly bad programme making to follow such a free fantasie with a series of other orchestral fantasies, for that is what the symphonic sketches of Paul Gilson amounted to. These sketches are entitled "The Sea," as if to accentuate their being much weaker than Rubinstein's setting of the same subject in symphonic form. There is, I am told, a storm movement in the work, but this was not given, and there were cuts made in at least one of the three movements that were presented. The first movement represented "sunrise at sea," and was most modern in the ecstatic chords in high position, which seemed but a reflection of a Wagnerian idea. There was a fair amount of thematic treatment, although many a long-winded passage seemed little more than an apotheosis of the scales.

The second movement gave a presentation of the sailors at play, and introduced some not very characteristic songs and dances. The spirit of the true "Chanty" was not in them, although a well-marked horn-pipe rhythm appeared at one time. "Twilight at Sea" ended the proceedings. This had some strange, but not always successful effects.

A figure, introduced at the beginning, was gradually shortened at each successive reappearance, in a manner that recalled the way in which children sometimes sing "John Brown's Body," lopping off a syllable at each repetition. Muted horns gave their repulsive tones (it may be remembered that Rubinstein uses the same tone-color in a few passages of the "Ocean Symphony") possibly to hint at the sorrows of Mal de Mer. But in this movement at least the auditor was able to find actual melody; the theme on the English horn (beautifully played by Mr. Mueller) presented something of true romance, and flute and clarinette were also given charming themes which were excellently played. But as a whole one could not find anything entirely satisfying in the work; it was too cloying, and at the best only portrayed "A painted ship upon a painted ocean."

It was scarcely credible that after so much of sweetness, yet more musical sugar should have been added, yet such was the case. Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony is not a symphony but a suite, and it deals in romantic ecstasy in a great degree. Again the woodwind instruments come into the foreground, and once more the violins climb into Alpine positions. The variations which begin the work at least served to display the various departments of the orchestra to good advantage, and they were read with some degree of power. Especially commendable was the oboe work here and the rapid elaboration of the theme on the violins. The clarinette work in the third movement was perfectly executed; indeed to each and all of the woodwind instruments must praise be given, for the concert gave more than usual opportunities to these instruments, and these were taken advantage of to the utmost. But the programme, as already intimated, was most ill assorted. The "Tannhaeuser" overture was the gem of it all, but its breadth emphasized the weaker character of all that followed. Nevertheless, as regards performance, there was little that could be adversely criticised, and, judging by the applause, the audience was entirely contented.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 25, 1893.

Closing Concert of the Boston Symphony Series.

As our large orchestral concerts begin to come to an end the fact is borne in upon us that the season is nearing its close. The Boston Symphony orchestra is, as usual, in the advance guard and completed its series of five concerts at Chickering Hall on Thursday evening, March 16.

To the regret of most of the hearers it was also the last concert we shall hear under Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who takes his departure shortly for an important post abroad.

There was a hearty and exceedingly friendly demonstration in favor of Mr. Nikisch at the end of the concert, which brought him repeatedly upon the platform. It was a purely personal demonstration, for the quality of the entertainment offered upon this occasion would not warrant an overabundance of applause, and the audiences that attend these concerts are too critical and discriminating to offer undeserved rewards. Things appeared to be quite at sixes and sevens during the evening. Mr. Nikisch did not conduct with his usual decision and painstaking carefulness. The popular concert meister, Mr. Franz Kneisel was ill, and could not play the Brahms concerto, as advertised, and was also absent from his post in the orchestra.

The place of soloist can always be filled and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang for us instead of Mr. Kneisel, but it is not so easy to fill the post at the head of an orchestra with satisfaction, for the orchestra played very roughly and unevenly throughout the evening. The opening number was the "Carnival," overture of Berlioz, not an especially attractive composition as a whole, but admirably suited to show the quality of an orchestra, which it had little opportunity to do that evening, for it was poorly played. The "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried" is one of the best things Mr. Nikisch has given us; and while hardly up to the mark of former readings, it was still potent enough to obtain considerable applause. Tschaikowski's Fifth Symphony, which is perhaps the most popular of this gifted writer's serious orchestral works, brought the program to an end. Mrs. Nikisch was warmly welcomed and she sang several "Lieder" quite charmingly. She has not much of a voice, but she sings with expression and refined musical feeling and can be heard with far greater satisfaction than many an artist of larger vocal attainments. She was delightfully accompanied by her husband in her final numbers.

This season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been given additional musical charm and additional educational value by the analytical lectures upon the programs given by Mr. Frederic Dean. Prior to each concert its program has been analyzed and illustrated in a most scholarly and clever manner by Mr. Dean, the symphonic beauties made more patent and the musical language more clear.

Mr. Dean is concise, terse and explicit in his explanations, and his illustrations have enlisted the services of some of our best vocal and instrumental artists. In a word his analytical lectures have been of benefit and value to the many who have had the pleasure of listening to them.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29, 1893.

Telephone - - - - 1253-18th.

The program of the nineteenth Symphony Concert was as follows:

Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
"La Fée d'Amour," op. 67.....Raff
"La Mer".....Gilson
First three movements.
Rustic Wedding Symphony.....Goldmark

The overture was played superbly, with fiery power and with a wealth of tonal color. It was a performance long to be remembered. For some reason or other the "Storm" movement in the Gilson composition was omitted, and therefore the value of the music as program music could not be properly estimated. The impression made from the standpoint of absolute music was this: That Gilson is a born colorist and a comparatively weak melodist. The themes are not of special worth, but they are ingeniously handled. The composer has imagination, decided technical skill, and this work is indeed remarkable for a man of his years.

Mr. Roth gave a smooth and delicate performance of Raff's "Love Fay." The piece itself is sugary salon music.

[128]

SUNDAY HERALD

MARCH 26, 1893

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Otto Roth.

It may be said of last evening's Symphony concert, the 19th of the present season's series, under Mr. Nikisch's direction, that what was new was not interesting and what was interesting was not new.

The programme began with the "Tannhäuser" overture, and no one who heard this performance of the famous old composition will be inclined to dispute the statement that it has never had a better interpretation. There was a splendid virility in the work of the men throughout, and the grand climax was worked up in a magnificent fashion, the brasses giving out a solidity of tone which created the audience in almost a frenzy of excitement, and called out a spontaneous outburst of the most enthusiastic applause after the finale.

Raff's concert piece, "La Fee d'Amour," which was played here by Sarasate during his last visit with pianoforte accompaniment, made the second number on the programme, the violin part being played by Mr. Otto Roth. It is a composition better suited to display the technical attainments of the soloist than to interest a general audience. Mr. Roth is to be commended for a very careful, refined and intelligent treatment of the solo part, and he was listened to with marked attention by the audience and heartily applauded as he concluded his task. The orchestration adds little to the interest of the work, and its choice by Mr. Roth for his annual appearance is a little difficult to explain.

This novelty was followed by a second composition which was given its first performance in this city. "La Mer," a series of three symphonic sketches by Paul Gilson, is based upon a poem of the same title by Eddy Levis. It had its first hearing at the Concerts Populaire in Brussels recently, where its composer had just graduated from the Conservatoire. Each of the movements is complete in itself, the designations being "Sunrise," "Sailors' Songs and Dances" and "Twilight." The first and last movements are decidedly romantic in their characteristics, and show evidences of mechanical training rather than inspiration on the part of the composer. In the second movement the composer has written some very jolly dance music, and the songs are melodious and interesting. As a whole these sketches appeal with little force to an audience having no personal interest in the composer.

The programme was ended with a splendid performance of Karl Goldmark's Rustic Wedding symphony, which was given a thoroughly interesting interpretation, and left a very pleasing impression of the evening's concert.

The 20th concert will have for its programme Tschaikowsky's overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet"; Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2; Dvorak's scherzo capriccioso, Op. 66, and Beethoven's symphony in B flat, No. 4, the soloist being Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni.

The musical performances at the Chicago exhibition will be inaugurated on May 15 by the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the first choral festival by representative choirs of the eastern states will be held June 7 to 9, a massed chorus of 2000 and an orchestra of 200 taking part. The programme will include Mr. Becker's "Hallelujah" cantata and selections from M. Rubinstein's "Moses."

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 27, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."
Raff: "La Fée d'Amour." Characteristic concert piece for violin and orchestra, op. 67.
Gilson: "La Mer." Symphonic sketches.
Goldmark: "Ländliche Hochzeit." Symphony, op. 23.

Mr. Otto Roth was the violinist.

The "Tannhäuser" overture came in for one of the most superb performances we have ever heard; Mr. Nikisch was at his very best. The performance was a succession of splendid strokes; and yet each stroke was so felicitous, so well-timed and in harmony with the spirit of the passage in hand, that the unity of the general impression produced was only enhanced thereby. In the peroration, at the last return of the pilgrims' chant in the six brass instruments in unison, Mr. Nikisch once more brought out that tremendous effect, the novelty and impressiveness of which were so striking in his first performance of the overture here. In the third phrase of the chant, as that flaming dominant-seventh chord (D-sharp, F-double-sharp, A-sharp, C-sharp) draws near, he whips up the horns to almost superhuman exertions, so that, when the chord comes, the D-sharp and F-double-sharp in the horns sound almost as strong as the C-sharp in the trumpets and trombones and, instead of the passage sounding like a brass solo against a hardly audible accompaniment, you actually hear it in full harmony. The effect is overwhelming! From this chord onward, the peroration reminded us of an anecdote told by Wagner of Schnorr von Carolsfeld at the preliminary rehearsals of "Tristan." Schnorr complained that the great "Love-Curse" in the third act was physically impossible, unless Wagner allowed him to take it at a more rapid tempo; that to sing this terrible passage as slow as he had just been trying to do was more than human lungs and breath could stand. Wagner replied that, so far from singing it too slow, he had not sung it half slow enough, and then sang it to him himself in the way he wished it to go. A light seemed to dawn upon Schnorr, and he immediately sang the passage much slower than before, with a far greater expenditure of vocal means, but without any sign of exhaustion. Of this Wagner said that, as soon as Schnorr had really understood the passage, he could sing it, and the enormous physical exertion required vanished from his consciousness in the passionate fervor of the moment. So in this peroration to the overture of "Tannhäuser" last Saturday evening; after that tremendous chord it seemed as if flesh and blood could do no more; and yet Mr. Nikisch, by some magic, pushed his forces on, crescendo e semper più crescendo, up to the end. Nothing more stupendous in its effect could be imagined! Yet this stroke was but one among many; the holding back the orchestra at each entrance of that passionate motive on the higher strings against ascending chromatic scale—passages in the 'celli, and then gradually quickening the beat, faster and faster, until the strings launch themselves upon Tannhäuser's Song to Venus in a perfect tiger-spring was another. The playing of the magical episode where the clarinet comes in with Venus's "Geliebter, komm! Sieh' dort die Grotte," pleased us less; the clarinet played the phrase too loud and passionately; it should be played more whisperingly, sweetly, seductively. But, with this exception, the overture was played magnificently, and the audience showed plainly that they appreciated it, too, for they recalled Mr. Nikisch twice when it was over.

The new suite, "La Mer," by Paul Gilson (of which only the first three movements were given, the fourth, "Tempest," being omitted) contains a good deal that is interesting and some things that are beautiful. As a piece of instrumentation, it may be regarded as the last word, so far, of orchestral epicureanism. After looking through the score, one stands aghast at the elaborate, hair-splitting pains the young composer has been at to mix the colors on his orchestral palette. Few things in Wagner's "Nibelungen" approach this score for minuteness of orchestral detail-work. Whether the same results could have been obtained by simpler means, or not, we will not try to determine; but certainly the results are exceedingly beautiful in their way. An enormous volume and brilliancy of tone is obtained without noisiness, and many of the softer effects are positively entrancing. It is modern French orchestration of the very finest sort. As for the intrinsically musical contents of the work, that is another matter. Of the three movements given (I. "Sunrise;" II. "Sailors' Songs and Dances;" III. "Twilight") we like the third unspeakably the best. The first is a glowing bit of color, but does not show much invention. In the second Mr. Gilson has the not uncommon French failing of mistaking a magnifying glass for idealization; his sailors seem to stand twenty feet in their stockings, and do not seem to be much better fellows for it. There is something monstrous and antidiluvian about the whole conception. But the "Twilight" movement does seem genuinely and beautifully poetic. That mournful little dialogue between the flute and English-horn, in 5-4 time, shows something that one is almost tempted to call genius. Upon the whole, the suite is one of the most interesting, and least repelling, French (or Belgian) things we have heard for some time. The composer is a young man who recently graduated with high honors from the Brussels Conservatoire—so we have been given to understand—and this suite of his has already won him distinguished fame in Belgium and elsewhere. Our orchestra had evidently spent great pains upon rehearsing the work, for it was most admirably played.

We are heartily tired of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding!" What did the man mean by calling it a symphony? He, an Austrian, of all things in the world! If anything in the form of variations can be found that is more tedious than the first movement, we, for one, should—not like to hear it. The "Scene in the Garden" contains much that is lovely; the opening clarinet theme may even pass muster as very beautiful; but the rest is trivial at best.

Raff's "Love Fairy" left no impression upon us whatever when Sarasate played it here with pianoforte accompaniment some time ago. We had hoped that Raff's clever orchestration might put a different face upon the work. But no! The thing still seems aimless, devoid of inspiration, and terribly spun-out. The cantabile love passage in the middle, from which we had hoped something on reading the score, turns out to be very like Wagner at his feeblest, without his effectiveness. It may express love, for all we know, but it surely does not express it musically. Neither does the instrumentation show us Raff at his best; it is not particularly effective. Then, too, the work even goes beyond other modern things for violin and orchestra we have heard of late, in the persistency with which it keeps the solo instrument hard at work saying nothing at all; with few exceptions, what is not mere preluding reduces itself to accompanying the orchestra with apparently hap-hazard figures of no interest in themselves, and without any striking effectiveness in the way of coloring. Nothing but the dire poverty of the literature of the violin in compositions in this form could save such a work from prompt oblivion. Violinists cannot keep playing the Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Bruch and Brahms concertos over and over again forever! The public worm has already begun to turn at revivals of "virtuose" concertos, by Paganini, Vieuxtemps, et al. tal. What are violinists to do? Mr. Roth performed his task (we can call it nothing else!) with artistic security, accuracy and grace. In a word, he played admirably. We have heard his tone sound larger before, but the orchestral part here is almost constantly pretty hard on the solo instrument, and a violin finds difficulty in sounding very big against several wooden wind instruments capering about in running passages. But his tone was sweet and pure, and he played throughout with rare elegance of style. As for compositions of this calibre being so often taken from the shelves where they are trying to repose in peace, may it not partly be accounted for on the same ground as the persistency with which pianists play Liszt Hungarian Rhapsodies, "Venezia e Napoli" and the like?—on the ground of their being, for some technical reasons, uncommonly good fun to play?

The next programme is: Tschaikowski, overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet;" Liszt, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in A major; Dvorák, scherzo capriccioso, opus 66; Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B flat major, opus 60. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni will be the pianist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 27, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

The first number of the programme was by far the best of the programme of last Saturday, both in its contents and in its performance. Not that the "Tannhäuser" overture has not received a clearer interpretation in Boston ere this, but it had a virility and power that most thoroughly reflected the spirit of the composer, and an occasional unclearness in chromatics and in the great violin figure which accompanies the Pilgrim's Chorus at its last appearance could readily be condoned because of the brilliancy of the general effect. The treatment of the Pilgrim's Chorus alluded to is the real climax of the overture, and nothing can show Wagner's loyalty to his opinions better than the fact that he deliberately cut out this powerful part, in rewriting the work for the Paris representations, because a "prelude" rather than an "overture" was demanded by his theories. A greater contrast than that between this work and the one which followed it can scarcely be imagined. Raff's "Fee d'Amour" is musical Eau Sucrée with a vengeance. It is a long fantasie, spasmodic to a degree, but seldom rising above sweetness in its effects. It is modern in its scoring, and occasionally reminds one of a greatly diluted and sweetened Wagner. Mr. Roth was the soloist in this, and although his tone seemed shallow and feeble, his technique was admirable. His intonation was always sure, and the cadenza introduced some excellent double-stopping and artificial harmonics. The soloist was recalled with much warmth, and evidently made a good impression on the general public.

It was decidedly bad programme making to follow such a free fantasie with a series of other orchestral fantasies, for that is what the symphonic sketches of Paul Gilson amounted to. These sketches are entitled "The Sea," as if to accentuate their being much weaker than Rubinstein's setting of the same subject in symphonic form. There is, I am told, a storm movement in the work, but this was not given, and there were cuts made in at least one of the three movements that were presented. The first movement represented "sunrise at sea," and was most modern in the ecstatic chords in high position, which seemed but a reflection of a Wagnerian idea. There was a fair amount of thematic treatment, although many a long-winded passage seemed little more than an apotheosis of the scales.

The second movement gave a presentation of the sailors at play, and introduced some not very characteristic songs and dances. The spirit of the true "Chanty" was not in them, although a well-marked horn-pipe rhythm appeared at one time. "Twilight at Sea" ended the proceedings. This had some strange, but not always successful effects.

A figure, introduced at the beginning, was gradually shortened at each successive reappearance, in a manner that recalled the way in which children sometimes sing "John Brown's Body," lopping off a syllable at each repetition. Muted horns gave their repulsive tones (it may be remembered that Rubinstein uses the same tone-color in a few passages of the "Ocean Symphony") possibly to hint at the sorrows of Mal de Mer. But in this movement at least the auditor was able to find actual melody; the theme on the English horn (beautifully played by Mr. Mueller) presented something of true romance, and flute and clarinette were also given charming themes which were excellently played. But as a whole one could not find anything entirely satisfying in the work; it was too cloying, and at the best only portrayed "A painted ship upon a painted ocean."

It was scarcely credible that after so much of sweetness, yet more musical sugar should have been added, yet such was the case. Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony is not a symphony but a suite, and it deals in romantic ecstasy in a great degree. Again the woodwind instruments come into the foreground, and once more the violins climb into Alpine positions. The variations which begin the work at least served to display the various departments of the orchestra to good advantage, and they were read with some degree of power. Especially commendable was the oboe work here and the rapid elaboration of the theme on the violins. The clarinette work in the third movement was perfectly executed; indeed to each and all of the woodwind instruments must praise be given, for the concert gave more than usual opportunities to these instruments, and these were taken advantage of to the utmost. But the programme, as already intimated, was most ill assorted. The "Tannhaeuser" overture was the gem of it all, but its breadth emphasized the weaker character of all that followed. Nevertheless, as regards performance, there was little that could be adversely criticised, and, judging by the applause, the audience was entirely contented.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 25, 1893.

Closing Concert of the Boston Symphony Series.

As our large orchestral concerts begin to come to an end the fact is borne in upon us that the season is nearing its close. The Boston Symphony orchestra is, as usual, in the advance guard and completed its series of five concerts at Chickering Hall on Thursday evening, March 16.

To the regret of most of the hearers it was also the last concert we shall hear under Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who takes his departure shortly for an important post abroad.

There was a hearty and exceedingy friendly demonstration in favor of Mr. Nikisch at the end of the concert, which brought him repeatedly upon the platform. It was a purely personal demonstration, for the quality of the entertainment offered upon this occasion would not warrant an overabundance of applause, and the audiences that attend these concerts are too critical and discriminating to offer undeserved rewards. Things appeared to be quite at sixes and sevens during the evening. Mr. Nikisch did not conduct with his usual decision and painstaking carefulness. The popular concert meister, Mr. Franz Kneisel was ill, and could not play the Brahms concerto, as advertised, and was also absent from his post in the orchestra.

The place of soloist can always be filled and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang for us instead of Mr. Kneisel, but it is not so easy to fill the post at the head of an orchestra with satisfaction, for the orchestra played very roughly and unevenly throughout the evening. The opening number was the "Carnival," overture of Berlioz, not an especially attractive composition as a whole, but admirably suited to show the quality of an orchestra, which it had little opportunity to do that evening, for it was poorly played. The "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried" is one of the best things Mr. Nikisch has given us; and while hardly up to the mark of former readings, it was still potent enough to obtain considerable applause. Tschaikowski's Fifth Symphony, which is perhaps the most popular of this gifted writer's serious orchestral works, brought the program to an end. Mrs. Nikisch was warmly welcomed and she sang several "Lieder" quite charmingly. She has not much of a voice, but she sings with expression and refined musical feeling and can be heard with far greater satisfaction than many an artist of larger vocal attainments. She was delightfully accompanied by her husband in her final numbers.

This season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been given additional musical charm and additional educational value by the analytical lectures upon the programs given by Mr. Frederic Dean. Prior to each concert its program has been analyzed and illustrated in a most scholarly and clever manner by Mr. Dean, the symphonic beauties made more patent and the musical language more clear.

Mr. Dean is concise, terse and explicit in his explanations, and his illustrations have enlisted the services of some of our best vocal and instrumental artists. In a word his analytical lectures have been of benefit and value to the many who have had the pleasure of listening to them.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29, 1893.

Telephone ---- 1253-18th.

The program of the nineteenth Symphony Concert was as follows:

Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
"La Fée d'Amour," op. 67.....Raff
"La Mer".....Gilson
First three movements.
Rustic Wedding Symphony.....Goldmark

The overture was played superbly, with fiery power and with a wealth of tonal color. It was a performance long to be remembered. For some reason or other the "Storm" movement in the Gilson composition was omitted, and therefore the value of the music as program music could not be properly estimated. The impression made from the standpoint of absolute music was this: That Gilson is a born colorist and a comparatively weak melodist. The themes are not of special worth, but they are ingeniously handled. The composer has imagination, decided technical skill, and this work is indeed remarkable for a man of his years.

Mr. Roth gave a smooth and delicate performance of Raff's "Love Fay." The piece itself is sugary salon music.

[128]

TEN PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 27, 1893.

The Nineteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Concerto, "Love Fay," for violin and orchestra, op. 67....Raff
"La Mer".....Gilson
"Rustic Wedding" Symphony.....Goldmark

"The Sea," by Paul Gilson, was played for the first time in this town.

The work was presented in a mutilated condition.

The original is a set of four "symphonic sketches": "Sunrise," "Sailors' Songs and Dances," "Twilight," "Storm." These scenes are poetically and musically connected in the verse of Eddy Levis and in the music of Gilson, the illustrator of the poem. There was no explanation in the programme book of the intention of the composer; there were no extracts from the poem. Gilson's music is professedly programme-music: but the hearer was left in the dark. Viewed as absolute music, "The Sea," as announced in three scenes, appeared ill-balanced and without a climax.

A double injustice was perpetrated by the cutting—against the composer, for surely his work should have been played according to his intention; against the hearer, who was deprived of the means of intelligent enjoyment.

***

And, first, who is Gilson? The name is not foreign to us. But we must cross the Atlantic in search of the composer of "La Mer."

Paul Gilson was born in Brussels, June 15, 1865. It is said that he studied harmony under Duyck in the Conservatory at Brussels, and then took lessons of the learned Gevaert. The season of 1888-89 was distinguished by the marked success of three Belgian composers, Blockx, Mathieu and Tinel; it was also in 1889 that Gilson gained the "Prix de Rome" by a cantata, "Sinai." Gilson has written "The Demon," a lyric drama; "The Suppliants"; "Daphne," for solos, chorus and orchestra; "David," an oratorio; incidental music for Maeterlinck's "Princess Matrine," etc.

"The Sea" was first played, and with great success, at a concert in Brussels, March 20, 1892, under the direction of Joseph Dupont, to whom the work is dedicated. The poem was declaimed by Le Bargy; each musical tableau was preceded by the explanatory verse. There was a second performance, equally successful, May 7.

"The Sea" was performed in Paris at a Colonne concert Jan. 15 of this year. The poem was then declaimed by the author. Barbadette wrote this acid note concerning the composition: "The poet is a Belgian, the music is also Belgian, and so a French audience did not grasp its full purport and its characteristics."

Gilson's work was performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in December. The fourth scene was then given in full, and it made a most profound impression.

***

The composer and the poet of "The Sea" are realists. Let us inquire into the nature of their work. The first scene represents sunrise at sea; it contains one chief melodic subject, which, by the way, is the foundation motive of the whole work. The second scene introduces lusty dances, one of which is "La Ronde du Gabier." now, "gabier" is a sort of quartermaster, or it may be a topman. One of these dances is a variation of the first theme. In the third scene the motives are supposed to give a twilight effect, while a duet between English horn and flute sets to music the love making of a sailor and his betrothed and the subsequent separation described by the poet. The fourth scene is a storm in which the ship is lost; the storm dies, and there is a return to the gentle music of the first scene. At the height of the storm Gilson introduces reminiscences of the sailors' songs and dances, as though in mockery. This effect is said to be terrible, yes, ghastly beyond description.

***

To attempt to pass judgment on the work as it was given Saturday—or, rather, as it was not given—would be unfair, even if it were possible. Yet it may be said that "The Sea" is the most important of the novelties presented thus far during the present season of these concerts. It is important on account of its realistic strength, its wild imagination, its workmanship; it shows the tendency of the modern school toward realism. Whether there is such a thing as realism in music; whether such a thing is desirable if it exists—these are questions that do not now require examination.

One thing is certain. The work should be given as a whole. Enough was heard, however, to convince the hearer that the composer is a colorist rather than a melodist; that he is a master of instrumentation; that, above all, he has something to say, and that in the expression of thought he uses his own voice.

***

Mr. Roth gave a smooth and pleasing performance of Raff's "characteristic piece." The piece itself is of little worth. There is pretty instrumentation that does not atone for poverty of thought.

***

The overture was played superbly, with a spirit that was contagious, and with a wealth of tonal color. It was a performance long to be remembered, and it is not surprising that the audience was enthusiastic. The symphony also gave pleasure.

***

The programme of the concert of next Saturday will be as follows: Overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; concerto for pianoforte, A major, No. 2, Liszt; Scherzo capriccioso, op. 66, Dvorak; symphony B flat, No. 4, Beethoven.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 26, 1893.

NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

While Mr. Nikisch has somewhat neglected the orthodox classics this season, and in the make-up of his programmes he has been conspicuously partial to the operatic works of Richard Wagner, it is but fair to bear in mind that our conductor's readings are seldom satisfactory with works that have long been identified with an absolute standard of interpretation; and that with a more eclectic class of music, such for example as the orchestra played last evening, he is always in his element. The reputation of Mr. Nikisch as a conductor of symphony concerts was very meagre indeed when he came to this country; but as an operatic director he was generally esteemed. True, in this capacity he had not held any position of greater import than that of first assistant to the musical director of the opera house in Leipzig; but here he had displayed an exceptional talent and a special adaptability. It is not surprising, therefore, that in Boston, as a conductor of symphony concerts, he has not been particularly successful in his interpretation of the most scholastic master-works. Last evening the overture to Tannhauser received very creditable and interesting treatment even to its most sensational effects being presented in all their integrity. The first performance of "Tannhauser" was at the Dresden Opera House, Oct. 20, 1845. Not long afterwards the work was produced in Weimar under the direction of Franz Liszt, and with a success that at once won Wagner's grateful recognition. It took place on Sunday. The audience was largely composed of the students of the University of Jena. Despite the presence of royalty they gave vent to frequent and prolonged applause, but some time prior to the end of the opera they were obliged to return to the university. No sooner had they disappeared than a perfect storm of hisses burst forth. Liszt became fairly wild with rage. Throwing down his music book, he abruptly turned his face to the audience, and raising his long arms covered with white gloves he began to applaud with all his might. His ardent enthusiasm for the work was of no avail. The hisses were resumed, the lights were turned out, and the audience dispersed in an uproar. Several times afterwards such scenes were repeated. Royalty would applaud rapturously, while all the rest of the audience hissed; but Liszt and royalty continued the fight till Wagner triumphed.

Mr. Otto Roth easily mastered the technical difficulties of the Raff concert piece for violin and orchestra, opus 67. His pliant and graceful technique, well ennunciated phrasing, as well as the rhythmical vitality of his performance and singing quantity of tone were one and all admirable. The work itself, while it is characterized by a conspicuous disproportion between its somewhat superficial exterior and inner merit is so deftly arranged as not to override the agreeable, attractive and sympathetic solo part. In brief it is virtuosic music pure and simple, technically difficult in the solo portions and adequately orchestrated.

Perhaps the most commendable feature of Mr. Roth's performance was his interpretation which was surprisingly supple and expressive and with a tone so refined, so spiritual, as to carry with it no trace or thought of its mechanical origin and as full of feeling as words spoken from the heart.

Then followed the novelty of the evening a suite for orchestra entitled "La Mer,"—three symphonic sketches written in the spirit of a tone picture of the sea. The first movement Lever de Soleil is evidently intended to suggest the rise of the sun in mid-ocean; but alas Old Sol is very persistent in rising in a fog and with such a wee bit of his genial old face shining that the intent of the composer in making use of a brief and wholly uninteresting motif is too painfully evident. This motif he tortuously develops and with great prolixity even to the extent of inciting the impression that he would creat a veritable mal de mer. The second movement is written in a real school and is refreshingly void of either the scholastic pedantry or popular pandering that have so generally characterized the novelties that have been introduced into the symphony concerts this season. There is an abundance of beauty in this second movement, and it is not simply the beauty that confines itself to sentiment, but rather that which belongs to robustness and health. It is written in a lively, varied and piquant style, and full of melody, though not to any important degree masterly. The last movement is prolix mournful and uninteresting.

The concert had for its final number an easily intelligible and attractive symphony, the "Laendiche-Hochzeit" (Rustic Wedding) symphony by Carl Goldmark. A Viennese critic has written of Goldmark that "his style is almost intermediate between that of Meyerbeer and Wagner in the Tannhauser period. From Meyerbeer Goldmark gets the passionatenes of his song, his pompous effects, his orchestral gorgeousness and at the same time a certain excess in these things." Now, the symphony played last evening is by no means a mirror of any such excesses as have been pointed out by the Viennese writer. This symphony was composed at a time when Goldmark had not matured his style; and yet it is music that is full gorgeous enough for the simple subject it depicts.

In style only does the "Rustic Wedding" seem to any extent antithetic to the form of the classic symphonies. It assumes a programme shape, yet its general architecture bears a distinct relation to the form fixed by the traditional writers. The first movement alone betrays marked innovations, and is radically unlike the sonata form of two contrasting subjects, episodes and general development. The special characteristics of the work as a whole are with its imaginative power, individuality of thought and expression, as well as a scholarly command of musical resources.

Throughout the concert the audience was uncommonly animated, and the few applause that greeted Mr. Nikisch upon his first appearance here since the announcement of his intention to accept a more congenial position, may be interpreted as illustrating the personal regret that generally prevails at the necessity of his departure. After the performance of the Tannhauser overture the audience was simply rapturous in the honors it bestowed, and the popular conductor was several times called upon to bow his acknowledgments. The Raff symphony was excellently played, notably the theme and variations, which received masterly treatments.

SUNDAY, MARCH 26, 1893.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

Conductor Nikisch introduced two novelties at the Symphony concert, the principal one being Paul Gilson's symphonic sketches, entitled, "The Sea," a descriptive number based upon a poem of the same title, by Eddy Levis, and first produced in Brussels a few months ago. The other piece was Raff's "Love Fairy," for violin and orchestra, given for the first time at these concerts, Mr. Roth playing the solo violin part.

Mr. Gilson is a young German composer, a recent graduate of the Brussels Conservatory, and, to judge from his work, an admirer of the Wagner class of music, for the orchestration in frequent instances plainly shows the influence of the great composer.

The numbers of "The Sea" represent sunrise, sailors' songs and dances, twilight and tempest, and the various parts are very effectively scored, although the storm movement but faintly suggests the turbulence of a storm at sea, the composer not calling into use the full resources of a grand orchestra in illustrating this episode.

There is a great deal of dainty descriptive work in the "Sunrise and Twilight" movements, and here perhaps Mr. Gilson is heard at his best. The sailors' songs and dances have a breezy and buoyant rhythm and swing, and appeal successfully to the emotions of the average concert-goers. These numbers may be ranked as possessing the element of popularity which is lacking in the more quiet and poetic parts of the work, wherein is shown his skilful knowledge and use of instruments typifying the emotional and gentle tone pictures.

Mr. Gilson's abilities are of a high grade, and he possesses an originality combined with simplicity of expression which argues well for his early attainment of a commanding position in the ranks of composers.

It is difficult to judge of the orchestral work at a single hearing, but praise is due the band for the sympathetic manner in which the melodic themes of the descriptive parts were interpreted. The storm scene doubtless would have been more thrilling had the composer deemed advisable to score it differently.

Raff's "Love Fairy" is merely a light and tripping concert piece without any depth or broad effects, and serves to show a violinist's facility of execution and little else.

The admirable artist, Mr. Otto Roth, played the fanciful number gracefully and dexterously. His legato runs were clear and true, and throughout the piece he played with a confidence of his powers which made his many friends regret that he was not afforded a better medium for showing his abilities as a violinist.

Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture, as originally written, was the opening number, and the familiar piece was given with telling effect, the various effects of light and shade being nicely observed. The pilgrims' song and jubilation at the close was grand, and roused the audience to the usual pitch of enthusiasm.

The pro ramme closed with Carl Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." The peculiar first part, with its 13 variations on one theme, and the odd beginning and finale by the 'cellos and double basses was more heartily appreciated than the remaining three movements. As a whole, Goldmark's number was the best interpreted of all.

The public rehearsal this week will be held on Thursday afternoon, March 30, to allow time to arrange the stage for the Handel and Haydn concert on Good Friday evening. The programme for the rehearsal and concert will be as follows: Overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; Liszt's concerto for pianoforte, A major, No. 2, Busoni; scherzo capriccioso, op. 66, Dvorak; symphony, B flat, No. 4, Beethoven. Mr. Busoni will be the pianist.

The programme of the first concert of the Kneisel quartet in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, next Wednesday evening, will be as follows: Quartet, A major, op. 18, Beethoven; romanza from quartet, G minor, Grieg; trio, B flat minor, Volkmann. Mr. Busoni will be the pianist.

The last of the Kneisel concerts of this season will be given Monday evening in Chickering Hall. The programme will be as follows: Quartet, D major, op. 64, No. 5, Haydn; quartet, A major, op. 41, No. 3, Schumann. Mr. E. A. MacDowell will play his "Sonata Tragica," for pianoforte.

Manager Ellis is hearing excellent reports about the success of George Grossmith in his tour of the Western cities. This clever comedian will return to Boston next month for a farewell series of recitals.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, MARCH 27, 1893.

The Nineteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
"The Love Fay," for violin and orchestra, op. 67....Raff
"The Sea".....Gilson
"Rustic Wedding" Symphony.....Goldmark

"The Sea," by Paul Gilson, was played for the first time in this town.

The work was presented in a mutilated condition.

The original is a set of four "symphonic sketches": "Sunrise," "Sailors' Songs and Dances," "Twilight," "Storm." These scenes are poetically and musically connected in the verse of Eddy Levis and in the music of Gilson, the illustrator of the poem. There was no explanation in the programme book of the intention of the composer; there were no extracts from the poem. Gilson's music is professedly programme-music; but the hearer was left in the dark. Viewed as absolute music, "The Sea," as announced in three scenes, appeared ill-balanced and without a climax.

A double injustice was perpetrated by the cutting—against the composer, for surely his work should have been played according to his intention; against the hearer, who was deprived of the means of intelligent enjoyment.

***

And, first, who is Gilson? The name is not foreign to us. But we must cross the Atlantic in search of the composer of "La Mer."

Paul Gilson was born in Brussels, June 15, 1865. It is said that he studied harmony under Duyck in the Conservatory at Brussels, and then took lessons of the learned Gevaert. The season of 1888-89 was distinguished by the marked success of three Belgian composers, Blockx, Mathieu and Tinel; it was also in 1889 that Gilson gained the "Prix de Rome" by a cantata, "Sinai." Gilson has written "The Demon," a lyric drama; "The Suppliants"; "Daphne," for solos, chorus and orchestra; "David," an oratorio; incidental music for Maaterlinck's "Princess Matrine," etc.

"The Sea" was first played, and with great success, at a concert in Brussels, March 20, 1892, under the direction of Joseph Dupont, to whom the work is dedicated. The poem was declaimed by Le Bargy; each musical tableau was preceded by the explanatory verse. There was a second performance, equally successful, May 7.

"The Sea" was performed in Paris at a Colonne concert Jan. 15 of this year. The poem was then declaimed by the author. Barbadette wrote this acid note concerning the compesition: "The poet is a Belgian, the music is also Belgian, and so a French audience did not grasp its full purport and its characteristics."

Gilson's work was performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in December. The fourth scene was then given in full, and it made a most profound impression.

***

The composer and the poet of "The Sea" are realists. Let us inquire into the nature of their work. The first scene represents sunrise at sea; it contains one chief melodic subject, which, by the way, is the foundation motive of the whole work. The second scene introduces lusty dances, one of which is "La Ronde du Gabier," now, "gabier" is a sort of quartermaster, or it may be a topman. One of these dances is a variation of the first theme. In the third scene the motives are supposed to give a twilight effect, while a duet between English horn and flute sets to music the love making of a sailor and his betrothed and the subsequent separation described by the poet. The fourth scene is a storm in which the ship is lost; the storm dies, and there is a return to the gentle music of the first scene. At the height of the storm Gilson introduces reminiscences of the sailors' songs and dances, as though in mockery. This effect is said to be terrible, yes, ghastly beyond description.

***

To attempt to pass judgment on the work as it was given Saturday—or, rather, as it was not given—would be unfair, even if it were possible. Yet it may be said that "The Sea" is the most important of the novelties presented thus far during the present season of these concerts. It is important on account of its realistic strength, its wild imagination, its workmanship; it shows the tendency of the modern school toward realism. Whether there is such a thing as realism in music; whether such a thing is desirable if it exists—these are questions that do not now require examination.

One thing is certain. The work should be given as a whole. Enough was heard, however, to convince the hearer that the composer is a colorist rather than a melodist; that he is a master of instrumentation; that, above all, he has something to say, and that in the expression of thought he uses his own voice.

***

Mr. Roth gave a smooth and pleasing performance of Raff's "characteristic piece." The piece itself is of little worth. There is pretty instrumentation that does not atone for poverty of thought.

***

The overture was played superbly, with a spirit that was contagious, and with a wealth of tonal color. It was a performance long to be remembered, and it is not surprising that the audience was enthusiastic. The symphony also gave pleasure.

***

The programme of the concert of next Saturday will be as follows: Overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; concerto for pianoforte, A major, No. 2, Liszt; Scherzo capriccioso, op. 66, Dvorak; symphony B flat, No. 4, Beethoven.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 26, 1893.

NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

While Mr. Nikisch has somewhat neglected the orthodox classics this season, and in the make-up of his programmes he has been conspicuously partial to the operatic works of Richard Wagner, it is but fair to bear in mind that our conductor's readings are seldom satisfactory with works that have long been identified with an absolute standard of interpretation; and that with a more eclectic class of music, such for example as the orchestra played last evening, he is always in his element. The reputation of Mr. Nikisch as a conductor of symphony concerts was very meagre indeed when he came to this country; but as an operatic director he was generally esteemed. True, in this capacity he had not held any position of greater import than that of first assistant to the musical director of the opera house in Leipzig; but here he had displayed an exceptional talent and a special adaptability. It is not surprising, therefore, that in Boston, as a conductor of symphony concerts, he has not been particularly successful in his interpretation of the most scholastic master-works. Last evening the overture to Tannhauser received very creditable and interesting treatment even to its most sensational effects being presented in all their integrity. The first performance of "Tannhauser" was at the Dresden Opera House, Oct. 20, 1845. Not long afterwards the work was produced in Weimar under the direction of Franz Liszt, and with a success that at once won Wagner's grateful recognition. It took place on Sunday. The audience was largely composed of the students of the University of Jena. Despite the presence of royalty they gave vent to frequent and prolonged applause, but some time prior to the end of the opera they were obliged to return to the university. No sooner had they disappeared than a perfect storm of hisses burst forth. Liszt became fairly wild with rage. Throwing down his music book, he abruptly turned his face to the audience, and raising his long arms covered with white gloves he began to applaud with all his might. His ardent enthusiasm for the work was of no avail. The hisses were resumed, the lights were turned out, and the audience dispersed in an uproar. Several times afterwards such scenes were repeated. Royalty would applaud rapturously, while all the rest of the audience hissed; but Liszt and royalty continued the fight till Wagner triumphed.

Mr. Otto Roth easily mastered the technical difficulties of the Raff concert piece for violin and orchestra, opus 67. His pliant and graceful technique, well ennunciated phrasing, as well as the rhythmical vitality of his performance and singing quantity of tone were one and all admirable. The work itself, while it is characterized by a conspicuous disproportion between its somewhat superficial exterior and inner merit is so deftly arranged as not to override the agreeable, attractive and sympathetic solo part. In brief it is virtuosic music pure and simple, technically difficult in the solo portions and adequately orchestrated.

Perhaps the most commendable feature of Mr. Roth's performance was his interpretation which was surprisingly supple and expressive and with a tone so refined, so spiritual, as to carry with it no trace or thought of its mechanical origin and as full of feeling as words spoken from the heart.

Then followed the novelty of the evening a suite for orchestra entitled "La Mer,"—three symphonic sketches written in the spirit of a tone picture of the sea. The first movement Lever de Soleil is evidently intended to suggest the rise of the sun in mid-ocean; but alas Old Sol is very persistent in rising in a fog and with such a wee bit of his genial old face shining that the intent of the composer in making use of a brief and wholly uninteresting motif is too painfully evident. This motif he tortuously develops and with great prolixity even to the extent of inciting the impression that he would creat a veritable mal de mer. The second movement is written in a real school and is refreshingly void of either the scholastic pedantry or popular pandering that have so generally characterized the novelties that have been introduced into the symphony concerts this season. There is an abundance of beauty in this second movement, and it is not simply the beauty that confines itself to sentiment, but rather that which belongs to robustness and health. It is written in a lively, varied and piquant style, and full of melody, though not to any important degree masterly. The last movement is prolix mournful and uninteresting.

The concert had for its final number an easily intelligible and attractive symphony, the "Laendiche-Hochzeit" (Rustic Wedding) symphony by Carl Goldmark. A Viennese critic has written of Goldmark that "his style is almost intermediate between that of Meyerbeer and Wagner in the Tannhauser period. From Meyerbeer Goldmark gets the passionateries of his song, his pompous effects, his orchestral gorgeousness and at the same time a certain excess in these things." Now, the symphony played last evening is by no means a mirror of any such excesses as have been pointed out by the Viennese writer. This symphony was composed at a time when Goldmark had not matured his style; and yet it is music that is full gorgeous enough for the simple subject it depicts.

In style only does the "Rustic Wedding" seem to any extent antithetic to the form of the classic symphonies. It assumes a programme shape, yet its general architecture bears a distinct relation to the form fixed by the traditional writers. The first movement alone betrays marked innovations, and is radically unlike the sonata form of two contrasting subjects, episodes and general development. The special characteristics of the work as a whole are with its imaginative power, individuality of thought and expression, as well as a scholarly command of musical resources.

Throughout the concert the audience was uncommonly animated, and the few applause that greeted Mr. Nikisch upon his first appearance here since the announcement of his intention to accept a more congenial position, may be interpreted as illustrating the personal regret that generally prevails at the necessity of his departure. After the performance of the Tannhauser overture the audience was simply rapturous in the honors it bestowed, and the popular conductor was several times called upon to bow his acknowledgments. The Raff symphony was excellently played, notably the theme and variations, which received masterly treatments.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 26, 1893.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

Conductor Nikisch introduced two novelties at the Symphony concert, the principal one being Paul Gilson's symphonic sketches, entitled, "The Sea," a descriptive number based upon a poem of the same title, by Eddy Levis, and first produced in Brussels a few months ago. The other piece was Raff's "Love Fairy," for violin and orchestra, given for the first time at these concerts, Mr. Roth playing the solo violin part.

Mr. Gilson is a young German composer, a recent graduate of the Brussels Conservatory, and, to judge from his work, an admirer of the Wagner class of music, for the orchestration in frequent instances plainly shows the influence of the great composer.

The numbers of "The Sea" represent sunrise, sailors' songs and dances, twilight and tempest, and the various parts are very effectively scored, although the storm movement but faintly suggests the turbulence of a storm at sea, the composer not calling into use the full resources of a grand orchestra in illustrating this episode.

There is a great deal of dainty descriptive work in the "Sunrise and Twilight" movements, and here perhaps Mr. Gilson is heard at his best. The sailors' songs and dances have a breezy and buoyant rhythm and swing, and appeal successfully to the emotions of the average concert-goers. These numbers may be ranked as possessing the element of popularity which is lacking in the more quiet and poetic parts of the work, wherein is shown his skilful knowledge and use of instruments typifying the emotional and gentle tone pictures.

Mr. Gilson's abilities are of a high grade, and he possesses an originality combined with simplicity of expression which argues well for his early attainment of a commanding position in the ranks of composers.

It is difficult to judge of the orchestral work at a single hearing, but praise is due the band for the sympathetic manner in which the melodic themes of the descriptive parts were interpreted. The storm scene doubtless would have been more thrilling had the composer deemed advisable to score it differently.

Raff's "Love Fairy" is merely a light and tripping concert piece without any depth or broad effects, and serves to show a violinist's facility of execution and little else.

The admirable artist, Mr. Otto Roth, played the fanciful number gracefully and dexterously. His legato runs were clear and true, and throughout the piece he played with a confidence of his powers which made his many friends regret that he was not afforded a better medium for showing his abilities as a violinist.

Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture, as originally written, was the opening number, and the familiar piece was given with telling effect, the various effects of light and shade being nicely observed. The pilgrims' song and jubilation at the close was grand, and roused the audience to the usual pitch of enthusiasm.

The pro ramme closed with Carl Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." The peculiar first part, with its 13 variations on one theme, and the odd beginning and finale by the 'cellos and double basses was more heartily appreciated than the remaining three movements. As a whole, Goldmark's number was the best interpreted of all.

The public rehearsal this week will be held on Thursday afternoon, March 30, to allow time to arrange the stage for the Handel and Haydn concert on Good Friday evening. The programme for the rehearsal and concert will be as follows: Overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; Liszt's concerto for pianoforte, A major, No. 2, Busoni; scherzo capriccioso, op. 66, Dvorak; symphony, B flat, No. 4, Beethoven. Mr. Busoni will be the pianist.

The programme of the first concert of the Kneisel quartet in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, next Wednesday evening, will be as follows: Quartet, A major, op. 18, Beethoven; romanza from quartet, G minor, Grieg; trio, B flat minor, Volkmann. Mr. Busoni will be the pianist.

The last of the Kneisel concerts of this season will be given Monday evening in Chickering Hall. The programme will be as follows: Quartet, D major, op. 64, No. 5, Haydn; quartet, A major, op. 41, No. 3, Schumann. Mr. E. A. MacDowell will play his "Sonata Tragica," for pianoforte.

Manager Ellis is hearing excellent reports about the success of George Grossmith in his tour of the Western cities. This clever comedian will return to Boston next month for a farewell series of recitals.

I w w p d c p r

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.

Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. E. A. MACDOWELL.

VIII. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

MONDAY, MARCH 27, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN. QUARTET in D major, op. 64, No. 5.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio cantabile.—Menuetto (Allegretto).—Presto.

MACDOWELL. SONATA TRAGICA, for PIANOFORTE, op. 45.
I. Largo maestoso.—Allegro risoluto.
II. Molto allegro, vivace.
III. Largo con maestà.
IV. Allegro eroico.

SCHUMANN. QUARTET in A major, op. 41, No. 3.
Andante espressivo; Allegro moderato.—Assai agitato.—Adagio molto.—Allegro molto vivace.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

BRATTLE HALL CONCERTS, CAMBRIDGE, Wednesday Evenings, March 29, April 12, and April 26, at 8. Subscription tickets now on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1893.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The last concert by the Kneisel Quartet this season was given last evening in Chickering Hall. Mr. MacDowell was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Quartette, D major, op. 64, No. 5.....Haydn
Sonata Tragica, for pianoforte.....MacDowell
Quartette, A major, op. 41, No. 3.....Schumann

Mr. MacDowell is known at home and abroad as a distinguished disciple of the modern romantic school. In this sonata he exchanges the freedom of modern romanticism for the more or less inexorable rules of established form; yet in doing this he shows again his romantic spirit, and it may here be said that the romanticism, as seen in the exquisite treatment of the beautiful second theme of the first movement, is, as far as first impressions go, the most thoroughly musical characteristic of this sonata.

Mr. MacDowell furnishes no text; he simply calls the sonata "tragic."

The first movement with its impressive introduction seems to me the most noble and the most beautiful portion of the work. The themes are strongly contrasted, and only a musician saturated with imagination and controlled by a keen sense of values could have invented and fashioned the second motive. It may be urged that this motive is too lyrical and tender, too full of fresh perfume that suggests and does not irritate; that the motive is foreign to tragedy. But this motive is mastered by the sterner and dolorous theme. Irony enters into the most complete tragedy. The laugh of nature enlarges human grief. When mourners go about the streets, the noon-day sun gives a more lurid light than ever came from phosphorescent graveyard or malignant cresset high on lonely tower.

The third movement, a largo, was played, as I understand, at a recital given last season by the composer. It, too, is strong. Its melancholy is robust, its passion is virile. There is no sentimentalism with crape-bordered handkerchief. There are suggestions of the bier and the slow procession, but the composer disdains the ordinary trappings of woe.

The second and the fourth movements seem of inferior musical worth. This inferiority does not appear in workmanship, for Mr. MacDowell is an acknowledged master of his trade; but they are not as suggestive; they do not carry conviction in the expression of musical thought. The hearer is, perhaps, not to be blamed if he wonders what all the pother is about.

What Charles Dancla once wrote concerning the question of whether a composer should conduct his own work may be applied to a composer-pianist: "The composer mastered by the ignorance of how the public may receive his work cannot preserve the calmness, the nerve, the vigorous firmness which are absolutely necessary to the leader of an orchestra." Mr. MacDowell, however, played last evening with strength, with sentiment, and with brilliancy.

***

And what shall be said at this late day concerning the merits of the performance of the Kneisel Quartet? The words can only be words of eulogy and glowing eulogy. There are chamber players that are heard to greatest advantage in works of ancient masters; others feel more deeply the nervous passion of our modern schools. The Kneisel Quartet know the serenity and the jollity of Haydn; they also appreciate the romanticism of Schumann even when it is hectic or neurotic. Their performances [illegible] unalloyed pleasure, as [illegible] enthusiasm of the large au-

---

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 28, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

Chickering Hall was, of course, filled on the occason of the last concert of the Kneisel Quartette Club for the season. The club in itself is a perennial attraction to the Boston public, but on this occasion another magnet was added to their drawing power by the appearance of the composer-pianist, MacDowell, who played a new work of his own, a sonata tragica. Much as I generally enjoy the works of this composer (he may be ranked as the most promising of the younger native composers) I could not enjoy this sonata on a first hearing; it seemed turgid and bombastic, and one movement seemed to duplicate the other in style and general treatment.

There were heavy chords, big with fate, followed invariably by tender melodic phrases, and this alternation was so constant that every mountain in the work seemed to bring forth its mouse. The movements might well have been entitled "Jupiter Tonans," "King Cambyses," "Bombastes Furioso," etc., and the eternal reiteration of mystery in the bass notes, the invariable interruption of phrases by sudden pauses, became too much of a mannerism. All seemed spasmodic and disconnected. Yet there was some development in the first part that spoke of the thorough composer, and the contrasts in the opening movement were more impressive than after they had become tame by repetition. The work seems in the modern free form, and attempts to attain a homogeneous effect by carrying some of its earlier episodes into succeeding movements. So far as one could judge, it presented one general style carried to too great a length. It may be that its novel vein and its constant attempts at overwhelming power dazed the critic, and that renewed hearing may reveal new beauties, but the first impression was not a favorable one.

The club played its numbers in famous style. Anything more perfect than the finale of the Haydn quartette could not be imagined.

The Schumann quartette in A major has the fault of the composer, that it is too frequently piano music given over to four stringed instruments. The moment that Schumann adds a piano to his strings he becomes greater, and one cannot help preferring the piano quintette, op. 44, or the quartette, op. 47, to the unsupported string quartette. Nevertheless the playing throughout was admirable, and the club has ended its season in a manner that proves it to be the best organization of its kind in America. LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 28, 1893.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The eighth and last concert for this season of the Kneisel quartet, Mr. E. A. MacDowell assisting, was given at Chickering Hall last evening to an exceedingly delighted and appreciative audience. The programme was well selected, in detail being: Quartet in D major, from Haydn and quartet in A major, from Shumann, each movement being carefully and beautifully rendered. Mr. MacDowell gave, with artistic execution and finish, a sonata of his own composition in four movements.

Subscription tickets are now on sale for the Brattle Hall concerts, Cambridge, advertised to be March 29, April 12 and April 26.

BOSTON

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 87.

TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The eighth and last of the season's chamber concerts by the Kneisel string quartet was given at Chickering Hall last evening, with Mr. E. A. MacDowell as assistant soloist. The works for strings included in the programme were Haydn's quartet in D major, op. 64, No. 3, and Schumann's quartet in A major, op. 41, No. 3, both of which were played with the faultless taste and skill which has come to be expected in all performances given by this organization. The novelty of the evening was Mr. MacDowell's own "Sonata Tragica" for pianoforte, a work of rare merit and originality in which the sterling abilities of this composer were again prominently shown. Mr. MacDowell's performance gained him a most attentive, hearing and the audience made their high appreciation of the composition and its interpretation most unmistakably evident. The series of concerts thus brought to a close has been the most successful, both artistically and financially, of any conducted by Mr. Kneisel, who enjoys the proud distinction of having been the one who has made chamber music concerts a standard attraction of each musical season in this city.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MARCH 28.

Kneisel Quartet.

Chickering Hall was crowded last evening at the last concert of the Kneisel quartet. Mr. Kneisel and his associates were heard in quartets by Haydn and Schumann, the charm of the programme being enhanced by Mr. E. A. MacDowell's performance of his new "Sonata Tragica."

Haydn's quartet in D major, and Schumann's quartet in A major were played with that perfect unity of expression and understanding which always characterizes the work of this fine organization. The beauty, vigor and sentimentality of the two compositions were delightfully illustrated by the artists, and their work found hearty appreciation from their auditors.

Mr. E. A. MacDowell's sonata is one of great merit, and worthy of his fame as one of the most scholarly of American composers. The work combines breadth and solidity with beauty and brilliancy, and the scoring is a fine example of the artist's ability in works of this class.

Mr. MacDowell's work and performance evoked hearty encomiums, and he not only was recalled several times at the conclusion of his playing, but was obliged to hold an impromptu reception in the waiting-room to receive the congratulations of his friends.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the eighth and last concert of this, its eighth season, in Chickering Hall, last evening, Mr. E. A. MacDowell assisting in the following programme:

Haydn—Quartet for strings, in D major (Peters No. 6).
MacDowell—Sonata tragica, for pianoforte, Op. 45.
Schumann—Quartet for strings, in A major, Op. 41, No. 3.

The delightful, sunny Haydn quartet was inimitably played; the last movement in special was a wonderful piece of agile delicacy. In the slow movement, which is almost a violin solo with trio accompaniment, Mr. Kneisel did some exquisite phrasing. Indeed, the whole quartet was played with a technical perfection and a fineness of musical feeling that left nothing to be desired. In itself, the work shows the finest side of Haydn's genius, and his consummate mastery over the form.

The Schumann quartet, the last of a set of three he wrote, is a work of another stamp; here we no longer find that easy mastery over the sonata-form that comes from perfect sympathy between the composer and it. The sonata-form was to Haydn, as the fugue was to Bach, a second nature; one feels that his musical thoughts spontaneously took that shape themselves of that the structural advantages of the form appealed to his musical instincts so strongly that he could not help turning them to account. To Schumann, on the other hand, the form was something traditional, the beauty, strength and inherent musical fitness of which he appreciated, to be sure, but with which his genius was nevertheless not in complete sympathy. He had mastered it sufficiently for it to be no serious shackle on his inspiration, but his inspiration itself was often restive, and tended to lead him away from the form in a way that was almost always charming for the moment, but often failed to compensate for certain defects that were the natural consequence of such straying from the normal path. His musical inventiveness was fertile enough, he never lacked for something to say; but the whisperings of his Muse, delightful and fascinating in themselves, did not always come just at the right time for him to turn them to the best account, and his finer strokes were not always delivered where they would tell most. In the finale of this quartet we find him at quite unusual pains to hold his genius down to its appointed task and keep it from straying into byways that might turn out to be no-thoroughfares; one feels a certain grim determination in him to write a real rondo for once in a way, to hold fast by that form as for dear life. He has done it manfully, but at the expense of a great deal of the freedom that was necessary for him to do things naively and brilliantly. His first theme, for instance—not well put upon the instruments, if the truth be told, and always sounding rather rough and thin, no matter how well played—comes back again and again, in genuine rondo fashion, or rather, we should say, it not so much comes back as is brought back nolens volens; it is brought back because the rondo scheme demands it, but it comes unwillingly, and instead of bringing new life and brilliancy with it, as a rondo theme should at its every return, it becomes tedious and really blocks the path of musical development. Every time it reappears you somehow feel that the music is beginning all over again, and that no solid vantage ground has been reached in what has gone before. This rondo is certainly the weakest movement in the quartet; but something of its weakness is to be felt, if to a less degree, in the other three. Still, there is so much ineffable beauty in the first three movements, such a wealth of invention, such true poetry of sentiment, that they might be weaker still, and still deserve to be called admirable. The first movement, which seems as if built out of lovers' sighs, is a dream of beauty; and what poignancy of expressiveness is there in the Adagio! Here is great music, if not the very greatest. The quartet was exquisitely, wonderfully played; one felt that so might Schumann himself have wished to hear it.

One of the strongest impressions of the evening was Mr. MacDowell's new Sonata tragica. At last we have come upon a work by Mr. MacDowell that has given us a real sensation; we were pretty sure the time would come, and now it has come. Of the last of the four movements in this sonata we can report nothing; listening intently to new music, especially when it moves you deeply, is a fatiguing process, and with the third movement our receptivity was exhausted. But of the first three movements we can speak, if only of the first impression they made upon us. Of musical details we can naturally as yet say nothing. The work seems to be the outcome of a real inspiration; the deeply emotional force that underlies it finds true beauty and vividness of expression; the impression the music makes is so continuous that even after a first hearing, one is tempted to conclude that there is genuine coherency there. The whole work moves on a very elevated and noble plane; one feels genius in it throughout—and we are perfectly aware that genius is not a term to be used lightly. In a word, the sonata took hold of us jusqu'aux entrailles. Mr. MacDowell played it superbly, magnificently.

For several seasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made trips of a week's duration, including New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore. The performances of the week of March 13-18 ended the series of five trips included in the scheme for the present season. It is gratifying to know that in each city every seat in the house was sold at every performance, a most flattering recognition of the merits of the orchestra. In New York, Chickering Hall has been packed, and the "standing room only" sign was always displayed when the doors were opened. Numerous requests have been received asking that the orchestra take a larger hall for next season, and several offers for special concerts outside the regular series were declined because of a lack of open dates. In Philadelphia, the Academy of Music, seating 600 more than Music Hall, was filled at every performance with just such an audience as to intelligence as attends the home performances. The third or upper balcony was thrown open to the holders of "rush tickets," as on Friday afternoons at Music Hall, and at each concert from 500 to 800 people availed themselves of this opportunity to hear the orchestra at a moderate price. In Washington, the foreign legations, justices, statesmen and their families, supplemented by musical students, made up an audience peculiar to the capital.

[130.]

CHICKERING HALL.

EIGHTH SEASON 1892-93.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.

Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. E. A. MACDOWELL.

VIII. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

MONDAY, MARCH 27, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN. QUARTET in D major, op. 64, No. 5.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio cantabile.—Menuetto (Allegretto).—Presto.

MACDOWELL. SONATA TRAGICA, for PIANOFORTE, op. 45.
I. Largo maestoso.—Allegro risoluto.
II. Molto allegro, vivace.
III. Largo con maestà.
IV. Allegro eroico.

SCHUMANN. QUARTET in A major, op. 41, No. 3.
Andante espressivo; Allegro moderato.—Assai agitato.—Adagio molto.—Allegro molto vivace.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

BRATTLE HALL CONCERTS, CAMBRIDGE, Wednesday Evenings, March 29, April 12, and April 26, at 8. Subscription tickets now on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 87.

TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The eighth and last of the season's chamber concerts by the Kneisel string quartet was given at Chickering Hall last evening, with Mr. E. A. MacDowell as assistant soloist. The works for strings included in the programme were Haydn's quartet in D major, op. 64, No. 3, and Schumann's quartet in A major, op. 41, No. 3, both of which were played with the faultless taste and skill which has come to be expected in all performances given by this organization. The novelty of the evening was Mr. MacDowell's own "Sonata Tragica" for pianoforte, a work of rare merit and originality in which the sterling abilities of this composer were again prominently shown. Mr. MacDowell's performance gained him a most attentive, hearing and theaudience made their high appreciation of the composition and its interpretation most unmistakably evident. The series of concerts thus brought to a close has been the most successful, both artistically and financially, of any conducted by Mr. Kneisel, who enjoys the proud distinction of having been the one who has made chamber music concerts a standard attraction of each musical season in this city.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MARCH 28.

Kneisel Quartet.

Chickering Hall was crowded last evening at the last concert of the Kneisel quartet. Mr. Kneisel and his associates were heard in quartets by Haydn and Schumann, the charm of the programme being enhanced by Mr. E. A. MacDowell's performance of his new "Sonata Tragica."

Haydn's quartet in D major, and Schumann's quartet in A major were played with that perfect unity of expression and understanding which always characterizes the work of this fine organization. The beauty, vigor and sentimentality of the two compositions were delightfully illustrated by the artists, and their work found hearty appreciation from their auditors.

Mr. E. A. MacDowell's sonata is one of great merit, and worthy of his fame as one of the most scholarly of American composers. The work combines breadth and solidity with beauty and brilliancy, and the scoring is a fine example of the artist's ability in works of this class.

Mr. MacDowell's work and performance evoked hearty encomiums, and he not only was recalled several times at the conclusion of his playing, but was obliged to hold an impromptu reception in the waiting-room to receive the congratulations of his friends.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1893.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the eighth and last concert of this, its eighth season, in Chickering Hall, last evening, Mr. E. A. MacDowell assisting in the following programme:

Haydn—Quartet for strings, in D major (Peters Ed., No. 6).
MacDowell—Sonata tragica, for pianoforte, Opus 45.
Schumann—Quartet for strings, in A major, Opus 41, No. 3.

The delightful, sunny Haydn quartet was inimitably played; the last movement in especial was a wonderful piece of agile delicacy. In the slow movement, which is almost a violin solo with trio accompaniment, Mr. Kneisel did some exquisite phrasing. Indeed, the whole quartet was played with a technical perfection and a fineness of musical feeling that left nothing to be desired. In itself, the work shows the finest side of Haydn's genius, and his consummate mastery over the form.

The Schumann quartet, the last of a set of three he wrote, is a work of another stamp; here we no longer find that easy mastery over the sonata-form that comes from perfect sympathy between the composer and it. The sonata-form was to Haydn, as the fugue was to Bach, a second nature; one feels that his musical thoughts spontaneously took that shape themselves of that the structural advantages of the form appealed to his musical instincts so strongly that he could not help turning them to account. To Schumann, on the other hand, the form was something traditional, the beauty, strength and inherent musical fitness of which he appreciated, to be sure, but with which his genius was nevertheless not in complete sympathy. He had mastered it sufficiently for it to be no serious shackle on his inspiration, but his inspiration itself was often restive, and tended to lead him away from the form in a way that was almost always charming for the moment, but often failed to compensate for certain defects that were the natural consequence of such straying from the normal path. His musical inventiveness was fertile enough, he never lacked for something to say; but the whisperings of his Muse, delightful and fascinating in themselves, did not always come just at the right time for him to turn them to the best account, and his finer strokes were not always delivered where they would tell most. In the finale of this quartet we find him at quite unusual pains to hold his genius down to its appointed task and keep it from straying into byways that might turn out to be no-thoroughfares; one feels a certain grim determination in him to write a real rondo for once in a way, to hold fast by that form as for dear life. He has done it manfully, but at the expense of a great deal of the freedom that was necessary for him to do things naively and brilliantly. His first theme, for instance—not well put upon the instruments, if the truth be told, and always sounding rather rough and thin, no matter how well played—comes back again and again, in genuine rondo fashion, or rather, we should say, it not so much comes back as is brought back nolens volens; it is brought back because the rondo scheme demands it, but it comes unwillingly, and instead of bringing new life and brilliancy with it, as a rondo theme should at its every return, it becomes tedious and really blocks the path of musical development. Every time it reappears you somehow feel that the music is beginning all over again, and that no solid vantage ground has been reached in what has gone before. This rondo is certainly the weakest movement in the quartet; but something of its weakness is to be felt, if to a less degree, in the other three. Still, there is so much ineffable beauty in the first three movements, such a wealth of invention, such true poetry of sentiment, that they might be weaker still, and still deserve to be called admirable. The first movement, which seems as if built out of lovers' sighs, is a dream of beauty; and what poignancy of expressiveness is there in the Adagio! Here is great music, if not the very greatest. The quartet was exquisitely, wonderfully played: one felt that so might Schumann himself have wished to hear it.

One of the strongest impressions of the evening was Mr. MacDowell's new Sonata tragica. At last we have come upon a work by Mr. MacDowell that has given us a real sensation; we were pretty sure the time would come, and now it has come. Of the last of the four movements in this sonata we can report nothing; listening intently to new music, especially when it moves you deeply, is a fatiguing process, and with the third movement our receptivity was exhausted. But of the first three movements we can speak, if only of the first impression they made upon us. Of musical details we can naturally as yet say nothing. The work seems to be the outcome of a real inspiration; the deeply emotional force that underlies it finds true beauty and vividness of expression; the impression the music makes is so continuous that even after a first hearing, one is tempted to conclude that there is genuine coherency there. The whole work moves on a very elevated and noble plane; one feels genius in it throughout—and we are perfectly aware that genius is not a term to be used lightly. In a word, the sonata took hold of us jusq'aux entrailles. Mr. MacDowell played it superbly, magnificently.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1893.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The last concert by the Kneisel Quartet this season was given last evening in Chickering Hall. Mr. MacDowell was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Quartette, D major, op. 64, No. 5.....Haydn
Sonata Tragica, for pianoforte.....MacDowell
Quartette, A major, op. 41, No. 3.....Schumann

Mr. MacDowell is known at home and abroad as a distinguished disciple of the modern romantic school. In this sonata he exchanges the freedom of modern romanticism for the more or less inexorable rules of established form; yet in doing this he shows again his romantic spirit, and it may here be said that the romanticism, as seen in the exquisite treatment of the beautiful second theme of the first movement, is, as far as first impressions go, the most thoroughly musical characteristic of this sonata.

Mr. MacDowell furnishes no text; he simply calls the sonata "tragic."

The first movement with its impressive introduction seems to me the most noble and the most beautiful portion of the work. The themes are strongly contrasted, and only a musician saturated with imagination and controlled by a keen sense of values could have invented and fashioned the second motive. It may be urged that this motive is too lyrical and tender, too full of fresh perfume that suggests and does not irritate; that the motive is foreign to tragedy. But this motive is mastered by the sterner and dolorous theme. Irony enters into the most complete tragedy. The laugh of nature enlarges human grief. When mourners go about the streets, the noon-day sun gives a more lurid light than ever came from phosphorescent graveyard or midnight cresset high on lonely tower.

The third movement, a largo, was played, as I understand, at a recital given last season by the composer. It, too, is strong. Its melancholy is robust, its passion is virile. There is no sentimentalism with crape-bordered handkerchief. There are suggestions of the bier and the slow procession, but the composer disdains the ordinary trappings of woe.

The second and the fourth movements seem of inferior musical worth. This inferiority does not appear in workmanship, for Mr. MacDowell is an acknowledged master of his trade; but they are not as suggestive; they do not carry conviction in the expression of musical thought. The hearer is, perhaps, not to be blamed if he wonders what all the pother is about.

What Charles Dancla once wrote concerning the question of whether a composer should conduct his own work may be applied to a composer-pianist: "The composer mastered by the ignorance of how the public may receive his work cannot preserve the calmness, the nerve, the vigorous firmness which are absolutely necessary to the leader of an orchestra." Mr. MacDowell, however, played last evening with strength, with sentiment, and with brilliancy.

***

And what shall be said at this late day concerning the merits of the performance of the Kneisel Quartet? The words can only be words of eulogy and glowing eulogy. There are chamber players that are heard to greatest advantage in works of ancient masters; others feel more deeply the nervous passion of our modern schools. The Kneisel Quartet know the serenity and the jollity of Haydn; they also appreciate the romanticism of Schumann even when it is fantastic or neurotic. Their performance last evening gave unalloyed pleasure, as was shown by the enthusiasm of the large audience.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 28, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

Chickering Hall was, of course, filled on the occason of the last concert of the Kneisel Quartette Club for the season. The club in itself is a perennial attraction to the Boston public, but on this occasion another magnet was added to their drawing power by the appearance of the composer-pianist, MacDowell, who played a new work of his own, a sonata tragica. Much as I generally enjoy the works of this composer (he may be ranked as the most promising of the younger native composers) I could not enjoy this sonata on a first hearing; it seemed turgid and bombastic, and one movement seemed to duplicate the other in style and general treatment.

There were heavy chords, big with fate, followed invariably by tender melodic phrases, and this alternation was so constant that every mountain in the work seemed to bring forth its mouse. The movements might well have been entitled "Jupiter Tonans," "King Cambyses," "Bombastes Furioso," etc., and the eternal reiteration of mystery in the bass notes, the invariable interruption of phrases by sudden pauses, became too much of a mannerism. All seemed spasmodic and disconnected. Yet there was some development in the first part that spoke of the thorough composer, and the contrasts in the opening movement were more impressive than after they had become tame by repetition. The work seems in the modern free form, and attempts to attain a homogeneous effect by carrying some of its earlier episodes into succeeding movements. So far as one could judge, it presented one general style carried to too great a length. It may be that its novel vein and its constant attempts at overwhelming power dazed the critic, and that renewed hearing may reveal new beauties, but the first impression was not a favorable one.

The club played its numbers in famous style. Anything more perfect than the finale of the Haydn quartette could not be imagined.

The Schumann quartette in A major has the fault of the composer, that it is too frequently piano music given over to four stringed instruments. The moment that Schumann adds a piano to his strings he becomes greater, and one cannot help preferring the piano quintette, op. 44, or the quartette, op. 47, to the unsupported string quartette. Nevertheless the playing throughout was admirable, and the club has ended its season in a manner that proves it to be the best organization of its kind in America.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 28, 1893.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The eighth and last concert for this season of the Kneisel quartet, Mr. E. A. MacDowell assisting, was given at Chickering Hall last evening to an exceedingly delighted and appreciative audience. The programme was well selected, in detail being: Quartet in D major, from Haydn and quartet in A major, from Shumann, each movement being carefully and beautifully rendered. Mr. MacDowell gave, with artistic execution and finish, a sonata of his own composition in four movements.

Subscription tickets are now on sale for the Brattle Hall concerts, Cambridge, advertised to be March 29, April 12 and April 26.

For several seasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made trips of a week's duration, including New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. The performances of the week of March 13-18 ended the series of five trips included in the scheme for the present season. It is gratifying to know that in each city every seat in the house was sold at every performance, a most flattering recognition of the merits of the orchestra. In New York, Chickering Hall has been packed, and the "standing room only" sign was always displayed when the doors were opened. Numerous requests have been received asking that the orchestra take a larger hall for next season, and several offers for special concerts outside the regular series were declined because of a lack of open dates. In Philadelphia, the Academy of Music, seating 600 more than Music Hall, was filled at every performance with just such an audience as to intelligence as attends the home performances. The third or upper balcony was thrown open to the holders of "rush tickets," as on Friday afternoons at Music Hall, and at each concert from 500 to 800 people availed themselves of this opportunity to hear the orchestra at a moderate price. In Washington, the foreign legations, justices, statesmen and their families, supplemented by musical students, made up an audience peculiar to the capital.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 1, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The one thing of great merit at the nineteenth Symphony concert was the magnificent performance of the "Tannhäuser" overture with which the evening began. Mr. Nikisch gave full freedom to his romantic and dramatic impulses, and yet he so guided them that they seemed to be the slaves of his will and the masters of the will of his players. Such a steadily crescent rendering we do not remember to have heard, Enthusiasm and power to portray it moved harmoniously together, so that when an absolute volume and sonority seemed to have been attained, there was yet in reserve an unexampled splendor of strength for the conclusion. The audience, in their familiarity with the work, felt and appreciated the triumph, and called the conductor forward three times with tempestuous applause. The rest of the programme was light and sweet, and even seemed thin and weak after the solidity, the domination and the concentration of the overture. Mr. Otto Roth had the second place for Raff's "La Fée d'Amour," which is a pretty, rambling, airy, inconsequential series of violin passages. These are not unshapely, but they do not signify much of anything; they might represent butterflies as well as fairies, and suggest love to be a very vagrant triviality. They require a fine, delicate and swift technique, of which Mr. Roth demonstrated his possession. His tone seemed slender, but the solo violin has to move constantly with flute figures, and the vast force of the Wagner violin passages was still in the ear. Then were presented three of the four "symphonic sketches" which make up "The Sea" of the young Belgian composer, Paul Gilson. They depict sunrise, the songs and dances of sailors, and evening twilight, the conclusion, a tempest, not being played. That they must coincide in some respects, with the musical ideas which have come to represent conventionally such subjects, may be taken for granted; but they go much beyond these, for they show originality in the use of presented means and the addition of new ones, a distinct melodic invention, independence of thought and a detail of workmanship as fine as that in the painting of a Meissonier or a Gaugengigl. The concert ended with Goldmark's saccharine but sympathetic "Rustic Wedding" symphony. The playing of the orchestra was altogether admirable throughout the evening, and the attention and applause of the audience proved that the programme gave unusual pleasure.

The unsatisfactory character of the programme-book was again demonstrated by the fact that only eight lines were given to "La Mer" and its composer—perhaps because the compiler of the "historical and descriptive notes" did not know where to find the interesting and necessary material which the musical editor of the Journal presented in abundance. Per contra, the book gave nearly eight pages to utterly irrelevant extracts from the writings of Berlioz, for which the compiler has a fondness which approaches close upon dotage, and two pages more to such shilly-shally extracts from real or imaginary authors as might have a proper hiding in a private scrap-book, but are an intrusion upon the space which should be devoted first to the legitimate purposes of the pamphlet and upon the time of the readers who receive such scanty measure of what the title-page promises them.

Tonight the symphony will be Beethoven's fourth, and the overture Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." Dvorak's attractive "Scherzo Capriccioso" will also be given by the orchestra, and Mr. Busoni will play Liszt's second pianofore concerto.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The last concert of the Kneisel season was given in Chickering Hall, on Monday evening, when the quartette played with the technical perfection and beautiful taste which are now expected from them as matters of course, Haydn's D-major quartette, opus 64, No. 5, and Schumann's in A-major, opus 41, No. 3. Between these Mr. E. A. MacDowell presented a work of his own, new to Boston—although it has been heard abroad, we believe—which he calls a "Tragic Sonata." That this young composer and pianist is a man of originality, individuality and forcefulness, has been said more than once in these columns, and this composition demonstrates as much once more. Yet it seems as if he had expressed his purpose almost completely in his first movement, and as if the other three were scarcely more than corollaries, derivatives from and accompaniments to, the principal proposition. In that first movement are light and life met, clouded and doomed by darkness and mystery. The contrast of themes, moods and states of being is grandly, powerfully and pathetically depicted, and the hearer needs no more to be convinced, so far as the eloquence of music can convince him, that the composer has seized the true symbols and used them masterfully. The other movements, although they contain ideas which are good and exhibit relationship to the thesis, and are skilfully and finely wrought out, do not enhance the listener's pleasure or deepen the more sombre impressions. It would perhaps have been as wise if Mr. MacDowell had contented himself with the first movement—as a complete entity, calling it plainly "Tragedy," if he so chose, and leaving it to stand or fall, to persuade or leave unmoved, alone.

The Kneisel Quartet will give four concerts in the World's Fair Recital Hall—seating five hundred people—on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, May 22, 23, 24 and 25. The following American concert-organists have been invited to give organ recitals: Samuel P. Warren, William C. Carl, Frank Taft, New York; George E. Whiting, S. B. Whitney, Boston; R. Huntington Woodman, Brooklyn; David D. Wood, Philadelphia; Samuel A. Baldwin, St. Paul; Clarence Eddy, Harrison M. Wild, Louis Falk, Walter E. Hall and Wilhelm Middelschulte of Chicago. The Pullman Military Band will give concerts during September and October.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 2, 1893.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The composers chosen for the twentieth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening were Tschaikowski, Liszt, Dvorak and Beethoven. The concert had as its chief attraction the performance of the concerto in A major, No. 2, by Franz Liszt. The soloist was Mr. Ferruccio Busoni. The concerto is the product of Liszt's best period. In it the old established concerto form is conspicuous by its absence. It thus antagonizes the musical conservator, but as an interesting type of Liszt's individuality and of that school of pianoforte music of which he was the pioneer, the concerto will always remain a masterpiece. The orchestral score of the work is richly endowed; the themes are impressively rhythmical as well as poetic and they are linked together with masterly power into a homogeneous whole of the profoundest interest. Mr. Busoni's performance of it was extraordinary. It was photographically clear and accurate in its loyalty to the concerto, while the depth of perception and truth of delineation that constantly attended it could not have a more perfect medium for their natural expression than the artist's eminently well-rounded and unerring technique. The huge and fantastic outlines of the work, the bold modulations and quaintly marked rhythms, the subtle melodic turns and exuberant ornamentation were one and all presented with the strictest attention to detail, and yet with the utmost refinement and ease.

In brief Mr. Busoni was a virtuoso par excellence with the work. Its herculean difficulties were easily at his command. He played it not simply as a pianist with superbly trained fingers, but also as a musician of the highest endowments. At the conclusion of his performance he was honored with the most prolonged ovation that has been bestowed upon any artist at the Symphony concerts this season.

The "Romeo and Juliet" overture by Tschaikowski more nearly approximates the symphonic poem than any other instrumental form. The composer offers no exposition of its poetic basis, and all one can glean from it is the reference on the title page, "After Shakespeare." The music, however, is replete with evidence that it was the great love-drama of the poet that inspired the composer, who has not been especially influenced, however, by its love episodes. Hence the work has more power than sentiment. One need not question long before deciding that two scenes of Shakespeare's drama are unmistakably embodied in the music, — namely, the combat between the Montagues and Capulets, and the fete at Juliet's father's house.

The temperamental affinity to the exciting and dramatic spirit of the work which charactized Mr. Nikisch's reading was very noticeable in its effect upon the orchestral performance. The fortes, pianos, crescendos, dimenuendos and the wide variety of nuances with which the score abounds were one and all excellently observed. The Praeludium, adagio and gavotte by Bach, arranged for orchestra by S. Bachrich from the composer's violin sonatas received the refined, scholarly and interesting treatment of a thoroughly loyal reading. The fourth symphony of Beethoven was finished in 1806. It lies between two greater ones, an expression of absolute sunshine and joviality, which came so rarely in the composer's life. It followed the "Ervica" after two years, and antedated the symphony in C minor, No. 5, two years. The symphony stands in great contrast to those that preceded it, not alone because its theme is less mighty than the "Ervica," but because of the new manner and constant surprises in style of its opus. Beethoven's versatility was extraordinary, scarcely ever does he repeat himself. Each of the nine symphonies differs from the other, and each introduction, allegro, andante, scherzo and finale is quite distinct from each corresponding movement of the other eight.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The eighth and last concert of the season by the Kneisel Quartet was given in Chickering Hall on Monday evening. The artistic feature of the occasion, in which the attention of the audience seemed centred, was the performance here for the first time of a new opus by E. A. MacDowell,—a composition for pianoforte, entitled Sonata Tragica, op. 45. The several divisions of the work include (I) a Largo Maestoso, and Allegro rivoluto; (II) Molto allegro vivace; (III) Largo con maesta; and (IV) Allegro vivace. A single hearing of this sonata would seem sufficient to enable even the most captious musician to pronounce it a master-work. It is distinguished throughout by a logical and scholarly development of a fundamental thought. The title, "Tragica," which the composer has given it, seems nothing less than exhaustive of its psychically rich contents. The sentiment is predominatingly objective and general, and in system, symmetry and regularity the technical design of the work is admirable. The sonata opens with a powerful, solemn and majestic largo, which is soon followed by an impassioned allegro. The initial theme of this movement, in G minor, is heroic in character, and the second theme appears not as a mere complement to it in the relative major key, but it is announced in D major. It is tranquil in spirit and suggestive throughout of a sorrowful submission to the inevitable. A more happy contrast between any two adjacent themes of a sonata movement can seldom be found. But the quieter sentiment referred to is not permitted throughout the movement, and as the second theme concludes the expression becomes more deeply agitated. The waves of passion sweep onward again, and become more and more irrepressible in a succession of harmonies most weird, and finally lead to the conventional reproduction of the first theme, which is admirably carried out to the end. The entire movement is masterly well rounded, and the distribution of tone shading is excellent.

The second movement is full of dramatic power; and seems as a real tone picture of manly earnest and intensely stirred passion. A deep devoutness is the prevailing characteristic of the third movement; and at the finale a noble, manly power bursts forth in full and majestic chords, the underlying thought of the movement being admirably in keeping with the fundamental idea of the work which throughout bears the stamp of originality and boldness. Both in its external proportions and inner meaning the sonata is a remarkably genuine and scholarly production.

The quartets performed at this concert were Haydn's in D major, op. 64, No. 5; and Schumann's in A major, op. 41, No. 3. In the performance both these works there was the characteristic finish, unanimous expressiveness, purity of execution and artistic mastery which are invariably accredited the Kneisel Quartet.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 2, 1893.

The Kneisel quartette is engaged for four concerts in Recital hall (seating five hundred people), at the World's Fair, on May 22, 23, 24 and 25. Among the organists invited to give concerts on the organ now being built for Festival hall are Mr. George E. Whiting and Mr. S. B. Whitney of Boston.

Philadelphia Music and Drama.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 1, 1893.

Comparatively few people have heard of the Countess Lolli, but all the musical world knows Mme. Scalchi. The latter name she got from her stepfather, of whom she speaks very affectionately. Mme. Scalchi's family name was Roda. She was born in Turin forty-eight years ago, and was educated at Bologna. Her husband, Count Alberto Lolli, a very distinguished-looking gentleman, accompanies her on her tour with the Nordica Concert Company. They have their own cook with them, and she prepares and serves their meals in their apartments. Mme. Scalchi objects very much to hotel dining-rooms, as she does not enjoy eating in the presence of a lot of people. The Count and Countess Lolli have one son, who is named for his father. The young man is now seventeen years old and is at school in Venice. Mme. Scalchi is very particular about her hours for taking food. On the days when she is to sing at a matinee she has a breakfast of rare beef and bread at ten o'clock and nothing more until six, when she again eats lightly. When she is to sing in the evening, she has her dinner a little after noon, and a supper after the performance.

* * *

She does not diet as most of the singers do, but she does not like to sing immediately after eating, and it was on account of this that her famous lawsuit with Henry E. Abbey occurred. She had not known that she was to sing at a matinee. Two hours before the performance the other contralto in the company sent word that she could not sing, and Mr. Abbey summoned Mme. Scalchi to take her place in "Le Prophete."

"I had just eaten a hearty meal," said Mme. Scalchi in telling me about it. "It was quite impossible for me to sing, and so I sent word to Mr. Abbey. I might sing one act, I said—possibly, two—but the whole opera I could not. I should have apoplexy."

Mr. Abbey, it seems, did not appreciate the validity of the singer's excuse. Count Lolli, by the way, does not use his title. "It is absurd to do so under the circumstances," he says. So he writes the name of himself and wife as "Mr. and Mrs. Luigi Alberti Lolli." Their home is in Turin and is named the Villino Sofia.

"It is a very simple home," the Count said to me recently. "We have a number of dogs and parrots."

"Yes," added Mme. Scalchi, "and those parrots talk very well."

"Can any of them sing?" I asked.

"Oh, yes, they sing just like me. They are all contraltos, every one."

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 2.

A notice of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unavoidably postponed until our next issue.

The last Kneisel Quartet concert of the season was given in Chickering Hall, on Monday evening, Mr. E. A. MacDowell, assisting. The programme was, Quartet, in D, op. 64, No. 5, Haydn; Sonata "Tragica," for piano-forte, MacDowell; Quartet, in A, op. 41, No. 3, Schumann. The lovely Haydn quartet was exquisitely read and played, and in a sympathetic spirit that was in every way delightful. Like unqualified praise may be bestowed on the interpretation and the performance of the noble Schumann work, the admirable organization bringing its final concert to a close with its most brilliant work of the season. Mr. MacDowell's Sonata made a profound impression on the critical audience present. It is a composition of great power, deep in sentiment, sincere in style and elevated in inspiration. It is not a work to be discussed in detail on a single hearing, but it is one whose worth makes itself instantly felt. It is conceived and developed in the extreme spirit of modern romanticism, but it is strict in form, clear in design, lucid in treatment and musicianly in all things. The opening movement, as it struck us, is the finest. It is pervaded by lofty dignity, profound emotion always kept within discreet control, and maintains throughout a noble passionateness. It second theme is one of rare poetic beauty, and its graceful melancholy is in admirable contrast with the sombre color of the principal motive. The second movement is not quite as interesting, and scarcely echoes the tragic note sounded by the first, but the slow movement is a wholly worthy companion of the first. It exhales woe, but it is a manly woe, whose sincerity is not for a moment in doubt, and whose intensity of feeling is never exaggerated. By the time it is over, however, the ear begins to weary of the triple rhythms that have prevailed in the work up to the close of this movement. A change is afforded in the fiery finale, the animation of which is sustained with immense vigor. It is less impressive than are the other portions of the work, though it has some magnificent moments. The sonata as a whole, however, is a splendid achievement, and merits a high place among the best contemporary works of its order. It is the effort of a composer of decided genius, and we believe that the better it is known the more will appreciation of it increase. It was brilliantly, artistically and impressively played by Mr. MacDowell, who had every reason to be gratified by the enthusiastic reception accorded his composition, and the hearty applause that rewarded his performance of it.

[131]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 1, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The one thing of great merit at the nineteenth Symphony concert was the magnificent performance of the "Tannhäuser" overture with which the evening began. Mr. Nikisch gave full freedom to his romantic and dramatic impulses, and yet he so guided them that they seemed to be the slaves of his will and the masters of the will of his players. Such a steadily crescent rendering we do not remember to have heard, Enthusiasm and power to portray it moved harmoniously together, so that when an absolute volume and sonority seemed to have been attained, there was yet in reserve an unexampled splendor of strength for the conclusion. The audience, in their familiarity with the work, felt and appreciated the triumph, and called the conductor forward three times with tempestuous applause. The rest of the programme was light and sweet, and even seemed thin and weak after the solidity, the domination and the concentration of the overture. Mr. Otto Roth had the second place for Raff's "La Fée d'Amour," which is a pretty, rambling, airy, inconsequential series of violin passages. These are not unshapely, but they do not signify much of anything; they might represent butterflies as well as fairies, and suggest love to be a very vagrant triviality. They require a fine, delicate and swift technique, of which Mr. Roth demonstrated his possession. His tone seemed slender, but the solo violin has to move constantly with flute figures, and the vast force of the Wagner violin passages was still in the ear. Then were presented three of the four "symphonic sketches" which make up "The Sea" of the young Belgian composer, Paul Gilson. They depict sunrise, the songs and dances of sailors, and evening twilight, the conclusion, a tempest, not being played. That they must coincide in some respects, with the musical ideas which have come to represent conventionally such subjects, may be taken for granted; but they go much beyond these, for they show originality in the use of presented means and the addition of new ones, a distinct melodic invention, independence of thought and a detail of workmanship as fine as that in the painting of a Meissonier or a Gaugengigl. The concert ended with Goldmark's saccharine but sympathetic "Rustic Wedding" symphony. The playing of the orchestra was altogether admirable throughout the evening, and the attention and applause of the audience proved that the programme gave unusual pleasure.

The unsatisfactory character of the programme-book was again demonstrated by the fact that only eight lines were given to "La Mer" and its composer—perhaps because the compiler of the "historical and descriptive notes" did not know where to find the interesting and necessary material which the musical editor of the Journal presented in abundance. Per contra, the book gave nearly eight pages to utterly irrelevant extracts from the writings of Berlioz, for which the compiler has a fondness which approaches close upon dotage, and two pages more to such shilly-shally, extracts from real or imaginary authors! as might have a proper hiding in a private scrap-book, but are an intrusion upon the space which should be devoted first to the legitimate purposes of the pamphlet and upon the time of the readers who receive such scanty measure of what the title-page promises them.

Tonight the symphony will be Beethoven's fourth, and the overture Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." Dvorak's attractive "Scherzo Capriccioso" will also be given by the orchestra, and Mr. Busoni will play Liszt's second pianofore concerto.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The last concert of the Kneisel season was given in Chickering Hall, on Monday evening, when the quartette played with the technical perfection and beautiful taste which are now expected from them as matters of course, Haydn's D-major quartette, opus 64, No. 5, and Schumann's in A-major, opus 41, No. 3. Between these Mr. E. A. MacDowell presented a work of his own, new to Boston—although it has been heard abroad, we believe—which he calls a "Tragic Sonata." That this young composer and pianist is a man of originality, individuality and forcefulness, has been said more than once in these columns, and this composition demonstrates as much once more. Yet it seems as if he had expressed his purpose almost completely in his first movement, and as if the other three were scarcely more than corollaries, derivatives from and accompaniments to, the principal proposition. In that first movement are light and life met, clouded and doomed by darkness and mystery. The contrast of themes, moods and states of being is grandly, powerfully and pathetically depicted, and the hearer needs no more to be convinced, so far as the eloquence of music can convince him, that the composer has seized the true symbols and used them masterfully. The other movements, although they contain ideas which are good and exhibit relationship to the thesis, and are skilfully and finely wrought out, do not enhance the listener's pleasure or deepen the more sombre impressions. It would perhaps have been as wise if Mr. MacDowell had contented himself with the first movement—as a complete entity, calling it plainly "Tragedy," if he so chose, and leaving it to stand or fall, to persuade or leave unmoved, alone.

The Kneisel Quartet will give four concerts in the World's Fair Recital Hall—seating five hundred people—on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, May 22, 23, 24 and 25. The following American concert-organists have been invited to give organ recitals: Samuel P. Warren, William C. Carl, Frank Taft, New York; George E. Whiting, S. B. Whitney, Boston; R. Huntington Woodman, Brooklyn; David D. Wood, Philadelphia; Samuel A. Baldwin, St. Paul; Clarence Eddy, Harrison M. Wild, Louis Falk, Walter E. Hall and Wilhelm Middelschulte of Chicago. The Pullman Military Band will give concerts during September and October.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 2, 1893.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The composers chosen for the twentieth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening were Tschaikowski, Liszt, Dvorak and Beethoven. The concert had as its chief attraction the performance of the concerto in A major, No. 2, by Franz Liszt. The soloist was Mr. Ferruccio Busoni. The concerto is the product of Liszt's best period. In it the old established concerto form is conspicuous by its absence. It thus antagonizes the musical conservator, but as an interesting type of Liszt's individuality and of that school of pianoforte music of which he was the pioneer, the concerto will always remain a masterpiece. The orchestral score of the work is richly endowed; the themes are impressively rhythmical as well as poetic and they are linked together with masterly power into a homogeneous whole of the profoundest interest. Mr. Busoni's performance of it was extraordinary. It was photographically clear and accurate in its loyalty to the concerto, while the depth of perception and truth of delieneation that constantly attended it could not have a more perfect medium for their natural expression than the artist's eminently well-rounded and unerring technique. The huge and fantastic outlines of the work, the bold modulations and quaintly marked rhythms, the subtle melodic turns and exuberant ornamentation were one and all presented with the strictest attention to detail, and yet with the utmost refinement and ease.

In brief Mr. Busoni was a virtuoso par excellence with the work. Its herculean difficulties were easily at his command. He played it not simply as a pianist with superbly trained fingers, but also as a musician of the highest endowments. At the conclusion of his performance he was honored with the most prolonged ovation that has been bestowed upon any artist at the Symphony concerts this season.

The "Romeo and Juliet" overture by Tschaikowski more nearly approximates the symphonic poem than any other instrumental form. The composer offers no exposition of its poetic basis, and all one can glean from it is the reference on the title page, "After Shakespeare." The music, however, is replete with evidence that it was the great love-drama of the poet that inspired the composer, who has not been especially influenced, however, by its love episodes. Hence the work has more power than sentiment. One need not question long before deciding that two scenes of Shakespeare's drama are unmistakably embodied in the music, — namely, the combat between the Montagues and Capulets, and the fete at Juliet's father's house.

The temperamental affinity to the exciting and dramatic spirit of the work which charactized Mr. Nikisch's reading was very noticeable in its effect upon the orchestral performance. The fortes, pianos, crescendos, dimenuendos and the wide variety of nuances with which the score abounds were one and all excellently observed. The Praeludium, adagio and gavotte by Bach, arranged for orchestra by S. Bachrich from the composer's violin sonatas received the refined, scholarly and interesting treatment of a thoroughly loyal reading. The fourth symphony of Beethoven was finished in 1806. It lies between two greater ones, an expression of absolute sunshine and joviality, which came so rarely in the composer's life. It followed the "Ervica" after two years, and antedated the symphony in C minor, No. 5, two years. The symphony stands in great contrast to those that preceded it, not alone because its theme is less mighty than the "Ervica," but because of the new manner and constant surprises in style of its opus. Beethoven's versatility was extraordinary, scarcely ever does he repeat himself. Each of the nine symphonies differs from the other, and each introduction, allegro, andante, scherzo and finale is quite distinct from each corresponding movement of the other eight.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The eighth and last concert of the season by the Kneisel Quartet was given in Chickering Hall on Monday evening. The artistic feature of the occasion, in which the attention of the audience seemed centred, was the performance here for the first time of a new opus by E. A. MacDowell,—a composition for pianoforte, entitled Sonata Tragica, op. 45. The several divisions of the work include (I) a Largo Maestoso, and Allegro rivoluto; (II) Molto allegro vivace; (III) Largo con maesta; and (IV) Allegro vivace. A single hearing of this sonata would seem sufficient to enable even the most captious musician to pronounce it a master-work. It is distinguished throughout by a logical and scholarly development of a fundamental thought. The title, "Tragica," which the composer has given it, seems nothing less than exhaustive of its psychically rich contents. The sentiment is predominatingly objective and general, and in system, symmetry and regularity the technical design of the work is admirable. The sonata opens with a powerful, solemn and majestic largo, which is soon followed by an impassioned allegro. The initial theme of this movement, in G minor, is heroic in character, and the second theme appears not as a mere complement to it in the relative major key, but it is announced in D major. It is tranquil in spirit and suggestive throughout of a sorrowful submission to the inevitable. A more happy contrast between any two adjacent themes of a sonata movement can seldom be found. But the quieter sentiment referred to is not permitted throughout the movement, and as the second theme concludes the expression becomes more deeply agitated. The waves of passion sweep onward again, and become more and more irrepressible in a succession of harmonies most weird, and finally lead to the conventional reproduction of the first theme, which is admirably carried out to the end. The entire movement is masterly well rounded, and the distribution of tone shading is excellent.

The second movement is full of dramatic power; and seems as a real tone picture of manly earnest and intensely stirred passion. A deep devoutness is the prevailing characteristic of the third movement; and at the finale a noble, manly power bursts forth in full and majestic chords, the underlying thought of the movement being admirably in keeping with the fundamental idea of the work which throughout bears the stamp of originality and boldness. Both in its external proportions and inner meaning the sonata is a remarkably genuine and scholarly production.

The quartets performed at this concert were Haydn's in D major, op. 64, No. 5; and Schumann's in A major, op. 41, No. 3. In the performance both these works there was the characteristic finish, unanimous expressiveness, purity of execution and artistic mastery which are invariably accredited the Kneisel Quartet.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 2, 1893.

The Kneisel quartette is engaged for four concerts in Recital hall (seating five hundred people), at the World's Fair, on May 22, 23, 24 and 25. Among the organists invited to give concerts on the organ now being built for Festival hall are Mr. George E. Whiting and Mr. S. B. Whitney of Boston.

Philadelphia Music and Drama

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 1, 1893.

Comparatively few people have heard of the Countess Lolli, but all the musical world knows Mme. Scalchi. The latter name she got from her stepfather, of whom she speaks very affectionately. Mme. Scalchi's family name was Roda. She was born in Turin forty-eight years ago, and was educated at Bologna. Her husband, Count Alberto Lolli, a very distinguished-looking gentleman, accompanies her on her tour with the Nordica Concert Company. They have their own cook with them, and she prepares and serves their meals in their apartments. Mme. Scalchi objects very much to hotel dining-rooms, as she does not enjoy eating in the presence of a lot of people. The Count and Countess Lolli have one son, who is named for his father. The young man is now seventeen years old and is at school in Venice. Mme. Scalchi is very particular about her hours for taking food. On the days when she is to sing at a matinee she has a breakfast of rare beef and bread at ten o'clock and nothing more until six, when she again eats lightly. When she is to sing in the evening, she has her dinner a little after noon, and a supper after the performance.

* * *

She does not diet as most of the singers do, but she does not like to sing immediately after eating, and it was on account of this that her famous lawsuit with Henry E. Abbey occurred. She had not known that she was to sing at a matinee. Two hours before the performance the other contralto in the company sent word that she could not sing, and Mr. Abbey summoned Mme. Scalchi to take her place in "Le Prophete."

"I had just eaten a hearty meal," said Mme. Scalchi in telling me about it. "It was quite impossible for me to sing, and so I sent word to Mr. Abbey. I might sing one act, I said—possibly, two—but the whole opera I could not. I should have apoplexy."

Mr. Abbey, it seems, did not appreciate the validity of the singer's excuse. Count Lolli, by the way, does not use his title. "It is absurd to do so under the circumstances," he says. So he writes the name of himself and wife as "Mr. and Mrs. Luigi Alberti Lolli." Their home is in Turin and is named the Villino Sofia.

"It is a very simple home," the Count said to me recently. "We have a number of dogs and parrots."

"Yes," added Mme. Scalchi, "and those parrots talk very well."

"Can any of them sing?" I asked.

"Oh, yes, they sing just like me. They are all contraltos, every one."

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 2.

A notice of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unavoidably postponed until our next issue.

The last Kneisel Quartet concert of the season was given in Chickering Hall, on Monday evening, Mr. E. A. MacDowell, assisting. The programme was, Quartet, in D, op. 64, No. 5, Haydn; Sonata "Tragica," for piano-forte, MacDowell; Quartet, in A, op. 41, No. 3, Schumann. The lovely Haydn quartet was exquisitely read and played, and in a sympathetic spirit that was in every way delightful. Like unqualified praise may be bestowed on the interpretation and the performance of the noble Schumann work, the admirable organization bringing its final concert to a close with its most brilliant work of the season. Mr. MacDowell's Sonata made a profound impression on the critical audience present. It is a composition of great power, deep in sentiment, sincere in style and elevated in inspiration. It is not a work to be discussed in detail on a single hearing, but it is one whose worth makes itself instantly felt. It is conceived and developed in the extreme spirit of modern romanticism, but it is strict in form, clear in design, lucid in treatment and musicianly in all things. The opening movement, as it struck us, is the finest. It is pervaded by lofty dignity, profound emotion always kept within discreet control, and maintains throughout a noble passionateness. It second theme is one of rare poetic beauty, and its graceful melancholy is in admirable contrast with the sombre color of the principal motive. The second movement is not quite as interesting, and scarcely echoes the tragic note sounded by the first, but the slow movement is a wholly worthy companion of the first. It exhales woe, but it is a manly woe, whose sincerity is not for a moment in doubt, and whose intensity of feeling is never exaggerated. By the time it is over, however, the ear begins to weary of the triple rhythms that have prevailed in the work up to the close of this movement. A change is afforded in the fiery finale, the animation of which is sustained with immense vigor. It is less impressive than are the other portions of the work, though it has some magnificent moments. The sonata as a whole, however, is a splendid achievement, and merits a high place among the best contemporary works of its order. It is the effort of a composer of decided genius, and we believe that the better it is known the more will appreciation of it increase. It was brilliantly, artistically and impressively played by Mr. MacDowell, who had every reason to be gratified by the enthusiastic reception accorded his composition, and the hearty applause that rewarded his performance of it.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

Blessings brighten as they take their flight; some of the recent overture readings in our symphony concerts have been remarkable, and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture was a most brilliant piece of work from beginning to end. Among the many musical thoughts that Shakespeare's play has inspired, ranging all the way from operas to symphonies, this great overture may be accorded a prominent place. It deals more with the feud of Montagues and Capulets than with the young pair, but Romeo is present on the English horn, and Juliet on the muted violins. To these instruments and to the pizzicati of the contrabasses and the fiery trumpet passages the chief praise must be given, but every part was well sustained and the performance was a pronounced success in the modern style.

Upon the heels of this came more spice in the shape of Liszt's piano concerto in A major. Liszt's concertos are not concertos in the sense in which Beethoven and Brahms have employed the term, and they depart altogether from the form which Mozart founded; they are free rhapsodies for the piano combined with orchestra and present, instead of any symmetrical shape, continuity and development. The concerto in E flat will ever be the more popular work of the two, but for all that this one in A major is immensely the greater music. De l'Audace, de l'Audace, et toujours de l'Audace might well be the motto of the work; but it has an audacity which compels admiration. It is not according to rule; then so much the worse for the rules. Never has the work had so perfect a presentation in Boston; the pianist, Feruccio Busoni, won a triumph which is all the more remarkable as coming from a Pakerewski-saturated public. The work seems to touch the boundaries of technique on every side, and the utmost lightness and rapidity in passagen and runs is there as well as the heaviest chord passages and the most dangerous skips. It may be sweepingly stated that the pianist met every exaction with absolute surety and entirely mastered every difficulty, so that technique properly became a means and not an end; one thought of the poetry of the work and not of its difficulty. The orchestra was inspired by the exaltation of the soloist and played with a perfect ensemble in the midst of most elastic caprice. After the finale it seemed as if the applause would never cease. At last the prophet received honor in his own country.

And now, suddenly, the orchestra renounced the world, the flesh, and the piccolo, and turned from modern agony to classic purity, from Tschaikowsky and Liszt to Bach and Beethoven. The change was perhaps a trifle too abrupt and neither the audience nor the musicians could at once adapt themselves to the new condition of things; the playing was not so perfect as in the preceding works. The Bach prelude seemed taken at too quick a pace, an impossible speed for the contrabasses, but the adagio was finely rendered on the first violins, and the gavotte was crisply and clearly given. If only our modern gavotte composers would study the shape which Bach always uses in this dance the musical repertoire would be the gainer; always beginning the quadruple rhythm on the third beat, he gains that light syncopation which is one of the charms of the form; the skipping style is always present in his chief theme, and if there be a musette as trio (here there was none) the flowing style is introduced as contrast. Short and incisive phrases, too, are always in order. How few of the modern Gavottes follow the above model!

It was delightful to find Bach applauded with as much heartiness as Tschaikowsky. The set of Bach pieces had been arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich, but not modernized or tampered with to any degree.

With Beethoven's fourth symphony the concert ended. While praising the reading of the second movement, the reviewer can take exception to the speed of the finale and its extreme caprice. This symphony bears a hornet sting in its tail, for the coda has a passage for the contrabasses that would be difficult even for violins; at the pace at which it was given it was bound to be blurred. Beethoven's fourth symphony bears capricious treatment better than any of the others of the nine, but one does not like to see too much individuality in a Beethoven performance in any case.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON JOURNAL.
MONDAY, APRIL 3, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet,".....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, A major.....Liszt
Præludium, adagio and gavotte, for string orchestra (arranged by Bachrich).....Bach
Symphony No. 4.....Beethoven

Mr. Busoni was the pianist, and he gave a remarkable performance of the fantastic concerto of Liszt. He appeared not only as a virtuoso of supreme excellence; he displayed refined taste and rare self-control. There was an ever-present appreciation of values; there was the keenest sense of the relation of the solo instrument to the orchestra. Conventional words of praise are here a mockery. Such a performance is an event in these days of musical sentimentalism, affectation, eccentricity and worship of personality; it puts the player in the very front rank of pianists.

The noble, passionate overture of Tschaikowsky gains in effect with each hearing. The objection has been urged against it that there is too much show of warring factions; but does not the prologue of the play itself lay stress on the ancient grudge, the new mutiny, civil blood making civil hands unclean? Without the riots in the streets of Verona, Romeo, having wedded his second sweetheart, would have grown old and fat and bald. There is hot love enough in this overture; for nothing can surpass the noble sensuousness of the chant of love, the chant of despairing, triumphant passion.

The other numbers are familiar to our concert-goers and do not call for comment.

The programme of the concert of next Saturday will be as follows: Dramatic overture (MSS.), Miss Lang; Scherzo capriccioso, op. 66, Dvorak; symphony, C minor, No. 9 (B. and H.), Haydn. Mr. Max Heinrich will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper of New England.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1893.

NIKISCH'S PLACE.

Will Herr Richter of London Accept It?

A RUMOR THAT HE WILL.

He Is Recognized as the Greatest Orchestral Leader in the World — Offered the Place Here Once Before.

On what should be the very best of authority the POST is informed that the next leader of the Symphony Orchestra will be no less a person than Herr Richter of London.

Of course, all the music-loving people of the city know that Mr. Nikisch is to retire the present season to take charge of an orchestra abroad, and of course they all regret this very much; but when they remember that Herr Richter is probably the greatest orchestral leader in the world, they will have cause to rejoice.

This is no disparagement to Mr. Nikisch or others who have cared for the Symphony, but is merely the sentiment of the best musical critics.

The work done by Herr Richter is well known in the world of music, and if the reported negotiations prove successful his coming to Boston will be the greatest thing yet done by Mr. Higginson for those who feel the Symphony is an institution Boston should be proud of.

Herr Richter will find a field here perhaps second to none in which he has ever worked; good material is not wanting, and with a leader recognized the world over as possibly the greatest, it is easy to contemplate what an impetus would be given to music in this city.

An effort was made last evening to see Mr. Higginson at his residence on Commonwealth avenue to get a more complete story of what is going on and what is contemplated in the near future, but he was away and could not be seen to verify the information received by the POST.

Herr Richter is now the leader of London's greatest orchestra, and it is thought that, as he has once before declined a similar offer, it may require a very generous inducement to bring him to Boston.

Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, who in the early winter made such a favorable impression by his artistic playing, was the soloist of the twentieth Symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening. The audience accorded him a most enthusiastic reception, and at the conclusion of his number he was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge the appreciation of his artistic work. Mr. Busoni selected Listz's Concerto in A Major, which received an interpretation that was masterly. He possesses an almost flawless technique and plays with that purity of style and flexibility of touch which has won him deserved renown. The orchestral numbers on the programme consisted of Tsachaikowsky's overture, "Romeo and Juliet," which was satisfactorily rendered. Bach's "Prelude Adagio and Gavotte," arranged for orchestra by Bachrich, gave the men an opportunity to do some excellent work, which received well-merited applause. Beethoven's beautiful fourth symphony brought the concert to a close. The soloist of the rehearsal and concert next week will be Mr. Max Heinrich.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 2, 1893.

Twentieth Symphony Programme.

Mr. Ferruccio Busoni was the soloist at the Symphony concert last evening, playing Liszt's concerto No. 2 in A major. The reception accorded the artist indicated the appreciation which concert patrons feel for this cultivated exponent of the divine art, who during the winter season has firmly established himself in the ranks of our foremost musicians.

The concerto has no title, and is probably a characteristic piece of brilliant composition by Liszt in which melody runs riot in ever-changing harmonies and instrumental variations. Mr. Busoni played superbly and without an attempt at theatric effects. His modesty of demeanor impresses his audience with the idea that the artist is thoroughly in love with his art for art's sake alone, and that he interprets the author conscientiously, honestly and with true artistic feeling.

Mr. Busoni's touch is musical and correct. His use of the pedals is judicious, and he preserves the balance of power without undue contrasts of light and shade. His execution is brilliant and very rapid, and the whimsical and fantastic concerto was given with a spirit and dash which aroused great enthusiasm. The performer was recalled at the close of the piece half a dozen times.

The orchestral numbers were Tschaikowsky's overture, "Romeo and Juliet," Bach's three movements for violin, arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich, and Beethoven's beautiful fourth symphony.

The love theme in the Tschaikowsky number was wonderfully well played, and the performance by the strings in Bach's composition was also a notable example of fine ensemble work by that contingent. Beethoven's symphony calls for high praise, the orchestra as a whole scoring the best results in the grand composition.

This week the programme for the rehearsal and concert will be solos by Mr. Max Heinrich, a dramatic overture for the first time by Margaret Ruthven Lang, Haydn's symphony in C minor, No. 9, and a scherzo by Antonin Dvorak.

The last of the Kneisel quartet concerts Monday night at Chickering Hall outrivalled all other attractions offered for that night in point of interest for the smart world. The hall was crowded, gallery and all, with a keenly appreciative company, which gave special approval to Mr. MacDowell's new "Tragic Sonata," played by the composer for the first time that night. In the brilliant audience were Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. Gardner, Mrs. Apthorp, Mrs. Fairchild and Miss Fairchild, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang and daughter, the Berthold Schlesingers, Dr. Hamilton Osgood and family with Mrs. Fiske Warren, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Edward Frothingham, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. J. S. Dwight, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot Pratt, Miss Elise Fay, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mrs. S. B. Field, Mrs. H. M. Ticknor, who had with her her guest, Miss Sara Newcomb, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Whiting, Mr. Faelten, Mr. Swornsbourne, Mr. Busoni and Mr. Whelpley.

Mr. and Mrs. Thornton K. Lothrop, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Miss Elsie Perkins, Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, who had with her the family's young pastor, Rev. Mr. Stebbins of Milton; Mrs. Herbert Sears, with her father, Mr. Bartlett; Mrs. Gardner, Mrs. Fairchild, Miss Sallie Fairchild, Mrs. Henry Howe, the Fenollosas, Mrs. Matthew Luce, the Schlesingers, Mr. Henry Wainwright, Mrs. James Jackson and the Lothrop Thorndikes were a few of the unusually large and brilliant audience at the Symphony rehearsal Thursday afternoon. Mr. Nikisch had a tumultuous greeting as he appeared to take his place on the stand for the first time since his decision to leave us was made public.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 92.
SUNDAY, APRIL 2, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Busoni.

"The Mountebanks," with Lillian Russell—"The Isle of Champagne" Relocated—Paderewski's Ovation Yesterday—Columbian Festival—The Hinrich Opera Company's Season.

At the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, the soloist was Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, the pianist whose recent series of recitals attracted so much attention.

Mr. Busoni chose for his appearance the concerto No. 2 in A major, by Liszt, which proved an excellent selection for the display of his abilities as a brilliant concert artist.

His masterly work throughout the concerto, his remarkably clear touch, technical proficiency and faultless accuracy, all combined to give the best results, and he held his own against the occasionally overwhelming volume of the orchestra with splendid effect.

He was made the object of quite an ovation as he concluded the concerto, and was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge the applause of the audience.

Director Nikisch took occasion to show the string players in the Bachrich arrangement of Bach's "Prelude, adagio and gavotte," and the men of this section of the band did some notably good work in their playing in this number of the programme, the final movement creating a marked impression upon the audience and winning a well merited recognition of the excellence of the string players.

The admirable "overture fantasy" by Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet," was given a most satisfactory interpretation at the beginning of the evening, and the fourth of the "immortal nine" symphonies brought the concert to an end, the reading of the several movements of Beethoven's work gaining Director Nikisch unstinted applause.

Mr. Max Heinrich will be the soloist next week, and the orchestra will play a new "dramatic overture" by Margaret Ruthven Lang, the scherzo capricciosa by Duorak, and Haydn's symphony in C minor, No. 9 (B. & H.).

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 3, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tschaikowsky: Overture—Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."
Liszt: Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in A major.
Bach: Præludium, Adagio and Gavotte, from the violin sonatas, arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60.
Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni was the pianist.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" grows in favor with every hearing. We have heard some musicians pronounce it, not only Tschaikowsky's greatest work, but one of the greatest compositions of modern times. There must be something wrong about us, for we fail to see it. Even among Tschaikowsky's own works, we should hesitate to rank it higher than the B-flat minor pianoforte concerto. It is a brilliant, dramatic composition, the rapid parts of which have at times a strong smack of Meyerbeer, and in other parts of which there is no little depth of real feeling shown. But we can see nothing in it that entitles it to be called really great; the famous second theme, about which so much talk is made, seems to us emotionally rather than purely melodically beautiful; and this very theme is so marred in our ears by that obstinately and tiresomely persistent accompanying counter-figure on the horns, that it is exceedingly hard for us to feel its full beauty. The work was splendidly played, and rapturously received. It is always a source of pleasure to hear anything by Bach; even transcriptions cannot lose all their charm. The three movements chosen by Bachrich for arrangement for string orchestra are fine examples of his style. But, in transferring them from violin solo to all the strings, the transcriber has not always done his work in the most effective way, and some of the passages where he has distributed the original violin part among two or three orchestral parts do not sound quite so well as they look on paper. Beethoven's ever-beautiful fourth symphony was excellently played, the orchestra doing especially fine work in the Adagio. We were glad, too, to find Mr. Nikisch take the Finale at somewhat less of a break-neck pace than some conductors do.

Mr. Busoni made an absolutely superb impression in the Liszt concerto. The work itself has always seemed to us exceedingly brilliant, with a sort of kaleidoscopic magic in its effectiveness. To this side of it Mr. Busoni did the fullest justice; but he also did much more and better; he is the first pianist we have yet heard play the work who has shown it to us as a coherently written and artistically balanced composition; he really makes musical sense out of it. How much musical brain power this task requires can best be appreciated by those who have attempted it themselves; still, those who can compare Mr. Busoni's triumphant success in performing it with the comparative failures of other pianists who have tried it here, can form at least some idea of it. Mr. Busoni's playing was marked by every fine quality; in a word, it was completely masterly. The audience showed that they knew a good thing when they heard it by the rapturous way in which they recalled the pianist again and again when his performance was over.

The next programme is: Margaret Ruthven Lang, dramatic overture in E minor, opus 12 (MS.); Dvorák, scherzo capriccioso, opus 66; Haydn, symphony in C minor (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 9.) Mr. Max Heinrich will sing arias which will be duly announced.

[132]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, April 5, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Single tickets, $1.25 each, now on sale at 170 Westminster St.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 95.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 5, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A New Leader to Be Imported for It from Foreign Parts.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 4, 1893. Ex-Representative Sherman Hoar was in town today, and called on Secretary Carlisle to present a question for the decision of that officer. Mr. Higginson wants to engage a new leader for the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the question was put to Mr. Carlisle whether a man of the attainments necessary to fit him for the post of leader of the orchestra would come under the exceptions to the alien contract labor law, and would be regarded as "a member of a recog ized profession." Mr. Carlisle will make a decision tomorrow that this new leader does come under the exceptions of the law. Mr. Hoar was careful not to disclose the name of the new leader, which is known in America only to himself and Mr. Higginson. The negotiations with the treasury department, however, show that the new man has been selected and that his musical attainments were of high enough order to allow him to rank as an "artist," and be an exception to the law.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 5, 1893.

Telephone - - - - 1253-18th.

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano, No. 2.....Liszt
Præludium, adagio and gavot.....Bach-Bachrich
Symphony No. 4.....Beethoven

Mr. Busoni was the pianist, and his performance was one of extraordinary merit. The technical difficulties were forgotten in the ease of the conqueror. There was a display of the keenest sense of values; the virtuoso was not obtrusive; he was one of the orchestra under the direction of a leader, and yet he made his presence felt by his self-restraint, as well as by his triumphant abandonment of the reins when occasion called for speed and brilliancy. It was indeed a performance of the very first rank, and it is not surprising that the applause of the audience was spontaneous, thundering and long continued. The noble overture of Tschaikowsky was nobly played.

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, April 2, 1893.

THE last concert by the Kneisel Quartet this season was given the 27th ult. in Chickering Hall. The program was as follows:

Quartet, D major, op. 64, No. 5.....Haydn
Sonata Tragica, for piano (first time).....MacDowell
Quartet, A major, op. 41, No. 3.....Schumann

The pianist was Mr. E. A. MacDowell.

The sonata provoked loud discussion. Some think it bombastic, affected and an inducer to gaping. Others think it a strong, original and exciting work. All agree that it was well played.

There are amateurs here who were in the habit of regarding Mr. MacDowell as a stray colt, kicking up his heels and sniffing the air as he pranced at will in the unfenced region of romanticism. They were willing to admit the grace and the strength of the animal, but they would fain pen him, that they might examine him knowingly, stroke him, thump him, look down his throat for a proper understanding and appreciation of him. Now that Mr. MacDowell has written a sonata, these amateurs stand close to the pen, the colt is within reach. For they know the district school rules for the construction of a fugue, even if do not exactly understand the worth of the material in the builder's hands. According to these amateurs, this "Sonata Tragica" is the finest of the works of this composer; but the highest praise they give is this: "Now, this music is intelligible." Why is it "intelligible" to them? Because forsooth they are prepared for certain things, they expect certain things, and by the laws of the sonata their expectations are gratified, yes, glutted. The obedience of the composer is then a tribute to their knowledge. But when Mr. MacDowell indulges himself in a symphonic poem or a piece of pure fantasy, these same amateurs are left to their own imagination for enjoyment. They feel the ground slipping away, or it is as though they had one foot in the shivering sands and already felt helpless.

Mr. MacDowell calls his sonata "tragic." He gives no text. The hearer may weave his own thoughts as he pleases. The first movement seems to me the most noble and beautiful of the four. The themes are strongly contrasted, and the second motive is a thing of exquisite fancy, very characteristic of the composer. The close of this movement is effective. The third movement seems to me large and impressive, full of Elizabethan tragedy. But I declare frankly that I now see no reason for the existence of the second and the fourth movements. I do not deny the possibility that there are strong passages therein, but to me the movements are without suggestion. Repeated hearings would very likely change these unfavorable impressions, but after one performance the only remembrance is a mighty straining of the composer with little result.

* * *

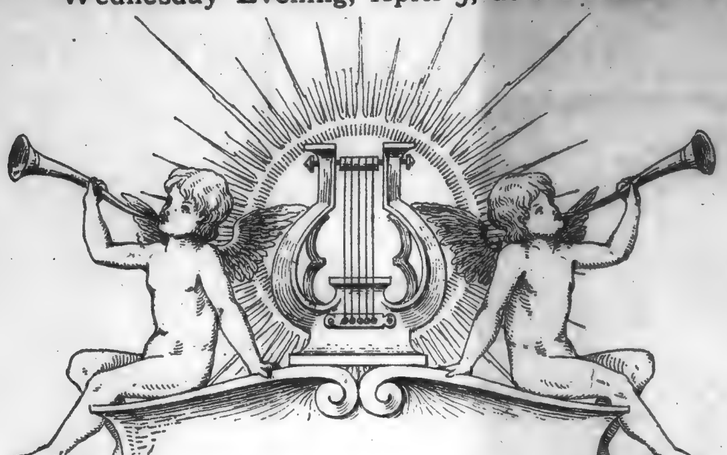
It is perhaps needless to say that the playing of the quartet was admirable from begining to end. Mr. Kneisel had intended to bring out the new work of d'Albert in manuscript, but he has been far from well, and he had not the strength for the necessary rehearsals.

* * *

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,

Wednesday Evening, April 5, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Single tickets, $1.25 each, now on sale at 170 Westminster St.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 95.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 5, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A New Leader to Be Imported for It from Foreign Parts.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 4, 1893. Ex-Representative Sherman Hoar was in town today, and called on Secretary Carlisle to present a question for the decision of that officer. Mr. Higginson wants to engage a new leader for the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the question was put to Mr. Carlisle whether a man of the attainments necessary to fit him for the post of leader of the orchestra would come under the exceptions to the alien contract labor law, and would be regarded as "a member of a recog ized profession." Mr. Carlisle will make a decision tomorrow that this new leader does come under the exceptions of the law. Mr. Hoar was careful not to disclose the name of the new leader, which is known in America only to himself and Mr. Higginson. The negotiations with the treasury department, however, show that the new man has been selected and that his musical attainments were of high enough order to allow him to rank as an "artist," and be an exception to the law.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 5, 1893.

Telephone - - - - 1253-18th.

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano, No. 2.....Liszt
Praeludium, adagio and gavot.....Bach-Bachrich
Symphony No. 4.....Beethoven

Mr. Busoni was the pianist, and his performance was one of extraordinary merit. The technical difficulties were forgotten in the ease of the conqueror. There was a display of the keenest sense of values; the virtuoso was not obtrusive; he was one of the orchestra under the direction of a leader, and yet he made his presence felt by his self-restraint, as well as by his triumphant abandonment of the reins when occasion called for speed and brilliancy. It was indeed a performance of the very first rank, and it is not surprising that the applause of the audience was spontaneous, thundering and long continued. The noble overture of Tschaikowsky was nobly played.

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, April 2, 1893.

THE last concert by the Kneisel Quartet this season was given the 27th ult. in Chickering Hall. The program was as follows:

Quartet, D major, op. 64, No. 5.....Haydn
Sonata Tragica, for piano (first time).....MacDowell
Quartet, A major, op. 41, No. 3.....Schumann

The pianist was Mr. E. A. MacDowell.

The sonata provoked loud discussion. Some think it bombastic, affected and an inducer to gaping. Others say it a strong, original and exciting work. All agree was well played.

There are amateurs here who were in the habit of regarding Mr. MacDowell as a stray colt, kicking up his heels and sniffing the air as he pranced at will in the unfenced region of romanticism. They were willing to admit the grace and the strength of the animal, but they would fain pen him that they might examine him knowingly, stroke him, thump him, look down his throat for a proper understanding and appreciation of him. Now that Mr. MacDowell has written a sonata, these amateurs stand close to the pen, the colt is within reach. For they know the district school rules for the construction of a fugue, even if do not exactly understand the worth of the material in the builder's hands. According to these amateurs, this "Sonata Tragica" is the finest of the works of this composer; but the highest praise they give is this: "Now, this music is intelligible." Why is it "intelligible" to them? Because forsooth they are prepared for certain things, they expect certain things, and by the laws of the sonata their expectations are gratified, yes, glutted. The obedience of the composer is then a tribute to their knowledge. But when Mr. MacDowell indulges himself in a symphonic poem or a piece of pure fantasy, these same amateurs are left to their own imagination for enjoyment. They feel the ground slipping away, or it is as though they had one foot in the shivering sands and already felt helpless.

Mr. MacDowell calls his sonata "tragic." He gives no text. The hearer may weave his own thoughts as he pleases. The first movement seems to me the most noble and beautiful of the four. The themes are strongly contrasted, and the second motive is a thing of exquisite fancy, very characteristic of the composer. The close of this movement is effective. The third movement seems to me large and impressive, full of Elizabethan tragedy. But I declare frankly that I now see no reason for the existence of the second and the fourth movements. I do not deny the possibility that there are strong passages therein, but to me the movements are without suggestion. Repeated hearings would very likely change these unfavorable impressions, but after one performance the only remembrance is a mighty straining of the composer with little result.

* * *

It is perhaps needless to say that the playing of the quartet was admirable from begining to end. Mr. Kneisel had intended to bring out the new work of d'Albert in manuscript, but he has been far from well, and he had not the strength for the necessary rehearsals.

* * *

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, APRIL 6, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Farewell Appearance of Conductor Nikisch.—A Large Audience and a Fine Programme.

The musical season may be said to have come to an end, so far as its most important events are concerned, with the closing concerts of the Arion Club on Tuesday evening and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. A larger audience than usual gathered to hear the final programme of the favorite instrumental organization, and were rewarded by the presentation of selections of more than ordinary interest, which were one and all most excellently played.

The longest and most important work on the programme came first—Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 5, in E-minor. This symphony is a strong and brilliant composition, thoroughly characteristic of the style of its author, who is now regarded as the most able and original musician Russia has yet produced. Although when examined in detail certain elements of weakness can be found, they are slight in comparison with the barbaric splendor and virile power which pulsates throughout the whole work. Tschaikowsky's orchestration is at times obscure—a trait which seems to be common to composers of the Russian school; he introduces discords with needless frequency, and does not always trouble himself to resolve them; a tendency to over-elaboration is sometimes to be found; but in spite of these things, it can be said of him—as has been said of Handel—that when he strikes it is with the blow of a sledge-hammer. The man has something definite to say, and says it, and his mastery of form, control of orchestral resource, and power of musical invention are undeniable. The waltz, which in this work takes the place of the usual scherzo, is both original and beautiful in character, while the stormy and brilliant finale leads up to an exhilarating close. Free use is made of Slavic themes, or at least themes of a Slavic character, which helps to make a coloring of the sort that distinguishes the music of the Russian school. The work was played with superb dash and abandon, together with the wonderful attention to every matter of detail that marks the renditions of this great orchestra.

The second instrumental number was Svendsen's "Zorahayda," a legend for orchestra in three movements, the motive of the work being taken from Washington Irving's "Legend of the Rose of the Alhambra." The music is of a fanciful and weird character, as befits the tale of the ghostly Zorahayda. Some peculiar effects are to be noted in the pizzicato of muted violins and other unusual devices, while delicous bits of melody are tossed about between the horns, flutes and strings. The legend offered a strong contrast to the symphony which preceded it, but was delightful in its way, and was very warmly received by the audience. The other numbers for the orchestra comprised Handel's familiar "Largo," the solo of which was beautifully given by Mr. Kneisel, and Wagner's equally familiar "Tannhauser" overture, which has never been better played in Providence than it was last night.

The vocalist of the evening was Mr. Max Heinrich, who sang, with the orchestra, a recitative and aria from Spohr's "Faust," and with piano two songs of Schubert. Fresh from his dramatic triumph of the evening before, the "Faust" aria offered him an entirely different field in which to show his artistic ability. It was a fine exhibition of cantabile singing and facile execution, and showed that Mr. Heinrich is an artist not only of recognized ability, but of versatility as well. His rendering of Schubert's great song, "Die Allmacht," was also an exceedingly fine piece of vocalism. Encores were attempted after each of his appearances, but the fiat had evidently gone forth that none were to be given.

An additional interest was felt in this concert, as it was the last time Mr. Arthur Nikisch will appear here as the conductor of the Symphony orchestra. Mr. Nikisch has become a great favorite in this city, and deservedly so, and his departure from this country, now near at hand, will be as keenly regretted in musical circles here as in Boston. It will be a difficult task to find a man capable of filling his place. There are few conductors living who can do that, but a capable leader for the orchestra will of course be secured, and unless something unforeseen should happen, we shall again be delighted next season by the usual course of concerts. Such, at least, was the promise upon last night's programme.

THE EVENING BULLETIN.

THURSDAY, APRIL 6, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Farewell Appearance of Conductor Nikisch.—A Large Audience and a Fine Programme.

The musical season may be said to have come to an end, so far as its most important events are concerned, with the closing concerts of the Arion Club on Tuesday evening and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. A larger audience than usual gathered to hear the final programme of the favorite instrumental organization, and were rewarded by the presentation of selections of more than ordinary interest, which were one and all most excellently played.

The longest and most important work on the programme came first—Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 5, in E-minor. This symphony is a strong and brilliant composition, thoroughly characteristic of the style of its author, who is now regarded as the most able and original musician Russia has yet produced. Although when examined in detail certain elements of weakness can be found, they are slight in comparison with the barbaric splendor and virile power which pulsates throughout the whole work. Tschaikowsky's orchestration is at times obscure—a trait which seems to be common to composers of the Russian school; he introduces discords with needless frequency, and does not always trouble himself to resolve them; a tendency to over-elaboration is sometimes to be found; but in spite of these things, it can be said of him—as has been said of Handel—that when he strikes it is with the blow of a sledge-hammer. The man has something definite to say, and says it, and his mastery of form, control of orchestral resource, and power of musical invention are undeniable. The waltz, which in this work takes the place of the usual scherzo, is both original and beautiful in character, while the stormy and brilliant finale leads up to an exhilarating close. Free use is made of Slavic themes, or at least themes of a Slavic character, which helps to make a coloring of the sort that distinguishes the music of the Russian school. The work was played with superb dash and abandon, together with the wonderful attention to every matter of detail that marks the renditions of this great orchestra.

The second instrumental number was Svendsen's "Zorahayda," a legend for orchestra in three movements, the motive of the work being taken from Washington Irving's "Legend of the Rose of the Alhambra." The music is of a fanciful and weird character, as befits the tale of the ghostly Zorahayda. Some peculiar effects are to be noted in the pizzicato of muted violins and other unusual devices, while delicous bits of melody are tossed about between the horns, flutes and strings. The legend offered a strong contrast to the symphony which preceded it, but was delightful in its way, and was very warmly received by the audience. The other numbers for the orchestra comprised Handel's familiar "Largo," the solo of which was beautifully given by Mr. Kneisel, and Wagner's equally familiar "Tannhauser" overture, which has never been better played in Providence than it was last night.

The vocalist of the evening was Mr. Max Heinrich, who sang, with the orchestra, a recitative and aria from Spohr's "Faust," and with piano two songs of Schubert. Fresh from his dramatic triumph of the evening before, the "Faust" aria offered him an entirely different field in which to show his artistic ability. It was a fine exhibition of cantabile singing and facile execution, and showed that Mr. Heinrich is an artist not only of recognized ability, but of versatility as well. His rendering of Schubert's great song, "Die Allmacht," was also an exceedingly fine piece of vocalism. Encores were attempted after each of his appearances, but the fiat had evidently gone forth that none were to be given.

An additional interest was felt in this concert, as it was the last time Mr. Arthur Nikisch will appear here as the conductor of the Symphony orchestra. Mr. Nikisch has become a great favorite in this city, and deservedly so, and his departure from this country, now near at hand, will be as keenly regretted in musical circles here as in Boston. It will be a difficult task to find a man capable of filling his place. There are few conductors living who can do that, but a capable leader for the orchestra will of course be secured, and unless something unforeseen should happen, we shall again be delighted next season by the usual course of concerts. Such, at least, was the promise upon last night's programme.

THE PROVIDENCE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

BUSINESS OFFICE, 7 Weybosset St.

Telephone 1877-2.

EDITORIAL ROOMS, 25 South Water St.

Telephone 1877-3.

THURSDAY, APRIL 6, 1893.

MR. NIKISCH'S FAREWELL

The last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season was given at Infantry hall last night to an audience that was remarkable for size, considering the interest in the election returns that were being shown on the various bulletin boards about the town. The occasion was of unusual interest on account of its being the last appearance of Mr. Nikisch in this city previous to his departure for his new post at the capital of his native land.

The program was not up to the standard of the season, so far as its popular character was concerned, but was artistically of the usual high order. Its chief feature was the Tschaikowsky symphony, No. 5, which was performed in a manner to do honor to the Russian composer. Of the popular merits of this work there is likely to be a difference of opinion, as it does not appeal to the people in a manner to win for it the enthusiastic approval of an audience composed at least in part of non experts. It is extremely modern, and seems also mechanical and an elaboration of themes already too much worked, without the infusion of sufficient originality.

Another orchestral number was Svendsen's "Zorahayda," a legend for the orchestra founded upon an incident in the legend of the "Rose of the Alhambra" by Washington Irving. Like the original, the musical legend is weird and solemn, and abounds in the supernatural sentiment of the tale. The remaining orchestral number was the closing piece, the Wagner "Tannhaeuser" overture, which has been given here enough to familiarize everybody with it, and render comment or criticism unnecessary.

The soloist was Max Heinrich, who sung at the Arion concert the night before, and has already become a favorite with Providence audiences. He sang a recitative and aria from Spohr's "Faust," and two Schubert songs. Franz Kneisel also had a delicate little solo in Handel's "Largo." He was given a very warm reception, as he always is in this city, and he always deserves it.

The next season's series of concerts was announced in the program last night, but who would conduct them was not hinted. Providence is very much interested in this question, as well as all the other cities that have enjoyed the concerts of the best orchestra in America, and have watched the progress made by Mr. Nikisch in his work of training it in his peculiar ideas of musical refinement.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A New Leader to be Imported for it From Foreign Parts.

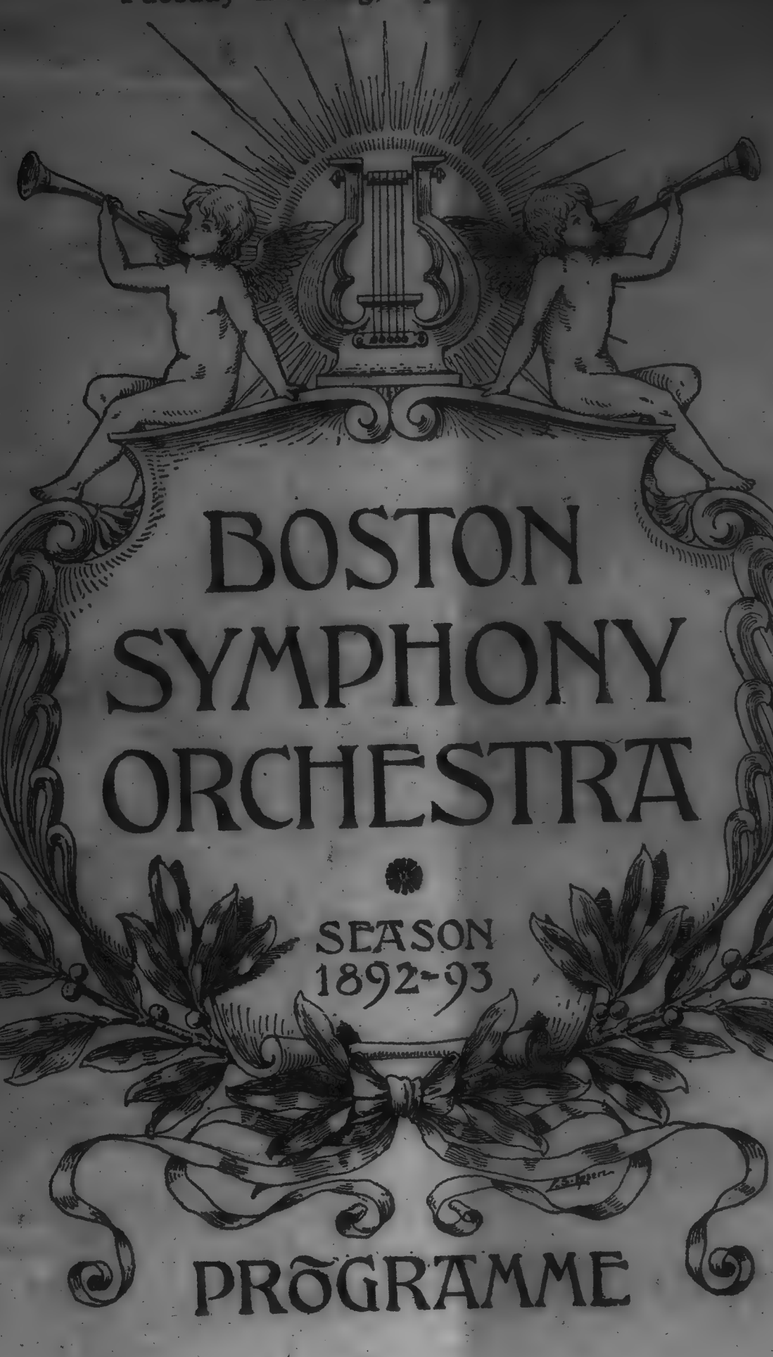
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 5.—Ex-Representative Sherman Hoar was in town today, and called on Secretary Carlisle to present a question for the decision of that officer. Mr. Higginson wants to engage a new leader for the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the question was put to Mr. Carlisle whether a man of the attainments necessary to fit him for the post of leader of the orchestra would come under the exceptions to the alien contract labor law, and would be regarded as "a member of a recognized profession."

Mr. Carlisle will make a decision tomorrow that this new leader does come under the exceptions of the laws. Mr. Hoar was careful not to disclose the name of the new leader, which is known in America only to himself and Mr. Higgonson. The negotiations with the treasury department, however, show that the new man has been selected and that his musical attainments were of high enough order to allow him to rank as an "artist," and be an exception to the law.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

NEW CADET ARMORY, SALEM,

Tuesday Evening, April 11, at 7.45.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

To the members of the Boston Symphony Chorus; - - - -

An unavoidable change in the arrangements for the closing concerts of the season makes it impossible to give the choral numbers which have been prepared for performance on April 14 and 15.

For this reason, the rehearsals of Monday and Wednesday next and the concerts of Friday and Saturday, as originally planned, have been given up.

I beg to express to you my grateful appreciation of your kind artistic support during the season, and extend to you my heartfelt thanks.

Yours sincerely,

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Music Hall,
Boston, April 8, 1893.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

At the Symphony concert last evening the first selection, entitled a "Dramatic Overture," was composed by Margaret Ruthven Lang. The composer is well known in this city as the daughter of Mr. B. J. Lang, the esteamed director of the Apollo and Cecilia Clubs, and a musician who for many years has been prominently identified with the musical growth of our city. Miss Lang was born in Boston, Nov. 27, 1867 At an early age she displayed a decided talent for musical composition, yet her serious study of this important branch of her art was later on in life under the direction of Gluth in Munich. Her earliest study of music began with the pianoforte under the instruction of one of her father's pupils. Miss Lang afterwards received personal instruction from her father, and later began the study of the violin under Schmidt. Her subsequent instructors were Drechsler, Abel and Gluth in Munich and recently Mr. E. A. MacDowell, of Boston.

The overture while evidently the work of a skillful and refined musician is nevertheless a very characteristic sample of kapelmeistermusik. There is a certain benign composure and nobility of intant in the writing of it, that is all too conspicuous, but the work appears to contain but a single well defined theme which is very reminiscent of the oriental music in Verdi's Aida. This theme is so tautologically treated and so frequently repeated that the prevailing impression created by it is one of monotony and languor. Perhaps the most praiseworthy feature of the overture is in the orchestral coloring of its harmonic development which is altogether excellent

Mr. Max Heinrich in his rendering of the aria by Spohr was characteristically successful in making melody what it ought to be, namely, not an exhibition of acquired skill, but a pliant and sympathetic language for the expression of thought and feeling. The enchanting cantatile and an absolutely pure and unaffected style that characterised Mr. Heinrich's vocal delivery were beyond comparison with any singing that has been heard from any vocalist who has appeared in the present series of symphony concerts. Later in the evening Mr. Heinrich sang with exquisite expressiveness two songs by Schubert, "Gruffe ans dem Tartarus" and "Die Allmacht." The artist was heartily complimented by the audience and four times recalled after his singing of the songs by Schubert.

The performance of a Haydn symphony (No. 9 Breitkopf and Hartet edition) last evening was a no less rare than welcome variation of the general character of the Boston symphony concert programmes this season. Haydn's symphonies sparkle with an indescribable true, pure and genial sentiment which can be found no where else. Salamon, the English concert agent and musician, who instigated Haydn's two visits to England, and for whom Haydn wrote twelve symphonies, classifies the C minor symphony (No. 9, B. & H.) as No. 5. It is a composition in which we find the master's ever sunny nature pouring out the whole wealth of its emotional life; and yet it is not without an abundance of the quaintness and formality of the fastidious old master, for it is said that Haydn, like Buffon, always thought it necessary, before he sat down to his work, to have his hair put in the same nice order as though he were going out, and that on all such occasions he dressed himself with a very pronounced degree of magnificence. It is even related that Haydn felt that he could not summon a single idea for either a sonata or symphony unless he had on the diamond ring that Frederic II sent him. But father Haydn was by no means an exception to great masters in general in entertaining certain whims as quite indispensable to the development of their art work. Tartini before composing, invariably read one of the soft sonnets from a classic poet. Charles Rink could not develop a composition until he had first written at the head of it the words "Mit Gott." The billious Alfieri, whose paintings of tyrants has exhibited all the stern bitterness which preys upon them, was passionately fond of listening to music before he sat down to work. Haydn was not only particular as to the style of dress with which he approached his art, but the paper on which he wrote had to be of the finest and whitest possible; and unlike Beethoven, he wrote with so much neatness and care that the most artistic copyist could not have surpassed him in the symmetry and cleverness of his notation. Such little heads and slender tails had his notes that he (Haydn) used quite appropriately to call them flie's legs. The analysis of G. P. Upton in writing of Haydn's ninth symphony calls attention to the bold steps at the opening and the march-like rhythm of the third and fourth bars, although subdued in a dynamic sense and never used in a military mood, gives the movement a certain crispness which is effectively counteracted by the second theme. The andante cantabile in E flat in its idylic theme betrays the composer of "with verdure clad," and fairly outrivals that well-known melody in sweetness. The working out of this theme in a number of variations is, perhaps, the most antique feature of the work. The minuet is one of the favorite concert numbers and is an ingenious as well as a characteristic specimen of grace and refined humor, combined with the always quaint stateliness of the old-fashioned dance. The trio varies from the previous ones in that the movement of eight notes appears staccato throughout and is given to the 'cellos, the violins only marking the rhythm. The finale vivace is very rich in the treatment of counterpoint and fugue; but the leading theme at once tells us that we have nothing to fear in the way of dry or pendantic music. The general treatment reminds one of Haydn's earlier symphonies, although much of it shows the influence of Mozart.

The Symphony was somewhat coarsely and unsympathetically read by Mr. Nikisch, and the orchestral performance corresponded. Perhaps the worthiest orchestral performances in the concert was of the two movements from the Moszkowski, Suite No. 1. With this work the artistic sympathy that prevailed among the performing musicians was very noticeable, and the composer's music throughout was very beautifullyand refinedly interpreted. The voluptuous alluring effects of the perpetnum mobile movement tickled the audience immensely and the performance of it was loudly applauded. The concert eneed with the "Scherzo Capriccio," opus 66, by Dvorak, which was delightfully played.

[135]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

NEW CADET ARMORY, ... SALEM,

Tuesday Evening, April 11, at 7.45.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

To the members of the Boston Symphony Chorus; = = = =

An unavoidable change in the arrangements for the closing concerts of the season makes it impossible to give the choral numbers which have been prepared for performance on April 14 and 15.

For this reason, the rehearsals of Monday and Wednesday next and the concerts of Friday and Saturday, as originally planned, have been given up.

I beg to express to you my grateful appreciation of your kind artistic support during the season, and extend to you my heartfelt thanks.

Yours sincerely,

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Music Hall,

Boston, April 8, 1893.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

At the Symphony concert last evening the first selection, entitled a "Dramatic Overture," was composed by Margaret Ruthven Lang. The composer is well known in this city as the daughter of Mr. B. J. Lang, the esteamed director of the Apollo and Cecilia Clubs, and a musician who for many years has been prominently identified with the musical growth of our city. Miss Lang was born in Boston, Nov. 27, 1867 At an early age she displayed a decided talent for musical composition, yet her serious study of this important branch of her art was later on in life under the direction of Gluth in Munich. Her earliest study of music began with the pianoforte under the instruction of one of her father's pupils. Miss Lang afterwards received personal instruction from her father, and later began the study of the violin under Schmidt. Her subsequent instructors were Drechsler, Abel and Gluth in Munich and recently Mr. E. A. MacDowell, of Boston.

The overture while evidently the work of a skillful and refined musician is nevertheless a very characteristic sample of kapelmeistermusik. There is a certain benign composure and nobility of intant in the writing of it, that is all too conspicuous, but the work appears to contain but a single well defined theme which is very reminiscent of the oriental music in Verdi's Aida. This theme is so tautologically treated and so frequently repeated that the prevailing impression created by it is one of monotony and languor. Perhaps the most praiseworthy feature of the overture is in the orchestral coloring of its harmonic development which is altogether excellent

Mr. Max Heinrich in his rendering of the aria by Spohr was characteristically successful in making melody what it ought to be, namely, not an exhibition of acquired skill, but a pliant and sympathetic language for the expression of thought and feeling. The enchanting cantatile and an absolutely pure and unaffected style that characterised Mr. Heinrich's vocal delivery were beyond comparison with any singing that has been heard from any vocalist who has appeared in the present series of symphony concerts. Later in the evening Mr. Heinrich sang with exquisite expressiveness two songs by Schubert, "Gruffe ans dem Tartarus" and "Die Allmacht." The artist was heartily complimented by the audience and four times recalled after his singing of the songs by Schubert.

The performance of a Haydn symphony (No. 9 Breitkopf and Hartet edition) last evening was a no less rare than welcome variation of the general character of the Boston symphony concert programmes this season. Haydn's symphonies sparkle with an indescribable true, pure and genial sentiment which can be found no where else. Salamon, the English concert agent and musician, who instigated Haydn's two visits to England, and for whom Haydn wrote twelve symphonies, classifies the C minor symphony (No. 9, B. & H.) as No. 5. It is a composition in which we find the master's ever sunny nature pouring out the whole wealth of its emotional life; and yet it is not without an abundance of the quaintness and formality of the fastidious old master, for it is said that Haydn, like Buffon, always thought it necessary, before he sat down to his work, to have his hair put in the same nice order as though he were going out, and that on all such occasions he dressed himself with a very pronounced degree of magnificence. It is even related that Haydn felt that he could not summon a single idea for either a sonata or symphony unless he had on the diamond ring that Frederic II sent him. But father Haydn was by no means an exception to great masters in general in entertaining certain whims as quite indispensable to the development of their art work. Tartini before composing, invariably read one of the soft sonnets from a classic poet. Charles Rink could not develop a composition until he had first written at the head of it the words "Mit Gott." The billious Alfieri, whose paintings of tyrants has exhibited all the stern bitterness which preys upon them, was passionately fond of listening to music before he sat down to work. Haydn was not only particular as to the style of dress with which he approached his art, but the paper on which he wrote had to be of the finest and whitest possible; and unlike Beethoven, he wrote with so much neatness and care that the most artistic copyist could not have surpassed him in the symmetry and cleverness of his notation. Such little heads and slender tails had his notes that he (Haydn) used quite appropriately to call them flie's legs. The analysis of G. P. Upton in writing of Haydn's ninth symphony calls attention to the bold steps at the opening and the march-like rhythm of the third and fourth bars, although subdued in a dynamic sense and never used in a military mood, gives the movement a certain crispness which is effectively counteracted by the second theme. The andante cantabile in E flat in its idyllic theme betrays the composer of "with verdure clad," and fairly outrivals that well-known melody in sweetness. The working out of this theme in a number of variations is, perhaps, the most antique feature of the work. The minuet is one of the favorite concert numbers and is an ingenious as well as a characteristic specimen of grace and refined humor, combined with the always quaint stateliness of the old-fashioned dance. The trio varies from the previous ones in that the movement of eight notes appears staccato throughout and is given to the 'cellos, the violins only marking the rhythm. The finale vivace is very rich in the treatment of counterpoint and fugue; but the leading theme at once tells us that we have nothing to fear in the way of dry or pendantic music. The general treatment reminds one of Haydn's earlier symphonies, although much of it shows the influence of Mozart.

The Symphony was somewhat coarsely and unsympathetically read by Mr. Nikisch, and the orchestral performance corresponded. Perhaps the worthiest orchestral performances in the concert was of the two movements from the Moszkowski, Suite No. 1. With this work the artistic sympathy that prevailed among the performing musicians was very noticeable, and the composer's music throughout was very beautifully and refinedly interpreted. The voluptuous alluring effects of the perpetnum mobile movement tickled the audience immensely and the performance of it was loudly applauded. The concert eneed with the "Scherzo Capriccio," opus 66, by Dvorak, which was delightfully played.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 9.

Anent the Symphony Orchestra Conductor.

Nothing is publicly known, as yet, regarding the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The unexpected secession of the present conductor, has caused some perplexity in finding a successor at a moment's notice. Many rumors have gone abroad regarding the cause of Mr. Nikisch's resignation. Among them is one that the music critics of Boston had made the position irksome to him, by reason of their unfavorable attitude toward his eccentricities as a conductor, and that he could bear it no longer. This of course, is absurd, for he has proclaimed that he has no time to read criticisms, that he is ignorant of what they say of him, and consequently cannot be either pained or pleased by them. As we understand it, Mr. Nikisch's contract had one year to run when the offer of the position at Buda Pesth came to him after it had been declined by Mr. Anton Seidl. While hesitating whether to accept it or not, it is said that he looked forward to a renewal of his contract as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for another term of five years. The prospect of such an arrangement not being encouraging, he closed with the proposition from Buda Pesth, and as it was imperative on him to begin his duties there next season, he felt obliged to depart without filling out the remaining year of his contract here. How true or how false this may be, we have no means of knowing, and we only give the report for what it is worth. One thing, however, is certain, and that is that the adverse criticisms in nowise inspired his action. All things considered, the departure of Mr. Nikisch is not to be greatly deplored. Charming as he may be as a man, talented as he may be as a musician, he has been, from the very beginning, sadly out of place as the director of the Symphony Orchestra. That body has steadily degenerated since it came under his control, and another year would have inevitably seen its still further fall from the efficiency that characterized it when it first came into his charge. He is essentially an opera conductor, and, not being eclectic in style, he impressed an operatic color on every work that he interpreted. This, together with an evident laxity in discipline, or a lack of knowledge how to drill and to keep a symphony orchestra up to a high standard of efficiency, made his efforts far from satisfactory, from the very outset. During his first season the fine condition in which the orchestra was left by his predecessor was still unimpaired, and he reaped the advantage of it, despite his innovating readings. From that time to the present, the splendid body of artists, that he found so thoroughly disciplined, has lost almost every quality that made it the equal of the best orchestras in Europe. The players remain, prepared to regain their earlier perfection, under favorable circumstances, but their work is far from what it was. The conductor has always been, too, much en evidence. He seemed to be more concerned with himself than with the music he caused to be played; the composer was pushed into the background in order that the conductor might become prominent; the artistic was made to give way to the purely personal; Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart, Schumann, Schubert were all subjected to the same process, and their individualities were suppressed that the individuality of the conductor might take their place. In other words, the composers, and orchestra, were secondary, and the conductor was first. This was all wrong. It reversed the proper order of things, and, instead of elevating the musical taste of the public, it simply elevated the conductor. We entertain no feelings of animosity toward Mr. Nikisch personally; but we are, and have been from the first first, averse to his peculiar methods of utilizing his position for his own special glorification; and we frankly confess that we glad, in the cause of art, that he is going. We trust that the next conductor may not be chosen from the ranks of the unknown, as Mr. Nikisch was. The head of such an orchestra should be an experienced leader, one who can enforce the respect of his musicians by indisputable knowledge of his art, and win their confidence from the beginning by his manifest fitness to be appointed over them. Such a body of artists as those which form the Symphony Orchestra soon takes the measure of a conductor, and if it finds him in any way lacking in skill and experience, loses interest in and esteem for him. We have now had three German conductors at these concerts; and our musical tastes have been thoroughly Germanized in consequence. Would it not be wise, now, to try some eminent French conductor by way of bringing back matters to a fair level of eclecticism in taste?

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Dramatic Overture (MS.), by Margaret Ruthven Lang, (first time); Recitative and aria, for tenor, from "Faust," by Spohr; Symphony C-minor, No. 9 (B. & H.), Haydn; "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" and "Die Allmacht," Schubert; Andante and Vivace from Suite No. 1, in F, Tschaikowsky; Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66, Dvorak. The soloist was Mr. Max Heinrich, The novelty of the concert was Miss Lang's overture. It was notable as the first purely orchestral work by a native woman composer, that has been performed here. Of the composition itself there is not much to be said that is pleasant in the saying. It is creditable as the result of a laudable ambition to essay an important work, and it may be pronounced a promising first attempt; but it is scarcely of a worth to warrant its performance, unless, indeed, to afford the composer an opportunity to hear it, and to profit by the experience. In the first place, it is hardly an overture, as the term is generally understood, and it is not dramatic in any sense. It has more the character of an orchestral fantasie. Nothing is clearly defined, nothing is completed. It is one long effort to say something, without any very clear idea of what is to be said. The general effect is spasmodic and fragmentary; and the work does not hang well together. The orchestration is vigorous, but is without richness or character. It has strong color here and there, but is never closely knit, and is often confusingly foggy. The pervading fault of the work, however, is that its meaning is not made apparent. It seems to wander on without any objective point, and, despite its length, is over before it has been made quite clear that it has really begun. In other words, it has all the faults of youth without any of its spontaneity and artless exuberance of fancy and of imagination. It is earnest in aim, and never sinks to commonplace, but is unmistakably "made music." As an evidence of its composer's serious study and its application, it is very commendable; but it is immature, and should not have been submitted to public criticisms. It is not gratifying to be compelled to write thus discouragingly of the work of a young composer, but no good is to be accomplished by glossing over the truth, and we are sure that it is wiser and kinder to point out the shortcomings of the composition than to indulge in insincerity and to damn it with faint praise. The audience received it in a very kind spirit, and applauded heartily. An effort was made to call the composer forward, but it was unsuccessful. Mr. Heinrich sang the archaic Spohr aria in a wholly artistic manner. He was not wholly happy in rendering its more ornate passages, but he was evidently under a cloud, and was not at his best. His fine artistic intelligence and his musicianship, however were always apparent, and he fairly won the two cordial recalls that rewarded his efforts. In the Schubert songs he was wholly successful and sang them magnificently and with noble dramatic effect; again winning two recalls. The Haydn Symphony was well read and sympathetically played. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; Concerto for violin, D-minor, Brahms; Symphonic Tone Poem, Busoni, (first time); Overture "Oberon," Weber. The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 10, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday began with a "dramatic overture" by Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang. It is the reviewer's task to state that this work was not up to the level of these concerts. Miss Lang has won some deserved successes at the Apollo Club concerts in the field of chorus composition, and has written some graceful bits of instrumental music which have achieved the dignity of publication, but it is a long stride from this to orchestral work in a large form, and to make the first public attempt in a concert course which is supposed to present the finest music that the world affords, to enter a programme which presented selections by Haydn, Dvorak and Moszkowski, was little less than rash. One may pay tribute to an evident tact in the matter of orchestral coloring that holds forth good promise for the future, but it may be at once added that these concerts are not supposed to be devoted to the presentation of incipient greatness. As the work was entitled a "dramatic overture," one need not quarrel with the fact that its form was very vague, but the dramatic element was not powerful enough to sustain the interest, nothing was carried to a logical conclusion, much was spasmodic, and at times the whole case could only be diagnosed as orchestral hysteria. It is not true encouragement of young genius to allow tasks to be undertaken before adequate strength is attained; great reputation acquired too soon is ever the heaviest of burdens, and it was not the friendliest act in the world to allow entrance to the symphony programmes to a young composer (who has done good work, and will do more,) before she was equipped for the task.

Of all the numerous Fausts Spohr's is the weakest. The libretto becomes a parody when placed beside that of Goethe, and the formal platitudes of the composer portray a love story that is worthy of the sentimental Kotzebue. Mr. Max Heinrich sang the aria "Der Hoelle Selbst," from this work, with much surety in the modulations, and with good shading but in the roulades there was a degree of over-accentuation present which somewhat marred the effect. The best of Mr. Heinrich's work was done in the two Schubert songs which came later in the programme; here Mr. Nickisch accompanied very finely, and the singer gave a degree of dramatic expression that won every auditor. Three recalls followed the conclusion of "Die Allmacht," but, in accordance with the old traditions of usage at these concerts, no encore was given.

The Haydn symphony (No. 9, Breitkopf & Haertel) was well played; the first movement had more virility given to it than is often the case. The andante seemed rather a periwigged specimen of the formal Haydn; its shape is not unlike the slow movement of Beethoven's fifth symphony, being a set of variations with episodes interspersed, but what a difference in treatment! And yet one of the reviewers in Beethoven's lifetime said "Mr. Beethoven cannot, and never could, properly vary a theme. If he desires to achieve anything in this direction, let him study the models of Haydn."

The trio of the minuet consisted of a cello solo, which Mr. Schulz played so finely that the audience would not be satisfied until he had bowed his acknowledgments from his seat in the orchestra. The finale of the symphony was one of those rollicking, rather inconsequential affairs which were the regulation endings of the symphony before Beethoven gave a deeper meaning to the last movement. The influence of the gigue, which ended the suite (from which the cyclical form of the symphony came) is plainly apparent in such movements.

But the great success of the programme lay in the last two selections. Here modern passion and caprice came on the tapis and Mr. Nikisch was entirely in his element. The theme and variations from Moszkowski's suite in F major, is one of the most fluent bits of orchestral writing that has been recently heard; it is not deep, it is not soul-stirring, but within its own graceful domain it is perfection. Such a work serves admirably to display the technique of the orchestra in detail, since the different departments of the organizations pass, as it were, in review before the auditor. In this parade the following points of excellence were apparent: The violins did superb work in the second and sixth variations and in the finale, the pizzicato effects of the seventh were exquisitely done, and the caprice of the fifth variation was caught up with perfect ensemble by the entire orchestra. The flute playing of the fourth variation could have been better, as it was rather spasmodic and the breathing was not so well managed as we have come to expect from this player. In the Moto Perpetuo which ended this selection, the first violins proved that they are artists every one; no orchestra in the world could have done this number more perfectly.

The concert ended with Dvorak's scherzo capriccioso, which was as brilliant as anything that has been done in these concerts for years. It seemed to exactly suit Mr. Nikisch's mood, and the sparks flew in the exciting way from one of the wildest compositions that the repertoire contains. Amid all its wildness and caprice the ensemble was not once irregular, which is saying very much for both director and orchestra.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, APRIL 10, 1893.

The Twenty-first Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert was as follows:

Dramatic Overture (manuscript)—first time, Margaret R. Lang

Recitative and aria, "Faust" ..... Spohr

Symphony, C minor, No. 9 (B. and H.) ..... Haydn

Songs with piano—

"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" } ..... Schubert

"Die Allmacht" }

Two movements from Suite No. 1, F major, op. 39, Moszkowski

Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66 ..... Dvorak

Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

***

The phrase Place aux dames should be without meaning on the concert stage.

The conductor of an orchestra should judge of the fitness of a composition proposed for performance without consideration of the sex of the composer.

Sex is here an accident.

A symphony is not good because the young and talented composer has suffered acutely from indigestion. A badly written song is still bad, even if the author sold newspapers at the age of six. The sufferings or the joys of the individual may color the composition and give it individuality, but its musical worth is not accurately determined by mere mention of sickness or health, poverty or riches, religious belief or sex.

A concert devoted to "the education of popular taste" should not be turned into a class room exercise for the purpose of testing compositions of students for the discovery of merit and the correction of faults.

Nor should Music Hall be turned into a hothouse for the purpose of forcing talent.

It is the duty of a conductor to put gallantry in his pocket and examine carefully the score, even when the work is presented by a blushing maiden, a matron of reserve or a toothless crone.

***

These observations of a general nature may be applied in part to the case of Miss Lang, who has in the past given undeniable proofs of her possession of a musical nature. She has shown in certain songs with pianoforte accompaniment a pretty knack of melody, and her compositions have been often characterized by refinement and grace. But there is a mighty difference between a song and a "dramatic overture" for orchestra.

***

In the present instance Miss Lang has little to say, although she seeks many means of expression. Her themes are neither of marked originality nor of musical importance. The working-out is not so much working-out as working-after something. There is no apparent definite purpose, or the purpose is frittered away in the search after effects. As an overture, the piece is amorphous. Dramatic, to be sure, is a comparative term, but in the common acceptation of the word, there is not one dramatic stroke in the whole work, nor is there a climax. As a fantastic tone poem, it is vague. Miss Lang finds at her disposal the orchestral paint box, and she colors her themes with this instrumental tablet and with that one; thus she gains, occasionally, a piquant effect, a pleasing passage, but the whole lacks coherency and is diffuse.

In a word, this composition might well please the eye of a prudent and skilled teacher. He might look kindly at the pupil and say: "This is good; this shows promise; you are making progress. Now put it away and we will review our exercises in the strict style." He would not be satisfied with "the spirit of the form" or "the sympathy with the form." He would demand the thing itself and not its impalpable atmosphere.

The overture was applauded and there was a vain effort made to call the composer forward.

***

Mr. Heinrich's number with orchestra was the air from Spohr's "Faust," the air with the recitative that opens with these mellifluous words: "Der Hoelle selbst will ich Segen entringen." Spohr wrote the part of Faust for a baritone, and yet in the opera the hero is obliged once to take a low E flat, and on another occasion he trills on a low G. In the air chosen by Mr. Heinrich there are old-fashioned and meaningless ornamental passages, and the air, as a whole, is neither dramatic nor interesting. Although the singer often showed admirable control of the breath, and although he sang with intelligence, he did not appear to full advantage; for in pure cantabile of merely sensuous beauty and in ornamentation Mr. Heinrich is never as successful as in music of strongly marked dramatic character. He is powerful in the conception, and the carrying out of the diabolical, the terrible, the grotesque; he rides at ease in the storm of passion; he can be dignified in a priestly role; he rises with the intensity of an occasion. It is not surprising then that he was eminently successful in the songs by Schubert, or that he was recalled again and again after his impassioned delivery of them.

***

The orchestral numbers gave the audience much pleasure. A Haydn Symphony is always welcome, and the brilliant numbers of Moszkowski and Dvorak show the favorable side of modern instrumentation. The incidental solos contributed by Mr. Schulz and Mr. Molé were warmly applauded.

***

The programme of the next concert, the fifteenth, will be as follows: Schumann, overture, "Manfred;" Brahms, concerto for violin, D major; Busoni, symphonic tone poem (manuscript), first time; Weber, overture, "Oberon."

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 10, 1893.

Great interest was manifested in the opening number on the programme of the twenty-first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday evening in Music Hall, it being a manuscript composition of Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang, styled a "Dramatic Overture," and given for the first time. It begins without a preliminary introduction and the musical developing of the themes partakes somewhat of the character of the writings of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, though the characteristic veins of both Beethoven and Wagner are noticed in the instrumentation. The modern treatment, however, produces an original dramatic effect, and is concise and beautifully harmonized. The strong evidence of Miss Lang's command of orchestral combination gives great promise for the future work of this young composer. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Max Heinrich, who was heard to good andvantage in Spohr's recitative and aria "Faust" and in Schubert numbers, to which Mr. Nikisch played the piano accompaniment. He showed marked artistic ability, which received the well-merited applause of the audience. Haydn's Symphony in C minor was particularly enjoyable and given brilliant rendering. The programme closed with two movements Moritz Morzkowski and a "Scherzo Capriccioso" by Antoine Dvorak. For the next concert on April 15, Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

[illegible]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR

VOL. XCIII., NO. 99.

SUNDAY, APRIL 9, 1893.

Last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall, brought forward a notable composition by Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang, styled a "dramatic overture," and the work proved to be most interesting. It is planned upon a scale of grand proportion, calling for the full complement of instruments in the modern orchestra, and both in its themes and their treatment show Miss Lang to have been a thorough and conscientious student of orchestral composition.

Her earlier contribution to the concert programmes of the day, in the form of songs and ballads, have justified bright anticipations of her success in larger works, and these were realized in a great degree in the overture heard last evening. She has followed good models, and wisely avoided sensational effects, her themes show marked individuality, and in their development many evidences are given of an extended study of orchestral combination. That a greater freedom in writing is desirable is only natural, but in this work there are so many evidences of marked ability in the command of orchestral forms that a hearing of Miss Lang's future contributions in this branch of composition will be awaited with much interest.

Mr. Max Heinrich, the baritone singer, was the soloist, and he gave splendid satisfaction, as usual. His skill as a vocalist was displayed to fine advantage in his selections, and the thoroughly artistic delivery of Spohr's recitative and aria from "Faust," "Der Hoelle-selbst-will-ich-Segen Entringen" and the songs, with piano, Schubert's "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" and "Die Allmacht" gave pleasure to all who listened. He is a singer who commands the applause of the most critical. His audience last evening showed their hearty appreciation of his artistic merits.

Director Nikisch brought the evening to a brilliant end by the performance of two movements from Noszkowski's suite No. 1, in F major, op. 39, and Dvorak, Scherzo Capriccios, op. 66, while a most enjoyable interpretation of Haydn's symphony in C minor No. 9 made the central attraction of the programme.

Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist next Saturday evening, and the programme will consist of Schumann's overture, "Manfred"; Brahms' concerto for violin, in D major; F. B. Busoni's "Symphonic Tone Poem" (manuscript), first time, and Weber's overture, "Oberon."

The Boston symphony had the largest audience that ever greeted it in Providence on Wednesday evening, when Nikisch bade farewell. His stand was decorated with Easter lilies and green, and even Mr. Comee wore a white flower in his buttonhole. The audience was both sympathetic and enthusiastic, and warmly applauded Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Heinrich and the orchestra.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 9, 1893.

Symphony Concert.

Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang's new dramatic overture was given for the first time at the Symphony last week, the fine composition by our talented townswoman proving to be of great merit. In the beginning two themes are developed, one sombre and of an antique character, the other passionate and modern in treatment, each played against the other and producing a dramatic effect original but melodic.

The working out is concise and beautifully harmonized, and the return to the first part is gradual and regular, without harsh cadences or Wagnerian style of orchestration.

The young composer has treated the stronger instruments of the orchestra very effectively, utilizing them for special themes in several instances, which gives a marked tonal color and contrast to the gentler fortissimo passages.

The work received a most flattering reception, and Mr. Nikisch's orchestra gave a delightful interpretation of the number.

Mr. Max Heinrich was the solo singer, and his work, as usual, was thoroughly enjoyable. A recitative and aria from Spohr's "Faust" was sung with notable expression and dramatic fire, and in the Schubert numbers, in which Mr. Heinrich played his own accompaniments, the accomplished artist again illustrated his wonderful dual ability as a player and singer.

Haydn's ninth symphony received adequate treatment, the performance of the 'cellosist in the trio being specially noteworthy. The brilliant finale was also extremely well played.

Two movements from Moszkowski's suite No. 1, were capitally given as a whole. The many difficult variations for the different instruments were as a rule smoothly played, and the "perpetual motion" finale seemed to present but few stumbling blocks to the orchestra.

Dvorak's scherzo capriccioso was given with delightful dash and brilliancy.

The programme for this week will be as follows: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; concerto for violin, in D major, Brahms; symphonic tone poem (manuscript), first time, F. B. Busoni; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

[136]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 9.

Anent the Symphony Orchestra Conductor.

Nothing is publicly known, as yet, regarding the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The unexpected secession of the present conductor, has caused some perplexity in finding a successor at a moment's notice. Many rumors have gone abroad regarding the cause of Mr. Nikisch's resignation. Among them is one that the music critics of Boston had made the position irksome to him, by reason of their unfavorable attitude toward his eccentricities as a conductor, and that he could bear it no longer. This of course, is absurd, for he has proclaimed that he has no time to read criticisms, that he is ignorant of what they say of him, and consequently cannot be either pained or pleased by them. As we understand it, Mr. Nikisch's contract had one year to run when the offer of the position at Buda Pesth came to him after it had been declined by Mr. Anton Seidl. While hesitating whether to accept it or not, it is said that he looked forward to a renewal of his contract as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for another term of five years. The prospect of such an arrangement not being encouraging, he closed with the proposition from Buda Pesth, and as it was imperative on him to begin his duties there next season, he felt obliged to depart without filling out the remaining year of his contract here. How true or how false this may be, we have no means of knowing, and we only give the report for what it is worth. One thing, however, is certain, and that is that the adverse criticisms in nowise inspired his action. All things considered, the departure of Mr. Nikisch is not to be greatly deplored. Charming as he may be as a man, talented as he may be as a musician, he has been, from the very beginning, sadly out of place as the director of the Symphony Orchestra. That body has steadily degenerated since it came under his control, and another year would have inevitably seen its still further fall from the efficiency that characterized it when it first came into his charge. He is essentially an opera conductor, and, not being eclectic in style, he impressed an operatic color on every work that he interpreted. This, together with an evident laxity in discipline, or a lack of knowledge how to drill and to keep a symphony orchestra up to a high standard of efficiency, made his efforts far from satisfactory, from the very outset. During his first season the fine condition in which the orchestra was left by his predecessor was still unimpaired, and he reaped the advantage of it, despite his innovating readings. From that time to the present, the splendid body of artists, that he found so thoroughly disciplined, has lost almost every quality that made it the equal of the best orchestras in Europe. The players remain, prepared to regain their earlier perfection, under favorable circumstances, but their work is far from what it was. The conductor has always been, too, much en evidence. He seemed to be more concerned with himself than with the music he caused to be played; the composer was pushed into the background in order that the conductor might become prominent; the artistic was made to give way to the purely personal; Haydn, Beethoven, Mozazt, Schumann, Schubert were all subjected to the same process, and their individualities were suppressed that the individuality of the conductor might take their place. In other words, the composers, and orchestra, were secondary, and the conductor was first. This was all wrong. It reversed the proper order of things, and, instead of elevating the musical taste of the public, it simply elevated the conductor. We entertain no feelings of animosity toward Mr. Nikisch personally; but we are, and have been from the first first, averse to his peculiar methods of utilizing his position for his own special glorification; and we frankly confess that we glad, in the cause of art, that he is going. We trust that the next conductor may not be chosen from the ranks of the unknown, as Mr. Nikisch was. The head of such an orchestra should be an experienced leader, one who can enforce the respect of his musicians by indisputable knowledge of his art, and win their confidence from the beginning by his manifest fitness to be appointed over them. Such a body of artists as those which form the Symphony Orchestra soon takes the measure of a conductor, and if it finds him in any way lacking in skill and experience, loses interest in and esteem for him. We have now had three German conductors at these concerts; and our musical tastes have been thoroughly Germanized in consequence. Would it not be wise, now, to try some eminent French conductor by way of bringing back matters to a fair level of eclecticism in taste?

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Dramatic Overture (MS.), by Margaret Ruthven Lang, (first time); Recitative and aria, for tenor, from "Faust," by Spohr; Symphony C-minor, No. 9 (B. & H.), Haydn; "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" and "Die Allmacht," Schubert; Andante and Vivace from Suite No. 1, in F, Tschaikowsky; Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66, Dvorak. The soloist was Mr. Max Heinrich, The novelty of the concert was Miss Lang's overture. It was notable as the first purely orchestral work by a native woman composer, that has been performed here. Of the composition itself there is not much to be said that is pleasant in the saying. It is creditable as the result of a laudable ambition to essay an important work, and it may be pronounced a promising first attempt; but it is scarcely of a worth to warrant its performance, unless, indeed, to afford the composer an opportunity to hear it, and to profit by the experience. In the first place, it is hardly an overture, as the term is generally understood, and it is not dramatic in any sense. It has more the character of an orchestral fantasie. Nothing is clearly defined, nothing is completed. It is one long effort to say something, without any very clear idea of what is to be said. The general effect is spasmodic and fragmentary; and the work does not hang well together. The orchestration is vigorous, but is without richness or character. It has strong color here and there, but is never closely knit, and is often confusingly foggy. The pervading fault of the work, however, is that its meaning is not made apparent. It seems to wander on without any objective point, and, despite its length, is over before it has been made quite clear that it has really begun. In other words, it has all the faults of youth without any of its spontaneity and artless exuberance of fancy and of imagination. It is earnest in aim, and never sinks to commonplace, but is unmistakably "made music." As an evidence of its composer's serious study and its application, it is very commendable; but it is immature, and should not have been submitted to public criticisms. It is not gratifying to be compelled to write thus discouragingly of the work of a young composer, but no good is to be accomplished by glossing over the truth, and we are sure that it is wiser and kinder to point out the shortcomings of the composition than to indulge in insincerity and to damn it with faint praise. The audience received it in a very kind spirit, and applauded heartily. An effort was made to call the composer forward, but it was unsuccessful. Mr. Heinrich sang the archaic Spohr aria in a wholly artistic manner. He was not wholly happy in rendering its more ornate passages, but he was evidently under a cloud, and was not at his best. His fine artistic intelligence and his musicianship, however were always apparent, and he fairly won the two cordial recalls that rewarded his efforts. In the Schubert songs he was wholly successful and sang them magnificently and with noble dramatic effect; again winning two recalls. The Haydn Symphony was well read and sympathetically played. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; Concerto for violin, D-minor, Brahms; Symphonic Tone Poem, Busoni, (first time); Overture "Oberon," Weber. The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 10, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday began with a "dramatic overture" by Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang. It is the reviewer's task to state that this work was not up to the level of these concerts. Miss Lang has won some deserved successes at the Apollo Club concerts in the field of chorus composition, and has written some graceful bits of instrumental music which have achieved the dignity of publication, but it is a long stride from this to orchestral work in a large form, and to make the first public attempt in a concert course which is supposed to present the finest music that the world affords, to enter a programme which presented selections by Haydn, Dvorak and Moszkowski, was little less than rash. One may pay tribute to an evident tact in the matter of orchestral coloring that holds forth good promise for the future, but it may be at once added that these concerts are not supposed to be devoted to the presentation of incipient greatness. As the work was entitled a "dramatic overture," one need not quarrel with the fact that its form was very vague, but the dramatic element was not powerful enough to sustain the interest, nothing was carried to a logical conclusion, much was spasmodic, and at times the whole case could only be diagnosed as orchestral hysteria. It is not true encouragement of young genius to allow tasks to be undertaken before adequate strength is attained; great reputation acquired too soon is ever the heaviest of burdens, and it was not the friendliest act in the world to allow entrance to the symphony programmes to a young composer (who has done good work, and will do more,) before she was equipped for the task.

Of all the numerous Fausts Spohr's is the weakest. The libretto becomes a parody when placed beside that of Goethe, and the formal platitudes of the composer portray a love story that is worthy of the sentimental Kotzebue. Mr. Max Heinrich sang the aria "Der Hoelle Selbst," from this work, with much surety in the modulations, and with good shadin but in the roulades there was a degree of over-accentuation present which somewhat marred the effect. The best of Mr. Heinrich's work was done in the two Schubert songs which came later in the programme; here Mr. Nickisch accompanied very finely, and the singer gave a degree of dramatic expression that won every auditor. Three recalls followed the conclusion of "Die Allmacht," but, in accordance with the old traditions of usage at these concerts, no encore was given.

The Haydn symphony (No. 9, Breitkopf & Haertel) was well played; the first movement had more virility given to it than is often the case. The andante seemed rather a periwigged specimen of the formal Haydn; its shape is not unlike the slow movement of Beethoven's fifth symphony, being a set of variations with episodes interspersed, but what a difference in treatment! And yet one of the reviewers in Beethoven's lifetime said "Mr. Beethoven cannot, and never could, properly vary a theme. If he desires to achieve anything in this direction, let him study the models of Haydn."

The trio of the minuet consisted of a cello solo, which Mr. Schulz played so finely that the audience would not be satisfied until he had bowed his acknowledgments from his seat in the orchestra. The finale of the symphony was one of those rollicking, rather inconsequential affairs which were the regulation endings of the symphony before Beethoven gave a deeper meaning to the last movement. The influence of the gigue, which ended the suite (from which the cyclical form of the symphony came) is plainly apparent in such movements.

But the great success of the programme lay in the last two selections. Here modern passion and caprice came on the tapis and Mr. Nikisch was entirely in his element. The theme and variations from Moszkowski's suite in F major, is one of the most fluent bits of orchestral writing that has been recently heard; it is not deep, it is not soul-stirring, but within its own graceful domain it is perfection. Such a work serves admirably to display the technique of the orchestra in detail, since the different departments of the organizations pass, as it were, in review before the auditor. In this parade the following points of excellence were apparent: The violins did superb work in the second and sixth variations and in the finale, the pizzicato effects of the seventh were exquisitely done, and the caprice of the fifth variation was caught up with perfect ensemble by the entire orchestra. The flute playing of the fourth variation could have been better, as it was rather spasmodic and the breathing was not so well managed as we have come to expect from this player. In the Moto Perpetuo which ended this selection, the first violins proved that they are artists every one; no orchestra in the world could have done this number more perfectly.

The concert ended with Dvorak's scherzo capriccioso, which was as brilliant as anything that has been done in these concerts for years. It seemed to exactly suit Mr. Nikisch's mood, and the sparks flew in the exciting way from one of the wildest compositions that the repertoire contains. Amid all its wildness and caprice the ensemble was not once irregular, which is saying very much for both director and orchestra.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, APRIL 10, 1893.

The Twenty-first Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert was as follows:

Dramatic Overture (manuscript)—first time, Margaret R. Lang
Recitative and aria, "Faust".....Spohr
Symphony, C minor, No. 9 (B. and H.).....Haydn
Songs with piano—
"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" } .....Schubert
"Die Allmacht" }
Two movements from Suite No. 1, F major, op. 39, Moszkowski
Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66.....Dvorak
Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

***

The phrase Place aux dames should be without meaning on the concert stage.

The conductor of an orchestra should judge of the fitness of a composition proposed for performance without consideration of the sex of the composer.

Sex is here an accident.

A symphony is not good because the young and talented composer has suffered acutely from indigestion. A badly written song is still bad, even if the author sold newspapers at the age of six. The sufferings or the joys of the individual may color the composition and give it individuality, but its musical worth is not accurately determined by mere mention of sickness or health, poverty or riches, religious belief or sex.

A concert devoted to "the education of popular taste" should not be turned into a class room exercise for the purpose of testing compositions of students for the discovery of merit and the correction of faults.

Nor should Music Hall be turned into a hothouse for the purpose of forcing talent.

It is the duty of a conductor to put gallantry in his pocket and examine carefully the score, even when the work is presented by a blushing maiden, a matron of reserve or a toothless crone.

***

These observations of a general nature may be applied in part to the case of Miss Lang, who has in the past given undeniable proofs of her possession of a musical nature. She has shown in certain songs with pianoforte accompaniment a pretty knack of melody, and her compositions have been often characterized by refinement and grace. But there is a mighty difference between a song and a "dramatic overture" for orchestra.

***

In the present instance Miss Lang has little to say, although she seeks many means of expression. Her themes are neither of marked originality nor of musical importance. The working-out is not so much working-out as working-after something. There is no apparent definite purpose, or the purpose is frittered away in the search after effects. As an overture, the piece is amorphous. Dramatic, to be sure, is a comparative term, but in the common acceptation of the word, there is not one dramatic stroke in the whole work, nor is there a climax. As a fantastic tone poem, it is vague. Miss Lang finds at her disposal the orchestral paint box, and she colors her themes with this instrumental tablet and with that one; thus she gains, occasionally, a piquant effect, a pleasing passage, but the whole lacks coherency and is diffuse.

In a word, this composition might well please the eye of a prudent and skilled teacher. He might look kindly at the pupil and say: "This is good; this shows promise; you are making progress. Now put it away and we will review our exercises in the strict style." He would not be satisfied with "the spirit of the form" or "the sympathy with the form." He would demand the thing itself and not its impalpable atmosphere.

The overture was applauded and there was a vain effort made to call the composer forward.

***

Mr. Heinrich's number with orchestra was the air from Spohr's "Faust," the air with the recitative that opens with these mellifluous words: "Der Hoelle selbst will ich Segen entringen." Spohr wrote the part of Faust for a baritone, and yet in the opera the hero is obliged once to take a low E flat, and on another occasion he trills on a low G. In the air chosen by Mr. Heinrich there are old-fashioned and meaningless ornamental passages, and the air, as a whole, is neither dramatic nor interesting. Although the singer often showed admirable control of the breath, and although he sang with intelligence, he did not appear to full advantage; for in pure cantabile of merely sensuous beauty and in ornamentation Mr. Heinrich is never as successful as in music of strongly marked dramatic character. He is powerful in the conception, and the carrying out of the diabolical, the terrible, the grotesque; he rides at ease in the storm of passion; he can be dignified in a priestly role; he rises with the intensity of an occasion. It is not surprising then that he was eminently successful in the songs by Schubert, or that he was recalled again and again after his impassioned delivery of them.

***

The orchestral numbers gave the audience much pleasure. A Haydn Symphony is always welcome, and the brilliant numbers of Moszkowski and Dvorak show the favorable side of modern instrumentation. The incidental solos contributed by Mr. Schulz and Mr. Molé were warmly applauded.

***

The programme of the next concert, the fifteenth, will be as follows: Schumann, overture, "Manfred;" Brahms, concerto for violin, D major; Busoni, symphonic tone poem (manuscript), first time; Weber, overture, "Oberon."

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 10, 1893.

Great interest was manifested in the opening number on the programme of the twenty-first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday evening in Music Hall, it being a manuscript composition of Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang, styled a "Dramatic Overture," and given for the first time. It begins without a preliminary introduction and the musical developing of the themes partakes somewhat of the character of the writings of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, though the characteristic veins of both Beethoven and Wagner are noticed in the instrumentation. The modern treatment, however, produces an original dramatic effect, and is concise and beautifully harmonized. The strong evidence of Miss Lang's command of orchestral combination gives great promise for the future work of this young composer. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Max Heinrich, who was heard to good andvantage in Spohr's recitative and aria "Faust" and in Schubert numbers, to which Mr. Nikisch played the piano accompaniment. He showed marked artistic ability, which received the well-merited applause of the audience. Haydn's Symphony in C minor was particularly enjoyable and given brilliant rendering. The programme closed with two movements Moritz Morzkowski and a "Scherzo Capriccioso" by Antoine Dvorak. For the next concert on April 15, Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 98.

SUNDAY, APRIL 9, 1893.

Last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall, brought forward a notable composition by Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang, styled a "dramatic overture," and the work proved to be most interesting. It is planned upon a scale of grand proportion, calling for the full complement of instruments in the modern orchestra, and both in its themes and their treatment show Miss Lang to have been a thorough and conscientious student of orchestral composition.

Her earlier contribution to the concert programmes of the day, in the form of songs and ballads, have justified bright anticipations of her success in larger works, and these were realized in a great degree in the overture heard last evening. She has followed good models, and wisely avoided sensational effects, her themes show marked individuality, and in their development many evidences are given of an extended study of orchestral combination. That a greater freedom in writing is desirable is only natural, but in this work there are so many evidences of marked ability in the command of orchestral forms that a hearing of Miss Lang's future contributions in this branch of composition will be awaited with much inrerest.

Mr. Max Heinrich, the baritone singer, was the soloist, and he gave splendid satisfaction, as usual. His skill as a vocalist was displayed to fine advantage in his selections, and the thoroughly artistic delivery of Spohr's recitative and aria from "Faust," "Der Holle-selbst-will-ich-Segen Entringen" and the songs, with piano, Schubert's "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" and "Die Allmacht" gave pleasure to all who listened. He is a singer who commands the applause of the most critical. His audience last evening showed their hearty appreciation of his artistic merits.

Director Nikisch brought the evening to a brilliant end by the performance of two movements from Noszkowski's suite No. 1, in F major, op. 39, and Dvorak, Scherzo Capriccios, op. 66, while a most enjoyable interpretation of Haydn's symphony in C minor No. 9 made the central attraction of the programme.

Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist next Saturday evening, and the programme will consist of Schumann's overture, "Manfred"; Brahms' concerto for violin, in D major; F. B. Busoni's "Symphonic Tone Poem" (manuscript), first time, and Weber's overture, "Oberon."

The Boston symphony had the largest audience that ever greeted it in Providence on Wednesday evening, when Nikisch bade farewell. His stand was decorated with Easter lilies and green, and even Mr. Comee wore a white flower in his buttonhole. The audience was both sympathetic and enthusiastic, and warmly applauded Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Heinrich and the orchestra.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 9, 1893.

Symphony Concert.

Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang's new dramatic overture was given for the first time at the Symphony last week, the fine composition by our talented townswoman proving to be of great merit. In the beginning two themes are developed, one sombre and of an antique character, the other passionate and modern in treatment, each played against the other and producing a dramatic effect original but melodic.

The working out is concise and beautifully harmonized, and the return to the first part is gradual and regular, without harsh cadences or Wagnerian style of orchestration.

The young composer has treated the stronger instruments of the orchestra very effectively, utilizing them for special themes in several instances, which gives a marked tonal color and contrast to the gentler fortissimo passages.

The work received a most flattering reception, and Mr. Nikisch's orchestra gave a delightful interpretation of the number.

Mr. Max Heinrich was the solo singer, and his work, as usual, was thoroughly enjoyable. A recitative and aria from Spohr's "Faust" was sung with notable expression and dramatic fire, and in the Schubert numbers, in which Mr. Heinrich played his own accompaniments, the accomplished artist again illustrated his wonderful dual ability as a player and singer.

Haydn's ninth symphony received adequate treatment, the performance of the 'celloist in the trio being specially noteworthy. The brilliant finale was also extremely well played.

Two movements from Moszkowski's suite No. 1 were capitally given as a whole. The many difficult variations for the different instruments were as a rule smoothly played, and the "perpetual motion" finale seemed to present but few stumbling blocks to the orchestra.

Dvorak's scherzo capriccioso was given with delightful dash and brilliancy.

The programme for this week will be as follows: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; concerto for violin, in D major, Brahms; symphonic tone poem (manuscript), first time, F. B. Busoni; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

[136]

...Transcript

...DAY, APRIL 10, 1893.

...Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

...programme of the twenty-first symphony ...given in the Music Hall last Saturday ...ng was as follows:

...et Ruthven Lang: Dramatic Overture No. 2, in ...r, Opus 12.

...Recitative, "Der Hölle selbst will ich Segen en- ...and Aria, Liebe ist die zarte Blüthe," from ..." Act I., scene 2.

...Symphony in C-minor, No. 9 (Breitkopf & ...Ed.)

...with pianoforte:

...Gruppe aus dem Tartarus.—Die Allmacht.

...owski: Two Movements from Suite No. 1, in F ...Opus 39.

...Scherzo Capriccioso, Opus 66.

...Max Heinrich was the singer.

This is, we believe, the first time that an orchestral composition by a woman has been played at one of our symphony concerts. It is rather odd how exceedingly little women have done in music—save in the way of singing and playing. In the creative part of the art they have done next to nothing of importance. They have done far more in painting, sculpture, or poetry. Fanny Hensel (Mendelssohn's sister) seems to stand rather at the head of female composers, and her baggage is neither large nor very important; Augusta Holmès seems to hold the first place today, but we have as yet seen nothing bearable of her composition. Louise Bertin wrote an opera, "Esmeralda,"—at least, Berlioz swore that he did not write a note of it—which was brought out at the Paris Opéra, and made fiasco. Upon the whole, the record is not brilliant. Miss Lang now comes forward with a work which must certainly stand very high indeed among compositions by women; indeed there is no special need of bringing her sex into the question at all, for this overture of hers does not need to be ranked in a special class in order to have good said of it. The beginning is particularly impressive—a grim phrase is given out by the trumpets and trombones in octaves, interrupted by syncopated thuds on the kettle-drums, and is followed by a most effective piece of harmony in the strings—a chord of C major is struck, and then merges into a passing harmony which you expect to lead, by a half cadence, directly to the dominant chord of B-major; but no! instead of leading to the dominant, it leads directly to the tonic chord of E-minor. The effect of this sudden appearance of the chord of E-minor is startling, the chord seems to come from a hundred miles away, the effect is as unearthly as that of the famous C-sharp minor chord on "et lux" in Verdi's "Manzoni" Requiem. If there is perhaps no other stroke in the overture that equals this in originality and force, what follows it has none the less conspicuous merit of its own. The thematic material is natural and unforced, the treatment coherent, often strikingly ingenious. Only once toward the latter part of the overture does the composer seem to lose her way for a moment in the maze of working-out; but she soon finds it again and pushes on to the end with very sure step. The general character of the work is passionate, with a warmth that seems wholly genuine and unsought-for, and now and then with more idyllic moments of much beauty. The instrumentation is brilliant, always skillfuly managed, if not precisely what one would call masterly; one now and then feels the lack of a certain something which is to be found in the scoring of the great masters of orchestration, from Mozart to Wagner; a certain way of using orchestral color to add to the formal coherence of the writing. Miss Lang's varied play of color seems at moments more fitful and fantastic than her musical form and thematic development. Yet, in one respect, her scoring shows a very fine instinct; unlike most young composers, she is singularly thrifty in her use of orchestral material and does not waste her heavy artillery on effects of sheer dynamic force where it can be more wisely spent on effects of contrast. Upon the whole, she in no wise lays herself open to the criticism once passed on Augusta Holmès by a Paris musician: that, "like most women, she tries to prove her own virility by making a tremendous noise!" The overture was admirably played and most enthusiastically received, Mr. Nikisch being called out three times after it.

The Haydn symphony is one not often played; it is one of the shortest of symphonies, but none the less great for that. The work is strong as steel, every part of it is welded to its adjacent parts so firmly that the whole shows not a single flaw. In listening to and studying such a work as this, one is reminded of what the late Otto Dressel once said, "I find much that is admirable, much that shows genuine talent, perhaps even genius, in the works of the modern composers you all admire so unreservedly; what I do not find is that complete mastery that marks the great classic writers." Now in this symphony by Haydn one does find the most complete mastery; a way of doing things that admits of no doubt, but carries immediate conviction with it; there is no indecision, not a moment of weakness, every phrase stands there as by a divine right of fitness. The symphony was admirably played.

The Theme and Variations and the Perpetuum mobile from Moszkowski's first suite are pretty playthings in the salon vein; more than this can hardly be said of them. They are brilliant and show off a virtuoso orchestra to fine advantage; they were played with immense effectiveness. The Dvorák Scherzo is on a somewhat higher plane; it has moments of no little charm, and is conspicuous for its brilliancy of orchestral coloring. There is not much nutrition in it, but it is good fun to listen to for once in a while. It was exceedingly brilliantly played.

Mr. Heinrich sang the aria from Spohr's "Faust" which he sang here some years ago with wonderful beauty of expression. The music begins to show the wrinkles of age a little, its beauty is not based on very conspicuous strength, but that it is beautiful is not to be denied. In the two Schubert songs, especially in "Die Allmacht," Mr. Heinrich carried everything before him; it was really great singing, and fully appreciated by the audience.

The next programme is—Schumann, overture to "Manfred;" Brahms, violin concerto in D; Busoni, symphonic tone-poem (MS.); Weber, overture to "Oberon." Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

[137]

The Musical Herald of the United States

(For... ...82.)

FEBRUARY, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert had a troublesome drawback to contend against, in the form of unfortunate atmospheric conditions. The band has never before sounded so crude comparatively, and at no concert so far as we can recall were there so many technical mishaps. Several passages in Beethoven's eighth symphony, which opened the concert, were marred by bad intonation and want of precision, and at no time in the course of the evening were the instruments perfectly in tune with each other. Under the circumstances the faults were venial, but they prevent the recording of another such success as was put to the credit of the orchestra on the occasion of its last visit. Concerning the symphony, however, it must be said that it commended itself with especial forcefulness to the admirers of the composition and the believers in Beethoven's knowledge touching his own intentions, in being free from the most flagrant of the innovations which have crept into the readings of the work since Wagner wrote his condemnation of the careless and perfunctory style in which the conductors of Germany were in the habit of playing it. Mr. Nikisch is not overburdened with devotion to tradition, but it is a pleasure to record the fact that neither does he seem to care to pose as a revolutionist simply for the sake of revolution. He permitted the dainty allegretto-scherzando to occupy the place of the slow movement of the symphony instead of transforming the characteristics of such a movement to the tempo di menuetto, as has been done by Dr. Von Buelow and others. The orchestral numbers in the scheme, besides the symphony were two movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" (the minuet of the will-o'-the-wisps, and the dance of sylphs, which latter bit of fairy tracery in music was demanded and given a second time), and the third "Leonore" overture by Beethoven.

The solo performers were Miss Eugenia Castellanc, pianoforte, and Mr. Timothee Adamowski, violin. Miss Castellano is a young woman of sixteen years, who hails from Italy, and who has been generously exploited since her arrival in New York a few weeks ago. She played at one of the Boston concerts two weeks ago and succeeded in impressing the New England capital with the idea that she was made of rare artistic metal. It is possible that the quantity and quality of the praise that has been lavished upon her, and has been trumpeted forth into the world, led us to expect too much; at any rate, from a musical point of view, her performance of the G minor concerto of Mendelssohn was distinctly disappointing. It was notable, if at all, simply as a mechanical achievement. In color it was monotonous, in the matter of expression sterile. The reason why the composition was chosen remained an unanswerable enigma until the finale was reached, when it became evident that the young lady's fingers and wrists had been kept in training for the purpose of exhibiting a degree of bravura which would please the average audience. In this finale, but more especially in a concert study by her teacher, Martucci, a bit of showy but empty music, she caused something like a sensation, and persuaded the judicious of her possession of a sufficient technical equipment to justify hopes of her future. But she did not persuade the judicious that she is now a ripe artist, and she is too old to be listened to as a prodigy.

Mr. Adamowski played the first two movements of Bruch's first violin concerto tastefully and intelligently, but, probably on account of the weather, his tone sounded strangely muffled and unsympathetic in the lower strings.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Two hours of unalloyed pleasure were enjoyed by those who attended the second concert of the Kneisel Quartette. Mr. Kneisel and his associates were in excellent mood, two of the compositions on the list were among the most perfect examples of chamber music in existence and the third was a new piece of music by an American composer which maintained itself so well in the afternoon's entertainment as to bring credit not only to the composer and the performers, but also to the artistic form which it is the purpose of the club to promote. The quartette, which consists of Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, L. Svecenski and Alwin Schroeder, played Schumann's quartette in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, and Schubert's quartette in D minor (the one with the ineffably lovely variations on the melody first used by the composer in his setting of the song by Claudius called "Der Tod und das Maedchen").

Between these numbers a quartette in C major by Arthur Foote, of Boston, for pianoforte and strings, was performed, the composer playing the pianoforte part. Concerning this work, by one of the most conscientious and dignified of American composers, the Tribune spoke some words of praise when the score was published by Mr. Arthur P. Schmidt, of Boston. The good opinion formed from the reading was not only confirmed but strengthened by the performance under notice. The work is fluent and melodious, and its ingenuousness has a most refreshing effect upon the ear of a professional hearer in these days of excessive reflection and constrained effort. The performance was marked by genuine sympathy on the part of Mr. Foote's associates, and it was very gratifying to observe that the audience was keenly appreciative of the beauties of both music and performance.

The charm of the quartette's playing is quite beyond conventional words of praise. It is the product, not only of a most admirable techical equipment in the case of each individual composing the club, but of a harmony of feeling and understanding between the four men, and an ambition to achieve a common success that are seldom met with among organizations devoted to chamber music.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

ORCHESTRA CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert of December 31 played Berlioz's brilliant overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and Volkmann's pleasing and interesting but not strikingly original symphony in B flat. Between these came Vieuxtemps' fourth violin concerto, the solo part of which was played by Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the violin family of the orchestra. Mr. Schnitzler came to this country some years ago, at the same time as Mr. Fritz Giese, the accomplished violoncellist, and for a while was a member of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. He was next in the west for a space, and returned this season and joined the orchestra. His work on the occasion under notice was admirable for its finish and taste, and the charm of it all was perceptibly heightened by the warm tone of his violin. There cannot be many orchestras in the world that can show a finer array of real artists among their violin players than our orchestra can boast, with Kneisel, Adamowski, Loeffler and Schnitzler in evidence. At the concert of January 7, the symphony was Haydn's in B flat (No. 12 in the Breitkopf & Haertel edition), and other orchestral works were the first suite arranged from Bizet's melodramatic music to Daudet's "L'Arlesienne" and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. Mrs. Basta-Tavary sang in good style and with marked intelligence, but not always with fullness of effect, Donna Anna's scene, with the "letter aria," from "Don Juan" and Elizabeth's greeting to the Hall of Song from "Tannhaeuser."

The Kneisel Quartet at the concert on January 16 played Volkmann's trio (for pianoforte, violin and violoncello) in B flat minor, Schumann's quartette, Op. 41, No. 1, and Brahms' quintette for clarinet and strings, Op. 115. The trio, in the performance of which Mr. Busoni took part at the pianoforte, is generally recognized as one of its author's most delightful creations, though it has much of real pathos in it. At the close, for instance, there is a dialogue of short, broken phrases between the pianoforte and the violin that is strongly suggestive of a long farewell between dear friends. Brahms' quintette is a strong, earnest, and what is more, an easily intelligible work. It is so free from bewildering moments that one is almost led to question if Brahms be its composer. The use of the clarinet as a warming agent is splendidly managed, and the entire quintette is a model of repose and dignity.

There is an unfortunate crowding of important musical events which brings the Seidl concert, with the Nikisch symphony-philharmonic on three successive days, in the same academy. Friday afternoon came the Philharmonic rehearsal, followed by the concert (the same program) Saturday evening. There were crowded houses; many well known connoisseurs from New York attended, and of artists Paderewski was seen in a box Saturday evening. Indeed, he has professed himself enamored of the Boston symphonists since their accompaniment to his concerto last season; and he is quoted as declaring this orchestra not only unsurpassed, but unequaled in the world, so far as his musical observation extends.

The program was very richly, indeed almost heavily stocked with good things. The temporary indisposition of Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist announced, was supplied by Madame Tavary. The program presented the following numbers: Edouard Lalo: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys." Mozart: "Non Mi Dir," from "Don Giovanni," by Madame Tavary. Antonin Dvorak: Suite for orchestra in D major, Op. 39 (five parts). Wagner, Elizabeth's aria, from "Tannhaeuser," Madame Tavary. Robert Schumann: Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61 (four parts).

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 10, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-first symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Margaret Ruthven Lang: Dramatic Overture No. 2, in E-minor, Opus 12.
Spohr: Recitative, "Der Hölle selbst will ich Segen entringen," and Aria, Liebe ist die zarte Blüthe," from "Faust," Act i., scene 2.
Haydn: Symphony in C-minor, No. 9 (Breitkopf & Härtel Ed.)
Songs with pianoforte:
Schubert: Gruppe aus dem Tartarus,—Die Allmacht.
Moszkowski: Two Movements from Suite No. 1, in F major, Opus 39.
Dvorak: Scherzo Capriccioso, Opus 66.
Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

This is, we believe, the first time that an orchestral composition by a woman has been played at one of our symphony concerts. It is rather odd how exceedingly little women have done in music—save in the way of singing and playing. In the creative part of the art they have done next to nothing of importance. They have done far more in painting, sculpture, or poetry. Fanny Hensel (Mendelssohn's sister) seems to stand rather at the head of female composers, and her baggage is neither large nor very important; Augusta Holmès seems to hold the first place today, but we have as yet seen nothing bearable of her composition. Louise Bertin wrote an opera, "Esmeralda,"—at least, Berlioz swore that he did not write a note of it—which was brought out at the Paris Opéra, and made fiasco. Upon the whole, the record is not brilliant. Miss Lang now comes forward with a work which must certainly stand very high indeed among compositions by women; indeed there is no special need of bringing her sex into the question at all, for this overture of hers does not need to be ranked in a special class in order to have good said of it. The beginning is particularly impressive—a grim phrase is given out by the trumpets and trombones in octaves, interrupted by syncopated thuds on the kettle-drums, and is followed by a most effective piece of harmony in the strings—a chord of C-major is struck, and then merges into a passing harmony which you expect to lead, by a half cadence, directly to the dominant chord of B-major; but no! instead of leading to the dominant, it leads directly to the tonic chord of E-minor. The effect of this sudden appearance of the chord of E-minor is startling, the chord seems to come from a hundred miles away, the effect is as unearthly as that of the famous C-sharp minor chord on "et lux" in Verdi's "Manzoni" Requiem. If there is perhaps no other stroke in the overture that equals this in originality and force, what follows it has none the less conspicuous merit of its own. The thematic material is natural and unforced, the treatment coherent, often strikingly ingenious. Only once toward the latter part of the overture does the composer seem to lose her way for a moment in the maze of working-out; but she soon finds it again and pushes on to the end with very sure step. The general character of the work is passionate, with a warmth that seems wholly genuine and unsought-for, and now and then with more idyllic moments of much beauty. The instrumentation is brilliant, always skillfuly managed, if not precisely what one would call masterly; one now and then feels the lack of a certain something which is to be found in the scoring of the great masters of orchestration, from Mozart to Wagner; a certain way of using orchestral color to add to the formal coherence of the writing. Miss Lang's varied play of color seems at moments more fitful and fantastic than her musical form and thematic development. Yet, in one respect, her scoring shows a very fine instinct; unlike most young composers, she is singularly thrifty in her use of orchestral material and does not waste her heavy artillery on effects of sheer dynamic force where it can be more wisely spent on effects of contrast. Upon the whole, she in no wise lays herself open to the criticism once passed on Augusta Holmès by a Paris musician: that, "like most women, she tries to prove her own virility by making a tremendous noise!" The overture was admirably played and most enthusiastically received, Mr. Nikisch being called out three times after it.

The Haydn symphony is one not often played; it is one of the shortest of symphonies, but none the less great for that. The work is strong as steel, every part of it is welded to its adjacent parts so firmly that the whole shows not a single flaw. In listening to and studying such a work as this, one is reminded of what the late Otto Dressel once said, "I find much that is admirable, much that shows genuine talent, perhaps even genius, in the works of the modern composers you all admire so unreservedly; what I do not find is that complete mastery that marks the great classic writers." Now in this symphony by Haydn one does find the most complete mastery; a way of doing things that admits of no doubt, but carries immediate conviction with it; there is no indecision, not a moment of weakness, every phrase stands there as by a divine right of fitness. The symphony was admirably played.

The Theme and Variations and the Perpetuum mobile from Moszkowski's first suite are pretty playthings in the salon vein; more than this can hardly be said of them. They are brilliant and show off a virtuoso orchestra to fine advantage; they were played with immense effectiveness. The Dvorák Scherzo is on a somewhat higher plane; it has moments of no little charm, and is conspicuous for its brilliancy of orchestral coloring. There is not much nutrition in it, but it is good fun to listen to for once in a while. It was exceedingly brilliantly played.

Mr. Heinrich sang the aria from Spohr's "Faust" which he sang here some years ago with wonderful beauty of expression. The music begins to show the wrinkles of age a little, its beauty is not based on very conspicuous strength, but that it is beautiful is not to be denied. In the two Schubert songs, especially in "Die Allmacht," Mr. Heinrich carried everything before him; it was really great singing, and fully appreciated by the audience.

The next programme is—Schumann, overture to "Manfred;" Brahms, violin concerto in D; Busoni, symphonic tone-poem (MS.); Weber, overture to "Oberon." Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

[137]

The Musical Herald of the United States

(For[illegible]82.)

FEBRUARY, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert had a troublesome drawback to contend against, in the form of unfortunate atmospheric conditions. The band has never before sounded so crude comparatively, and at no concert so far as we can recall were there so many technical mishaps. Several passages in Beethoven's eighth symphony, which opened the concert, were marred by bad intonation and want of precision, and at no time in the course of the evening were the instruments perfectly in tune with each other. Under the circumstances the faults were venial, but they prevent the recording of another such success as was put to the credit of the orchestra on the occasion of its last visit. Concerning the symphony, however, it must be said that it commended itself with especial forcefulness to the admirers of the composition and the believers in Beethoven's knowledge touching his own intentions, in being free from the most flagrant of the innovations which have crept into the readings of the work since Wagner wrote his condemnation of the careless and perfunctory style in which the conductors of Germany were in the habit of playing it. Mr. Nikisch is not overburdened with devotion to tradition, but it is a pleasure to record the fact that neither does he seem to care to pose as a revolutionist simply for the sake of revolution. He permitted the dainty allegretto-scherzando to occupy the place of the slow movement of the symphony instead of transforming the characteristics of such a movement to the tempo di menuetto, as has been done by Dr. Von Buelow and others. The orchestral numbers in the scheme, besides the symphony were two movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" (the minuet of the will-o'-the-wisps, and the dance of sylphs, which latter bit of fairy tracery in music was demanded and given a second time), and the third "Leonore" overture by Beethoven.

The solo performers were Miss Eugenia Castellano, pianoforte, and Mr. Timothee Adamowski, violin. Miss Castellano is a young woman of sixteen years, who hails from Italy, and who has been generously exploited since her arrival in New York a few weeks ago. She played at one of the Boston concerts two weeks ago and succeeded in impressing the New England capital with the idea that she was made of rare artistic metal. It is possible that the quantity and quality of the praise that has been lavished upon her, and has been trumpeted forth into the world, led us to expect too much; at any rate, from a musical point of view, her performance of the G minor concerto of Mendelssohn was distinctly disappointing. It was notable, if at all, simply as a mechanical achievement. In color it was monotonous, in the matter of expression sterile. The reason why the composition was chosen remained an unanswerable enigma until the finale was reached, when it became evident that the young lady's fingers and wrists had been kept in training for the purpose of exhibiting a degree of bravura which would please the average audience. In this finale, but more especially in a concert study by her teacher, Martucci, a bit of showy but empty music, she caused something like a sensation, and persuaded the judicious of her possession of a sufficient technical equipment to justify hopes of her future. But she did not persuade the judicious that she is now a ripe artist, and she is too old to be listened to as a prodigy.

Mr. Adamowski played the first two movements of Bruch's first violin concerto tastefully and intelligently, but, probably on account of the weather, his tone sounded strangely muffled and unsympathetic in the lower strings.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Two hours of unalloyed pleasure were enjoyed by those who attended the second concert of the Kneisel Quartette. Mr. Kneisel and his associates were in excellent mood, two of the compositions on the list were among the most perfect examples of chamber music in existence and the third was a new piece of music by an American composer which maintained itself so well in the afternoon's entertainment as to bring credit not only to the composer and the performers, but also to the artistic form which it is the purpose of the club to promote. The quartette, which consists of Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, L. Svecenski and Alwin Schroeder, played Schumann's quartette in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, and Schubert's quartette in D minor (the one with the ineffably lovely variations on the melody first used by the composer in his setting of the song by Claudius called "Der Tod und das Maedchen").

Between these numbers a quartette in C major by Arthur Foote, of Boston, for pianoforte and strings, was performed, the composer playing the pianoforte part. Concerning this work, by one of the most conscientious and dignified of American composers, the Tribune spoke some words of praise when the score was published by Mr. Arthur P. Schmidt, of Boston. The good opinion formed from the reading was not only confirmed but strengthened by the performance under notice. The work is fluent and melodious, and its ingenuousness has a most refreshing effect upon the ear of a professional hearer in these days of excessive reflection and constrained effort. The performance was marked by genuine sympathy on the part of Mr. Foote's associates, and it was very gratifying to observe that the audience was keenly appreciative of the beauties of both music and performance.

The charm of the quartette's playing is quite beyond conventional words of praise. It is the product, not only of a most admirable techical equipment in the case of each individual composing the club, but of a harmony of feeling and understanding between the four men, and an ambition to achieve a common success that are seldom met with among organizations devoted to chamber music.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

ORCHESTRA CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert of December 31 played Berlioz's brilliant overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and Volkmann's pleasing and interesting but not strikingly original symphony in B flat. Between these came Vieuxtemps' fourth violin concerto, the solo part of which was played by Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the violin family of the orchestra. Mr. Schnitzler came to this country some years ago, at the same time as Mr. Fritz Giese, the accomplished violoncellist, and for a while was a member of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. He was next in the west for a space, and returned this season and joined the orchestra. His work on the occasion under notice was admirable for its finish and taste, and the charm of it all was perceptibly heightened by the warm tone of his violin. There cannot be many orchestras in the world that can show a finer array of real artists among their violin players than our orchestra can boast, with Kneisel, Adamowski, Loeffler and Schnitzler in evidence. At the concert of January 7, the symphony was Haydn's in B flat (No. 12 in the Breitkopf & Haertel edition), and other orchestral works were the first suite arranged from Bizet's melodramatic music to Daudet's "L'Arlesienne" and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. Mrs. Basta-Tavary sang in good style and with marked intelligence, but not always with fullness of effect, Donna Anna's scene, with the "letter aria," from "Don Juan" and Elizabeth's greeting to the Hall of Song from "Tannhaeuser."

The Kneisel Quartet at the concert on January 16 played Volkmann's trio (for pianoforte, violin and violoncello) in B flat minor, Schumann's quartette, Op. 41, No. 1, and Brahms' quintette for clarinet and strings, Op. 115. The trio, in the performance of which Mr. Busoni took part at the pianoforte, is generally recognized as one of its author's most delightful creations, though it has much of real pathos in it. At the close, for instance, there is a dialogue of short, broken phrases between the pianoforte and the violin that is strongly suggestive of a long farewell between dear friends. Brahms' quintette is a strong, earnest, and what is more, an easily intelligible work. It is so free from bewildering moments that one is almost led to question if Brahms be its composer. The use of the clarinet as a warming agent is splendidly managed, and the entire quintette is a model of repose and dignity.

There is an unfortunate crowding of important musical events which brings the Seidl concert, with the Nikisch symphony-philharmonic on three successive days, in the same academy. Friday afternoon came the Philharmonic rehearsal, followed by the concert (the same program) Saturday evening. There were crowded houses; many well known connoisseurs from New York attended, and of artists Paderewski was seen in a box Saturday evening. Indeed, he has professed himself enamored of the Boston symphonists since their accompaniment to his concerto last season; and he is quoted as declaring this orchestra not only unsurpassed, but unequaled in the world, so far as his musical observation extends.

The program was very richly, indeed almost heavily stocked with good things. The temporary indisposition of Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist announced, was supplied by Madame Tavary. The program presented the following numbers: Edouard Lalo: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys." Mozart: "Non Mi Dir," from "Don Giovanni," by Madame Tavary. Antonin Dvorak: Suite for orchestra in D major, Op. 39 (five parts). Wagner, Elizabeth's aria, from "Tannhaeuser," Madame Tavary. Robert Schumann: Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61 (four parts).

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 13, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ARTHUR FOOTE. SYMPHONIC PROLOGUE. "Francesca da Rimini."

MAX BRUCH. CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in G minor, No. 1.
(First and second movements.)

ROBERT SCHUMANN SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat major, op. 38.
I. Andante un poco maestoso. B flat major.
Allegro molto vivace. B flat major.
II. Larghetto. E flat major.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. D minor.
Trio I. Molto piu vivace. D major.
Trio II. Same tempo as the Scherzo. B flat major.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso. B flat major.

FRANZ LISZT. SYMPHONIC POEM. "Les Preludes."

SOLOIST:

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

The Tenth and Last Concert, Thursday Evening, April 27.

BRATTLE HALL, : : CAMBRIDGE.

:::::1893:::::

Wednesday Evening, April 12, at 8.

Second Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL. L. SVECENSKI.
OTTO ROTH. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in C sharp minor, op. 131.
Adagio ma non troppo e molto espressivo.—
Allegro molto vivace.—Allegro moderato.—
Andante ma non troppo e molto cantabile.—Presto.—
Adagio quasi un poco andante.—Allegro.

SCHUMANN. QUARTET in A major, op. 41, No. 3.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio cantabile.—
Menuetto (Allegretto).—Presto.

HAYDN. QUARTET in D major, op. 64, No. 5.
Andante espressivo; Allegro moderato.—
Assai agitato.—Adagio molto.—Allegro molto vivace.

Third and last Concert, Wednesday Evening, April 26.

BRATTLE HALL, : : CAMBRIDGE.

:::::1893:::::

Wednesday Evening, March 29, at 8.

First Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL. L. SVECENSKI.
OTTO ROTH. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Mr. F. Busoni assisting.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in A major, op. 18, No. 5.
Allegro.—Menuetto.—Andante cantabile.—Allegro.

GRIEG. ROMANZA, from Quartet in G minor.

VOLKMANN. TRIO in B flat minor.
I. Largo.
II. Ritornell (Allegretto).
III. Allegro con brio.—Largo.
Piano, Mr. BUSONI.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

The date of the next concert is April 12.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1893.

DR. HANS RICHTER

COMING TO BOSTON TO SUCCEED NIKISCH.

HE CABLES HIS ACCEPTANCE OF THE SYMPHONY LEADERSHIP.

The Announcement Will Cause a Sensation in the American Musical World—His Reputation as a Musician and Conductor World-Wide—His Connection With the Great Wagnerian Festivals—Mr. Elson's Opionion.

VIENNA, April 13.—Hans Richter, the celebrated conductor of orchestral concerts, has resigned his position as director of the Court Opera Theatre in Vienna, and has accepted an offer to take charge of the orchestral performances in Boston.

The coming of Richter will undoubtedly cause a commotion in the American musical world. His reputation rests on his connection with Wagner in the many musical festivals at Bayreuth, and in later years for his annual symphony and Wagnerian concerts in London. His connection with Wagner began in the early sixties.

Wagner took him to Lucerne, and he was the one who made the first fair copy of the score of "Die Meister singer."

In 1871 he was principal conductor of the National Opera at Pesth. On the retirement of Herbech he became first conductor at the Vienna Opera House. In 1876 he conducted the rehearsals and all performances of the "Ring of the Niebelung." At Bayreuth achieving thereby a worldwide fame. At the close of the third series of performances there he received the order of Maximilian from King Ludwig of Bavaria, and that of the falcon from the grand duke of Weimar. In 1885 he was chosen director of the Birmingham festival.

When Richter was a man of 23 he was recommended by Esser to Wagner, then living at Triebchen near Lucerne, and in need of an expert copyist, and spent more than a year under the same roof with the great composer, and the score of whose "Meistersinger" he made the first complete fair copy. Richter's room was exactly over that in which Wagner worked at the "Meistersinger," and it is interesting to learn, on the authority of the former, that during the entire 13 months of his stay under Wagner's roof he never once heard him strike a note on the piano in his room.

Before Richter came to Wagner he had fulfilled an engagement as a horn player in the orchestra of the Karnthnerthor Opera House in Vienna, and had also obtained a practical mastery over most of the orchestral instruments; but it seems that Wagner only once availed himself of the copyist's expert knowledge.

One day he brought up a page of the score with the ink still wet, and pointing to a passage asked Richter, "Do you think this passage can be played on the horn at the tempo I have indicated? Isn't it too difficult?" the passage in question was the "Finale" of act ii. of the "Meistersinger," where the horn repeats the theme of Beckmesser's serenade. Richter looked at the passage and reassured him, "Yes, it can be played; but it will sound rather queer; the tone will be decidedly nasal."

"Capital," rejoined Wagner, "that is exactly the comic effect I wanted." Richter then played the passage over on the horn. "Again! again! quicker! quicker!" cried the meister delighted to find that his instinct had been so accurate.

It was his practice in the summer to row out on the lake to a little islet opposite the villa and there, ensconced in the long grass, to blow to his hearts content. The curiosity of the neighborhood was soon aroused by this mysterious music, but Richter for some time eluded detection, until at last some time an English tourist surprised him in his hiding place.

"At last," he cried, "I have found you out. It was you, then, who has been making this enchanting music. Let me thank you, sir, for the pleasure you have given me on so many evenings."

Fifteen years later Dr. Richter was given anh onorary degree at Oxford. After the ceremony one of the professors of the University came up to salute and congratulate him. It was none other than the enterprising tourist. He had not forgotten the circumstances of their meeting.

Our New Conductor.

It is to be Hans Richter, and Boston and America are to be congratulated. Richter is probably the greatest of living conductors, and there is every probability that under his leadership, our band will become the greatest of orchestras. Hans Richter is not only a great drillmaster, but a most poetic interpreter of the classical repertoire. His tastes are broad and catholic, so that Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner are all familiar to him, and he does not allow one school to obliterate another. His successes in Bayreuth have been phenomenal, and his London concerts have been a great feature in the past musical seasons of that metropolis.

No man can get better work from an orchestra, yet there is nothing of the martinet or severe taskmaster in him; a thorough musician himself, he demands thorough musicianship on the part of his co-workers. He is of middle age (only 50), decidedly German in appearance and manner, and is a veritable personification of Hans Sachs in sturdiness and bonhommie. He will be a factor not only in Boston's music, but will wield an influence throughout America.

It is something to be glad that our orchestra again falls into German hands. Its traditions are German, its personnel is largely German, and its repertoire must, of course, be drawn largely from German sources; a Frenchman, no matter what his musical abilities, could not have been in full sympathy with the men, and would have found the position an especially arduous one. The coming of Richter will ease the minds of more than one member of the orchestra. Had Mr. Nikisch had a Gallic successor, it is likely that there would have been changes made in the list of the musicians, as it is no capable artist need fear a sudden discharge.

This element of fixity means much to an orchestra; the men will play with far more [illegible] and devotion to their task because [illegible] everything will be judged [illegible] very announcement [illegible] engagement will make a difference in the playing of the more anxious ones; and it may be permitted, in this connection, to plead for something more of permanency in the positions of the men; when they know that they possess life positions like their European confreres they will give more enthusiasm to their task.

Dr. Richter (he has a Cambridge degree) is a practical musician being a horn-player as well as a director. Although I have spoken of him as a German, he is by birth a Hungarian, but his long service in Austria and Germany has so Teutonized him that he may readily be classed with the army of the great German musicians of the present. We may hope for noble music, nobly performed, in the near future.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, APRIL 14.

HANS RICHTER IS COMING.

Famous Vienna Leader Has Resigned His Position to Take Charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

VIENNA, April 13.—Hans Richter, the celebrated conductor of orchestral concerts, has resigned his position as director of the Court Opera Theatre in Vienna and has accepted an offer to take charge of the Symphony orchestra in Boston.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 104.
FRIDAY, APRIL 14, 1893.

HANS RICHTER IS COMING.

The Symphony Orchestra Secures the Great Austrian Conductor.

VIENNA, April 13, 1893. Hans Richter, the celebrated conductor of orchestral concerts, has resigned his position as director of the Court Opera Theatre in Vienna, and has accepted an offer to take charge of the orchestral performances in Boston.

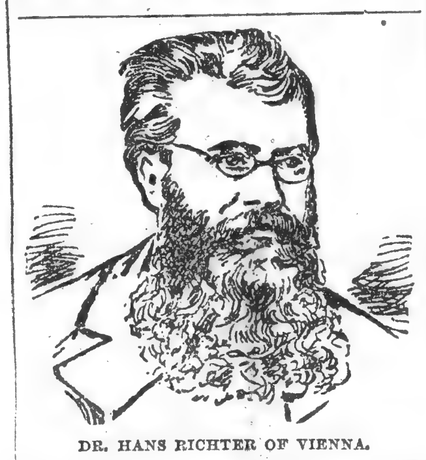
Boston Daily Globe.
SATURDAY, APRIL 15.

TO CHARM BOSTONIANS.

Dr. Hans Richter Coming to Lead the Symphonies—Greatest Conductor of the Age—He was a Friend of Wagner.

Boston music lovers are delighted to learn that Hans Richter, the celebrated conductor of orchestral concerts, is to be the successor of Mr. Arthur Nikisch as leader of the symphonies.

Mr. Richter has resigned as director of the Court Opera House at Vienna, and is soon to sail for this country. Congressman Hoar has secured a special permit from the Treasury Department for him to land, and thus he will have no trouble in connection with the alien contract law.



DR. HANS RICHTER OF VIENNA.

Richter is probably the greatest of the conductors of today, wonderful as a drillmaster, and a most poetic interpreter of the classical repertoire. Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner are all familiar to him, so broad are his tastes, and he does not allow one school to obliterate another.

He is a Hungarian by birth, but his long service in Austria and Germany has so Teutonized him that he may be classed with the army of German musicians.

His reputation rests on his connection with Wagner in the many musical festivals at Bayreuth, and in later years for his annual symphony and Wagnerian concerts in London.

In his youth he had an engagement as a horn player in the orchestra of the Karnthnerthor Opera House in Vienna, and also obtained a practical mastery over most of the orchestral instruments.

When Richter was 23 he was recommended by Esser to Wagner, then living at Triebchen, near Lucerne, and in need of an expert copyist, and spent more than a year under the same roof with the great composer, and of the score of whose "Meistersinger" he made the first complete fair copy. Richter's room was exactly over that in which Wagner worked at the "Meistersinger," and it is interesting to learn, on the authority of the former, that during the entire 13 months of his stay under Wagner's roof he never once heard him strike a note on the piano in his room.

In 1871 he was principal conductor of the National Opera at Pesth. On the retirement of Herbech he became first conductor at the Vienna Opera House.

In 1876 he conducted the rehearsals and all performances of the "Ring of the Niebelung," at Bayreuth, achieving thereby a world-wide fame. At the close of the third series of performances there he received the order of Maximilian from King Ludwig of Bavaria, and that of the falcon from the grand duke of Weimar.

In 1885 he was chosen director of the Birmingham festival.

He has an honorary degree from Oxford, and as Dr. Richter will be known to Bostonians.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 15, '93.

THE NEW SYMPHONY LEADER.

HERR HANS RICHTER.

The Post laughs best because it laughs last.

Two weeks ago when it exclusively announced that Herr Hans Richter was likely to assume the place of Arthur Nikisch as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the report was treated in derision by certain papers. Nevertheless, one or two papers showed their good sense by printing biographical sketches of the noted leader, Yesterday's cablegram from Vienna, announcing that Herr Richter had accepted the leadership of the Symphony Orchestra, was the talk of the day in musical circles, and Colonel Higginson's office was besieged by those interested in the matter, who sought additional details. The attendance at the banking house finally assumed such proportions that Colonel Higginson gave orders to the clerks to inquire of callers if it was the orchestra they wished to ask about.

A Post reporter was, indeed, given to understand that Mr. Higginson was out, and when the clerk's attention was called to the fact that the banker sat behind his desk, the statement was modified so as to read that the colonel was too busy to be seen, at least, during the afternoon.

Upon hearing this the Post man swept his arms around the wire railing enclosing the teller and gathered up the icicles, with the idea that they would come in handy if it was a hot summer. Then he sat down to wait and had a little quiet fun, for there was a chain of clerks in waiting for musical inquirers.

Colonel Higginson was not ready to talk on the matter when he was approached. He said he had noticed the cablegram in the morning papers, but was not yet in a position either to affirm or deny it. His manner indicated that the last stage of the negotiation had not yet been accomplished, and that he was simply delaying his utterances until he is able to speak with authority regarding every detail.

What Other People Think.

C. A. Ellis, the business manager of the Symphony Orchestra, was only able to say that a cablegram had been received and that everybody was at liberty to draw their inferences from that. There is no good reason to doubt that it is Richter's intention to come to this country.

Dexter Smith, whose interest in the Symphony Orchestra is a matter of history, was very glad to hear that Richter was coming to Boston, but was afraid there might be some little hitch that would frustrate the plan. Mr. Smith was inclined to think that the celebrated conductor might experience difficulty in securing a release from his contract to which the government is a party. The fact that Richter would receive a pension by remaining in his position two years more would not necessarily stand in the way of his coming to this country for he is possessed of a colossal fortune, and has already laid away $1,000,000, the interest of which will be used if need be to perpetuate the organization after his death. Furthermore, the salary he would receive in this country must be larger than that paid abroad.

Mr. Smith has from the first been a warm advocate of the German conductor for the new leader, recognizing the superiority of the man and the school which he represents, although he believes in giving the French, American and other music ample consideration. Mr. Smith has a notion that it might be possible for Richter to come to Boston and yet continue part of his work abroad. The season here is from October to May, while that in London is from May to August.

Richter has commonly spent about two months in London. This year he is planning to attend the Chicago Exposition, and with that end in view, has secured a six months' release from his duties at Vienna. He has already engaged to conduct a series of orchestral performances in the exhibition concert hall in August, and will doubtless make an extended stop in Boston in July; his plan being to leave London about the middle of the month.

It scarcely need be said that Boston musicians were highly gratified at the news of Hans Richter's coming, for he is without doubt the greatest conductor living. In discussing the growing greatness of Boston as a musical centre, a well-known critic ran over a long list, principal among which were McDowell, Paine, Chadwick, Foote, Nevin and Horatio W. Parker. "Really," said he, "with Richter here we might begin to pride ourselves on the musical outlook at the Hub."

A High Tribute.

One of the leading musicians of Boston, who knows instinctively the renowned musician, has this to say of the future leader of the Symphony:

"In 1889 I was introduced to Hans Richter, and truly he is a real Bohemian in his mode of living. He invited me into a restaurant and we talked music until the time came for his appearance at the opera. Then I went with him to the theatre and sat with the orchestra. He was very friendly and expressed a great desire to be of service to an American musician.

"He said he had been asked to come to America previous to that time, but gave as an excuse that he was married and too old to go abroad.

"When speaking of his love of music he would get rather warm in his approval of some authors, and said he used his left hand while conducting Gounod's compositions. With those he liked he said he made use of his right.

"His introduction to Vienna opera was about thirty years ago, when he played first horn. Now he plays the piano very little, but in fact he never was a great executer.

"His work attracted the attention of Wagner, who, in a measure, made him what he is. He has played accompaniments for me, and he certainly lacked the sympathy of Nikisch or Gericke, but he is a conductor and does not pretend to play.

"He is the one great conductor of the world, yet his position at Vienna is secondary to that of Jahn, the imperial court opera director.

Coming Here in July.

Aside from any question of Herr Richter's connection with the Symphony Orchestra, he some time since secured six months' release from his duties at Vienna, and will spend part of that time in a trip to the United States. He will arrive in London late in May, and will give concerts at St. James Hall on Mondays, from June 5 to July 10.

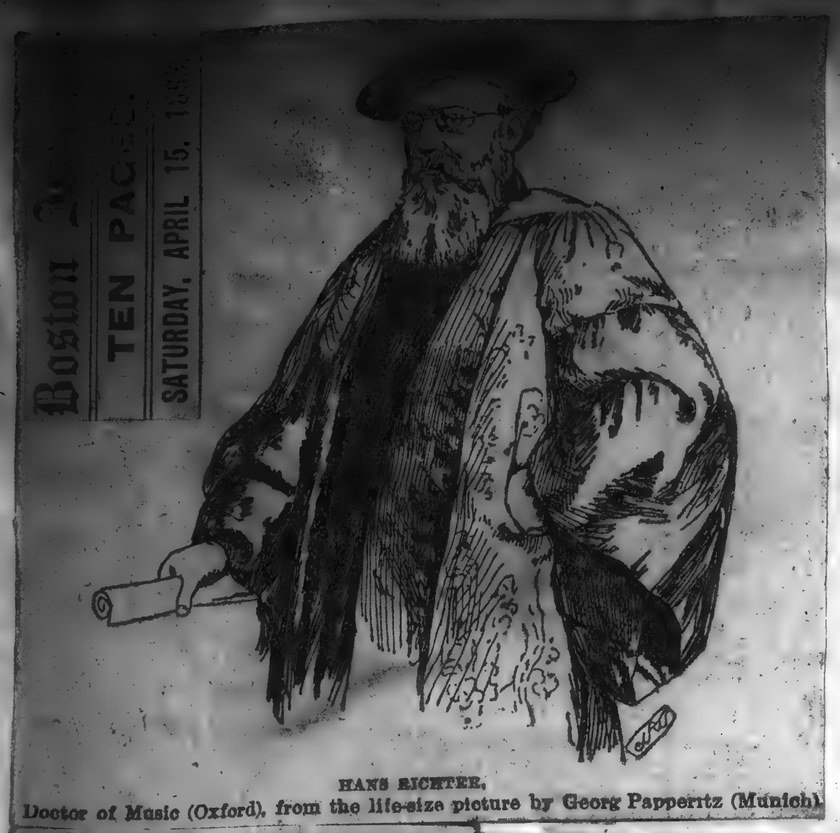
He will then come to Chicago, where he will conduct a series of orchestral performances in the Exhibition Concert Hall, his original plan being to return to England in October for his London autumn concerts and his provincial tour.

Boston Transcript
FRIDAY, APRIL 14, 1893.

HANS RICHTER FOR THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA?

A gratifying piece of news is printed in the morning papers—or, rather, it would be gratifying if all that it implies were truth, which, unfortunately, is not the case as yet. As stated in effect in the despatch from Vienna, Hans Richter has sent in his resignation of the post of conductor at the Opera and also the position of conductor at the Imperial Chapel, his reason for this course being his acceptance of the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But the Austrian Government is not of the hustling order, and we must wait, with Richter, a good two weeks or more to learn the result of the deliberations of Franz Josef's representatives. If they shall accept the great conductor's resignation it will be an act of real generosity, for besides, as is likely, giving to him a post with less work and more pay, they will deprive themselves of the services of the most distinguished conductor now living and one to whom the great theatre where he has been in charge largely owes its leading importance in the art world of Europe. Indeed, reflecting on his value and considering the practical impossibility of finding a fully equipped successor, there arises a feeling of apprehension that the kaiser's advisers in these matters will say "no." Even then, however, the incident will stand as another illustration of Colonel Higginson's constant purpose to provide the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the best men at all points, with never a thought of the question of cost.

Boston Sunday Herald
TEN PAGES.
SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1893.



HANS RICHTER,
Doctor of Music (Oxford), from the life-size picture by Georg Papperitz (Munich).

HANS RICHTER

May Become Director of Boston Symphony.

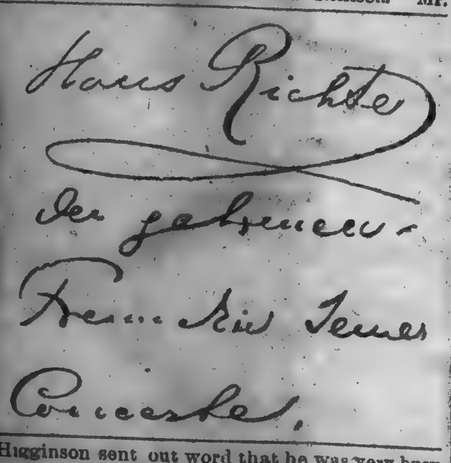
Resigns From the Vienna Imperial Orchestra.

Prospective Good Fortune for Musical Boston.

Sketch, and Other Facts of Personal Nature.

Dr. Hans Richter, at present the head Director of the Vienna Imperial Orchestra at the Court Opera House in Vienna, has been asked to succeed Mr. Nikisch as Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has resigned his position in Vienna at the present time, it is said, in order to go to Chicago, but after that it is supposed he will come to Boston.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson, to whose munificence the original existence of the Symphony Orchestra is due, was not inclined to talk about the matter of the leadership of the orchestra when the Journal reporter called at his office, asking him to either confirm or deny the report that Dr. Richter was to succeed Mr. Nikisch. Mr. Higginson sent out word that he was very busy and had nothing to say about the case.



But from other sources it is learned by the Journal that the proffer has actually been made to Dr. Richter, and that it is confidently expected he will accept. There is one point to be cleared away, but that, it is hoped, will be soon accomplished.

There has recently been a conference in Washington to decide whether Dr. Richter has a right to come or not, for it was feared he would not be allowed to land in this country on account of the alien contract law, which forbids the landing of foreigners under contract. The question to be decided was whether Dr. Richter, in his position as an artist, was to be considered a musician under contract. All difficulty in this direction has been removed.

"GREATEST IN THE WORLD."

Thus Speaks Conductor Nikisch—He Says That Boston Is to Be Congratulated.

The present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, speaks of his successor in words which, coming from another, would be thought extravagantly praiseful. A Journal reportor talked with Mr. Nikisch after yesterday's rehearsal, and was the first one to definitely inform him of the resignation of Herr Richter.

"If it is really so," said Mr. Nikisch, "Boston is to be congratulated. Richter is the greatest conductor in the world. Everyone will say so of him. He is a great man.

"You know he is a man of long training. He was formerly a horn player, and then became conductor of the opera at Buda Pesth.

"Personally, he is such a man that his characteristics are of no interest to newspaper readers. I have known him for years, and can say that he is superior to all conductors living."

ANECDOTES OF RICHTER.

His Personal Characteristics, His Appearance and His Methods.

"Richter coming? Oh, it's too good to be true!" exclaim his enthusiastic admirers.

"But are you sure it is so? Is it not merely a rumor?" said Miss Lena Little of this city to the Journal representative yesterday. "I can hardly believe it. I knew he was coming to the World's Fair, for I received letters only the other day from friends in London telling me about it. But I never dreamed that he was going to stay. Oh, I can hardly believe it!

"I was well acquainted with him and with Mrs. Richter in London.

"But has he resigned his position at the Court Opera House in Vienna? I can hardly understand that. His work was so pleasant there, and so much easier than what he will have to do here. There are three or four directors at the Court Theatre beside himself, and he had very little traveling to do. But the Symphony Orchestra does a great deal of traveling, which is one reason why Mr. Nikisch has disliked the work, and of all things Richter detests traveling. He has led the Philharmonic Orchestra of London, but that was only once a week and was not difficult work for him.

"The members of the Symphony Orchestra here can hardly appreciate how greatly they will be blessed if they should be so fortunate as to have Richter for their next leader.

"His bearing and appearance are typically German, although he is Austrian by birth. He is a large man, and has the true Saxon complexion. He has a very mild blue eye, and is jolly and good-natured.

"He not only knows how to direct an orchestra, but how to train his musicians, and now to get from them the best possible effects. He is able to do with his orchestra just what he desires, and can readily obtain the required effects from the musicians, because they understand at once just what he wants. For this reason he is not obliged to rehearse his orchestra nearly as much as most leaders. For this reason some have said that he was lazy; not because he did not produce the best effects with his orchestra, but simply because they knew that he did not do much rehearsing.

"I think one can hardly call him 'very catholic and broad' in his tastes, because there is so much music that he does not like at all. He likes most of the German music, I believe, but he indorses very little French music. His wife is very pleasant."

Mrs. Richter is not at all musical except by taste and associations. Of course she moves in musical circles on account of her husband's profession and position, but she neither sings nor plays.

"Dr. Richter has five beautiful children, the oldest being a daughter about fifteen years of age," continued Miss Little in conversation with the Journal caller.

"Many people seem to think Dr. Richter is growing old. But although he has been well known in musical circles for so many years, he is only about 50 years of age. His degree of Doctor of Music was received from Oxford."

Dr. Richter met with some very amusing experiences when he first went to England, for he was much troubled to learn the English language.

At one time he was conducting a rehearsal with his orchestra when he was suddenly seen to frown severely at the violinists. His keen eye at once detected the guilty one who was holding his bow with the ends or fleshy parts of his fingers. Dr. Richter shook his head, rapped swiftly on the music rack with his baton to emphasize each word as he said vehemently:

"You must not bow with the meat of your fingers!" the word "meat" being the translation given in the dictionary for the German word "fleisch," which may also mean "flesh."

ABOUT HANS RICHTER.

Facts and Gossip Concerning the Celebrated Orchestra Conductor.

Boston may well plume herself if Hans Richter accepts the offer made to him and comes to us as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His reputuation was long ago established, and the years have only proved his natural gifts, his musical intuition, his catholic tastes, his mastery over players and his worth as a man as well as a musician.

***

Richter was born April 4, 1843, at Raab, Hungary. His father was a director of church music in the town, and when his father died (1853) Hans entered into the Hofkapelle of Vienna as a choir boy. From 1860 to 1865 he studied in the Viennese Conservatory of Friends of Music. He studied the horn under Kleinecke, and composition under Sechter and Hellmesberger. He also studied the pianoforte. He was engaged as horn player in the Imperial Opera Orchestra of Vienna.

Esser called the attention of Wagner to Richter, and in 1866 and 1867 Richter dwelt with Wagner in Lucerne and copied the score of "The Mastersingers" for publication. With the assistance of Wagner, Richter was chosen chorus director at the court opera in Munich, 1868. He afterward was director of the royal music. In 1869 Richter went to Paris to study there the state and conditions of music, but he was called to Brussels, where he directed the rehearsals of "Lohengrin," which was performed for the first time in that city March 22, 1870, at the Theatre de la Monnaie. The opera was given chiefly through the earnest efforts of Brassin, the late eminent pianist. Richter had amusing difficulties in his dealings with Vachot, the director of the theatre, while Singelée was the first of the orchestral conductors. Léon Dommartin gives the following account:

"A good fellow, this Richter, and an excellent musician. You should have seen him with Daddy Vachot, whom he called in his broken French, 'Mosié Fajotte,' with the air of a savage beast that whets his teeth. For Richter, sweet as a lamb on ordinary occasions, was ferocious when hands were laid on his idol. Vachot was [illegible] he wished to [illegible] called to witness gods and men, singers, orchestra, stage carpenters and firemen; he went about groaning and gesturing wildly: 'He wishes to cut everything.' The triumphal idea of Vachot was to introduce a ballet in the second act, under the pretext that the act needed enlivening. That day Richter, strangled by indignation, thought he would die. Vachot, too, was near death, for Richter spoke seriously of choking him."

However, the performance was a great success.

***

Richter went to Vienna and then returned to Wagner and assisted him in the preparation of the "Nibelungen Ring" for press. In the spring of 1871 he was chosen conductor at the National-Theatre, Pesth, and he stayed there until 1875. In that year he directed an orchestral concert in Vienna with overwhelming success, and he was called to Vienna as the successor of Dessoff as conductor of the Imperial Opera and as conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, which positions he has since held with a few intermissions. In 1878 Richter was named Second Chapel Master of the Hofkapelle. In 1876 he directed the Wagner performances at Baireuth, and in 1877 he laid in London the foundations of his great renown in England.

***

Hanslick in his "Musikalisches Skizzenbuch" tells the story of Richter's first appearance in London.

***

It was in 1877 that Wagner was to direct in Albert Hall a festival, the programmes of which were selected from his works. Before his arrival, two conductors of London tried to lead the rehearsals—but in vain; conductors and players were utterly at sea. Richter grasped the stick and showed them the meaning of the music. The musicians were exceeding glad. At the festival Wagner was tired out and nervous; he only conducted the lighter pieces from "Tannhaeuser" and "Lohengrin." Richter conducted all the other selections, and such was his success that he was called on to lead a performance of symphonies of Beethoven. Richter's friend Franke bestirred himself and arranged for three Richter concerts in 1880.

His orchestra in London numbers 100, and in Wagner concerts the number is increased. He insists on strict rehearsals, to which hearers are not admitted.

It is estimated that each of these London concerts, one rehearsal included, costs about $2000. A full house brings in about $3000.

***

It is difficult to choose from the many and glowing eulogiums pronounced by experts on Richter's abilities.

Otto Lessmann of Berlin, a hyper-modern, praises the sincerity of the musician, and commends his leading for its freedom from conceit, personal originality, and all extravagance.

But he that wishes to study in advance the methods of Richter should read carefully Maurice Kufferath's "L'Art de Diriger l'Orchestre," Paris, 1890; for in this pamphlet of 100 pages are many interesting details concerning Richter, the conductor.

Richter is, for instance, scrupulous in the matter of the nuances. What Kufferath says concerning the famous orchestra of Brussels may be applied to our own organization: "These excellent violinists are, I think, too often merely virtuosos, and they play as such, with the bow on the string, giving constantly vibration to the tone." But Richter constantly insisted in rehearsals on piano, and was rigid in the observance of pianissimo. He was equally difficult to please in sustained forte.

He is a musician to the bone. His memory is remarkable, and he is fond of directing without the score. It is his habit after the final rehearsal to carefully go over the score to fix in his mind the intentions of the composer. His beat is imperious but simple. The rhythm is indicated with remarkable energy. At the same time he does not annihilate spontaneity; he does not reduce the orchestra to a machine. He is master because without imposing himself upon the players he does not abandon them. He vibrates with the players and they with him.

Above all, he does not direct, says Kufferath, for the audience; he is there simply for the orchestra; he regards nothing but the orchestra.

***

Let us hope that all these words are true. Let us also hope that he is not narrow, as has been suggested, but that he is a reasonable man who does not think that music is necessarily a thing of German invention, fostered by Germans alone.

"AN AUTOCRAT OF THE FIRST ORDER."

Such Mr. B. J. Lang Declares Herr Richter to Be—His Characteristics.

The director of two of Boston's choral societies, Mr. B. J. Lang, is not only acquainted with Hans Richter and with his personal habits, but knows him as a friend. Mr. Lang's talk with a Journal reporter Friday, consequently, is not only interesting but also illustrates Richter's characteristics.

"In the first place," said Mr. Lang, "Richter is a Hungarian, and, therefore, is not to be mistaken for a Bohemian, an Austrian or a German. He is a man of mature years. He was associated very much with Wagner and was always with him. Together they looked over the scores of a few of Wagner's operas, and Richter helped him in other things.

This friendship led to his being director of the first few seasons' festivals of the German master's music at Bayreuth.

As is known, he is a man of great experience. For years he has conducted at Vienna and every three years goes to Birmingham, England, and conducts the festivals there. Every summer he gives a series of concerts in London, not with his own orchestra but with one of picked players.

"Physically Richter is a man of great stature, with a commanding presence. He is not a picturesque character—not a man for the girls to rave over. They won't ask for locks of his hair," said the musician, smilingly.

"Professionally he is an autocrat of the first order, and I should think he was a mixture of—well, I can't say for the moment.

"It's hard to think of a personal anecdote at this moment." But after ruminating for half a minute or so, Mr. Lang continued, the smile of reminiscence deepening as he spoke: "You know, in Bayreuth the orchestra is under the stage and is quite concealed, the conductor being the only one who can see it and the stage. Well, one night I thought I'd like to experience what the effect was down there, and I took a seat among the players. Later on, unwittingly, I stood up. In a few moments I became aware that the men about me were all looking at one spot very closely. Then a violin bow tapped my leg, and I, looking with the others, saw Richter glaring at me as if he would kill me. I sat down immediately. Of course, I should not have stood up; besides, I was obstructing the view of a violinist. But if ever I thought a friend could kill me with a look it was then."

"HE'S A SPLENDID MAN."

Mr. W. J. Winch, Who Sang Many Times Under His Direction, Speaks With Praise.

Among those who consider themselves fortunate in the possession of Hans Richter's friendship is Mr. W. J. Winch, the tenor.

A Journal reporter, with whom Mr. Winch conversed during a passage down stairs yesterday, got the following interesting facts: "Richter is a man of charming personality, and," continued the speaker, "I am glad they've got him. I knew him well in London, and was in his company a great deal. We often lunched together, as he and I belonged to the same club. He is indeed a very fine man, when we were discussing the Ninth Symphony we had occasion to go back some measures, and he, without reference, struck the exact chord. Of course, that is only a little incident."

Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the director of the Handel and Haydn Society, also expressed his pleasure at the news. To a Journal reporter he said: "I have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Richter, but I know that he's a very fine man."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Busoni's performance of Liszt's second concerto was the feature of the twentieth Symphony programme. The work, as all students of pianoforte literature know, is not a concerto at all, but a free fantasia—almost a rhapsody at times—in which the composer seems to have written in his own interest as a pianist, contriving passages which must test every point of technical equipment to the utmost. For such a trial Mr. Busoni was splendidly prepared and he came through it triumphantly, for he seems to have a command of the keyboard not less than that of Paderewski, who is just now the accepted and worthy standard of comparison. Certainly he appears to reach the extreme limit of virtuosity, and he adds to this mechanical perfection a high degree of taste, judgment and proportion. His playing was happily appreciated and he was several times recalled with ardent applause. The concert began with a fine and romantic rendering of Tschaikowsky's dramatic and passionate "Romeo and Juliet" overture, no phase of which the conductor neglected or pushed to excess. The other numbers were Bachrich's excellent arrangement for strings of the prelude, adagio and gavotte of Bach and Beethoven's fourth symphony. The rendering of these was highly commendable, the only flaws being some cloudiness in the double-basses when the pace was forced beyond their limit of possible clearness.

The programme-book only gave two and a half pages of Berlioz this time!

The twenty-first concert was almost all delightful. The orchestral numbers were short, all but one of them well known and admired, and all were performed with ample spirit and discreet variety of color and expression. When we have named Haydn's C-minor symphony (with its charming trio for 'cello in the minuet, beautifully played by Mr. Schulz), the "Scherzo Capriccioso" of Dvorak and the gay theme with variations and the perpetuum mobile from Moszkowski's first suite, it will be readily understood that the programme was full of animation, vivacity and piquancy. The wholesome Haydn music was good to hear in its definiteness and simplicity, and the romantic vigor and restlessness of the Slavonic compositions made just a balance with the more serious matters of the evening. The other number was an example of high-minded ambition in a right direction—a "Dramatic" overture by Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang, the flight of whose pen has risen rapidly from the plane of vocal music to that of abstract composition where the notes and tones alone must tell their own story. The composition shows youth and inexperience, and ought not to have had a place among those of acknowledged mastership; but it demonstrates intelligent purpose, tangible feeling and the persistent desire and effort to justify its name. The principal themes are short; the one is a strong and sombre phrase, the other a wilder and keener one, with a sound of protest and rebellion in it. With these goes a melody of softer character, now nearly entwined with them and now lost in their growth and determined self-assertion. The subject sought for portrayal is apparently that of a gentle nature worn and crushed at last between the contending impulses and influences of life. The tragedy is not that of ideas or facts, for there are no crashing, clashing bars with their intimation of death; but it is that of mood and feeling, and implies rather the defeats and glooms which befall a spiritual being in the unequal contests with the grosser elements of this temporary world. Youth is betrayed by the want of a strong, steady grasp upon the themes, which results in such wandering and vagueness as belong rather to a tone-poem than an overture; but the atmosphere of the work is poetic and metaphysical, and the scoring, while generous and fanciful, is discreet and concentrated, the weightier forces of the orchestra being used sparingly and very seldom conventionally. The audience enjoyed the overture exceedingly, and Mr. Nikisch was called forward four times at its conclusion. Mr. Max Heinrich sang most acceptably and well, choosing for his orchestrally-accompanied number the large scene from Spohr's "Faust," "Der Hölle selbst will ich segen Entringen," and in lighter vein two songs from Schubert, beautifully accompanied by Mr. Nikisch—"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" and "Die Allmacht." The inequalities of his tone-production were noticeable in the scena, but in the songs his dramatic disposition could assert itself, and he did himself full justice.

Two overtures—Schumann's "Manfred" and Weber's "Oberon" will begin and end tonight's concert. A manuscript "symphonic tone-poem," by Mr. Busoni, will have its first hearing, and Mr. Kneisel will play Brahms's D-major violin concerto.

[140]

Boston Journal. TEN PAGES. SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1893.

HANS RICHTER,
Doctor of Music (Oxford), from the life-size picture by Georg Papperitz (Munich).

HANS RICHTER

May Become Director of Boston Symphony.

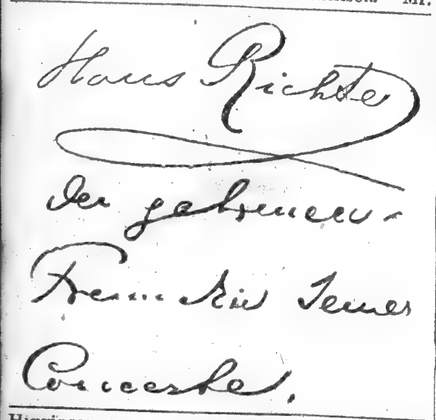
Resigns From the Vienna Imperial Orchestra.

Prospective Good Fortune for Musical Boston.

Sketch, and Other Facts of Personal Nature.

Dr. Hans Richter, at present the head Director of the Vienna Imperial Orchestra at the Court Opera House in Vienna, has been asked to succeed Mr. Nikisch as Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has resigned his position in Vienna at the present time, it is said, in order to go to Chicago, but after that it is supposed he will come to Boston.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson, to whose munificence the original existence of the Symphony Orchestra is due, was not inclined to talk about the matter of the leadership of the orchestra when the Journal reporter called at his office, asking him to either confirm or deny the report that Dr. Richter was to succeed Mr. Nikisch. Mr.



Higginson sent out word that he was very busy and had nothing to say about the case.

But from other sources it is learned by the Journal that the proffer has actually been made to Dr. Richter, and that it is confidently expected he will accept. There is one point to be cleared away, but that, it is hoped, will be soon accomplished.

There has recently been a conference in Washington to decide whether Dr. Richter has a right to come or not, for it was feared he would not be allowed to land in this country on account of the alien contract law, which forbids the landing of foreigners under contract. The question to be decided was whether Dr. Richter, in his position as an artist, was to be considered a musician under contract. All difficulty in this direction has been removed.

"GREATEST IN THE WORLD."

Thus Speaks Conductor Nikisch—He Says That Boston Is to Be Congratulated.

The present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, speaks of his successor in words which, coming from another, would be thought extravagantly praiseful. A Journal reporter talked with Mr. Nikisch after yesterday's rehearsal, and was the first one to definitely inform him of the resignation of Herr Richter.

"If it is really so," said Mr. Nikisch, "Boston is to be congratulated. Richter is the greatest conductor in the world. Everyone will say so of him. He is a great man.

"You know he is a man of long training. He was formerly a horn player, and then became conductor of the opera at Buda Pesth.

"Personally, he is such a man that his characteristics are of no interest to newspaper readers. I have known him for years, and can say that he is superior to all conductors living."

ANECDOTES OF RICHTER.

His Personal Characteristics, His Appearance and His Methods.

"Richter coming? Oh, it's too good to be true!" exclaim his enthusiastic admirers.

"But are you sure it is so? Is it not merely a rumor?" said Miss Lena Little of this city to the Journal representative yesterday. "I can hardly believe it. I knew he was coming to the World's Fair, for I received letters only the other day from friends in London telling me about it. But I never dreamed that he was going to stay. Oh, I can hardly believe it!

"I was well acquainted with him and with Mrs. Richter in London.

"But has he resigned his position at the Court Opera House in Vienna? I can hardly understand that. His work was so pleasant there, and so much easier than what he will have to do here. There are three or four directors at the Court Theatre beside himself, and he had very little traveling to do. But the Symphony Orchestra does a great deal of traveling, which is one reasen why Mr. Nikisch has disliked the work, and of all things Richter detests traveling. He has led the Philharmonic Orchestra of London, but that was only once a week and was not difficult work for him.

"The members of the Symphony Orchestra here can hardly appreciate how greatly they will be blessed if they should be so fortunate as to have Richter for their next leader.

"His bearing and appearance are typically German, although he is Austrian by birth. He is a large man, and has the true Saxon complexion. He has a very mild blue eye, and is jolly and good-natured.

"He not only knows how to direct an orchestra, but how to train his musicians, and how to get from them the best possible effects. He is able to do with his orchestra just what he desires, and can readily obtain the required effects from the musicians, because they understand at once just what he wants. For this reason he is not obliged to rehearse his orchestra nearly as much as most leaders. For this reason some have said that he was lazy; not because he did not produce the best effects with his orchestra, but simply because they knew that he did not do much rehearsing.

"I think one can hardly call him 'very catholic and broad' in his tastes, because there is so much music that he does not like at all. He likes most of the German music, I believe, but he indorses very little French music. His wife is very pleasant."

Mrs. Richter is not at all musical except by taste and associations. Of course she moves in musical circles on account of her husband's profession and position, but she neither sings nor plays.

"Dr. Richter has five beautiful children, the oldest being a daughter about fifteen years of age," continued Miss Little in conversation with the Journal caller.

"Many people seem to think Dr. Richter is growing old. But although he has been well known in musical circles for so many years, he is only about 50 years of age. His degree of Doctor of Music was received from Oxford."

Dr. Richter met with some very amusing experiences when he first went to England, for he was much troubled to learn the English language.

At one time he was conducting a rehearsal with his orchestra when he was suddenly seen to frown severely at the violinists. His keen eye at once detected the guilty one who was bolding his bow with the ends or fleshy parts of his fingers. Dr. Richter shook his head, rapped swiftly on the music rack with his baton to emphasize each word as he said vehemently:

"You must not bow with the meat of your fingers!" the word "meat" being the translation given in the dictionary for the German word "fleisch," which may also mean "flesh."

ABOUT HANS RICHTER.

Facts and Gossip Concerning the Celebrated Orchestra Conductor.

Boston may well plume herself if Hans Richter accepts the offer made to him and comes to us as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His reputuation was long ago established, and the years have only proved his natural gifts, his musical intuition, his catholic tastes, his mastery over players and his worth as a man as well as a musician.

***

Richter was born April 4, 1843, at Raab, Hungary. His father was a director of church music in the town, and when his father died (1853) Hans entered into the Hofkapelle of Vienna as a choir boy. From 1860 to 1865 he studied in the Viennese Conservatory of Friends of Music. He studied the horn under Kleinecke, and composition under Sechter and Hellmesberger. He also studied the pianoforte. He was engaged as horn player in the Imperial Opera Orchestra of Vienna.

Esser called the attention of Wagner to Richter, and in 1866 and 1867 Richter dwelt with Wagner in Lucerne and copied the score of "The Mastersingers" for publication. With the assistance of Wagner, Richter was chosen chorus director at the court opera in Munich, 1868. He afterward was director of the royal music. In 1869 Richter went to Paris to study there the state and conditions of music, but he was called to Brussels, where he directed the rehearsals of "Lohengrin," which was performed for the first time in that city March 22, 1870, at the Theatre de la Monnaie. The opera was given chiefly through the earnest efforts of Brassin, the late eminent pianist. Richter had amusing difficulties in his dealings with Vachot, the director of the theatre, while Singelée was the first of the orchestral conductors. Léon Dommartin gives the following account:

"A good fellow, this Richter, and an excellent musician. You should have seen him with Daddy Vachot, whom he called in his broken French, 'Mosié Fajotte,' with the air of a savage beast that whets his teeth. For Richter, sweet as a lamb on ordinary occasions, was ferocious when hands were laid on his idol. Vachot was crazy to arrange everything; he wished to cut right and left. Richter bowled in wrath, and called to witness gods and men, singers, orchestra, stage carpenters and firemen; he went about groaning and gesturing wildly: 'He wishes to cut everything.' The triumphal idea of Vachot was to introduce a ballet in the second act, under the pretext that the act needed enlivening. That day Richter, strangled by indignation, thought he would die. Vachot, too, was near death, for Richter spoke seriously of choking him."

However, the performance was a great success.

***

Richter went to Vienna and then returned to Wagner and assisted him in the preparation of the "Nibelungen Ring" for press. In the spring of 1871 he was chosen conductor at the National Theatre, Pesth, and he stayed there until 1875. In that year he directed an orchestral concert in Vienna with overwhelming success, and he was called to Vienna as the successor of Dessoff as conductor of the Imperial Opera and as conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, which positions he has since held with a few intermissions. In 1878 Richter was named Second Chapel Master of the Hofkapelle. In 1876 he directed the Wagner performances at Baireuth, and in 1877 he laid in London the foundations of his great renown in England.

***

Hanslick in his "Musikalisches Skizzenbuch" tells the story of Richter's first appearance in London.

***

It was in 1877 that Wagner was to direct in Albert Hall a festival, the programmes of which were selected from his works. Before his arrival, two conductors of London tried to lead the rehearsals—but in vain; conductors and players were utterly at sea. Richter grasped the stick and showed them the meaning of the music. The musicians were exceeding glad. At the festival Wagner was tired out and nervous; he only conducted the lighter pieces from "Tannhaeuser" and "Lonhengrin." Richter conducted all the other selections, and such was his success that he was called on to lead a performance of symphonies of Beethoven. Richter's friend Franke bestirred himself and arranged for three Richter concerts in 1880.

His orchestra in London numbers 100, and in Wagner concerts the number is increased. He insists on strict rehearsals, to which hearers are not admitted.

It is estimated that each of these London concerts, one rehearsal included, costs about $2000. A full house brings in about $3000.

***

It is difficult to choose from the many and glowing eulogiums pronounced by experts on Richter's abilities.

Otto Lessmann of Berlin, a hyper-modern, praises the sincerity of the musician, and commends his leading for its freedom from conceit, personal originality, and all extravagance.

But he that wishes to study in advance the methods of Richter should read carefully Maurice Kufferath's "L'Art de Diriger l'Orchestre," Paris, 1890; for in this pamphlet of 100 pages are many interesting details concerning Richter, the conductor.

Richter is, for instance, scrupulous in the matter of the nuances. What Kufferath says concerning the famous orchestra of Brussels may be applied to our own organization: "These excellent violinists are, I think, too often merely virtuosos, and they play as such, with the bow on the string, giving constantly vibration to the tone." But Richter constantly insisted in rehearsals on piano, and was rigid in the observance of pianissimo. He was equally difficult to please in sustained forte.

He is a musician to the bone. His memory is remarkable, and he is fond of directing without the score. It is his habit after the final rehearsal to carefully go over the score to fix in his mind the intentions of the composer. His beat is imperious but simple. The rhythm is indicated with remarkable energy. At the same time he does not annihilate spontaneity; he does not reduce the orchestra to a machine. He is master because without imposing himself upon the players he does not abandon them. He vibrates with the players and they with him.

Above all, he does not direct, says Kufferath, for the audience; he is there simply for the orchestra; he regards nothing but the orchestra.

***

Let us hope that all these words are true. Let us also hope that he is not narrow, as has been suggested, but that he is a reasonable man who does not think that music is necessarily a thing of German invention, fostered by Germans alone.

"AN AUTOCRAT OF THE FIRST ORDER."

Such Mr. E. J. Lang Declares Herr Richter to Be—His Characteristics.

The director of two of Boston's choral societies, Mr. B. J. Lang, is not only acquainted with Hans Richter and with his personal habits, but knows him as a friend. Mr. Lang's talk with a Journal reporter Friday, consequently, is not only interesting but also illustrates Richter's characteristics.

"In the first place," said Mr. Lang, "Richter is a Hungarian, and, therefore, is not to be mistaken for a Bohemian, an Austrian or a German. He is a man of mature years. He was associated very much with Wagner and was always with him. Together they looked over the scores of a few of Wagner's operas, and Richter helped him in other things.

This friendship led to his being director of the first few seasons' festivals of the German master's music at Bayreuth.

As is known, he is a man of great experience. For years he has conducted at Vienna and every three years goes to Birmingham, England, and conducts the festivals there. Every summer he gives a series of concerts in London, not with his own orchestra but with one of picked players.

"Physically Richter is a man of great stature, with a commanding presence. He is not a picturesque character—not a man for the girls to rave over. They won't ask for locks of his hair," said the musician, smilingly.

"Professionally he is an autocrat of the first order, and I should think he was a mixture of—well, I can't say for the moment.

"It's hard to think of a personal anecdote at this moment." But after ruminating for half a minute or so, Mr. Lang continued, the smile of reminiscence deepening as he spoke: "You know, in Bayreuth the orchestra is under the stage and is quite concealed, the conductor being the only one who can see it and the stage. Well, one night I thought I'd like to experience what the effect was down there, and I took a seat among the players. Later on, unwittingly, I stood up. In a few moments I became aware that the men about me were all looking at one spot very closely. Then a violin bow tapped my leg, and I, looking with the others, saw Richter glaring at me as if he would kill me. I sat down immediately. Of course, I should not have stood up; besides, I was obstructing the view of a violinist. But if ever I thought a friend could kill me with a look it was then."

"HE'S A SPLENDID MAN."

Mr. W. J. Winch, Who Sang Many Times Under His Direction, Speaks With Praise.

Among those who consider themselves fortunate in the possession of Hans Richter's friendship is Mr. W. J. Winch, the tenor.

A Journal reporter, with whom Mr. Winch conversed during a passage down stairs yesterday, got the following interesting facts: "Richter is a man of charming personality, and," continued the speaker, "I am glad they've got him. I knew him well in London, and was in his company a great deal. We often lunched together, as he and I belonged to the same club. He is, indeed, a very fine man. His memory is wonderful. I remember once when we were rehearsing the Ninth Symphony we had occasion to go back some measures, and he, without reference, struck the exact chord. Of course, that is only a little incident."

Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the director of the Handel and Haydn Society, also expressed his pleasure at the news. To a Journal reporter he said: "I have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Richter, but I know that he's a very fine man."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Busoni's performance of Liszt's second concerto was the feature of the twentieth Symphony programme. The work, as all students of pianoforte literature know, is not a concerto at all, but a free fantasia—almost a rhapsody at times—in which the composer seems to have written in his own interest as a pianist, contriving passages which must test every point of technical equipment to the utmost. For such a trial Mr. Busoni was splendidly prepared and he came through it triumphantly, for he seems to have a command of the keyboard not less than that of Paderewski, who is just now the accepted and worthy standard of comparison. Certainly he appears to reach the extreme limit of virtuosity, and he adds to this mechanical perfection a high degree of taste, judgment and proportion. His playing was happily appreciated and he was several times recalled with ardent applause. The concert began with a fine and romantic rendering of Tschaikowsky's dramatic and passionate "Romeo and Juliet" overture, no phase of which the conductor neglected or pushed to excess. The other numbers were Bachrich's excellent arrangement for strings of the prelude, adagio and gavotte of Bach and Beethoven's fourth symphony. The rendering of these was highly commendable, the only flaws being some cloudiness in the double-basses when the pace was forced beyond their limit of possible clearness.

The programme-book only gave two and a half pages of Berlioz this time!

The twenty-first concert was almost all delightful. The orchestral numbers were short, all but one of them well known and admired, and all were performed with ample spirit and discreet variety of color and expression. When we have named Haydn's C-minor symphony (with its charming trio for 'cello in the minuet, beautifully played by Mr. Schulz), the "Scherzo Capriccioso" of Dvorak and the gay theme with variations and the perpetuum mobile from Moszkowski's first suite, it will be readily understood that the programme was full of animation, vivacity and piquancy. The wholesome Haydn music was good to hear in its definiteness and simplicity, and the romantic vigor and restlessness of the Slavonic compositions made just a balance with the more serious matters of the evening. The other number was an example of high-minded ambition in a right direction—a "Dramatic" overture by Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang, the flight of whose pen has risen rapidly from the plane of vocal music to that of abstract composition where the notes and tones alone must tell their own story. The composition shows youth and inexperience, and ought not to have had a place among those of acknowledged mastership; but it demonstrates intelligent purpose, tangible feeling and the persistent desire and effort to justify its name. The principal themes are short; the one is a strong and sombre phrase, the other a wilder and keener one, with a sound of protest and rebellion in it. With these goes a melody of softer character, now nearly entwined with them and now lost in their growth and determined self-assertion. The subject sought for portrayal is apparently that of a gentle nature worn and crushed at last between the contending impulses and influences of life. The tragedy is not that of ideas or facts, for there are no crashing, clashing bars with their intimation of death; but it is that of mood and feeling, and implies rather the defeats and glooms which befall a spiritual being in the unequal contests with the grosser elements of this temporary world. Youth is betrayed by the want of a strong, steady grasp upon the themes, which results in such wandering and vagueness as belong rather to a tone-poem than an overture; but the atmosphere of the work is poetic and metaphysical, and the scoring, while generous and fanciful, is discreet and concentrated, the weightier forces of the orchestra being used sparingly and very seldom conventionally. The audience enjoyed the overture exceedingly, and Mr. Nikisch was called forward four times at its conclusion. Mr. Max Heinrich sang most acceptably and well, choosing for his orchestrally-accompanied number the large scene from Spohr's "Faust," "Der Hölle selbst will ich segen Entringen," and in lighter vein two songs from Schubert, beautifully accompanied by Mr. Nikisch—"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" and "Die Allmacht." The inequalities of his tone-production were noticeable in the scena, but in the songs his dramatic disposition could assert itself, and he did himself full justice.

Two overtures—Schumann's "Manfred" and Weber's "Oberon" will begin and end tonight's concert. A manuscript "symphonic tone-poem," by Mr. Busoni, will have its first hearing, and Mr. Kneisel will play Brahms's D-major violin concerto.

[140]

[illegible]

[illegible] EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR

VOL. XCIII., NO. 106.

SUNDAY, APRIL 16, 1893.

Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Franz Kneisel.

[illegible]or Nikisch is certainly to be commended for giving his Symphony concert [illegible] ances of the present season an up-to-[illegible] character, and whatever ill-success [illegible] attended his efforts in this direction [illegible] not be attributed to him so much as to [illegible] composers of the present day, from [illegible] works he has been obliged to select [illegible] contributions.

Last evening he brought forward, as among the novelties of the season, the "Symphonic Tone Poem," by F. B. Busoni, which is dedicated to Director Nikisch, and was given its first performance in public on this occasion.

Mr. Busoni will be recalled with much pleasure as the pianist who has made such a favorable record for himself, both in recitals and with the Symphony orchestra the present season, and it is disappointing that he should appear at such a disadvantage in this, his first, contribution in the way of a large work of a symphonic character. Mr. Busoni is evidently a thorough student of the modern orchestra, and in his "Poem" he has not been satisfied with less than a full complement of all the instruments known in the grand orchestra of today.

It is somewhat to be regretted that he has used such large means to such small ends, for he has been successful only in saying the most inconsequential things in the most magnificent way. He is evidently familiar with the compositions of the writers of the past and present, and has succeeded in showing most catholic taste in choosing his models to be followed in his composition.

The composition appeared to meet with favor by those who appreciate music from a scientific standpoint, and it certainly commands approval as the work of an able musician, however much it is lacking in evidences of Mr. Busoni's genius as a composer.

The appearance of Mr. Franz Kneisel as the soloist of the concert was a most enjoyable event, and this talented musician has seldom had a more pronounced evidence of his personal and professional popularity in Boston than that given him on this occasion. He played the Brahms' concerto in D major as his contribution to the programme, and gave a masterly performance of its movements that won him a grand demonstration at the end of the work, in which both audience and orchestra joined with great unanimity. The programme was begun with a very pleasing performance of Schumann's overture to "Manfred" and ended with a remarkably brilliant performance of Weber's overture to "Oberon."

HANS RICHTER.

A Vienna Correspondent Chats with Him.

He Talks Freely for Herald Readers—His Motives for Accepting the Boston Engagement—His Popularity with the Vienna Public—Some Local Impressions Given in Interviews.

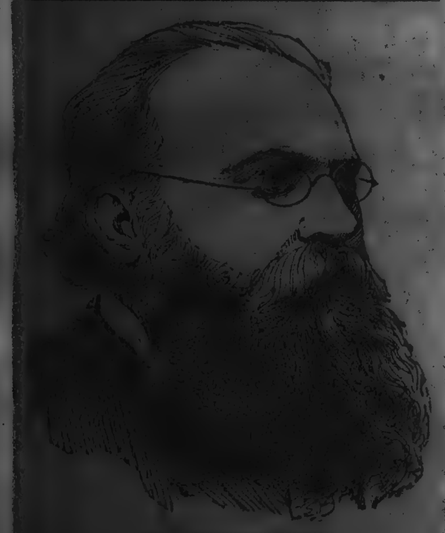
[BY CABLE TO THE SUNDAY HERALD.]

VIENNA, April 15, 1893. When I received cable instructions from Boston today to call upon Hans Richter and have a chat with him about his plans for going to America, I mentally congratulated myself upon being associated with his favorite paper here, and felt that the request made could be easily complied with.

I called at his pleasant residence this afternoon at the hour he is usually to be found at home, and confidently sent in my card with my jurnalistic position here duly inscribed upon it. To my surprise it was returned with a message of regret that a previous engagement would prevent my reception. My Viennese pride was touched, but my early American training came to my rescue, and pencilling under my Vienna address, "Correspondent BOSTON HERALD," I requested its return to the great conductor.

It Proved an Inspiration.

For presently the servant returned with a smiling face, and assured me that if I would



HERR HANS RICHTER.

at this moment I would be most heartily welcome to any service I desired.

My entrance to Richter's room was accompanied by a most hearty greeting, and it was evident to me that the HERALD of Boston was well known to Richter. I discovered that he had been besieged by members of the Vienna press, and had been compelled to be courteously reticent to all callers. He, however, expressed himself willing to [illegible] in America. [illegible] energy [illegible] is [illegible] Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 16, 1893.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert last evening had perhaps its most gratifying feature in the performance of Brahm's concerto for violin in D major. To perform a work of such magnitude as this concerto it is absolutely essential to possess just such earnestness, artistic sincerity and technical mastery as are the never failing auxiliaries of Mr. Kneisel's art; and last evening he was not only in his element so far as the distinguishing and all important characteristics of his virtuosal ability were concerned, but he was more than ever successful in individualizing himself himself with the composer. If anything his performance of the great work was throughout so eminently sincere and refined, that he perhaps excited a less appreciative degree of interest than has frequently attended the performances of men whose general attainments have been below his standard; but, in this connection, it is well to bear in mind that our concertmeister's feeling for his art is conspicuously more like that of a musician than a virtuoso. While far from being deficient in the virtuosity, so essential to the making of a really great player, Mr. Kneisel's ideas of musical interpretation are much too lofty and too sacred to admit of his being rated as a mere perfomer or a violin gymnast.

His taste is cultivated to the highest excess and his execution is so exquisitely finished, graceful and refined that it sometimes appears to encroach upon the energy of his performance. The quality of bravura which for its inherent allurement is as a sine qua non for other violinists, is by Mr. Kneisel cast into the shade and rendered less perceptibly at his command than it really is, owing to the predominating influence of his ever-scrupulous refinement and unrelenting loyalty.

While this is true there are apparently no technical difficulties that he can not master with the greatest ease, and his success with the concerto that he performed last evening, aside from his making the work itself perfectly clear and intelligible to the auditor without the slightest deviation from its beauty of form and expression, was also characterized by an inherent brilliancy that Mr. Kneisel has seldom equalled here. In brief he executed the exceedingly difficult concerto with such precision, assurance and calmness and at the same time with a self-effacement that enabled him to add to his interpretation of the composer, a sympathetic instinct and poetic appreciation, that he might easily have driven to despair some of the most skilful artists in orchestra who have studied the violin all their lives.

At the conclusion of his performance Mr. Kneisel was heartily eulogized in the prolonged applause of the audience and was made the recipient of several floral tributes including an elegant basket of flowers the very choice offering of his admiring pupils.

Following the concerto was a symphonic poem composed by F. B. Busoni. It would seem disrespectful to a musician, pianist and composer so deservedly esteemed as Mr. Busoni to attempt to pass final judgment. after a single hearing of a work so elaborate and so profoundly conceived as this symphonic tone poem.

The orchestration of the poem is apparently its noblest feature, and is marvellously ingenious. The opening bars contain some very clever canonic imitations, but wherein the tone poem as a whole is the logical development of a single poetic idea, it would seem impossible upon a first acquaintance with it to state. Considerable of it indeed would appear to be nothing more or less than an orchestral delirium; and seemingly contains much sound and fury signifying nothing more indeed than the possible pain and agony which might have incited the composer to write the work at a time when he would appear to have been a fit subject for a country doctor.

The concert had two overtures, namely "Manfred," by Schumann and "Oberon," by Weber. Few overtures have so powerfully influenced composerf as "Oberon." It was the happy remark of one of Weber's biographer's that through "Oberon" Weber became the father of all the musical elves, the naiads and mermaids. Thus also may be have invited Mendelssohn to write his "Midsummer Night's Dream," the "Melusina" and "Hebrides;" and it is more than possible that "Oberon" may have suggested to Bennett his "Naiads" and to Wagner his "Rhine Daughters." Oberon was literally Weber's Swan Song. After the opera was first performed on the ninth of April, 1826, in London, the composer, who for some time had been in ill health, eetertained but the single thought that he must go home and die among his people. "Der Freischutz" was to be performed for Weber's benefit on June 6, but on the second of that month (1826), he wrote his last letter, which ended thus: "God bless and preserve you in health. Would that I were with you"—this to his wife. On the morning of the 6th, writer his son and biographer, "Sir George Smart's servant knocked at his chamber door. No answer came. He knocked again and louder. . . . It was then resolved to force the door. All was still within. The watch which the last movement of the great hand which had written Freichutz Euryanthe and Oberon had wound up, alone ticked with painful distinctness. The bed curtains were torn back. There lay the beloved master, dead." Yes, Oberon was Weber's "Swan Song."

The orchestral playing throughout the concert was fairly if not quite on a par with the orchestra's well known standard.

[illegible] MONDAY, April 17, 1893.

The Twenty-second Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred" ..... Schumann
Concerto for violin, D-major ..... Brahms
Symphonic Tone Poem (Manuscript) ..... Busoni
Overture, Oberon ..... Weber

Mr. Kneisel was the violinist.

Mr. Busoni's orchestral poem is dedicated to Mr. Nikisch.

It calls for a modern orchestra that includes harp, double-bassoon, bass-clarinet, English horn, gong, cymbals, xylophone and drums in plenty.

And yet, with all these instruments, Mr. Busoni does not succeed in catching one effect.

He is alert, he is eager; he deliberately makes great preparations, so that the hearer sees him laying trains of gunpowder for the future explosions; or, again, he hopes to catch the hearer napping, and startle him by an unexpected discharge of orchestral artillery.

But try as he may: let him use silence or the xylophone, or let him set everything going at full speed; lo, there is no effect, except that the hearer, however well-disposed, is disturbed and dismayed.

The poem is said to be "purely fanciful," "absolutely free."

The hearer therefore enjoys the privilege of discovering things in the music.

The hearer is first introduced to Spenser's darksome cave, where he finds "That cursed man, low sitting on the ground,

Musing full sadly in his sullein mind."

The scene changes and the curtain rises on the earthquake at Lisbon.

There is a funeral march in honor of the engulfed.

The mourning is dispelled by the advance of the Chinese army arrayed in all the glorious panoply of war.

Again we are in Europe, and the sun rises on the battle of Austerlitz. After the realistic description of the battle, there are groans for the defeated, lamentation for the slain, and cheers for the little Man in Gray.

But now the hearer becomes confused; the music is wilder and is thrown from the stage in spasmodic jets.

There are suggestions of the blowing up of Hell Gate and an audible aurora borealis.

And there is a final return to the cave in the first scene.

***

Mr. Busoni is a pianist of remarkable ability. No one in this country to-day is in certain respects his superior, and in other certain respects he is superior to his colleagues.

He has orchestral technique as well as the technique of the pianist.

But when he wrote this orchestral poem he had nothing to say.

And so he wrote many notes for many instruments.

A little simplicity would have been more to the purpose.

One melody of power or beauty would have been grateful.

A logical sentence firmly knit would have pleased more than this rhapsody, punctuated solely by dashes, exclamation points and points of interrogation.

***

The feature of the concert was Mr. Kneisel's fine performance of the concerto. There might have been a more marked display of power in the last movement, and nowhere in the performance was there a revelation of temperament. But the playing of Mr. Kneisel was pure, accurate, chaste and full of noble serenity. He deserved the enthusiastic welcome; he deserved the hearty applause that followed each movement; for he is an artist whose chief aim is to glorify the chosen composer, and he devotes himself body and soul to the task.

***

The overtures were played with dramatic power, and the concert was of reasonable length.

***

The next concert will be devoted to selections from the works of Wagner. Miss Kaschoska, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Leimer and Mr. Meyn will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 16.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; Concerto for Violin, in D, Brahms; Symphonic Tone Poem (MS.), F. B. Busoni (first time), and Overture, "Oberon," Weber. The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel. The novelty of the evening, Mr. Busoni's work, was the most extraordinary composition that has ever been performed at these concerts. Why it should have been performed baffles understanding; why it should have been written is still more perplexing. It is redundant in ingenious and novel instrumental combinations, some of which are rich and beautiful in effect; but we must frankly confess that we found it impossible to detect what the music meant. If ever a musical work imperatively needed a minute description of its meaning printed on the programme, surely this is the very work. To us it seemed no more than a wild charivari, beginning in nothing particular, going nowhere, and leading to nothing but confusion. It says nothing intelligible and nothing that appears worth the saying. To us this tone poem seemed to depict a full-fledged Dakota cyclone roaring through a wholesale tin-ware establishment, destroying two or three dynamite factories with wildly explosive results, and causing the collapse of a six-story crockery warehouse. In other words it is nothing but noise, and hideous noise for the most part, as well. The audience listened to it in almost dazed astonishment, meekly applauded it when it was over, and then drew a breath of relief. Mr. Kneisel played the Brahms concerto with his familiar purity of taste and finish of style. He was received with prolonged enthusiasm, and, at the end of each movement, was stormily applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert will be devoted wholly to Wagner, with Miss F. Kaschoska, Mrs. A. Nikisch, Miss L. Leimer and Mr. H. Meyn as soloists.

Heutige „Demokrat“ hat ein Beiblatt.

Stadt Philadelphia.

Samstag, 15. April 1893.

Der neue Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters.

Boston, Mass., 14. April. Der berühmte Wiener Kapellmeister Hans Richter, welcher künftig an der Spitze des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters stehen wird, wurde am 4. April 1843 zu Raab in Ungarn geboren, trat 1853 als Chorknabe in die Wiener Hofkapelle, studirte darauf 1860—1865 im Conservatorium der Musikfreunde Klavier und Composition und wurde 1868 auf Empfehlung Richard Wagner's, bei dem er ein Jahr lang in der Schweiz geweilt hatte, zum Chordirektor an der Münchener Oper ernannt. Im Jahre 1870 leitete er die erste Aufführung des „Lohengrin“ in Brüssel, wurde 1871—1875 Kapellmeister am Nationaltheater zu Budapest und nachdem er 1875 ein großes Orchester-Konzert zu Wien mit außerordentlichem Erfolge dirigirt hatte, als Nachfolger Dessoffs Kapellmeister der Hofoper und zugleich Dirigent der Philharmonischen Konzerte in Wien. 1878 erhielt er die zweite Kapellmeisterstelle der Hofkapelle. Er dirigirte 1876 die Nibelungenaufführungen in Baireuth und 1877 abwechselnd mit Wagner die Wagner-Konzerte in London. Seit 1879 veranstaltete er jährlich Orchester-Konzerte in den Hauptstädten Großbritanniens.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 16, 1893.

Boston Symphony Season Soon to End.

Mr. Nikisch presented but one novelty at the Symphony concert yesterday, works by Schumann, Brahms and Weber making up the principal portion of the programme. The new composition was a symphonic tone poem in MS. by the talented composer and pianist, Mr. F. B. Busoni, dedicated to Mr. Nikisch.

The piece is a fanciful work, without any title to indicate the musical picture the author wished to present. The scoring is brilliant, tumultuous at times, and calls into play all of the instruments of the orchestra. Some of the effects are Wagnerian in the forte passages, and might well typify the tortures of a guilty soul in inferno.

As a piece of orchestration it must be ranked highly, for the color and variety of the different phrases and themes are ever changing and effective, but as a coherent, descriptive work it fails to fully satisfy the auditor.

It was played with vigor and confidence by the orchestra and evidently in harmony with the ideas of the composer.

Mr. Kneisel's performance of the Brahm's concerto was the gem of the evening, and he renewed his success of three seasons ago when he first played the piece in this city.

His glides, trills and double chords were notably true, and his introduced cadenza was most delicately played.

The whole interpretation was seemingly without a blemish, and the accomplished artist was several times summoned to the platform at the close of the number to bow his acknowledgments.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture and Weber's "Oberon" completed the programme. The tremendous orchestral crash in the latter piece was given with the proper force and aroused the usual astonishment among the spectators.

This week a Wagner programme will be given, with Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. Heinrick Meyn as soloists.

[141]

HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 108.

SUNDAY, APRIL 16, 1893.

Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Director Nikisch is certainly to be commended for giving his Symphony concert programmes of the present season an up-to-date character, and whatever ill-success has attended his efforts in this direction cannot be attributed to him so much as to the composers of the present day, from whose works he has been obliged to select contributions.

Last evening he brought forward, as among the novelties of the season, the "Symphonic Tone Poem," by F. B. Busoni, which is dedicated to Director Nikisch, and was given its first performance in public on this occasion.

Mr. Busoni will be recalled with much pleasure as the pianist who has made such a favorable record for himself, both in recitals and with the Symphony orchestra the present season, and it is disappointing that he should appear at such a disadvantage in this, his first, contribution in the way of a large work of a symphonic character. Mr. Busoni is evidently a thorough student of the modern orchestra, and in his "Poem" he has not been satisfied with less than a full complement of all the instruments known in the grand orchestra of today.

It is somewhat to be regretted that he has used such large means to such small ends, for he has been successful only in saying the most inconsequential things in the most magnificent way. He is evidently familiar with the compositions of the writers of the past and present, and has succeeded in showing most catholic taste in choosing his models to be followed in this composition.

The composition appeared to meet with favor by those who appreciate music from a scientific standpoint, and it certainly commands approval as the work of an able musician, however much it is lacking in evidences of Mr. Busoni's genius as a composer.

The appearance of Mr. Franz Kneisel as the soloist of the concert was a most enjoyable event, and this talented musician has seldom had a more pronounced evidence of his personal and professional popularity in Boston than that given him on this occasion. He played the Brahms' concerto in D major as his contribution to the programme, and gave a masterly performance of its movements that won him a grand demonstration at the end of the work, in which both audience and orchestra joined with great unanimity. The programme was begun with a very pleasing performance of Schumann's overture to "Manfred" and ended with a remarkably brilliant performance of Weber's overture to "Oberon."

HANS RICHTER.

A Vienna Correspondent Chats with Him.

He Talks Freely for Herald Readers—His Motives for Accepting the Boston Engagement—His Popularity with the Vienna Public—Some Local Impressions Given in Interviews.

[BY CABLE TO THE SUNDAY HERALD.]

VIENNA, April 15, 1893. When I received cable instructions from Boston today to call upon Hans Richter and have a chat with him about his plans for going to America, I mentally congratulated myself upon being associated with his favorite paper here, and felt that the request made could be easily complied with.

I called at his pleasant residence this afternoon at the hour he is usually to be found at home, and confidently sent in my card with my jurnalistic position here duly inscribed upon it. To my surprise it was returned with a message of regret that a previous engagement would prevent my reception. My Viennese pride was touched, but my early American training came to my rescue, and pencilling under my Vienna address, "Correspondent BOSTON HERALD," I requested its return to the great conductor.

It Proved an Inspiration.

for presently the servant returned with a smiling face, and assured me that if I would wait a moment I would be most heartily welcome to any service I desired.

HERR HANS RICHTER.

My entrance to Richter's room was accompanied by a most hearty greeting, and it was evident to me that the HERALD of Boston was well known to Richter. I quickly found that he had been besieged by my associates of the Vienna press, and had been compelled to be courteously reticent toward all callers. He, however, expressed himself as entirely willing to [illegible] for publication in America. [illegible] known for his immense energy [illegible] undertakings, and when once [illegible] given course he is culiarity has set all Vienna talking about Richter's plan of going to America since it has been known that he signed his contract with Mr. Higginson on Thursday, and his duties to the opera and the government have been widely discussed in all art circles here. I called his attention to the publication in today's paper of a statement that his contract with the opera house has four more years to run, and that he cannot retire until its expiration.

This did not appear to affect him in any way, and he simply reiterated his statement that he should fulfil his contract with Mr. Higginson to the letter.

He told me that

His Boston Contract

calls for his direction of two concerts each week, beginning in the early part of next October, and his duties under his new contract will, he thinks, be a great relief after those he has been subjected to here.

The two reasons which have led him to accept Mr. Higginson's contract are, first, a feeling that it will give him a relief from the overwork now imposed upon him here, which he feels the need of; and, second, what I am satisfied is a thorough and sincere admiration for and sympathy with the American people and American ideas.

Financially he is so situated that whatever money inducement has been held out by Mr. Higginson would have little or no influence upon his action in the matter.

When I ventured to suggest that he might find obstacles to carrying out his plans from his official associations he scowled in the way all who have ever played under him will readily remember, and said that he should carry out his contract with Mr. Higginson at any cost. He added, with a smile, that when once in America he expected he should quickly become thoroughly identified with its people, manners and ideas. For a resident of Vienna this is an approach to heresy, for Vienna is the world in the popular belief here. Richter told me that his plans had not been changed regarding his Chicago concerts as a part of the series associated with the exposition there. He will leave here early in June, and return immediately after his short stay in Chicago, to prepare to take his wife and family to Boston, in which city he expects to be established permanently by the middle of next September.

It is difficult for me to convey to the HERALD readers the

Consternation in Art Circles

here over this intended departure of Richter. It will be apparent from the facts that he directs the choral church service at the Imperial Chapel, is first director at the Grand Opera and conductor of the Philharmonic Society that he is thoroughly identified with Vienna art life. It does not appear to be realized here that all these duties make demands upon such a man that even his great energy is not at all times sufficient to carry him through them all.

From a pecuniary standpoint, although I am not at liberty to quote figures, I can say that the two concerts each week will give a much better return to Richter than all his engagements here.

Tomorrow Richter directs for the last time here the ninth symphony, and the excitement over the event is widespread. A grand ovation awaits him upon his appearance at the conductor's desk, and he will be made to realize once more how large a place he holds in the hearts of the Vienna musical public.

I am satisfied that Wilhelm Gericke, the former director of the Boston orchestra, has had not a little to do with the decision of Richter in regard to Mr. Higginson's contract, and I should not be surprised if it was largely due to his influence that Boston is to have the services of the greatest orchestral conductor now in Europe.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 16.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; Concerto for Violin, in D, Brahms; Symphonic Tone Poem (MS.), F. B. Busoni (first time), and Overture, "Oberon," Weber. The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel. The novelty of the evening, Mr. Busoni's work, was the most extraordinary composition that has ever been performed at these concerts. Why it should have been performed baffles understanding; why it should have been written is still more perplexing. It is abundant in ingenious and novel instrumental combinations, some of which are rich and beautiful in effect; but we must frankly confess that we found it impossible to detect what the music meant. If ever a musical work imperatively needed a minute description of its meaning printed on the programme, surely this is the very work. To us it seemed no more than a wild charivari, beginning in nothing particular, going nowhere, and leading to nothing but confusion. It says nothing intelligible and nothing that appears worth the saying. To us this tone poem seemed to depict a full-fledged Dakota cyclone roaring through a wholesale tin-ware establishment, destroying two or three dynamite factories with wildly explosive results, and causing the collapse of a six-story crockery warehouse. In other words it is nothing but noise, and hideous noise for the most part, as well. The audience listened to it in almost dazed astonishment, meekly applauded it when it was over, and then drew a breath of relief. Mr. Kneisel played the Brahms concerto with his familiar purity of taste and finish of style. He was received with prolonged enthusiasm, and, at the end of each movement, was stormily applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert will be devoted wholly to Wagner, with Miss F. Kaschoska, Mrs. A. Nikisch, Miss L. Leimer and Mr. H. Meyn as soloists.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 16, 1893.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert last evening had perhaps its most gratifying feature in the performance of Brahm's concerto for violin in D major. To perform a work of such magnitude as this concerto it is absolutely essential to possess just such earnestness, artistic sincerity and technical mastery as are the never failing auxiliaries of Mr. Kneisel's art; and last evening he was not only in his element so far as the distinguishing and all important characteristics of his virtuosal ability were concerned, but he was more than ever successful in individualizing himself himself with the composer. If anything his performance of the great work was throughout so eminently sincere and refined, that he perhaps excited a less appreciative degree of interest than has frequently attended the performances of men whose general attainments have been below his standard; but, in this connection, it is well to bear in mind that our concertmeister's feeling for his art is conspicuously more like that of a musician than a virtuoso. While far from being deficient in the virtuosity, so essential to the making of a really great player, Mr. Kneisel's ideas of musical interpretation are much too lofty and too sacred to admit of his being rated as a mere perfomer or a violin gymnast.

